Let us be understood on this point. We do not say that the more active the mind is the better will be the physical condition. But we do say, as we said in relation to muscular exercise in a previous article, that a certain amount of mental exercise is necessary to the best condition of the system, that is, to its highest and most confirmed health, and then, beyond this, the exercise can be extended in the case of the student, as with muscular exercise in the case of the laborer, to an amount which will not be inconsistent with the best condition of the system.

This is the natural and rational view of the matter. The Creator could never have designed that the soul, which he has so intimately connected with the body, should, in its legitimate activities, do damage to that body. On the other hand, it is in consonance with what we ordinarily see of the works of the Deity that mind and body should be of mutual benefit. Indeed we have abundant evidence that they do exert genial influences upon each other.

This is true in regard to the influence of the mind upon the body, not only of what directly concerns enjoyment and the use of which we may be called purely intellectual operations; for there is intellection in intellectual acquisition, and this will, like muscular exercise, exert an influence upon the body. And if the knowledge acquired be connected directly with the labor which is performed, it will strip that of its character of drudgery, and therefore substitute an enlivening in place of a depressing influence. And that knowledge, which has not this connection will lighten labor, by the consciousness of power and dignity which it gives.

Suppose here are a hundred farmers who have but little mental cultivation, and who therefore have not an idea of scientific knowledge of their business. The only satisfaction which they can have in their labor comes from its results and the anticipation of them, and the thought, moreover, must be for the most part mere drudgery. Suppose another hundred, who work in the same way that the first do, but, from their early education, or from what they have had, understand to some good extent natural philosophy, chemistry, geology, zoology, and vegetable physiology. They will find a pleasure in something else besides results—the processes by which these are reached and the influence of fertilizers upon them are subjects of interest and pleasure as they watch the progress of the vegetation under their care. Their employment furnishes them with continual food for thought; and though it has degraded and rendered interesting, is not wearisome, monotonous drudgery, as it is when performed with little thought beyond that which is absolutely necessary to its performance.

This latter company of farmers will be on an average live longer and have better health than the first company, simply because their labor would be performed under more genial and sustaining influences. Indeed, few persons have any amount of labor than the uncultivated and unthinking, for there is less wear and tear of the system when it works cheerily than when it performs its functions come task.

Suppose farther, that the wife and daughters of an intelligent farmer understand all the chemistry concerned in the dairy, the composition of milk, the character of the various grasses and the physiology material for all the different organs of the body, and, besides this, the phenomena of vegetation, and other allied subjects, in connection with the farmer himself, how would their labor be lightened, and how would the consciousness of intellectual pleasure produce a genial influence upon the whole field of promoting health! And in the rest of evening, after the labors of the day are over, how would the intelligent conversation of such a family be of the benefit of rest by giving it the character of an agreeable diversion!

What we have said of farming is true also of the mechanic arts. If the mechanic understand the principles that lie at the basis of his art he has an interest in his work which he can not enjoy but not. His work is not simply skillful manipulation the mind does not merely think enough to guide the hand, but is busy with itself either on the principles involved in the work, or on some other subject, and this agreeable occupation of the mind lightens the toil. It actually becomes recreation! were properly educated, and their families also, how much would the consequent intelligent conversation of the family and its visitors add to the joy and comment of life, and therefore benefit their physical as well as mental and moral condition!

The education which we have supposed is far from being an impossibility. It is within the range of our common schools. The knowledge which is absolutely lost in loading the memory with words and forms of expression and processes, that are not understood, would, if understood, bring about the conscious things with which the pupil will have to do most in after-life, such as air, water, light, heat, mechanics, chemical effects, vegetation, etc. Then such mechanics and farmers as we have spoken of would abound in the community, and this change in education would, we have said, add vastly to the health of those classes and to their average length of life.

BARBARA FRIETCHIE.

THE beautiful poem by WHITTIER which we copied last week to accompany the portrait of BARBARA FRIETCHIE was originally published in The Atlantic Monthly, and should have been credited to that periodical.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

July 18:

In the Senate, Mr. Sherman called up the bill to fund the public debt. The first and second sections, giving the legal-tender notes the same character as five-per-cent bonds were stricken out.—The death of Senator Lane was announced.

In the House, the contested election case of Kountz and Cobden, from the Sixteenth District of Pennsylvania, was called up and decided in favor of the former.—The Revised Tariff bill was considered and passed under the operation of the previous question by a large majority—yeas 88, nays 34. The 25th of July was fixed for the adjournment of Congress.

July 19:

In the Senate, a bill directing the President to place $50,000 at the disposal of the Governor of Maine for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in Portland, Maine, was passed, 22 to 18.—The bill for the funding of the public debt was resumed.—Mr. Trumbull declined to recognize the State Government of Tennessee, and announced that the Legislature of that State had just ratified the Constitutional Amendments.

In the House, a bill granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific Railroad in California to Portland in Oregon was passed.—Mr. Shellabarger called up the report of the Select Committee on the charges made by Hon. Reverdy Johnson, in his late Baltimore speech, against General GRANT and Mr. BOUTWELL. The report briefly exonerates Mr. Conkling and severely censures Mr. Ely. It was adopted with only four dissenting votes.

July 20:

In the Senate, Mr. Sumner presented the report of the Conference Committee on the Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill, which was agreed to after considerable discussion.—The Tennessee bill, to compromise by gross for the coming year to the United States Minister at Lisbon, Portugal.

In the House, the joint resolution for the admission of Tennessee was passed—yeas 125, nays 27. The following names were voted nay—Alley, Benjamin, Boutwell, Eliot, Higby, Hooker, Kelley, Morrill, Orth, Sloan, McVeigh, Palmer, Williams.

July 21:

In the Senate, the Committees on the Judiciary reported back the House joint resolution declaring Tennessee entitled to representation. The Committee with an amendment in the form of a substitute which briefly alluded to the several points of the House bill, but moved unconstitutional, and which had paved the way for its restoration. Mr. Sherman objected to the bill in its present form as it would probably be vetoed by the President. Mr. Trumbull supported the substitute.—Mr. Johnson thinks the substitute ground, and was rejected, but a change was made in the body of the bill which would restore it to the House. The vote was 28 to 4, Messrs. Sumner, Brown, Buckalew, and Saulsbury voting in the negative.

In the House, the Russian case being under discussion, Mr. Stevens moved to strike out the appropriation which he said had been manifestly tossed into in debate. He thought it improper to interfere between the Czar and his people. Mr. Schenck said that he had sent to the Governor of Alaska all the information in his possession.

July 23:

In the Senate, the Civil Appropriation bill being taken up, the Committee on Appropriations reported back the bill to put out of the consolidation draft fund, for every slave being, to help defray the cost, to exceed $300 each, was adopted. An amendment increasing the pay of clerks in the Treasury Department to $1,800 was agreed to.—An amendment abolishing the mission to Greece was adopted.

NEWS ITEMS.

Cholera has broken out on the steamer San Salvador, which arrived at Savannah on the 18th of July with 800 recruits for the Mexican Imperialists. There were 25 cases among them and 3 deaths during the voyage. One death occurred after the arrival. The vessel will not be allowed to land the troops but landed at Tybee Island. There was no sickness among the troops on shipboard, but the steamer was ordered to remain in quarantine 15 days.

The Commissioners appointed by Governor St. Joseph, Missouri, on the 16th, and report considerable disorder in society there, because of the threatening proclamations of the rebel element. Loyal citizens find it difficult to live in peace.

In the Lower House of the Tennessee Legislature the Constitutional Amendment was passed, July 19, by a vote of 45 to 18. Governor Brownlow sent the following telegraphic dispatch to the President:

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, Thursday, July 19—11 M.

To Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

My compliments to the President. We have carried the Constitutional Amendment in the House. Vote 45 to 18; two of us took refusing to vote.

W. G. BROWNLOW.

Senator Lane having died, and Senator Pomeroy's term expiring with the present session, the Legislature of Kansas legislature must elect two Senators to fill their places.

A dispatch announces the appointment of KINNEY as successor to that Major E. G. Rose, editor of the Lawrence Tribune, has been elected United States Senator for that State, in the place of the late James H. Lane.

The Commissioners of Public Accounts state that George Peabody intends to bestow $50,000 each upon Harvard, Dartmouth, Yale, and Williams Colleges of Massachusetts, and the sum of $1,000,000 upon Boston for homes for the poor.

The death occurred on the 19th, at 1115, of Major-General Barlow, of wounds received in the battle of the Wilderness.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE EUROPEAN WAR.

THE LONDON TIMES of the 20th publishes a telegraphic dispatch consist of the great battle of Sadowa at once from the tower of Koniginhof, which is the highest point reached since then the Austrians, for they incurred the chance of being surrounded by the Prussian army, if they never could succeed in withdrawing their army in the face of the enemy through Koniginhof, which was the only line of retreat they had entered Bohemia. Benedek, on the other hand, had a wide retreat open to him through Olmutz and Prague, and, Benedek to his splendid cavalry, was able to avail himself of it. Dr. Brandt, who had visited the battle-field, says the density of the smoke did not obscure the whole field of action in which the movements for the Prussian turning of the Austrian flank without being seen. Between 11.30 and 12 o'clock the Austrian army was all broken, and successful on the centre and on its flanks, although the fury of the conquering Prussian troops rendered it impossible to follow up the front from the front of Neuhaustz to the platform of Koniginhof, although the Austrians were making the most obstinate resistance of the Prussians. At one o'clock the Prussians, having driven the Austrians out of the ground on the right. Then as the Austrian left and centre gained ground the right yielded, and after considerable fighting Benedek came upon the ridge fitting as they advanced, while their guns on the left were still very retreating but not disorderly Austrian with shrapnel and case.

"It was now about two o'clock, and I thought that there could be no hesitation in declaring that the Prussians were all but victorious. I assured as if a change as could of the bone dredged for miles on the plateau could still be kept up. Benedek, or, rather, his staff, could not be ignorant of the fact that the Austrians from the right of the centre to oppose the last effort of the Prussians to force the open interval between the centre and the extreme right resting on the Koniginhof ground near the river, but the Austrians did not perceive it, or if they did could not protect the advance of the Prussian flag the plateau that the big tree toward Kim. The Austrian right and reserve became more and more broken, their artillery coutre very fast of ground. Suddenly a spattering of musketry broke out on their extreme right. A short fight ensued, and the Austrian gunners and on the columns of infantry drawn up on the plateau. The latter cannot fail on all sides—their losses are dreadful—the fire increases in intensity—the Prussians are on the left—the Austrians in the centre—in an awful catastrophe—two columns of Austrians are led against the Prussians, but they are not stand the fire, and after three attempts to carry it retreat, leaving the hill-side covered with dead and wounded. The Austrians—The Prussians see their advantage; they have got into the very centre of the position. It is with the staff-officers fly to the reserves and horses to get back some of the artillery from the front. The Austrian artillery-horses in the open ground between the centre and the extreme right rushing on the Prussian flank, and from the slope take both the Austrians on the extreme right and the reserves in flank. The spread away to the woods near the Prague road and fire into the rear of the Austrian gunners. Then a wedge-shaped mass of Prussians drives in more deeply every instant was forced into the very body of the Austrian centre, which is now in full retreat, dividing the left and centre from the right. The troops in the centre and left of the Austrians, which is now completely gone in the rear, and are soon exposed to the fire which most of all destroys the moral and the Austrian army. The Austrians on the right, previously broken up and discomfited, hurry toward the Prague road in something like confusion, and spread alarm among the reserves of the left and right. The regular lines of the columns have also gradually lodging out, and are at last swallowed up in disordered multitudes. Officers give orders about trying to restore order. Some regiments hold together, though they are losing men in large every instant. The left wing is arrested in its onward progress. The Prussian generals in front of them and on the centre, seeing their enemy waver, throw their battalions against them and encourage their artillery to final efforts, but the formidable Austrian cavalry prevents any hasty or enthusiastic demonstrations on the part of the Prussian right whose long-continued fighting and heavy losses must have exhausted their energy.

Even then Dr. Russell and in this opinion the military correspondent of The Times evidently thinks that a decisive charge of Austrian cavalry might have restored the fortunes of the day; but the cavalry were not called on for this service, and were used merely to prevent the retreat of the infantry. A combination of recklessness and slowness on the part of the Austrian generals, to the former of which Dr. Russell attributes the defeat, ingt. to prevent the Austrian left, ingt. to prevent the order of battle being changed, and especially to prevent the Austrian centre by the Prussian right, by which long-continued fighting and heavy losses must have been avoided.

Even then Dr. Russell and in this opinion the military correspondent of The Times evidently thinks that a decisive charge of Austrian cavalry might have restored the fortunes of the day; but the cavalry were not called on for this service, and were used merely to prevent the retreat of the infantry. A combination of recklessness and slowness on the part of the Austrian generals, to the former of which Dr. Russell attributes the defeat, ingt. to prevent the Austrian left, ingt. to prevent the order of battle being changed, and especially to prevent the Austrian centre by the Prussian right, by which long-continued fighting and heavy losses must have been avoided.

Even then Dr. Russell and in this opinion the military correspondent of The Times evidently thinks that a decisive charge of Austrian cavalry might have restored the fortunes of the day; but the cavalry were not called on for this service, and were used merely to prevent the retreat of the infantry. A combination of recklessness and slowness on the part of the Austrian generals, to the former of which Dr. Russell attributes the defeat, ingt. to prevent the Austrian left, ingt. to prevent the order of battle being changed, and especially to prevent the Austrian centre by the Prussian right, by which long-continued fighting and heavy losses must have been avoided.

It appears from Dr. Russell's account that the needle-gun was of very little avail in the battle, the country not being favorable to its use. About 70,000 Prussians were engaged on the field, and the Austrians are computed that many 200 Prussians as an equal number. It is estimated that many 200 guns were in action, of which 150 were Prussian. The Prussians had the night of the enemy fell by one hundred and fifty; but each side must have suffered terribly. The woods offered shelter to the Austrians, and the ground, in some degree, from the needle-gun, while at the same time it afforded an excellent artillery position. The Austrians lost 18 guns, which the Prussian Regiment of Guard, Captain Count Stolberg, was the first to enter. Twenty-eight officers and nearly 300 men fell with him. They promptly blew up all the works and fortifications defending the town, and had a large number of the guns which formed the bridges. The next morning the Austrians made a renewed demonstration before Kaya, with artillery, in the direction of London. They were driven back with the bayonet by the Prussian Guard, and the bridge over which place was occupied by the volunteers. Gerlitsch was present, but had not engaged in a carriage in consequence of his wound. Gerlitsch had been wounded in a stream on the 29th June. Dr. Russell is of opinion that the excellent staff reports that it is to performing wound by a small shell at the close extremity of the left flank. The distance between the points at which the ball entered and passed out is about four inches.

The negotiations for an armistice have not arrested the progress of the Prussian into Austria. The army of the Crown Prince, which forms the tête-de-pont of the invading force, is now at Brunn, the Moravian capital, already far beyond Pardubitz, and within a short distance of Vienna.

The Times gives the following as the conditions on which the Italian army is prepared to be transferred to the Emperor Napoleon:

First, That the question of the District of Trent should be referred to Italy to be discussed.

Second, That the question of the Duchies of Trent should be referred to Italy to be discussed.

Third, That the Austrian fortresses in the Quadrilateral should be given up to the Austrians.

The Prussian conditions contained in the letter of Prince Napoleon are stated to be as follows:

The exclusion of Austria from the Germanic Confederation.

The exclusion of Austria from the Germanic Confederation.

The Confederation of Austria.

The Confederation of the military and naval forces of the Confederation by Prussia.

The diplomatic representation of Germany abroad, and the annexation by Prussia of the Duchies and part of the territory already occupied.

The following are the basis of the negotiations suggested by France, and communicated to Count von Goltz and Prince Metternich, by whom they have been transmitted to Berlin and Vienna:

The Germanic Confederation to be dissolved and another constituted in order to establish a line of neutrality Prussia nor Austria should form a part.

The territorial integrity to be respected of Austria.

The abandonment by the latter of her rights on the Duchies, and to place the war indemnity to be first demanded by Prussia.

Prussia to incorporate Schleswig-Holstein, Hesse Cassel, Hesse Darmstadt, and Brunswick. The population of the Prussian Monarchy would thereby be raised to 24,000,000—the Rhine to constitute the western frontier of Prussia, and the Austrian Netherlands to be given to Prussia or else as an indemnity to the sovereigns dispossessed by the latter.

An exchange of territory to take place between Baden and Bavaria, whereby the latter would give the whole of the Rhenish Palatinate; Saxony, Hanover, and the Electors of Hesse to constitute military alliance with Prussia. The inhabitants of London to choose whether they shall belong to Prussia or Austria, the boundary line in the Valley of the Saone to choose between France and the Germanic Confederation.

The Florence journals of the 10th assert that Prussia had declined the Austrian proposals.

The same journals announce that the Prussian Government has officially declared to the Italian Cabinet that Italy can not accept an armistice which, being based upon the cession of Venetia, would be concluded and separately concluded peace, and would disengage to the detriment of Prussia and to the ruin of Italy.

The Austrians are to be allowed to send no more troops after the battle of Sadowa as was expected. We have therefore reason to believe that the Emperor FRANCIS JOSEPH'S negotiations for an armistice have failed. The Prussian Government cannot be induced not to make any humiliating concessions. The Austrian army has been driven from the interior of Bohemia to Olmutz before the enemy to make peace with the Prussians before he will consent to the cession of Venetia. Fighting is feared by a very large and influential section of the people in the provinces of Austria and Bohemia. Nor is the confidence of the Austrian government in the valor of its troops in the very formidable force at their disposal. The army of the Archduke ALBERT, which consists of 150,000 men, including some selected from the troops which have been engaged in Italy, is there and its troops are employed on garrison duty. Another 50,000 men, and the reserve of nearly 100,000 more, will be drawn from the following districts: Hungary proper, which has a population of 9,000,000 and can supply 40,000 men and 60,000 more from the military districts of Transylvania, Croatia, Slavonia, and the Military Frontier. Another 50,000 men will be drawn from Lombardy, 30,000 men from Venice, and 60,000 men and some hundreds of guns from the provinces of Austria proper and Bohemia. Besides these troops, which are to be employed in the defense of the country, the Austrians have still an army of 100,000 troops, well equipped, provided with strong reserves, and with artillery and cavalry. They are to be reserved for an army of that strength.

The Archduke has been superseded in the chief command by the Archduke ALBERT.

The Vienna official of Tuesday reports the loss at the battle of Custozza on the 24th ultimo: Officers, 69 killed, 203 wounded, 30 missing; 20 missing. Total loss in men, 631 killed, 2968 wounded, and 4462 prisoners and missing.

H.S.H. PRINCE CHRISTIAN.
H.R.H. THE PRINCESS HELENA.

SECRET MEETING OF SOUTHERN UNIONISTS.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, A. R. WAUD.]

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

MEETING OF UNION MEN.

THE Union men of Louisiana say: "The Government has deserted us; WELLS, our Governor, has crushed us, and General CANBY has helped him to do it. When the armies of the United States occupied our State we were encouraged to come forward and proclaim ourselves; needful elections were held, and the general result good and faithful civil officers.

"The people found themselves free to vote as they pleased; a privilege seldom exercised in this section; and we rejoiced in the absence of the fearful power of the rebellion, par excellence the poor man's enemy. Now the progress of reconciliation has returned the power to the hands of the old dominant slave-owning class, the same that has always kept the poor white man ignorant and useless. And now they vote as Major this or Colonel t'other tells them to. As for the Union men they are proscribed, outlawed; if the Confederacy had succeeded, JEFFERSON DAVIS could not have done worse for them. And in thus sacrificing the interests of Union men the Government has not attracted an atom of devotion or loyalty from those who were lately rebels. Conciliation here means neither the improvement of the black nor white race, but simply the placing means of mischief in the hands of the old domineering class which produced the rebellion, and is now only abiding the time when it may once more have the power to do the country an injury."

It was with astonishment that I found how complete is the re-establishment of the old "Reign of Terror" for Southern Union men, the wistful glance at strangers, the constraint upon their speech—for none dare to speak out who wish to live in the South—with the exception of those who live in large cities, where numbers make men bold. These, and an air of depression and suffering, are the present characteristics of the "native Unionists." In some places, where they are few in number, employment is kept from them, and covert insult—sometimes more—is heaped upon them. Being invited to attend a meeting of them—for obvious reasons I need not state the precise spot—I entered a little house, where the accommodations were very limited, and a look-out was kept in case any chivalric folks might be in the neighborhood to repeat the little trick of letting off their pistols through the thin boards of the house, and then running away in the dark; the accidental discharge of fire-arms at night being a thing no one can count on—not if he is a Union man, certainly.

THE "IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT"—CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, JUNE 24, 1866.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]

The sketch gives but a faint idea of the air of secrecy and distrust with which these good fellows meet. As far the business which brought them together, it was simply benevolent and self-protective; but, being Union men, they could not meet openly without increasing the hatred against them, and becoming objects for further persecution.

THE "IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT."

In nearly all the cities of the South such scenes as this are occasional occurrence, only failing to assume the proportions of the Memphis slaughter by the action of the military authorities.

This affair commenced on the afternoon of Sunday, upon the battery at Charleston, where large numbers of both whites and blacks were congregating. Some colored men and boys, on the top of a mound, being boisterous, were ordered away by the police. A one-armed man among them was abusive, he was arrested, and, for showing resistance, beaten till he was covered with blood. This led to excited remarks from the populace, and in a short time, to the throwing of brickbats; the favorite weapon in these little skirmishes. The Provost Marshal, Captain Fielden, drove himself between the combatants, and begging them to desist, called upon them not to disgrace Charleston by making it the scene of a Memphis riot. The whites professed to heed him till he turned to address the retreating negroes, when they again commenced to throw brickbats. "Take care, you will hit the Captain!" said one. "That's the man I want to hit," answered another. "Kill the Yankee son of a b—h." The police could not use double quick; came right upon the leaders of the white mob in the act of throwing, but made no effort to arrest one; pushing through them, they endeavored to reach the negroes, and some were arrested. Now in Charleston and its vicinity there are some very bad characters among the whites, a number of them turbulent fellows were in the crowd, but it is equally true that the whites were quite as bad, and very desirous of battle with the "niggers." As was one of the white men died of his injuries. And the Charleston papers insinuated that the matter was aggravated by the actions of the Provost Marshal. A, who was a spectator, knew better; with much risk to himself, he succeeded in stopping the onward fight, police came up, and the work of fire-arms, the usual result of these brickbat fights, was prevented.

As stated before this is not an isolated occurrence, but a characteristic incident; and it requires but little reflection to consider in what condition the South would be if the military influence should be so speedily withdrawn.

A. R. W.

PRINCE CHRISTIAN AND PRINCESS HELENA.

WE give on page 484 portraits of her Royal Highness the Princess HELENA, third daughter of Queen VICTORIA, and of PRINCE CHRISTIAN of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenburg, to whom she was married on the 22d of January, 1866, at Windsor. He holds, or held until lately, a captaincy in the Third Regiment of Prussian Uhlans of the Guard. He will now, however, probably retire from the Prussian service, if he has not already done so, as it is understood that the Princess and her husband are to reside permanently in England. The Prince has had the title of Royal Highness conferred upon him, and has also been made a Major-General in the British Army.

The following description of the marriage is taken from the London Times:—

"There was no pomp in the chapel where pomp could add to them to command a view of the regal train as it swept through the long corridor, but there was no fortunate enjoyed a spectacle of great magnificence. The corridor was from end to end of the building, and was open to all the apartments along its course, and forming a means of communication with the chapel royal. Every Prince heightened approach, lined by the Gentlemen-at-arms, with their richly-faced uniforms, their drawn swords and tall bullet-caps, formed a splendid avenue for the procession, which moved onward to the music of Handel's Triumphal March.

On the first entry of the royal party there was a slight hesitation as to places, caused, no doubt, by the absence of the Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who was the attack of gout, but this was speedily rectified. Louis Napoleon, Lord Chamberlain, and Lord Steward, and Lord Churchill, employed the interval in proceeding to the Red Room, from which they returned with the bridegroom. MRED HIGNESS'S march from "Athalie" was gilding as they entered the chapel. Then followed the most Prince CHRISTIAN wore the uniform of a Major General in the British service, the only mark of distinction as a foreign uniform being the ORDEN RANDAU, h' gentleman of honor.

Advancing to the altar-rails and making the slight inclination required, they took their places—on the left the Royal Highness knelt for a few seconds in prayer, and then, rising, were presented to their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians. The photographs, as usual, convey but an inaccurate idea of the bridegroom, who is a very tall man, apparently between 25 and 40 years of age, with a good forehead, but the upper part of his face covered by a heavy moustache, peculiar of the features are visible wearing a calm, determined expression that never forsook him, but appears to enter into the solemnities of his actions.

There was a pause of nearly ten minutes before the procession of the bride made its appearance, also heralded by a stately march. This time from HANDEL'S "Scipione." All present rose as the Princess, supported by the Queen and the Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, entered the chapel; and the members of the different processions, with now considerably elevated the sound-screen in front of the apartment, proceeded to take up new positions.

The train, in entering the chapel was visibly doubled, but regained its proper upon reaching her place at the left hand side of the altar, and subsequently, with the necessary exception with a clearness and audibility to be heard in the theatre of speeches from the throne to day when those were read by the sovereign in person.

The Queen wore a dress of black moire antique, embroidered with a long crape veil falling from under a crown of diamonds, with necklace and diamond ornaments. The Princess HELENA wore a wedding-dress of rich white satin, trimmed with Honiton point lace, and trimmed with bouquets of orange blossom and myrtle, under a white satin veil of Honiton lace, fastened with orange blossom and myrtle. Wedding-wreath of orange blossom and myrtle under a splendid veil of Honiton lace, in pattern similar to that worn by her sister, the Princess ALICE, on her marriage. The service was performed by the Lord Primate. The queen, in person, gave away the bride, responding to the inquiry made by the Primate with a gentle inclination of the head and a smile.

The ceremony over, the bride was formally embraced by Her Majesty and the Prince of Wales; and, leaning upon the arm of her husband, her Royal Highness was led to the altar-rails, where the Archbishop, the royal procession, clergy, and attending officers, and in presence of the accompanying and attending them, and in presence of the remainder of the guests, the registry of the marriage was attested in due form.

HONEY.

CHESTS as brown as chestnuts could not blush, of course. At least they could not, but as Honey stood there, her kinky head dropped down, two dimples framing her full mouth, and her eyes just glimmering under their curved lids, it was a plain that she blushed as if you could have seen her do it. She tugged at the corner of her white pinafore, and then dropped it, wriggled her fat shoulders and tried to get away, but Sam held her fast.

"Can't go yet, Honey; can't go yet. Dere is no time like de present. Dere's a question I want to ask ye."

"Dunno what kin be," said Honey, knowing well.

"Jes only whether you don't like me a little, Honey?"

"Dere now! No, of course not!"

"Don't I like it, Honey."

"Dunno why you should presumptuate I do."

"Well, Honey, 'cause I'm so berry fond o' you."

Honey relented a little.

"You see," said Sam, holding her fast still, "Massa tell me some time ago to pick out a gal I liked, and dere an't no gal I like but you. You's jes de purtiest and smartest in dese parts, and I don't marry no one else. I's neber repent it; fas as I kin. I'll make you happy, Honey."

And then his voice fell a little, for at that instant he crossed the dusty threshold a man who did not, even own himself, who never could own even his children, might find it a little hard to make his wife happy under some circumstances.

Honey just then only thought of him. She lifted her great soul-brown eyes and gave him a look that stopped them again. Sam put his arm a little further around her waist.

"Honey, if you will, Massa'll give us a regler wedden'. He said he would, and you dunno how glad I'll be. Years like I shouldn't take no heart in nuthin' if you liked Bill best."

"I don't like Bill a bit," said Honey.

"Then you'll like me?"

"Oh, go way!" said Honey, "spect I'll hab to go to be shet of you."

And then Sam kissed her, and Honey tried to laugh, and made a little uproar, and Sam tried to, and ended by blowing her head in his dusky waistcoat and crying there like a baby. She hardly knew why herself.

The next minute a bell rung, a voice was heard, and both flew to answer the summons. Sam was Mr. Brusle's own man. Honey was Mrs. Brusle's fitting-woman. Both had been pampered and petted. Both possessed extensive wardrobes, both were as handsome as they could be, both thinking making a fashionable view of matters one might have said that Sam was an exceedingly desirable parti, and that, on the whole, Honey could not have done better. Some jest of this kind passed from mother to son when the matter was spoken of at the breakfast-table. But Sam and Honey were a white dress. Young Mr. Brusle tossed Sam a suit which had graced a fashionable ball-room with its presence.

The Rev. Oliver Huile was invited to dine for the purpose of performing the ceremony, and afterward there were congratulations and feasting in the kitchen

"Those Northerners talk of our cruelty to our slaves," said Mr. Brusle, who was in a most generous fan softly to and fro, sitting between her son and the divine, on the veranda; "but I fancy they don't have such a comfortable set of servants as we. I'm sure I've really exerted myself to please Honey." And the Rev. Huile patted his lips with his cambric handkerchief, and looked as if he were sympathizing with the lady, partly in derision of the fancies of the North.

"Those Chinese, you know, think all other nations barbarians, my dear lady," he said, "and we humor their fancies and buy their fans. Let us have no more discussion of the matter. Sam and Honey are fortunate folks, and we ought to be glad of their felicities!" and he sipped his lemonade. Young Brusle taking his cigar from his lips to say:

"Sam and Honey will make themselves whether we are bad masters. Hark to that! You don't hear any thing like it in a Yankee factory."

And in the parlor Honey was trying to laughter swept across the court-yard from the kitchen.

Just then, certainly, it would have been a safe question to put. Old Sam would have had a piece of pure perfection; Massa Charles the best master on earth. Work was light, food good, society had been sold for cash, and nothing but a wedding and a feast, and dancing and a fiddle!

Honey thought of nothing further; Sam had a kind of vague, troubled consciousness that Honey was not as entirely his as a freeman's wife would have been, but he dismissed off in a double shuffle, and refused to believe that he was not perfectly content.

"As happy as a clam, Massa, tank you!" he said, when questioned by that gentleman. "Neber har 'spec to be no happier toder side o' Jordan! Jes wish dey was all like Massa Charlie!"

"What is it, Sam?"

Sam was two years Massa Charlie's senior, and, in long past days, had been his playfellow.

"I wish," he said, brushing his master's hair artistically, and stepping back to get a better view of the general effect, "dat young Massa would find out some party young lady for to be his lady, and be jes as happy as me—will all respect to de difference o' de position."

"Perhaps I shall some day, Sam," said Massa Charlie, "if our connubial bliss continues, and you assume me of the fact."

And Sam, still smiling, made his best bow, and resumed the expression, "connubial bliss," as a very fine one, to be repeated on the first suitable occasion.

Meanwhile Massa Charlie had his own little affair under consideration. It was a troublesome one, too. There were the parents, and parents to win over. Grace Gordon was an heiress and a beauty—such a beauty as one does not often meet; and though the Brusles were rich as Jews and "niggers," the Gordons boasted far more bank-stock, and were altogether better off. Then, years before, two great grandfathers had quarrelled, and the quarrel had clung its shadow down even to the present day; so that young Oakum had actually booked a bet, laid with young Cayman, that Brusle would have to give up marrying Grace Gordon; while Charlie's mother, between her pride and her love for her son, had anxiously agonized and secretly abetted the union.

But Charlie had one important personage in his favor—the girl herself. His great black eyes and brown cheek, with the scarlet lips which he was spoke to her; his voice, very music, and mellow, and a certain frank way, all his own, had won the blonde belle's heart. She tormented him a while; then, seeing him grieve, relented; then coquetted with him again; and finally entrapped into a tête-à-tête with a gentleman who had decided to Charlie a wooing, and promised to be his—his, as a free man's wife may be, owned so entirely that only God has any greater claim. It is the woman on whose finger he has placed the wedding-ring.

And at last, after some opposition, the course of their love began to run smoothly as possible. Mrs. Brusle called on Mrs. Gordon, and the two families dined together. The betrothal was a settled thing.

A great difference, of course, between a well-bred gentleman of good old family and an exquisitely lovely lady, and a "nigger" and a "couple of niggers." But when Honey, in the idle time of twilight, found herself with Sam, his arm about her waist, his voice in her ears, she used to ask:

"Sam, do you reckon Massa Charlie and Miss Grace is jes as happy as we is?"

And Sam would, I reckon," keeping to himself that thought, "She belongs to him. He owns himself and her. There's no danger." But Honey was not satisfied. Sam would not allow it to go further. "Love, Honey? No; that couldn't be.

Ten months his wife, and he loved her better than ever. She was lovelier, more bewitching. She grew fonder and fonder of him. A glad, joyful-hearted, came into her eye when it rested on him. She thought of him night and day. She talked less, and fell into a quiet, gentle brooding over her work when he was not near her.

Grace Gordon called her the prettiest creature the Brusles could have imagined as they were, their well-fed, well-dressed slaves were all good-looking.

It never entered Massa Charlie's mind that Sam's love was any thing like his. Perhaps he was not quite sure how near a "nigger" came to being a man. They were certainly not of one blood. But he honored his piece of ebony, gave him "lots of time" and handfuls of small silver. So he allowed Honey to have a little room for her own pet canary. He never whipped either horse or nigger unnecessarily, and prided himself on his good-natured treatment of both.

But now, as the time of his own marriage drew near, there were important things to think of. Handy money was wanted and no doubt was owing. As yet he had made no costly present to Grace, and that was one of the great necessities.

For pride's sake he must not seem make her offering also to the bride, and how it was to be done without selling land or "niggers" neither could guess. The first thing was to thought of; the world would know it. But who would miss a darkey or so? Ned and Jack might go, and those heroes Julius Cæsar and Brutus could do none the wiser. In fact, as Ned had tried to run away one day, that was excuse enough for selling him, and as for Jack, he was getting too much in confidence over their evening meal one day, when, apropos of their resolve, Satan, or his emissary, Sam, had suggested that Jack, in a coatee, lurly man, with a general air of being ashamed of himself, and daring any one to find it out, dressed in white for a wedding-present, "A gemplemen, Massa;" and stood, trying to look as nearly as possible like the description.

Sam, by the way, he said, a moment being asked to take a seat, sucked at his cane-handle in silence a while, and then, despairing of introducing the subject neatly, fell into it with a splash, as into a pond.

A gentleman, a friend of his, name not to be known at present, and gentleman, wanted a gal of theirs, by name Honey. He knew it was a favor to ask; but he made an offer worth something, and he would be glad to know if Massa Charlie saw a quick glance at her son. "Not the thing to do when a gentleman had not spoken of parting with his people, but a matter of offence. There was the offer—so much for the gal Honey. That was what brought him, and there he was. Well now?

The mother looked at her son, the son at her. "We must talk it over," he "Excuse us a moment;" then the two left room together. Neither spoke until they had the door of a little room upon them; then Sam broke the silence:

"It's just the sum we want, le."

"Yes; but can we?"

"I shall miss Honey's voice—I shall mad."

"Sam will be furious," said Mr. harlie.

"It's a wonderful offer. Who is it? I can't imagine."

The anonymous buyer was Rev. Oliver Huile, who had had a call to South Carolina, and was fitly ordering his household.

"She's a girl who would command a price," said Charlie; "but I never thought of selling her. You see, Sam is a pet of mine, and he hasn't been used to thwarting. I wonder whether he wouldn't take a notion to Fan if this one was sold? I reckon we'll have to tie it;" and he put the sum offered into words instead.

They made Madame Brusle's eyes glisten.

"We want," she said; "it's no humored our niggers too much, and they went back to the trader arm in arm.

A few more words—then money clinked upon the table—a receipt was signed—"the girl Honey" was made over to the unknown buyer through this his agent, and the bargain was struck.

Take her this afternoon as quietly as you can," said Massa Charlie. "The fact is"—and he put just one little pang at his heart—"she has a husband on the place, and I want to get him out of the way. It won't inconvenience you to wait, I hope?"

"Not a bit," said the man. "But you are tender with your niggers. He'll have another in a week."

Massa Charlie was not so sure of that as he appeared to be. He gave the trader a cigar, took out himself, and lounged away. In the hall he met Sam.

"Get yourself ready Sam," he said. "I'm going over to Oakum, and you'll go. Sam bowed.

"Soon, Massa Charlie?"

"Immediately."

Sam's light step was on the stairs in a moment; but I before he reached his own sleeping-place, where his wardrobe was stored, he passed Honey at work in her light room on the top, every white work of her own, and stopped and kissed her.

She looked up with a tear in her eye.

"I wonder, Sam, if I do of their work to you," she said. "Dere me to be suthin before I knowed ye! Now there ain't nuthin only you."

"Yes, I is," said Sam, "and I is, too," said Sam; and the haunting terror fell on him again—the terror born of the fact that "a nigger" couldn't even own his wife.

He whistled it off and dressed and went down to his master, a dandy of the first water. Honey peeped at him from a window. Over the veranda the trader looked at him also.

"A likely fellow," he said.

"Yes," said Madame Brusle; "Honey's husband."

"Oh, the gal, eh?" Then the trader laughed, as at a joke. "Let him out of the way of the society, I say; he's not the kind to make a great row. I know 'em, I do. No, this here 'll take it cool."

An hour passed there came a cart to the door. A cry, wild and fearful, that froze the listener's blood; then sobbing words:

"Sam, Sam, help me, Sam! You couldn't take me if Sam was here. I'm his wife. Sam, Sah!" Then the voice was smothered down, and those children of the house saw Honey borne out of the door and carried a carriage, which, with windows closely shut, was driven rapidly away. It passed the Gordons on the road.

Massa Charlie and Sam came home at nightfall. Massa Charlie was nervous. It was not exactly the time a lover would be pleased to leave his bride Miss Grace Gordon spending the evening with his mother; but he was glad to see her, nevertheless. He wasn't easy, he fancied, between Sam's tone and the "scene" which must soon come. He remembered it again when Sam came bowing to the door.

"Excuse me, Missus; can you tell me what I shill find Honey?"

"Indeed I can't, Sam," said Mrs. Brusle, kind to say more. Sam went round, he returned in ten minutes with a frightened face. "Missus," he said, "I can't find Honey." The three looked at each other. Miss Gordon knew that a girl had been sold, and guessed the rest. Nobody answered.

"Honey, Honey!" called Sam, growing pale and loud. Then trying to laugh, "Seems me, ladies and Massa," he said, "fas' is, dem ne'count niggers in de kitchen has been tryin' to skeer me. Fak is fun, I s'pose, not understandin' how folks feel. Dey told me—law now—dem niggers—dey say—Honey's gone. Ha, ha!" and he set words to a laugh that forced from lips on which white froth had gathered as the negro stared at his master.

Charles Brusle knew the grave what he had done.

"Sam," he said, "don't take it hard. I've been kind to you. I've—"

"She's sold," gasped Sam.

"Yes, Sam, she's sold."

Sam was black no longer, the hue of ashes had spread upon it.

"I knowed it," he said, in a kind of crushed despair. "Kep' a thinkin', arter all she don't belong to me, and I don't belong to myself. But I didn't know Massa could do it. Massa just gives to bab a wife himself. What's dat de matter wid?" Then Old Sam fairly fixed her on her self-pity. Dem's words for white folks, not for niggers.

Then out of the calm, as from the hill of a storm, came a sudden flash of human nature to his white father, the barbaric fierceness of those who were his black mother's ancestors. "Sold to—where in hell?" turning fiercely on his master, he cursed him with curses horrible as those of the Pepsin excommunication. "Dere's a gal named Miss Massa Charles," he panted at last. "One dat kin take dem you love as you've took Honey. And I'll do it, Massa Charles—I'll do it any body kin be to you. But He'll take some from you afore you die."

Then a wild sob came like the breaking of a wave upon the shore, and he had flung himself upon the ground, writhing with the agony of his awful woe.

"It's a wonderful offer. Who is it? I can't imagine."

The anonymous buyer was Rev. Oliver Huile, who had had a call to South Carolina, and was fitly ordering his household.

"She's a girl who would command a price," said Charlie; "but I never thought of selling her. You see, Sam is a pet of mine, and he hasn't been used to thwarting. I wonder whether he wouldn't take a notion to Fan if this one was sold? I reckon we'll have to tie it;" and he put the sum offered into words instead.

They made Madame Brusle's eyes glisten.

"We want," she said; "it's no humored our niggers too much, and they went back to the trader arm in arm.

A few more words—then money clinked upon the table—a receipt was signed—"the girl Honey" was made over to the unknown buyer through this his agent, and the bargain was struck.

Take her this afternoon as quietly as you can," said Massa Charlie. "The fact is"—and he put just one little pang at his heart—"she has a husband on the place, and I want to get him out of the way. It won't inconvenience you to wait, I hope?"

"Not a bit," said the man. "But you are tender with your niggers. He'll have another in a week."

Massa Charlie was not so sure of that as he appeared to be. He gave the trader a cigar, took out himself, and lounged away. In the hall he met Sam.

"Get yourself ready Sam," he said. "I'm going over to Oakum, and you'll go. Sam bowed.

"Soon, Massa Charlie?"

"Immediately."

Sam's light step was on the stairs in a moment; but I before he reached his own sleeping-place, where his wardrobe was stored, he passed Honey at work in her light room on the top, every white work of her own, and stopped and kissed her.

She looked up with a tear in her eye.

"I wonder, Sam, if I do of their work to you," she said. "Dere me to be suthin before I knowed ye! Now there ain't nuthin only you."

"Yes, I is," said Madame Brusle; "Honey's husband."

"Oh, the gal, eh?" Then the trader laughed, as at a joke. "Let him out of the way of the society, I say; he's not the kind to make a great row. I know 'em, I do. No, this here 'll take it cool."

An hour passed there came a cart to the door. A cry, wild and fearful, that froze the listener's blood; then sobbing words:

"Sam, Sam, help me, Sam! You couldn't take me if Sam was here. I'm his wife. Sam, Sah!" Then the voice was smothered down, and those children of the house saw Honey borne out of the door and carried a carriage, which, with windows closely shut, was driven rapidly away. It passed the Gordons on the road.

Massa Charlie and Sam came home at nightfall. Massa Charlie was nervous. It was not exactly the time a lover would be pleased to leave his bride Miss Grace Gordon spending the evening with his mother; but he was glad to see her, nevertheless. He wasn't easy, he fancied, between Sam's tone and the "scene" which must soon come. He remembered it again when Sam came bowing to the door.

"Excuse me, Missus; can you tell me what I shill find Honey?"

"Indeed I can't, Sam," said Mrs. Brusle, kind to say more. Sam went round, he returned in ten minutes with a frightened face. "Missus," he said, "I can't find Honey." The three looked at each other. Miss Gordon knew that a girl had been sold, and guessed the rest. Nobody answered.

"Honey, Honey!" called Sam, growing pale and loud. Then trying to laugh, "Seems me, ladies and Massa," he said, "fas' is, dem ne'count niggers in de kitchen has been tryin' to skeer me. Fak is fun, I s'pose, not understandin' how folks feel. Dey told me—law now—dem niggers—dey say—Honey's gone. Ha, ha!" and he set words to a laugh that forced from lips on which white froth had gathered as the negro stared at his master.

Charles Brusle knew the grave what he had done.

"Sam," he said, "don't take it hard. I've been kind to you. I've—"

"She's sold," gasped Sam.

"Yes, Sam, she's sold."

Sam was black no longer, the hue of ashes had spread upon it.

"I knowed it," he said, in a kind of crushed despair. "Kep' a thinkin', arter all she don't belong to me, and I don't belong to myself. But I didn't know Massa could do it. Massa just gives to bab a wife himself. What's dat de matter wid?" Then Old Sam fairly fixed her on her self-pity. Dem's words for white folks, not for niggers.

Then out of the calm, as from the hill of a storm, came a sudden flash of human nature to his white father, the barbaric fierceness of those who were his black mother's ancestors. "Sold to—where in hell?" turning fiercely on his master, he cursed him with curses horrible as those of the Pepsin excommunication. "Dere's a gal named Miss Massa Charles," he panted at last. "One dat kin take dem you love as you've took Honey. And I'll do it, Massa Charles—I'll do it any body kin be to you. But He'll take some from you afore you die."

Then a wild sob came like the breaking of a wave upon the shore, and he had flung himself upon the ground, writhing with the agony of his awful woe.

Grace Gordon stood over him, Charles Brusle kept beside him. He under-stood now. "Sam," he cried, "Sam! I didn't know you felt so. The trader isn't cruel. I'll have her back, Sam—I swear it!"

And his brotherhood turned toward him.

"I hold you to your oath," she said. "Restore this man's wife to him or I will never be yours."

And there, humbled in the dust, kissing his master's feet and the hem of the lady's robe, knelt the slave-man.

The little carriage was at the door, the horses harnessed by fingers trembling with eagerness. Mason Carlisle and Grace sat within, and Sam begged to drive.

"I'll drive faster than any body else," he said. "I need all I think me, and think Honey knows it."

And the whirling wheel flung the dust on high, and half hid the horses in a gray cloud. Soon dusky in half hid the horses in a gray cloud. Soon dusky in the moonlight loomed the trader's house.

They could see the lights in its windows, hear voices within. Sitting at the verandah they saw a figure upon it—to their surprise the Rev. Oliver Hale. He only gave them a gloomy bow. Then the door opened, and they faced the trader.

"The girl—Honey—you have her yet?" asked Charles Brusle, in a breath.

The trader nodded.

"That was a good spec of yours, Sir," he said. "You're one for luck, I reckon. Tain't on my hands though, it ain't a Master."

And filling them with an and-fluable terror, he opened another door and ushered them in. An old negress sat crouched upon a low stool. Her head burned dimly. By its ray they saw a cot with a coarse check covering, and a woman lying upon it with a sort of linen shroud at her breast. Sam gave a scream of joy. He rushed forward; he flung aside the drapery and bent over the cot, looking into the face of the wife he loved and the child he had begot—ay, years ago.

He bent lower. He looked closer. He stood motionless as an ebon statue of Despair; for under his passionate gaze, unbreathing and unanswering, Honey lay dead, with her dead babe upon her bosom.

"Sis that it lies her arms when it comed," crooned the old negress from her seat; "and say she, 'We longs to Sam,' say she, 'and no one else sha'n't ever us bet de Lord,' and shet her eyes, and died like goin' off asleep. Dem's her las' words.—We longs to Sam, and nobody else sha'n't us but de Lord."

To-day there are no slaves beneath the Stars and Stripes, thank God! but long before the reign of Slavery was over Charles Brusle and his wife had washed their hands of the black shame. From Honey's grave, from the crushed life of that black chattel, Sam, Grace fell strang to her every duty, and poverty and the sneers of those who watched them were as nothing to her wounds. Each man, woman, and child who called them master and mistress they set free, and spending their wealth to aid them, ended their lives in Northern homes, where Heaven blessed them with health and love and the meed of honest, earnest industry.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the Southern District of New York.]

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

BY MISS ANNA WARNER,

Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XI.

"Now don't ask too many questions," said Sam, as he stood in a hole into the ground, "but look on and learn. See if you can not find out for yourselves why I divide the ground into two parts."

"It's a great deal easier to have you tell us," said Lily.

"And a great deal easier for you to forget, if I do," said Sam. "No, I will not answer any questions until I have dug at least one square yard."

And with that he began to work in earnest, but in a way that seemed very mysterious. All over the end of one of his two divisions Sam dug a sort of trench, taking out each spadeful of earth and laying it smooth at the end of the other division, and so to form a ridge. Then leaving division number two to take care of itself for a while he went back to the line he had made next his trench and dug that up—turning each spadeful quite over into the trench, breaking the lumps with his spade, and bringing it to a fine smoothness; and heaping also a new trench to receive the next line of earth. But all this time the other division was left to itself, with the ridge of earth at one end.

"Why don't you dig straight across?" said Lily, when trench after trench had been filled with the pulverized earth. "There you've left all that ridge. What will you ever do with it?"

"What should I do without it" said Sam, digging on.

"I know, I know!" said Clover, joyfully. "Sam, please stop a minute and listen. And, Lily, you too. You'll dig divine and taste to the end of this division; and then to fill the last trench you'll take earth from across the lower end of this other division. And then you'll begin to dig that one down there, and dig on and on back to the top again. And then when you come to the last trench of all you'll be on the ridge of earth to fill it. Isn't that right?"

"Right as a glove," said Sam, looking pleased. "You'll make a gardener yet."

"But, Sam," said little Primrose, "if you were digging a great field you'd have to carry the earth clear across to make the ridge."

"Not so, little sister," said Sam. "I should never be digging a great field; fields are always plowed, Prim; but if it were a large piece of ground instead of a small one, I should divide it into many parts instead of two—only taking care always to have an even number. Two divisions, you see, take care of each other; but if I had a third or a fifth or a seventh all by itself, there would be no place to lay the earth from my first trench, and all I could do would be to carry or wheel each spadeful round to the other end."

"It's quite beautiful!" said Clover, looking lovingly at the brown earth.

"Well, I didn't know digging was so very easy," said Lily. "I don't see why people ever have lumps in their gardens. The earth seems to crumble right up when you touch it."

"Appearances are peculiar things," said her brother, with a smile. "Don't you want to try how much they are worth?"

"What do you mean now?" said Lily.

"Get your spade and help me dig."

"May I?" cried Clover.

"Certainly; it is your garden."

Away flies Lily after her spade. Sam set his in the ground and stopped to rest.

"In this way of dividing off the ground, Clover," he said, "you must be careful of two things: first, to dig your trenches straight; and secondly, to make quite sure that the edge of your division I dig quite into the edge of another, else you will have a balk all across your ground."

"What a balk?" said Clover.

"That is what some gard-ners call a bit of unbug ground left in the middle of that which has been dug."

"It balks the plants if they can't grow," put in Jack.

"Isn't Jack smart?" said Clover, softly to Sam.

"But, Sam, if you are not too tired, will you just dig one more row across mine?" asked Lily comet. I must remand about the trenches, but there's something I want to see."

"I'm not a bit tired," said her brother; and away he went across the strip of earth again, while Clover looked on more intently than before, watching how Lily had thought so "easy." She saw that the earth by no means "crumbled right up" of its own accord, on the contrary, it had to be well separated. Sam's spade went into it, and through it, and into it again, with a light skill before which most of the lumps presently gave way, but now and then there was one so hard that nothing but a good sound tap from the flat of the spade reduced it to order; and every large, round stone that showed its head was picked out and thrown aside.

"Sam," said Clover, suddenly, "why do you turn every spadeful of earth quite over, so that the top goes to the bottom?"

"Why, just to bring the bottom to the top," said Sam, pausing with his spade in the air. "Don't the sun burn gets the benefit of the sun and air, and it grows mellow, and more fit for the plants."

"Here comes Lily's spade-full of stones. Now there'll be sights!" And Jack settled himself on the fence with renewed satisfaction as lily came trudging down the hill, spade in hand.

"No bonnet, Lily?" said her brother, looking at the uncovered head.

"No, I guess I dropped it in the tool-house," said Lily. "Never mind; I don't care for the sun."

"And no shoes nor gloves, and a light pink frock," muttered Jack down on the fence.

"Be quiet," said Lily. "I've got shoes."

"But not our garden-shoes, you know, Lily," said little Primrose.

"Our garden-shoes!" said Lily. "I wonder how many pair I can wear at once! Where shall I begin, Sam?"

"Choose your place," said her brother, stepping aside.

"I suppose I may as well begin right here where you left off," said Lily, plunging right across the soft bed with more than proper haste, and shoveling her bright house-boots with soil. Clover gave a little cry of dismay.

"I've walked over walk across newly-dug ground if it is possible to help it," remarked Sam; "for it packs the earth again, and you lo e your labor."

"Oh!" said Lily. Never mind, I'll not go again. Now for it!" And Lily struck her spade vehemently into the ground, but with such a glancing slope that the effort was more than part of a handful of earth and r ow it high into the air.

"I plendid! first-rate!" exclaimed Jack, clapping his hands. "Clover is a splendid gard-ner, Sam."

Sam did not laugh, but stood by to give counsel.

"If you se your spade straight down, Lily," he said, "instead of at such an angle, and put your foot across the cross-piece and press it down, and then draw the handle down toward you—so—and lift the spade gently up, the soil will be loosened to begin with it, instead of flying off at a tangent. Don't try to take up too much at first."

Which wise advice Lily disregarded; measuring off for herself a spadeful of about extra size that she could not stir it, and was obliged to pull her spade ignominiously out, with the whole digging in safety.

"Lazy, isn't it?" said Jack from the fence. "Gets along so fast!"

"Take heed, said Sam, kindly; "and take a little at a time. There—that is better; now turn it well over into the trench." And Lily, stimulated by the cheerful tone, proceeded to get up a small spadeful of earth and overset it into the trench. She was much elated.

"I do believe I could do it all myself now," she said. "And I'd much rather do it myself. So you may go, Sam—you needn't dig any more for me."

A queer little movement among the earth in Sam's eyes, but he took his coat and began to put it on.

"Very good for me," he said, looking at his watch, "I'll have something to do in the house, Jack, so have you. And as for you, little Prim, your only chance of a ride on my shoulders before dinner is by cheerfully consenting

ST. PETER

[See Page 494.]

JULY.

Throughout the house a dreamy stillness stole,
The warm-day sign, source heard the lazy fly;
The clock ticked on with solemn measured tone,
Counting the drowsy moments of July.

Through quaint-shaped panes the mellow light crept in,
And noted rare brown-gold shadows on the floor;
The air was heavy with the scent that hung
Around the damsels that framed the door.

Through the chipped arches of the olden yew
I peeked, and eyes of silence reigned around;
Although the earth by some enchanter's spell
In magic trance was bound.

The peaches slumbered on the garden-wall,
The deep open their crimson cheeks was wet;
The ruby grapes clustered amid their leaves
Like rubies in a dazed coronet.

The feathery wheat stood still as fairy spears,
Borne by a million hundred-armed soldiers;
The harebell was asleep, nor woke to ring,
In honor of July, her tiny bells.

The flame-tongued nightshade droop'd her purple pride,
Yet held aloft amid the hedges where she clung;
And wearied there our trails of blossoms white
The wild convolvulus flung.

The river with its wayside waters lay
All motionless, as a pure crystal sea;
Another landscape painted on its tide,
With spire, and mill, and tree.

Close by the rush-grown bank a boat was moor'd,
So still, it seemed not on the river's breast;
The world was hush'd, and Nature's self
Lay wrapp'd in perfect rest.

Like to the pictures in the story old,
Since by her beauty skept—oh, sight of bliss!
Waiting until some poet-heart should come
And wake her with his kiss.

O wake! O wake! and breathe into my soul
The spell that rightly I of thee sing!
O—deep forever—by beauty veil'd,
Sleep Julys wing.

THE PARTY IN SPECTACLES.

I.

"There he is! That's the very man!"

"Where?" Which man?"

"That party—don't look while I point—that party in spectacles."

I cast my eye discreetly in the direction indicated by my companion, and beheld a stout, rosy, smooth-shaven gentleman, apparently turned of fifty-seven, with very gray—almost silver-hair, a fine Roman nose, a rather large, sensuous mouth, with a teeth, and blue spectacles.

After a moment's quiet inspection of the "party" I think my head confidently and replied:

"I have not a bit of it. What! he—he—he—?"

"Hush! I tell you it is. Wait till the passengers settle down a little. I'll introduce you, and you'll see."

"But—but you don't know him yourself."

"Pooh! that isn't of any consequence," said my friend, laughing. "I know who he is, and that's enough. Under the circumstances, you know, we're favored by such recognition when discreetly shown. And our object being serious—oh, never fear, it will be all right."

But he's all alone. No one else seems to recognize him; whereas, if he really were—" I'm sure we're mistaken, and we shall "still ourselves meet-ing."

"Nonsense! I can't be mistaken. And as to his being alone and unknown, don't you see the blue spectacles? It's a uncog."

"Which?" Why should he—if it be he—"I mean," do you call it? It's absurd. Tell your—"

"I don't like it right," interrupted my friend, disdainfully. "I take the responsibility. There, he is by himself now, looking at the capstan. Come along; we'll join him as if we were accidental."

Let me own a pardonable, before we go further to explain the scene and characters of the foregoing dialogue.

We—that is, my friend Sam Chellis and his friend Will Wyndon, red-hot myself—were upon the deck of a car-ain steamer, which was gallantly steaming up the tide of the well-known river (by name neither I otenue nor Mississippi) between two populous cities within the territories of the Re-United States of America.

Mr. Chellis was (and is) a rising member of the bar.

Mr. Wyndon was (and is) simply a youngish gentleman of leisure, and your very humble servant.

Both were travelling in pursuit of health, happiness, and other illusive phantoms unnecessary to detail.

Both were enthusiastic admirers of true greatness and anxious ever to approach and hold communion with the good, the noble, and the wise and their fellow-men.

Mr. Chellis's enthusiasm, indeed, was apt to outrun his discretion occasionally, and, without being at all a celebrity-hunter in the vulgar meaning of the term, he still was prone to seize every opportunity, even upon apparently impossible, occasion of profiting by the intercourse, no matter how limited or unusual its character or opportunity, of the eccentric personages that chance threw in his way. Not infrequently had this surely praiseworthy proclivity of his subjected him to embarrassment, and even to temporary mortification. But nothing had ever damped his ardor, or lessened his righteous confidence in himself.

It was not long before this that Chellis, reading aloud a grateful and richly-deserved tribute, in a great English journal, to a certain noble-hearted fellow-countryman of ours, whose name is an honor to mon-mity, exclaimed to me:

"By Jove!" Wyndon, I'd give my left hand to meet that man! If I could only say three words to him and shake him by the hand—you know how mechanically once shattered the glass that a certain illustrious personage had just drank from, saying it should never be touched by less worthy lips! "Will, Will, upon my life, I should feel like keeping the hand that had clasped that man's noble palm inviolate from human touch ever afterward!"

"The sentiment, though slightly exaggerated, does you credit, Sam," I replied. "But there will be little difficulty in your gratifying your wish, by and by. You are here now, you know, and must meet him. He is ever here now, you know, and will doubtless be the subject of much public attention. You can easily say your few words to him. We'll subscribe to his first public dinner, or—"

"Well do nothing of the kind. At least I shall not. I would not give a copper to meet him in such a 'bunkum' way. None of your public flummery for me. I want no formal introduction, no "set form of speech," and all that sort of bosh. I wish to meet him just casually, by chance—off his guard, as it were—and have him to myself for five minutes. In the street, for instance, or at the barber-shop, or in a rail-car—say where in an indirect sort of way, you know, I've seen his portrait in the papers, and thought, of course, it's an execrable wood-cut, I'm sure I'd recognize the original at once."

"Perhaps so. But you remember your little mistake with reference to Garibaldi. And how you took the—"

"Pshaw!" interrupted Chellis, testily. "What of that? Mistakes may happen to any man, especially when the likenesses published are so ill-executed as they often are, when I thought I met Garibaldi. At all events, I shouldn't be mistaken in this case, as you can see for yourself, so let me have a chance to obtain the opportunity I long for. That isn't probable, however, for I doubt if he will ever visit our city. There is no time to be hanging around after him, even if I had the inclination—which I haven't—for such tomfoolery."

As I knew my friend as to the improbability of the accidental meeting he referred to, I said nothing in reply, and the matter was, so far as I was concerned, dismissed.

A short time afterward, however, Chellis found himself unexpectedly at leisure for a fortnight, and eagerly accepted my invitation to join in passing glimpse of nature and art (especially of art) at a few of the so-called "fashionable watering-places."

"By George, Will!" cried he, "we must meet him after all! In fact I have a presentiment that we shall. So keep a sharp look-out, my boy, and be sure I shall do the same."

In this disposition we had been loitering by rail and river, from "spa" to "spa" (to use a fashionable term) for days in a desultory way, but without encountering any adventure whatever, in the celebrity line or otherwise, when Chellis, one day unusually out of spirits, and for a lucky chance to turn up in accordance with one of his several presentiments, suddenly startled me by the exclamation, quoted at the commencement of this chapter, on board the steamer as above described, and caused the dialogue that ensued, which we will now resume at the point where we've left it—in chapter

II.

"Come along," said Chellis, seizing me by the arm; "we'll 'bolt' up to him, you know, and do a thing genteelly, for a glorious chance, isn't it?"

"Certainly a very pleasant opportunity," said I, suffering myself to be led onward somewhat reluctantly by Sam; "but it is a glorious chance, isn't it?"

"Certainly a very pleasant opportunity," said I, suffering myself to be led onward somewhat reluctantly by Sam; "but it is, if the gentleman really should be the—"

"Confound your skepticism, Wyndon! to say nothing of your insult to my perspicacity. But I shall expect an ample apology, mind! when it's over, and gratitude besides. Now, then, old fellow!"

We slowly neared the solitary traveler in blue spectacles. He sat contemplating the captain, apparently in rapt contemplation of something in the distant perspective.

Chellis followed the direction of his gaze a moment, then, in a respectfully cordial tone:

"A glorious outlook, Sir!" said he; "a splendid sight, Sir! Those noble mountains, the many towers of a great commercial city, and the myriad spars of her vast commercial navy looming through the blue ocean-haze. We are, without vulgar vanity, Sir, a very great nation."

The stranger started slightly as Chellis accosted him, and keenly eyed my friend through his spectacles while he was speaking. When Sam paused interrogatively, the old gentleman gave himself a sort of shake or two, as to resettle his wandering thoughts, and, smiling blandly:

"Immense! immense!" he exclaimed. Then a smile gravely overspread his fine, intellectual countenance, and drawing himself up slightly, "Excuse me," he added, quickly, "but I really beg your pardon, sir—I—I do not believe you have the advantage of me—"

"Certainly!" interrupted Chellis, with enthusiasm. "I have, indeed, a very great advantage of you; the advantage of having the proud honor to know by sight, as well as by name and fame, that most large-hearted, the philanthropic, the munificent, the princely Mr.—"

At the moment I am about to write the name which my friend Sam Chellis pronounced with such unction I am suddenly withheld by a perplexing example of delicacy. This name, which is the personal property of a modest private gentleman; although by his noble character and actions a household word of honor and gratitude in the circles of earnest lips, in millions of prayerful hearts, still, a private gentleman's name, not to be lightly used for selfish purposes or in connection with unworthy trifles" like myself. What shall I do? Though the tale I tell be true, will its truth justify me for placing a veritable personage, in the actual scene by the side of others whose identity is concealed by fictitious description and nonsenclature? Though what I say of this personage be—but else could it by any possibility be?—the simple and familiar truth, and therefore honorable to him—if—is it is pleasant to me that say it, will this be sufficient examination for the liberty I take?

I positively can not take the responsibility of a decision.

Under these circumstances I see but one resource, and that is, to seek such refuge as I may find under the, perhaps transparent, shelter of a simple initial.

This much indiscretion will, I humbly trust, be forgiven me.

"The princely Mr. P.," concluded Chellis, raising his hat with respectful courtesy.

The gentleman in blue spectacles started back, and "blushed celestial rosy red." Then, plunging both hands in the capacious pockets of his linen overall, he started forward again, and ejaculated:

"Dat's it, Sir? Is dat it? Is dat de hourse whisper, like the "asidc" of the stage villain.

"I beg your pardon!" exclaimed Chellis, hastily. "I have no intention of intruding—of interrupting you. I respect your privacy, Sir, your modest desire to be unrecognized; believe me, Mr. P., I simply desire to offer my tribute of admiration, and to have the honor of shaking hands with you, in the quietest way. I and my friend, Mr. Wyndon, Mr. P., my own name is Chellis, Sir, permit me"—he grasped the old gentleman's hand as he spoke—"to express the proud satisfaction I feel in thus taking by the hand a fellow-countryman whose noble philanthropy has done honor to two hemispheres, and made the name of American sympathy world-wide—"

"Hush! H—ush!" interrupted the traveler, casting an uneasy glance around him. "Don't—don't talk so loud. Hey good Sir!"

"Certainly not; excuse me," murmured my friend, sinking his voice instantly. "But I must be heard the conversation. He seemed in deep thought, his glance wandering from one to the other of us abstractedly; but in a moment or two he suddenly nodded, laughed a quick, low laugh, and in a brusque, though cheerful tone:

"How did you discover, ha?" said he.

"By having seen your portrait, Sir," replied Chellis. "I know I couldn't be mistaken, though my skepticism would have denied it that you were not Mr. P. Aha! Wyndon, what do you say now?"

"Yes, ha! what do you say now, Mr. Wyndon?" echoed Mr. P., laughing, and giving me a slight tap on the waistcoat with his forefinger.

Of course I replied suitably pleasantly, and expressed myself charmed at this unexpected opportunity of informal converse with a gentleman so widely and deservedly famed for his many private acts of charity and benevolence; while I added at the same time that I was delighted, though not surprised, to find him affable and familiar—so unreserved and even jovial of manner.

"Not surprised, certainly no!" said Chellis, sententiously. "Genius and true worth are the true indices of a good heart and approving conscience. And these Mr. P. must possess in an eminent degree, if it be true that he is the man of sufficient reward. Ah, Sir, what a magnificent monument you have erected—a pyramid of Good Works which shall endure when time itself is no longer hoary wonderlist into the sands of the desert!"

Mr. P. looked at Sam, then at me, and laughed again.

"You flatter me, gentlemen," said he. "But I—yes, I'll tell you a secret!—will you keep it, hi?"

Of course we somewhat surprised, but still more pleased by such an unexpected mark of confidence.

"Sacredly, sacredly, my dear Sir" exclaimed Chellis, looking as if he were ready to take a solemn oath of secrecy on the spot.

"Ah, Mr. P.," said I, "and not Mr. Chellis," said Mr. P., giving each of us a tap with his forefinger as he named us, "listen! I've done something, as you say, for the poor—men. But what I have done, Sirs, is nothing—the veriest trifle—to that which I am going to do. The most insignificant trifle in the world, I assure you, Sirs!"—and as he said "ha!" cheerily, he leaned back and looked at us with the brightest of smiles, as if he were hugely enjoying our selfless embarrassment. Chellis first recovered himself.

"Excuse me," said he; "that though I am prepared for any conceivable amount of humanitarian munificence on the part of—on your part, Sir, still I can not for a moment entertain the idea that you really unprecedented liberalities to your suffering fellow-mortals in the light of trifles. My dear Mr. P., they are gigantic, simply gigantic, in their size and influence!"

"Ha! but only by comparison; only by comparison, my friend," repeated Mr. P., archly. "Now, Sir, when you shall hear what I am about to do—hush! here comes some one! Pray don't say a word—don't mention my name, I beg of you, gentlemen!"

"Of course not—certainly not!" we both hastened to assure him, with a perceptible evident nervousness at the idea of being a centre of public curiosity or attention at such a moment.

The interruption was by one in number: one a slender, bright-eyed, sharp-featured gentl man of middle age; the other a short, muscular man, with a round, good-humored face, and a pair of bushy flaxen whiskers. This person had the air and dress of an intelligent mechanic, or perhaps a sort of confidential overseer or steward upon a professional gentleman, such as his companion was at once decided to be by both Chellis and myself.

"He has a doctor's eye," said Sam, sotto voce, as the pair halted a few paces off, and seemed to retire, though not at all offensively, our scrutiny.

"A lawyer's, rather," I retorted, for I had studied—or, more properly, had not studied medicine, but had flounced through a couple of courses at a Medical University, some years before, for want of other occupation.

"A doctor, for deuces!" muttered Chellis.

"A lawyer, for any thing you like!" I re pond-ed.

"Champagne?" queried Sam.

"Done!" said I.

But how shall we find out? Perhaps Mr. P. will be good enough to—"

At this moment the subject of our wager made an almost imperceptible sign with his hand toward our distinguished companion, and smiled pleasantly.

"Ah! you know the genuil-man, my dear Sir," said Chellis. "Then, then, that is if—"

"I—yes—that is—a casual acquaintance—never saw him before in my—I mean I never saw him but once before, you know, ha?" exclaimed Mr P., in his stage-whisper, at the same time molestely avoiding the stranger's eye.

The short man said something to the sharp-featured gentleman in an under-tone; the other nodded and smiled again, and both walked away.

"At all events you know his profession, I hope?" resumed Sam.

"His profession?" Ha! I—I believe he—he's an undertaker—yes, I know he's an undertaker; measures dead people and buries them, you know—horrible!" and Mr. P. fairly shuddered.

"It is a repulsive trade!" said Chellis. "But you, at least, can have no fears of death, Sir. The great and good deeds of your life must assuredly outlife you, Sir, to the blessed reward—"

"Hush! hush! Don't talk of death; pray don't," interrupted Mr. P., earnestly. "I don't intend to die; I really don't, indeed." Saying this Mr. P. once more applied his forefinger to our waistcoats, and laughed in his quick, low manner.

I saw that I was considerably surprised by the increasing eccentricity of our famous fellow-traveller; but, though as of my man has a right to be odd, that man is surely the great and good Samaritan before me.

Chellis, however, did not seem to notice these little peculiarities; his whole mind was absorbed in the problem of what stupendous enterprise of benevolence Mr. P. was about to engage that could possibly eclipse the splendor of his recent achievements in this line.

"Pardon me, my dear Mr. P.," said he, in a moment; "but you were about to honor us by confiding to our admiration and discretion a project for which more extensive manifestation of your beneficence—a work that should cause your previous princely efforts to appear—but that is not possible. However, as I remarked, you were good enough to propose—"

"Ha! yes; so I was, so I was, my dear friends; laughed the little waffle-man, that confounded undertaker has driven it all out of my head—all, upon my soul! Singular, isn't it? Ha!" And Mr. P. looked from one to the other of us in indescribably comical perplexity.

I could not forbear laughing for the life of me, and Sam followed in my hearty cachinnation, though scarcely with an equal unaffectedness.

But what was our surprise—our amazement—our confusion, when Mr. P. suddenly sprang up from the bench, his face violently flushed, and frowning majestically upon us, exclaimed: "Laughing! laughing at me! You will find it no laughing matter, Sirs!" and before we could recover our presence of mind sufficiently to start after him he was down the wharf-side in a way, and was lost to the crowd at the further end of the boat.

For some minutes we sat in the silence of abashed astonishment. What Chellis was thinking of I can not say; but my mortification speedily gave place to resentment, and I exclaimed:

"Confound his stupidity! Though he were Mr. P., or any other man, great or little, he is a most insufferable old muff, and if he were twenty years older—"

"Pshaw! Wyndon. It certainly was very disrespectful in you to laugh. It was natural that Mr. P. should fancy you were laughing at him; equally so, that he should be sensitive as to his memory and more so still, as to his evident prejudice against the undertaker, which he is, no doubt, conscious of as a weakness. You were very wrong to laugh."

"Why, Sam, Chellis, you laughed too," cried I, rather nettled at his putting all the blame on me.

"I know I did, but it was only an echo; your merriment was so confoundedly catching. But seriously, what do you think he will do? He threatened we should find it no laughing matter, you know."

"I neither know nor care," replied I, tartly. "He's a fool, anyhow, except cut our acquaintance. What can he do?"

"I'm sure I don't know," answered Sam, mournfully. "Well, Sam, what shall I, my good humor returning, "you'll admit that the great philanthropist is a very different sort of man from the idea you had formed of him. Such a one would not follow it up, I presume, by a meeting of death, or even a challenge to mortal combat before. However, as you said, he is traveling incog., and perhaps his known manners are a part of the disguise. At all any rate, we've had the fun of meeting and talking with him. You've shaken his 'noble palm,' too, Sam—a fact I envy you the kindled whatever comes of it."

Just as Chellis was going to answer, probably to rebuke my irony, the alarm sounded for dinner.

"Come and dine," said I, "I'm hungry. No doubt we shall see our distinguished fellow-voyager at table. We'll sit near him, if we can, just to see what he will do or say."

"I hope he will accept an apology," said Sam, walking with me into the dining-saloon.

III.

The tables were nearly full. There were but five seats vacant; three together on one side of the board, and two others directly opposite, but separated by a pillar. We advanced toward the unoccupied triad of chairs.

"Seats me, gen'lmen, these seats is engaged," objected the polite African of American descent who officiated as chief waiter. "Take them two seats, gen'lmen, please!" he added, pointing to the vacant twain on either side the column.

We obeyed, and seated ourselves.

While we were tasting our soup the expected occupants of the opposite chairs came in. They proved to be the sharp-featured gentleman and his muscular companion, and — yes — our susceptible friend, the great philanthropist.

He came forward first, alone, and swiftly, and took the centre seat without looking at us, or, apparently, at any one else. The other two followed, and placed themselves one on either side of him. Neither of them paid any attention to Mr. P., nor did he seem to notice them, save by a slight, and, as it were, involuntary shrinking, as they sat down.

"Your position, Mr. Whipped Chellis;" "he'll never be able to eat with that underjaw beside him. I've half a mind to offer to change seats with him. Perhaps he'd take it as an awande honorable, eh?"

"Don't do any thing of the sort," said I, earnestly. "It would surely offend his neighbors and be ridiculous besides. Keep quiet, and don't annoy him by disagreeable remarks."

I added this caution, for I just then caught his eyes fixed for an instant upon us, and its expression (for he had all his blue spectacles up on his forehead at the moment) was by no means amicable. As soon as he saw that I noticed him he dropped his glasses quickly over his eyes again, and began playing with his table-spoon while waiting for his soup.

The soup was brought, and he fell to with apparent appetite.

In another moment I heard a clatter and an exclamation of impatience, and, looking up, saw that Mr. P.'s blue spectacles had fallen into his soup-plate, from which he was nervously fishing them out.

Chellis also perceived it, and, resting his glance for an instant on the old gentleman's fishing operations, he smiled very maliciously at the disaster.

At the same moment Mr. P. looked up his eyes and those of Chellis met, and, quick as lightning, he caught the plate up and flung it, soup, spectacles, and all across the table at poor Sam's head, exclaiming at the same time in a gleeful tone,

"Ha! laugh, will you? take that!" and was proceeding to follow up his volley with his tumbler, when his arm was suddenly arrested by the waiter-man beside him, who snatched the tumbler away, saying, in a stern voice, "None of that, Sir, or we'll put you out, Sir, in a minute!" At the same time a person whom we supposed to be an undertaker looked steadily at the excited old gentleman, and said, very quietly but firmly:

"Calm yourself, my dear Sir. I entreat you, I command you to be calm!"

The flash passed away as if by magic from Mr. P.'s face; he held down his head, and waited, like a shamefaced school-boy, till his spectacles were rescued and another plate of soup set before him; when he resumed his meal in the meekest and most decorous manner possible.

Fortunately for the old gentleman's aim had been less deadly than his intention, and Chellis got off with a sprinkling of soup on his garments and the tablecloth but firmly.

But fancy, if you can, his feelings, and the expression of his countenance as well as my own, to say nothing of the general effects produced by this extraordinary explosion upon the other guests at the table. Fancy the scene if you can, for it is beyond me to paint it, or even an intelligent idea of it.

As soon as order was restored the sharp-featured gentleman rose and made a brief apology for his friend's conduct — he called him Mr. Tangi — and said that his friend was unhappily afflicted with a malady — here he smiled, and slightly touched his forehead, meaning that he was at times, but not often, to some momentary control of his temper; that he was extremely sensitive — foolishly so, he might say, without offence to his friend — to ridicule; that he could not bear to be laughed at — few men could, for that matter — but that his friend was apt to fancy that people were laughing at him when in fact they had no such intention. That such had been no doubt his friend's belief when he saw the gentleman opposite smile at a little accident of the eating tables; but that now, when he was assured that no such incivility had been intended, his friend would be, as it ought to apologize, he knew, and he supposed the apology would be accepted. Here he sat down and looked at his "friend," who had listened intently to this speech with his table-spoon balanced across his forelmger. The old gentleman no sooner caught his friend's eye than he dropped the spoon, and said, in an unsteady voice: "Yes! but I certainly — most sorry — did not mean — of course — hoped it was all right — ha!" and quickly picking up the spoon again went at the soup more quickly than ever.

After dinner Chellis and I went upon the upper deck to smoke our cigars. To us presently came the sharp featured gentleman, and spoke as follows:

"I am exceedingly sorry that my patient's violence has caused you annoyance. He is generally a most harmless, and in many respects a pleasant and entertaining person. Nothing ever moves him but laughter which he supposes to be aimed at himself. I trust you were not hurt, Sir?"

"Oh no, not in the least," replied Chellis, who looked very wolfeomne and clop-fallen. "But—do you mean to say that that gentleman is not—I mean that he is a—a—an insane person?"

"A mild monomaniac, Sir; nothing worse, I assure you; but incurable, I fear. I saw him talking pleasantly to you before dinner, and did not like to trust you. I always forbear to restrain his liberty, or to mortify him uselessly by my authority or recognition when we are traveling. By-the-way, what was he telling you? How did you scrape acquaintance?

I was about to give the Doctor (for such he evidently was) a brief account of Chellis's comical mistake and its strange consequences, for I thought it, after all, a pretty good joke. But Sam frowned and winked at me savagely, and I stopped.

"Oh!" said Chellis, in as off-handish a way as he could assume, "nothing worth a chance word of you know, something about the view or the weather, that brought us together—travelers' ordinary civil—"

"Though your friend," interrupted I, a little malicious ly, "your patient, Doctor, seemed to think we took him for some one else; and I rather think we—or at least Mr. Chellis here—encouraged him somewhat in this fancy, for—"

"The fact is," said Sam, cutting me short in time, as he supposed, to prevent my betraying his secret — "the fact is, Sir, that your friend certainly did imitate we mistook him for a distinguished philanthropist of our acquaintance—I would say, whom we were desirous of becoming acquainted with."

"Ah! ha! ha! indeed!" exclaimed the sharp Doctor, smiling. "Pray, who—what distinguished person did you—that is, did he conceive himself to resemble?"

Sam hesitated rather sheepishly.

"To the reverse be it said, Mr. P.," said I, "Oh! ha! ha! ha! capital!" cried the Doctor. "Wasn't it? ha! ha! ha!" echoed I.

"Really!" said you have quite made me out to be fancied you took him, for our honored countryman, the famous Mr. P.?" repeated the bright-eyed Doctor, with a look of a sort of likeness now, isn't there?" This to Chellis.

"I—can't say I see it!" growled Sam.

"I do," said I, with much mock gravity. "I think your patient looks very like Mr. P., or, rather, very much as Mr. P. might look if he were traveling alone, disguised in blue spectacles, you know—eh, Chellis?"

Sam walked off, muttering something that sounded decidedly like a wish that we were both—

We didn't see the bogus Mr. P. again, nor have either of us yet had the pleasure of meeting his illustrious original. But I have my own opinions as to the possibility of some passing stranger being any celebrated personage I pleasantly remark. "Remember the party to-morrow!" and my friend's enthusiasm oozes away, like Bob Acre's courage, instantly.

A "TANGI" IN NEW ZEALAND.

LADIES, when making a great merit of offering their tears as a precious gift to man, accompanied as not by other indications of sympathy and emotion as tits case may be, [illegible] to be considered in the luxury which is to be found in a "good cry," and the readiness with which the charming sex has always indulged in its favorite enjoyment is as old as the age, and in all parts of the world. As it was in the days of the Old Testament writers, and of Xenophon, Sophocles, and Euripides, so all through mention not only of emotion publicly expressed, but of professional "howlers," ready to provide tears, sighs, groans, and shrieks, whether real, made for exportation; so, happily for all of us—for a woman without sympathy is a garden without flowers — the same luxury is to be found to this very day. We need not stir out of the enlightened kingdom of New Zealand to find instances of professional mourning by the side of tears of a warmer nature; and if we take the trouble to survey mankind "from China to Peru" we shall find the London belle to our Antipodes, which will, perhaps, answer our purpose as well, we shall find that woman relishes her "good cry" as keenly and enthusiastic as she does her dinner or a settlement of savages when squatting, wrapped in a dirty blanket, over the smoke of a wood-fire indulged in a luxury of tears as free as a fashionable coudoir in London or Paris, with eau de Cologne and sal volatile at hiitman. When, therefore, one of our correspondents tells him of a peculiar practice of the native village in New Zealand, and found all the female inhabitants engaged in a "Tangi," or howling concert, preparatory to a great festival or ceremony, I need have discovered nothing singular therein, though it seemed at once to carry the tale right down for nearly four thousand years. In the days of the patriarchs, when Jacob "kissed Rachel and lifted up his voice and wept," as he rolled away the stone from the pretty face that was to be his bride, the scenery around, and the air, like a bath of liquid gold, with the murmur of the adjacent forest, he fostered a belief that tears could be used still, and that we were all patriarchs together, performing an everyday observance.

A chief, a fine looking fellow with aquiline features and the appearance of a ruler of men, who was a personage of rank among the northern tribes, had just returned from a long absence, and was being welcomed on his arrival by the customary "Tangi," indicative of affectionate joy, performed by the ladies of his settlement. The gentlemen have expressed their sentiments by rubbing their noses against his.

The ceremony may be described as follows: Upon the death of a relative or friend, or his serious illness or misfortune; or upon any occasion of rejoicing similar to the one in question, the old women of a tribe assemble for an affectionate "Tangi," or cry together. What a cup of tea is to some of the fairer gender, soothing to the spirits, a cure for spasms or little tempers—and, in fact, a general panacea for all the ills, pains, or sorrows of the female, a number of women sitting on the ground in a circle, some with their face wrapped in the blanket with which they are all clad fashion, some carefully exhibiting with ostentatious vanity great circular head-dresses of turkey's feathers or "parky" hair, others appear to be sewing their faces together at intervals, at the same time raising their hands and dropping them on their laps with gestures of hopelessness, great grief, or weariness. On a nearer approach they are heard to be keeping up a kind of wailing chant of a dreary repetition of three notes in a minor key, sung in chorus. Every now and then, at a particularly affecting part of the impromptu recitation, they will bring all their faces together, and, pressing nose to nose, maintain that attitude for nearly ten minutes, while they continue the wailing in a murmur. One old woman may generally be observed taking the lead, who is evidently the most experienced "blubberer," knowing exactly where to bring in the nose business with the greatest effect, and able to keep it up longer than any one else; she will be making the most tremendous and fearful contortions of the face that can be imagined, as an accompaniment to the act of weeping, if that be not a word suggesting too deep a feeling to be used here. With her head raised, her mouth drawn from ear to ear, and her eyes squeezed up and swollen with tears, she lets out a howl that would discomfit a dog at the fall of the moon, only stopping for—in point of fact "so muchee," in the primitive manner of patriarchal times—wipe her eyes, when the latter will expectorate freely and noisily previous to beginning over again with renewed vigor, the whole party seeming to think it a point of honor to produce the most disgusting amount of grimacing ever witnessed out of a nightmare. At another moment one woman perhaps may be sitting with her head bent forward and inclined on one side, her eyes cast down, and her hands clasped over her knees, silently sighing, the very picture of quiet, absorbed, heart-broken misery; while next to her an old lady will be nodding, wriking, and exchanging facetious remarks with a friend for a moment's interval, after which she will take up her crying again with tenfold violence.

The "Tangi" never interferes with business; any of the old ladies will at any time leave off the work to sell a basket of peaches, or take a turn at peeling and boiling the potatoes for her lord's dinner, afterward upon the return of friends, and will screw up her features into their former grimace, and continue her performance precisely where she left off. Real grief or trouble, however, should be respected and sympathized with, but the "Tangi" is so much real than the polite exoderance of the world of London. It is only a ceremony, a required indulgence in the luxury of shaus, and it can no more be relied upon as an evidence of the warm or affectionate nature of the Maoris than the first funeral met with in London can be accepted as a proof of the ardent bereavement of English relatives. In fact, a Maori would no more hesitate to knock out the brains of a man with whom he had previously rubbed noses and wept in a "Tangi" than in former times, he would have felt compunction about serving up a fricasee of his grandmother as a chosen dinner for a favored friend. At the present moment occasion, dinner and business both being pressing, the "Tangi" was not allowed to occupy too much time. Enough having been done to satisfy the most accomplished and punctilious of formalists, the ostensible cause of the meeting was introduced, the head-dresses laid aside, the countenances of the ladies smoothed and composed into their customary beauty, and decorated each with a short pipe, the sorrow of all the world was consigned and the tears dried, till they should be again ordered and paid for.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

An English mariner lady has consulted her lawyer on the question whether, having married her husband for his money, and that money being all spent, she is not a widow and so an heiress to marry again. Decision reserved.

"The other day a member of Congress wielding to say, in fine English, that a friend of his had died, and the House of Representatives that "he gentlemanly spirit winged his way to its Maker."

A REVERSE.
When the defeated Austrian flies
Across the Alpine ridges,
Fair Venice, with her Bridges o' Sighs,
Will soon be her sighs sledges.

It is stated that a man in Indiana obtained a divorce from his wife because she could not stand against his wishes. He conducted to "fetch her sticks."

CONDITIONS OF SALE.—Wind and tide permitting.

A gentleman from the country on the Fourth of July took eight glasses of soda-water, waiting a while with each one for the "scum to settle."

A VERY STRONG OPINION.—At the Police Court, the other day, one Mylton Onion was committed for trial on a charge of violently assaulting a policeman. He had been in the habit of pocket-ed eight times for assaults on the police. Mr. Onion was described as "a tall and athletic looking man. Onions generally are strong. This Onion appears to be abundantly justified.

A young woman, on the important occasion of making her little boy to fit a pair of trowsers, contrived to trim that it would be more economical to make them of the same dimensions behind and before, so that they might be changed about and wear evenly. Their effect, when donned by the little fellow, was very ridiculous. Puzzled, the fond sight of the baggy garment, burst into a roar of laughter, and exclaimed, "Oh, my dear, how could you have the heart to do it? Why, the poor little fellow won't know whether he's going to school or coming home."

"Bring me some cold cream," said a gentleman to a stupid waiter at a fashionable restaurant. "Yes, uncold cream," repeated the man. "Oh! some ice cream?"

"No, some cold cream, for this," pointing to his face.

"Ah!" returned the enlightened waiter; "some shaving cream."

"No," persisted the gentleman, rather sarcastically, "some ice cream."

What word is that in the Lord of the Isles—The patron's gleke.

MISTAKEN.
One summer's noon, while yet the dew
Lay glittering on the lawn,
I spied a maiden fresh and fair,
Come tripping like a fawn
Across the lawn-in-scented meads
With step so light and airy,
You really might have fancied her
A wood-sprite or a fairy.

"Sweet girl!" I cried, all powerless
To check my admiration,
As she, with trailing skirts, raised
My morning salutation.
"Sweet girl! of all the lovely flowers
In Flora's diadem,
Then, while thy wealth of glowing die
Art the most brilliant gem.

"Surely the Queen of Beauty nurse"
"Who while her nymphs behind her
And fed them on Olympian food—
Ambrosia and nectar?"
"Bother," she haughtily replied,
"I feed 'em, then bent mistaking:
Are them on good strong wholesome brown
Wi' lots of bone and sinew."

HOW TO MAKE THE HOUSE SO FAST.—Let the "cut of the mouse."

PURSE-PICK-SOME.—We have seen some good-sized purses in our time, but we never had the luck to see a purse a purse-monstrule be the one described in the following sentence, clipped from a police report in an English paper:

"Ruth Jones, of a yard in Hawley-croft, said she left her house and locked the door on Friday afternoon, and when she went out on Monday morning she missed a purse containing four pawn tickets and a clothes brush."

REFLECTION BY AN IRISH LOVER.—It's a great pleasure to be alone, especially when you have your sweet-heart with you.

What is the best flower for a doctor to cultivate? Cyclamen (sickly men).

"Here's a riddle for you," said Jon to Jack. "Be quick, and let's hear you guess it right away. Why are you just like your father's nose?" Give it up? You're under his eye."

A dandy acquaintance of ours was refused admission to a gunpowder magazine by the sentinel on the ground that he was a quick.

Old Rose kept a hotel, where he used to say one could get any thing that was ever made to eat. One day in came a Yankee, who asked old Rose what he could give him for dinner. "Any thing you like, Sir, from a pickled elephant to a canary bird's tongue."

"Well, I'm a Yankee, eying Rose, "guess I'll take a piece of pickled elephant."

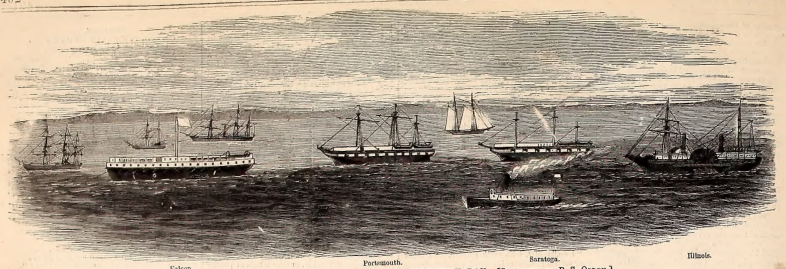
"Well, you've got the only right here in the house, but you'll have to take a whole un, 'cause we never cut 'em."

The Yankee thought he would take some codfish and potatoes.

RAILROAD LYRIC.

If an engine meet an engine
"Coming round a curve,"
If they smash track, train, and tender,
What do they deserve?
Not a penny's paid to any,
So far as we observe,
But all accept the incident,
When "coming round the curve."

If an engine meet a steamer
"Coming through the deep,"
If they crash or drown the public,
Need we go to law?
If the engineer was careless—
Perhaps he's rather true—
They don't darkingen on honest fellow,
"Coming through the deep."



If a steamer chase a steamer,
"Running up to time,"
If they burst their boilers and boiler,
Where's the mighty crime?
Should a fool spy in a fury
Make them try one dime,
Or send the others to prison,
"Running up to time?"

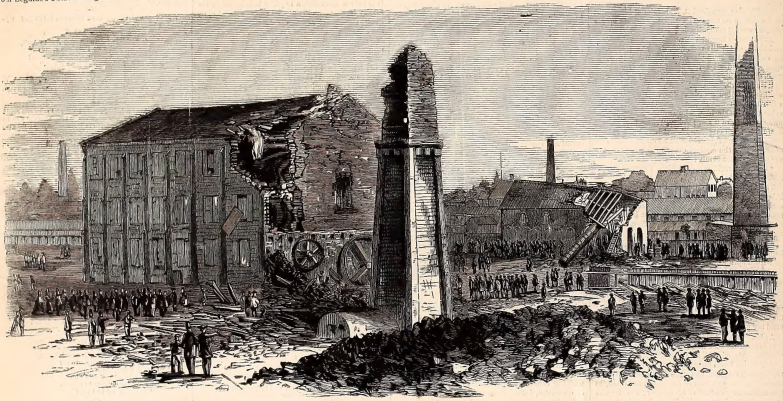
If they make or kill a body,
Or a body's wife,
And a body runs a body,
For luggage, limb, or life?
If you sue for damages,
For pay for wrap you lost,
You get a broken neck or leg,
And have to meet the cost.

DENMARK AVENGED.

Denmark. "FIGHT IT OUT, GENTLEMEN! I'VE THE PLEASURE TO LOOK ON!"

HOSPITAL SHIPS AT THE LOWER QUARANTINE, NEW YORK BAY.—[SKETCHED BY B. S. OSBON.]

HOSPITAL SHIPS IN QUARANTINE.



THE expulsion of the Quarantine Commissioners from Seguine's Point has again left them without any adequate accommodation for their patients. They are therefore compelled to resort to Hospital Ships. We give on this page an illustration representing the Hospital Ships at the Lower Quarantine.

The side-wheel steamer Illinois, 2040 tons, was built by SMITH and DIMON. The engines were constructed by the Allaire Works of this city, in 1851. She was employed in the California trade, between New York and Aspinwall, till the late war broke out. In the war she became a transport in the service of the Government.

The Saratoga, 22 guns, was built in 1842. She has been attached to almost every one of our squadrons. In the war she belonged to the South Atlantic Squadron. Since the war she was employed as an ordnance vessel till she passed into the hands of the Quarantine Commissioners.

The Portsmouth, 26 guns, was built at Portsmouth in 1843. She was attached to FARRAGUT'S fleet in the attack on the forts below New Orleans. She lay at New Orleans for a long time as receiving-ship and temporary flag-ship, and has been lately used as an ordnance vessel at the port of New York.

The Falcon, formerly a steamer of 878 tons, was built in 1848. She was not a good sea-boat, and after making a few voyages was condemned. When purchased by the Commissioners she was named the

EXPLOSION IN WILLIAMSBURG, JULY 18, 1866—RUINS OF LAWRENCE & SONS' CORDAGE FACTORY.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE PAGE 493.]

THE UNITED STATES IRON-CLAD MONITOR "MIANTONOMOH" OFF QUEENSTOWN, IRELAND.—[SEE PAGE 493.]

Florence Nightingale, and fitted up as a hospital ship. She has excellent accommodations for a limited number of patients.

EXPLOSION IN WILLIAMSBURG.

DURING the violent thunder-storm of July 18, a singular accident occurred in Williamsburg, Long Island, which we illustrate on page 492. The New York Tribune gives the following account of the affair:

On Bushwick Avenue, between M'Kibben Avenue and Boerum Street, is located the rope factory of HENRY LAWRENCE & SONS, a firm doing business in this city. The factory consisted of one three-story building, and a one-story building, in which were four boilers and engine. At one end of this boiler-room was a large chimney 75 or 80 feet in height. This chimney was the cause of all the mischief. The lightning struck the chimney, completely demolishing it, and then ran down the interior of it into the engine-room, striking in its course the supply pipes, which at once caused the boilers to explode with a fearful crash.

At least this is the theory, but the precise facts will never be known, as the engineer, the only person who could possibly throw any light upon the matter, was instantaneously killed. At the moment of explosion there was a loud and tremendous peal of thunder—indeed, so appalling was the crash that many persons living in the immediate vicinity of the disaster were not aware that a boiler explosion had taken place till some time afterward.

Two of the boilers were driven with frightful velocity through a brick wall to a distance of 600 feet, ploughing in their course large and stalwart trees like so many twigs. The other two boilers took an opposite direction, being hurled across the street, and through a brick stable, which they completely destroyed, fatally burying themselves in the rope-walk of Messrs. WALES & SONS.

To add to the terror of the scene, the buildings caught on fire, but owing to the prompt arrival of Hose Carriage No. 2 the flames were quickly subdued without doing any further an out of damage.

Captain SELLEN, of the Forty-sixth Precinct, with a squad of men was quickly up in the ground, and he found Engineer WILLIAM BOYLE lying upon the sidewalk, outside the building, face downward, with a heavy plate of iron resting upon his back; before raising him he was found quite dead. His left leg had been cut off just below the knee, and both arms were shattered, hanging to his body by mere shreds of skin.

Deceased was about 40 years of age, and leaves a wife and four children, the eldest not more than 10 years of age, to mourn his untimely death. The grief of these little ones and their mother was heart-rending to behold, and it was a relief when some kindly-disposed neighbors led them from the scene.

It is a matter of wonderment that no more casualties occurred, for in the factory proper, the roof of which was torn completely off, there were over 300 people employed, all of whom escaped without the slightest injury.

Coroner SMITH held an inquest during the afternoon, and from the testimony elicited it was shown that the deceased, WILLIAM BOYLE, was not killed by the explosion of the boilers, but by lightning, and a verdict to that effect was rendered.

The damage done to the building and those in the immediate vicinity is estimated at about $5,000.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JULY.

THERE are but few changes in fashion to chronicle this month. As the weather has grown warmer, dresses lighter and brighter in color and lighter materials have become more general worn; but, with this exception, there is little to notice. Muslins, of course, are greatly in fashion, chiefly, though, for indoor wear; not many elegant printed robes with deep borders of flowers and extremely rich shawl patterns, but plain white muslins trimmed with sky-blue or rose color ribbon, up the centre of which some running pattern is embroidered, and the edges of which are bordered with Valenciennes lace. The "peplum," the new capuchin-shaped jacket, with long pointed ends falling frequently in front as well as behind, is generally worn with robes of this description; and, when so, is invariably made to match the robe itself. Taffeta robes with long trains and jupes cut fourreau, and with casaques of the same material or of white lace, are very commonly worn on grand occasions, those of a delicate green tint shotted with violet appearing to have the preference. One observes, too, in the Bois de Boulogne, numerous robes of gaze de Chambéry of rich pale tints or embroidered over with Lamballe blue, mauve, rose, or amber-color spots, or perhaps of maize-color, with watered ground, all having casaques to match; these casaques being frequently trimmed with long pearl drops. The above-mentioned robes are all made without pleats and are worn without crinolines, the jupon being of white cambric muslin, with one or two small flounces or plaited at the bottom, and having an extra deal of gathering.

There is nothing new in the way of chapeaux; indeed, so endless is the variety at this moment in vogue that it would seem almost impossible to introduce any novelty that was not in too striking contrast to the present mode to stand the least chance of being adopted. Chapeaux of black straw, with yellow straw trimming that more than partially covers them, and occasionally a single flower or small bunch of fruit at the side, have just been introduced. They are evidently intended for country or sea-side wear.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Casaque and robe cut fourreau of fine gray muslin, the jupon ornamented at the bottom with a row of puffings of light porcelain blue taffeta fastened with small buttons. The robe is raised by a band of blue taffeta, which catches it up at regular distances and gives the idea of a tunic. The casaque is ornamented in the same style as the jupon. The chapeau is of rice straw, bordered with plaits of pink taffeta, and with strings to correspond; at the side is a cluster of roses. Parasol covered with imitation silk.

Fig. 2. Robe, with casaque and double skirt en suite of violet silk trimmed with white lace or a straw-colored passementerie. The chapeau is of gathered tulle of the same shade of color as the robe.

Fig. 3. Robe and paletot of striped foulard (green on a white ground), ornamented with guipure Cluny. Chapeau Lemballe of fancy straw, with a large bow of green satin ribbon bordered with black lace placed in the centre of the crown; green satin strings.

Fig. 4. Robe of blue taffeta with a double row of straw-color dentelle fringe at the lower part of the skirt. Paletot of the same material as the robe and trimmed to correspond. Chapeau of straw with rows of blue ribbon diverging star-shape from the centre of the crown, and on which are arranged single ears of corn that take the same diverging form.

"LITTLE BO-PEEP."

THE "MIANTONOMOH."

THE Monitor Miantonomoh, with a paddle war vessel called the Ashuelot, and the sloop of war Augusta, arrived at Queenstown, Ireland, June 16. They came from St. Johns, Newfoundland, whence they sailed on the morning of the 6th inst., having thus made the voyage across the Atlantic in ten days and a few hours. The Miantonomoh is a new ship, built in the naval dock-yard, New York, in 1865, and, though never tried in any engagement, is considered to be superior to any other vessel of the kind constructed for the late war, both as a sea-going and a fighting ship. Her hull is in shape like any ordinary vessel, but from a distance is scarcely perceptible above the water, and resembles nothing more than a huge raft of timber, with two immense turrets and a funnel. The armament consists of four Dahlgren 480 lb. guns and one 12 lb. howitzer. The crew numbers 100 men. The Miantonomoh proved herself a first-rate ship in her ocean passage. She brought as passengers Mr. Fox, Assistant Secretary of the Navy Department of the United States Government, and an Attaché of the English Embassy at Washington. The Ashuelot, which accompanies the Miantonomoh, is a paddle-steamer, capable of steering from either end. She was built at Boston in 1865, and is of 700-horse power. The armament consists of ten 48-inch shell guns, two 60 lb. rifles, two 20 lb. rifles, two 24 lb. howitzers. The Augusta is employed as tender to the Miantonomoh, and, previously to being purchased by the United States Government, was a passenger-ship from Charleston to New Orleans, watching likewise-runners, having captured property to the value of over a million of dollars. The American ships were visited in the harbor of Queenstown by frequent and large parties of excursionists, greatly to the profit of the railway and steamer companies.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JULY, 1866.

The Miantonomoh has two turrets, 38 feet in diameter, each of which are two 15-inch guns. Each turret carries, as a second story, a pilot-house. The sides of the turret consist of eleven inch-thick plates of iron laid upon each other. On the withdrawal of the guns the port-holes can be instantaneously closed by large masses of iron. The armor-plating of the ship extends vertically from her deck downward about 9 feet, and is composed of six inch-thick plates bolted together, and backed with a solid solid thickness of 2 feet 6 inches. The iron plating overlaps the general line of the hull four and a half feet. The hull is of timber, 3 feet 6 inches thick. The ship's deck is planked with 3-inch deal, under which are iron plates 2½ inches in thickness, resting on 18 inches of beams and wooden backing. The ship is 60 inches of beams and wooden backing. The general dimensions of the Miantonomoh are as follow: Length over all, 259 feet; breadth, 57 feet; depth of hold, 19 feet; tonnage, 3,990. The Monadnock is of the same size and class, but two screws, one under each quarter, of 10 feet 6 inches diameter and 15 feet pitch. She has no fan-tail screw-tree: separate gear to work her screws, turrets, ventilating-fans, steering-gear and capstans. Her speed may be safely stated at 10½ knots, though in fair weather and under favorable circumstances she has made 11½ knots.

The presence of this Monitor in a British port has occasioned a great deal of excitement, and the vessel has created an almost universal admiration. The general impression made was that the Americans much ado about their armaments were far to those of the British Navy. On the other hand, it writes in the Daily Mail, are, taking exception to the general opinion, speaks lines of the guns of the Miantonomoh:

"Without attempting to pronounce offhand on opinion as to the respective offensive and defensive powers of the Miantonomoh and our own ships of war, we may say emphatically, and with all confidence, that the artillery arrangements of the two were to choose pieces, we should unhesitatingly give much broader encomiums and assign them rated at present. The Miantonomoh's guns are not only superior, but it is probable that at no very distant date, but infinitely inferior, there is little doubt, to the whole of our English ships of war which will be effectively so much ease and expense. They are also smoothbore guns, whereas, by actual experiment, not by theory alone, within the scope of a short article, we have described, each have and adopted for the British naval ordnance type of our heavy naval guns a very efficient system of rifling. Further, these guns are breech-loaders, and by simply the velocity with which the 450 lb. shot of the Miantonomoh are capable of being propelled by the comparatively few charges used is very much below what it is necessary to use to obtain similar results with the very shortest ranges, and although we are told that the American naval strategy, the theory of heavy metal and striking velocities, in opposition to direct penetration, it already borne in mind that this theory, just at one time many old supporters in this country, that the experience which we have made—the only experience entitled to have applied to it, and to-day, that its retention by the Admiralty is probably rather a compliment than a reproach of the system of heavy artillery which we have adopted.

"It is not impossible to conjecture that the success of this system is somewhat as follows: Powerful ships-guns were required when the means of propelling them were not known, and when there was little time for experiment. Large cast-iron guns, therefore, were the first that were cast, and shot with massive charges remembered themselves, and could be pointed; and for the present day we seem, with the strongest theory, and the best of the system, with the strongest theory, and the best of the Admiralty to publish

$5 SEWING $5 MACHINE.

First Premium and Improvements, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented March 6, 1865; Improvement patented June 5, 1866. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with its newest improvement, is constructed to operate, by the use of a single stitch of ALL KINDS with extraordinary facility, and a beautiful stitch strikes to each revolution of the Wheel. Will gather, hem, ruffle, shirr, tuck, sew by braiding, &c., &c. Strongest machine manufactured. Warranted not to get out of order 5 years. It has received the approval of all the principal journals, and of those who have used it.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly does the stitching exactly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

Single machines, ALL COMPLETE, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted in every where. Address all orders

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY,
Office 102 Nassau Street, New York.

Permanent and Wide-Spread Success

Is the best evidence of the goodness of BRANDRETH'S PILLS. They should be in every family, ready for use on the first symptoms of disease occurring. This method will often save life. Remember, the Cholera must be treated as a Poison, and your safety demands it should be got rid of without delay. Colds, rheumatism, asthma, pleurisy, diarrhœa, colics—in fact, all sickness is the consequence of active impurities in the blood. These being removed, the health is restored at once.

Observe my name in the Government stamp in white letters. Sold by druggists. B. BRANDRETH,
Principal Office 294 Canal Street, New York.

The Great Acclimating Tonic.

Wherever HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS, the celebrated American prevention of Climatic Diseases, have been introduced into unhealthy regions, their effects to each day

THE CONSISTENT DEMOCRAT.

MANAGING MAN. "You must be a Delegate to this Philadelphia Convention!"
CONSISTENT DEMOCRAT. "I is it on the basis of the Constitution as it was?"
MANAGING MAN. "Yes, and on the principle of love and cherish your enemies; and, what's more, BEN WOOD and VALLANDIGHAM will be there."
CONSISTENT DEMOCRAT. "Then I am with you!"

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN
GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York.
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our PERSONAL attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

MUSICAL BOXES,
Playing from one to thirty-six different tunes, and costing from $5 50 to $400 00. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in New York. Fine ornaments for the parlor, and pleasant companions for the invalid. M. T. PAILLARD & CO., Importers, 21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York. Musical Boxes repaired.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Canes, Revolving Rifles,
Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.
In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.
Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Ilion, N. Y.

MERWIN & BRAY,
262 BROADWAY,
MANUFACTURERS OF THE CELEBRATED BALLARD BREECH-LOADING RIFLES, MILITARY AND SPORTING STYLES.
These Rifles carry a ball very long from one half ounce each to 120 to the pound. Material and workmanship of the best quality. They are warranted in every respect.
SOLE AGENTS
for the well-known Eagle Arms Co.'s Cartridge Revolvers, Belt and Pocket size. These Pistols require but four motions to load and discharge, a degree of perfection never before obtained. Are sure fire, and carry a much larger ball than any other revolver of the same weight and size. Also Agents for the Whitney Arms Co.'s Colts' Model Revolvers, and the New York Metallic Ammunition Co.'s Copper Cartridge of every style and size.
Dealers in Arms and Ammunition of all kinds. Illustrated Circulars furnished when desired.
262 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING
R. T. BABBITT'S STAR YEAST POWDER. Light Biscuit or any kind of Cake may be made with the "Yeast Powder" in 15 minutes. No shortening is required when yeast milk is used. No. 64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

Ladies & Gentlemen
OUT OF THE CITY,
TAKE YOUR OWN MEASURE AND SEND TO
E. A. BROOKS, Agt.,
Importer and Manufacturer of
BOOTS, SHOES, &c.
575 Broadway, New York.
Directions for Measuring the Foot.
First. Place the foot upon a piece of paper and trace the outline of same with a pencil, which will give the length and spread of the foot, as shown in figure A.
Second. Make the following measurements, in inches and fractions, with tape measure, as shown in figure B, viz:
1st.—The Ball of the foot.
2d.—The Low Instep.
3d.—The High Instep.
4th.—The Ankle.
5th.—The Calf.
Fig. A. Fig. B.
THIS HOUSE IS THE LARGEST IN THE CITY, AND WAS ESTABLISHED IN 1850.

Important to European Travellers.
HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST.
BY W. P. PETRIDGE.
A New and Revised Edition (the Fifth Year) of this Valuable Book will be ready in a few days.
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

KEROSENE and GAS STOVES.
All the Cooking for a family may be done with Kerosene Gas, or Gas, with less trouble and at less expense, than by any other fuel.
Send for Circular.
Liberal Discount to the Trade.
Kerosene Lamp Heater Co., 206 Pearl St., N. Y.

WARD'S, PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars, sent free every where.
THE CASH CAN BE PAID to EXPRESS COMPANY.
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.
S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, New York.

SOMETHING NEW.
A SET OF ROCK CRYSTAL JEWELRY..... $2 50
A SET OF GREEN CRYSTAL JEWELRY..... 2 00
A SET OF FROSTED CRYSTAL JEWELRY..... 3 00
A SET OF JET JEWELRY..... 2 00
A SET OF IVORY JEWELRY..... 2 00
SENT FREE BY MAIL ON RECEIPT OF THE PRICE.
F. P. PERKINS & BROTHER,
IMPORTERS OF FRENCH JEWELRY AND FANCY GOODS,
727 Broadway, New York.

THE MANHATTAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY,
Nos. 156 and 158 Broadway, New York.
OFFICERS.
H. STOKES, Pres't. C. Y. WEMPLE, Sec'y. J. L. HALSEY, Ass't Sec'y. S. N. STEBBINS, Actuary.
Annual Income Nearly $2,000,000.
IMPORTANT NEW FEATURE IN DIVIDENDS AND MODES OF INSURANCE.
SMALLEST RATIO OF MORTALITY.
EXPENSES LESS THAN ANY CASH COMPANY.
LIBERAL MODES OF PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS.
INSURERS RECEIVE THE LARGEST BONUS EVER GIVEN.
DIVIDENDS MADE ANNUALLY ON ALL PARTICIPATING POLICIES.
No Claims Unpaid.
ALL KINDS OF NON-FORFEITING LIFE AND ENDOWMENT POLICIES. POLICIES INCONTESTIBLE. LOANS MADE ON POLICIES. ALL POLICIES AFTER THREE YEARS NON-FORFEITABLE.
The following are examples of the operation of the last Dividend:

	POLICIES IN 1862, ONLY FOUR YEARS AGO.
Age at Issue.	Amount Insured.	Premium Paid.	Added to Policy.	Total Amount of Policy.
40	$10,000	$1280	$372	$12,372
35	9,000	1022	2848	10,848
30	7,500	769	2708	10,208
25	7,000	571	2208	9,208

This is an entirely new plan, originating with this Company, and gives insurers the largest return ever made by any Company in the same period.
A DU BOIS, Medical Examiner, at office 2 to 3 P.M. H. G. PIFFARD, Ass't Med. Examiner, at office 11 to 12 M.
A LIBERAL ARRANGEMENT WILL BE MADE WITH SOLICITORS for new business brought to the office.

GRAND NATIONAL CONCERT,
For the Benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home Fund, at Grover's Theatre, Washington, D. C., on Thursday Evening, August 2, 1866.
300,000 Tickets, at $1 each. 75,000 Presents, valued at $250,000, consisting of Fine Residences, Lots, Pianos, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silverware, &c., &c.
MANAGING DIRECTORS: Major H. A. HALL, President Soldiers' and Sailors' Union; Colonel CHARLES CAPEHART; Major M. H. ALLEBAUGH; WILLIAM S. MORSE.
TREASURER: J. B. HUTCHINSON, Cashier National Bank of the Metropolis.
TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE, WASHINGTON, June 27, 1866.
Whereas H. A. Hall and others, as "managing directors of Grand National Concert" to be held in Washington, D.C., on the 2d of August next, have made due application to L. Clephane, Collector of Internal Revenue for the collection district of the District of Columbia, for permission to hold a lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise, and presented collection district of the District of Columbia, for permission to hold a lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise, and presented satisfactory evidence that the proceeds of said lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise will be devoted to charitable to him satisfactory evidence that the proceeds of said lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise will be devoted to charitable uses, permission is hereby granted to such "managing directors" to hold such lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise from all charges of internal revenue tax or license, in respect to such lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise.
E. A. ROLLINS, Commissioner.
WILLIAM S. MORSE, Secretary,
Washington, D. C.
All orders must be addressed, with stamps enclosed, to Lock Box 57.
Tickets sold by G. M. VAN BUREN & CO., 384 Broadway, New York.
WE REFER, BY PERMISSION, TO
Major-Gen. Winfield S. Hancock, U.S.A.; Gen. Robert C. Schenck, M.C., Ohio; Gen. Hulbert E. Paine, M.C., Wis.; Gen. John H. Kinzie, M.C., N. Y.; Gen. James G. Blunt, Kansas; Gen. J. N. Hedrick, Iowa; Gen. D. C. McCallum, D. C.; Gen. O. V. Dayton, N. Y.; Hon. Thos. W. Ferry, M.C., Mich.; Hon. George Lawrence, M.C., Penn.; D. C. Forney, Esq., D. C.; Major E. F. Dunphy, N. Y.; Hon. Richard Wallach, Washington, D. C.; Hon. Henry C. Deming, M.C., Conn.; Hon. Thos. C. Ingersoll, M.C., Ill.; Hon. Samuel J. Randall, M.C., Penn.; Hon. C. G. Burgen, M.C., N.Y.; Hon. Henry Wilson, U.S.S., Mass.; Hon. Henry D. Washburn, M.C., Ind.; Hon. Henry Winter Davis, M.C., Md.; Hon. Benj. F. Wade, U.S.S., Ohio; Hon. Reuben E. Whaley, M.C., West Va.; Hon. Wm. D. Kelley, M.C., Penn.; Hon. A. H. Laflin, M.C., N.Y.; Hon. Leonard Myers, M.C., Penn.; Hon. William A. Newell, M.C., N.J.; Hon. George W. Julian, M.C., Ind.; Hon. Stephen F. Wilson, M.C., Penn.; Hon. J. B. Grinnell, M.C., Iowa; Major G. M. Van Buren, N. Y.; Gen. R. B. Hayes, M.C., Ohio; Gen. S. T. Hudson, M.C., N.Y.; Hon. G. R. Latham, M.C., West Va.; Hon. James A. Marvin, M.C., N.Y.; Hon. Thomas T. Davis, M.C., N.Y.

MAGIC LANTERN
AND STEREOSCOPE.
We are now receiving the most comprehensive and finest importation of glass views ever made to America, representing scenes and objects in nearly all European cities and countries. These views are specially selected abroad by our Mr. Edward Anthony, and are adapted for the use of either the Stereoscope or the Stereoscope.
E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway,
3 doors south of the St. Nicholas Hotel.

TRADE MARK
OF THE
MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,
To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods, of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and infringements on the patents of the Magic Ruffle Company. The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction to consumers. Office of the Company No. 58 Chambers Street, New York.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.
This new celebrated Revolver excels all others for compactness, effectiveness, durability, power, and safety. Is light (14 oz.), small (6¾ in.), carries a large bullet—only 7 in.), with larger metallic cone-proof cartridge (37-100 ball) than any Revolver made of same size and weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. HICKOX, 73 Beekman Street, New York.

Economy is Wealth.
If you want the best-fitting, strongest, and most serviceable Paper Collar ever offered to the Public, don't fail to purchase the
PATENT REVERSIBLE PAPER COLLAR
MADE BY
MARCH BROS., PIERCE & CO.,
AGENTS,
WINTHROP SQUARE, BOSTON.
MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 56 Broadway.

50 MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP PER-CENT SAVED BY
USING B. T. BABBITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH, or READY SOAP-MAKER. Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and more than any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of 1 pound, 2 pounds, 5 pounds, 6 pounds, and 12 pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making hard and soft Soap. One pound will make 10 gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.
B. T. BABBITT, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

$200 A MONTH IS BEING MADE with our IMPROVED STENCIL DIES, by Ladies and Gentlemen. Send for our Free Catalogue, containing samples and prices. Address
S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

POLLAK & SON Meerschaum Manufacturers, 402 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes $6 to $50 each.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL POMADE
The best hair restorer and dressing. Sold by druggists.

Mosquito Nets
WITH PATENT PORTABLE FRAMES.
G. L. & J. B. KELTY, 447 Broadway.

T. ARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Madame Jumel's Mammarial Balm
For developing the female form. Mammarial cups are also used when required. Sent 3d3 Canal Street. Madame Jumel's Wrinkle Obliterator. Send stamp for circular. Sold by Druggists.

Dr. Foote's Advertisements.
OLD EYES MADE NEW, without Spectacles, Doctor, or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.
COMFORT AND CURE FOR THE RUPTURED.—Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.
MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—400 pages—100 Illustrations. By E. B. FOOTE, M.D. Sent by mail every where postpaid. Contents Tables sent free. Address, Dr. Ashley E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. X.—No. 502.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 11, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE REVIEW AT LONG BRANCH.

THE review of the New Jersey Militia by Governor WARD, on the 25th of July, was not an ordinary parade. The occasion made the day one of very great interest to the whole State. Long Branch was thronged with the beauty and fashion of New Jersey. It was also announced that General MEADE, who has been spending a few days at this popular place of summer resort, would honor the troops with his presence and criticisms. But owing to other engagements General MEADE was not present. For several days Major-General RUNYON's Brigade of New Jersey Militia have been enjoying at Long Branch their annual encampment. The encampment is pleasantly located a short distance from the beach, and presents a clean, neat, and most creditable appearance. The officers preserve excellent discipline, and drill their men regularly. We did not hear a complaint made by any of the citizens of the conduct of the men. The men look brown and sun-burnt, but, notwithstanding their exposure to the sun and their hard drills, seem to enjoy the sport very much. The encampment is visited daily by the ladies stopping at the Branch, and the dress parades in the evening have become an attractive feature in the daily programme. Two good brass bands belong to the Brigade, and contribute greatly to the entertainment of visitors.

At 5 o'clock the line was formed facing the hotel. At this time the square and the streets were packed with eager sight-seers, while the front of the hotel, and every available window and balcony in the vicinity, were occupied by bright and smiling ladies. General RUNYON took command of the parade immediately, and exercised the men slightly in the manual of arms. Governor WARD shortly arrived upon the ground with his brilliant staff, and was received with regulation honors. The Governor and the General, accompanied by the officers of their respective staffs, rode up and down the line, expressing great satisfaction with the appearance of the troops. The Brigade then marched past the Governor in review, with company front. Their marching was excellent; but the First and Second Regiments divided the honors for steady marching and neat and soldierly appearance. The Brigade marched past a second time at "route step" and "right shoulder shift," after which the line was again formed. After a little more exercising in the manual of arms the troops were marched back to camp. The Brigade consists of the First Regiment, of Newark, Lieutenant-Colonel A. B. PROVOST commanding; the Second Regiment, of Newark, Colonel JOSEPH W. PLUME commanding; the Third Regiment, Colonel URIAH DE HART commanding; First Battalion, Major D. D. BUCHANAN commanding; Second Battalion, Major A. B. M'KEON commanding; the Newark City Battery (two brass 12-pounders), Captain MATTHEW WATERS commanding, and Captain W. F. GERD's company of Newark City Cavalry. The review was admirably conducted throughout; the Brigade looked admirably, and showed a degree of proficiency highly creditable to all concerned.

THE NEEDLE-GUN.

DURING the Crimean War, and more especially in the war in Italy in 1859, "arms of precision"—that is, guns that would carry a projectile far and carry it sure—were the great desideratum. In both these struggles attention was particularly given to having cannon of far and accurate range; the French and English infantry were armed with rifles, and though these were all muzzle-loaders, and were mainly valued for picking off sentries and in rifle-pit practice, they were found to be a most efficient weapon in the hands of the bulk of the army. The possession of Lancaster and other guns of long range gave the English the advantage over the Russians in the contest before Sebastopol; but it was reserved for the campaign in Italy in 1859 to demonstrate the vast superiority of rifled cannon over the old smooth-bore pieces then still in use in the Austrian army. The French cannon rayés largely contributed to winning the battle of Solferino, and showed that "arms of precision" conferred an enormous advantage upon troops so armed over opponents who had adhered to obsolete patterns.

That was one great step in the practice of war. But another, equally if not more important, has since been introduced, namely, the construction of breech-loading cannons as well as breech-loading rifles. At Solferino it was the greater rapidity as much as the higher range of the French cannon which told upon the Austrians; and through the whole of the battles in Bohemia it has been the rapid fire of the needle-gun which has enabled the Prussians to conquer. The Prussians do not appear to have displayed in any marked manner superior generalship, greater bravery, or better discipline than the Austrians. They won battle after battle chiefly because they outnumbered the Austrians, but no small measure of their success is to be attributed to their possession of the needle-gun. It is doubtful whether the Prussian needle-gun is at all superior to our Spencer repeating-rifle. But if we are to judge from our experience with the latter, these breech-loading rifles are chiefly available on the skirmish line. It is frequently the case in a great battle that, from one cause or another, their superiority is of no avail. This was the case at the battle of Sadowa. It is very doubtful whether the needle-gun of the Prussians was any very great advantage—the last he was won, we think, not on account of better rifles, but by reason of greater numbers and superior strategy.

The latest story about the needle-gun and the furore it is exciting in Paris is told by the correspondent of the Star: "The Prince Imperial asked his father to explain the difference between the needle-gun and the ordinary fire-arm to him. Wishing to give example to theoretical demonstration, the Emperor went down to the court of the Tuileries, and telling the sentinel said to him, 'Mon brave, load and fire to amuse these children,' the children being the young Prince and Princesse. Meanwhile his Majesty, who had a needle-gun in his hand, loaded and fired five times before the little ones had the simple shot. 'How quick!' exclaimed. 'Hein,' said the Emperor, 'it's quicker work with this gun than with yours; would you like to have one?' 'Certainly, Sire.' 'Then so you shall,' answered the Emperor."

REVIEW OF THE NEW JERSEY STATE MILITIA BY GOVERNOR WARD AT LONG BRANCH, JULY 25, 1866.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 11, 1866.

POP-GUNS SPIKED.

THOSE who think that when the late insurgent States sink down their arms all our dangers and difficulties ended, if we would only consent to see it so, and who denounce Congress as maliciously or stupidly delaying measures to ensure it thought that in the gravest political crisis we have ever known it was not unwise to act only upon patient reflection, constantly repeat certain questions as if they were conclusive arguments.

Thus, speaking of those who have been foiled in their efforts to destroy the Government, it is asked whether, by excluding them from a share in it, we expect to make them any more friendly to it? Certainly not; nor is there any wish to exclude them. But the very terms of the objection imply that they are not now well-disposed toward it. Is it, then, unwise to take reasonable, and only reasonable, security against acknowledged evil dispositions?

Or it is said that they are now as fit as they ever will be to resume their relations in the Union. It is, then, unkind to the country to make that resumption as harmless as possible?

Or it is asked whether we admit "that the people of the United States are deficient in either the wisdom or the virtue necessary to continue the existence of the republic?" No more than Mr. SEWARD, who asks the question. The wisest in eleven of the States are that half of the people which has proved its hostility to the republic are to vote, is it distrust of the people to demand that they shall not be left to speak for half who are the truest friends of the Union, and who are to have no voice?

Or we are asked whether the total failure of the rebellion, the emancipation of the slaves, the terrible bereavements and ruin of fortunes, and the overwhelming defeat in the field are not sufficient pledges of future fidelity? Is it unjust, in view of such facts, no generous man would be harsh. He would be as conciliatory as possible, but he must not be blind. The wounded rebel prisoners whom the Union army captured were tenderly nursed in the Union hospitals, but they were not dismissed with their arms to return to the enemy's camp. Did King GEORGE THE THIRD say the less endeavor to assert the royal prerogative because KING CHARLES THE FIRST was beheaded? "Ambition," says BURKE, "though it is not the same general views, has not at all times the same means nor the same particular objects.... There are very few statesmen," he says, "so very clumsy and awkward in their business as to fall into the identical snare which has proved fatal to their predecessors." Now the motives and purposes of the late insurgents have not changed. We do not expect them, indeed, to renew the rebellion to destroy the Union; but we do expect, and we have every possible man, that, in connection with the Democratic party, they will try to control the Government in the spirit of caste which created the rebellion. It is not unjust or ungenerous to insist that they shall not have an unfair advantage in the contest? Granting that it is good policy under all the circumstances to allow every late insurgent State to determine who of its citizens shall vote, does good policy also require that if it excludes from the polls thousands of true friends of the Government those friends shall be counted in the basis of national representation? Because the South Carolina planter has been ruined by his own recklessness, and because it is good policy to tax by-gones be by-gones, is it, therefore, vindictive to insist that he shall not throw two votes for one cast by the farmer of Illinois or New Hampshire?

Or we are asked whether it is honorable, when the insurgent States have accepted the principle originally proposed, to insist upon others? But when until now have the loyal people of the Union represented in Congress offered any terms upon accepting which the late insurgent States might resume their national relations? The President, indeed, without consultation with Congress, during the summer and autumn of 1865, mentioned certain conditions which he said he considered indispensable preliminaries to such resumption. But even he did not say that acceptance of them would entitle the States in question to that resumption. So late as the beginning of November, 1865, he telegraphed through Mr. SEWARD to Governor PERRY of South Carolina that "it is impossible to anticipate events." His opinion of what it might be necessary for a State to do could not possibly bind Congress. He did not suffer it to bind himself. And if later these expressions of opinion were called a policy, and the President assumed that, having done what he suggested, the States were entitled to representation, the situation was not in the least changed. The honor or the country could not be engaged until Congress approved his opinions and authorized his action. If, as the last surgeon thought it was, they were plainly mistaken, and their error could not bind the country to its peril.

Again we are asked whether it is constitutional or just to govern States without representation? But this objection is an international sophism. Was not the legislation of Congress during the war constitutionally and justly binding upon the States which were not represented? May a State by refusing to be represented absolve itself from the supremacy of national law? And if a State withdraws its representation for the purpose of destroying the Government and succeeds, may not the States that remain loyal and save the Government rightfully determine upon what terms, consistent with a republican government, such representation may be resumed? Moreover, what is the force of this objection, urged as it is, for instance, by Governor ORR of South Carolina, a State which has now half its adult male population of representation?

If the war were an exhilarating little tournament, which, being ended, the knights ride jingling home to dinner, pardons and restitution are plainly impertinent. But if it were a serious and radical conflict of principles and tendencies which, whatever the result of war, still remain because they are rooted in human nature, then to insist that every thing is settled by a surrender of arms is simply in turn to surrender common-sense.

FINANCIAL ASPECT OF THE TELEGRAPH.

THE Atlantic Telegraph is once more a success. At the hour we write these lines we have been received from Queen VICTORIA, congratulating the President on the successful accomplishment of this great international enterprise, and from certain merchants at Valentia, Ireland, announcing the restoration of peace in Germany, and the outbreak of riots in London. The Queen's dispatch of course will not be the first telegram of the Atlantic Telegraph open to the suspicions to which a similar reticence exposed them in 1858. Possibly, by the time these lines are before the reader they will be a regular working order, and we may have quotations day by day from London and the other European markets.

It would be a idle to descant upon the advantages of the Telegraph, should it prove a practical success, as to commend the operation of the instrument's company as applied the multiplication table. All will admit that it is an advantage to shorten communication between the two worlds from ten days to minutes. Indeed every body concedes the vast importance and substantial glory of the achievement with which the name of CYRUS FIELD will always be associated, though we do not generally realize how the Telegraph is going to affect business. And it may, perhaps, be worth while to show that its effect, in the main, will be to depress our trade with Europe of its speculative character, and to establish it on as safe and as certain a basis as the internal trade between New York and the interior.

Let us illustrate the case. We ship to England breadstuffs and cotton. It is a maxim in both trades that, if you wish to make a profit, you must ship in the face of a loss—in other words, you must ship your goods at a time when the ruling quotations abroad are lower than the ruling quotations here. The reason is very simple. We have cotton and wheat are higher in Liverpool than they are here, every one ships, the foreign market is glutted, and cotton, and American shippers are more likely to lose than to make money. On the other hand, when cotton and wheat are quoted lower in Liverpool than in New York, the great bulk of shippers hold back their stocks; and there is a chance that the few adventurous merchants who do send forward their property may find that by the time it arrives on our foreign market, and consequently a fair demand at advancing quotations. This has been the history of the export trade in cotton and breadstuffs for years, not to say generations. One of the oldest and wisest bankers in New York used to ask—when he heard of a house going into one of these two trades—how much capital have they got? If they had $100,000, he would tell his clerks to trust them—i. e., to buy their bills, for a year; if they had $200,000, for six months; if they had $200,000, for two years. His experience had taught him that, at the expiration of these periods, their capital would, in most cases out of ten, be exhausted, and they would fail. Now, the Atlantic Telegraph will put an end to all this speculative business and all these losses. Any sporting merchant will sell his cotton in Liverpool the day he buys it in New York, and will ship it at his leisure without fear of risk. A provision dealer will not buy a barrel of flour or a bushel of grain for export until he has secured his profit by Telegraph. The trade will change entirely. Profits will be smaller but certain, and there will be but few losses. People will cease to assume, as a matter of course, the biennial failure of cotton and produce shippers.

On the other hand the foreign dry-goods trade will undergo a similar change. Hitherto importers and agents of European manufacturers have always been gamblers to some extent. They have been forced to probable condition of the spring and fall markets; they have theorized as to the state of the money market; they have guessed at the probable bank expansion; and as the result of their theories they have ordered goods. They have often been mistaken. Losses have not been as large as in the cotton trade, partly because the importation of dry goods in this country has seldom been in excess of the demand, and partly because our dry-goods men are by far the shrewdest merchants in the country. But still there have been many seasons when the dry-goods importers in this city would have paid the entire cost of the Telegraph if they could have countermanded the orders they had sent out only a fortnight before. With the Telegraph all this will be altered. No orders for goods will be sent by mail. They will all go by Telegraph, and as a general rule the importer will secure a bid from the jobber before he transmits his order to Leeds or Rouen. Thus the element of speculation still adheres to the trade will vanish, and it will become as steady, as devoid of excitement, and as clear of great failures as the business of any banking or the domestic dry-goods trade.

Those old men who can remember the state of things which existed in the United States before the establishment of land telegraphs can easily realize the change. In those old days—they seem as ancient as COTTON MATHER or the Crusades—a bank trade was driven in Hartford by Southern merchants, and LITTLE was at the head of it. There were no telegraphs, and the mails were leisurely. No one could say for sure what kind of funds were worth, or how the Vicksburg Bank stood. JACOB LITTLE made it his business to know—by means of horse expresses and fleet couriers—and in the course of a few years he made a million out of the merchants engaged in the Southern trade by his early information. By-and-by telegraphs were established, every one could ascertain the facts as soon as Mr. LITTLE, and there was no more gambling in Southern money. It had its value, fixed and certain, for the day, and it made it became as safe and as free from excitement as the manufacture of horn buttons.

It will be so with all our foreign trade if the Atlantic cable prove a practical success. The smart German bankers who have made money by speculating between New York and London or New York and Frankfort in Five-Twenty bonds will find their vocation gone. It is an open question whether, in the long-run, they have ever made any thing; but there is no doubt that they have rendered severe losses both on American and on European holders. This business—or at least the speculative part of it—will cease when the Telegraph transmits the daily London and Frankfort quotations side by side. We shall cease to see Five-Twenties five cent. lower here than in Europe, or Erie eight per cent. higher in London than at the open Board of Brokers in this city. These anomalies will disappear, and the New York and London markets will show no greater variation than the markets of New York and Philadelphia.

THE POSITION OF ITALY.

AS experience constantly proves that the class calculations of "practical men" and others "practical men" are the most visionary and foolish of all, it is not surprising that the news of the cession of Venetia to France by Austria should have caused the London Stock Exchange to shout that peace was virtually concluded. All the elements of the situation were at once forgotten. That Prussia and Italy were close allies, that one could not act in the matter without the other, and that the object of the cession was the release of the Austrian army in Italy to act at Prussia in Bohemia, were obvious facts which controlled the situation and made peace extremely doubtful, except upon the assumption that its terms were to reduce Austria to a secondary position, and that she voluntarily accepted her defeat at Sadowa as a death-blow to her imperial power.

But apart from the more complicated view there was another, very simple and painfully evident, which should have moderated the crude transports of the Stock Exchange. The cession of Venetia to France was the humiliation of Italy. To expel Austria has been for years the inspiring motive of Italian politics. To encircle Austria in the person of METTERNICH, so long its evil genius, the wish of Italy was

"To feel his red wra throat doffi
And see his bowels and wy tees hanging."

It had for six years maintained an immense army at vast expense and political risk, to undertake the work of deliverance, and improving the first favorable hour, with Prussia as alliance, with France in sympathy, and the world hopefully looking on, it struck a brave blow, and was defeated. The moral reaction of that defeat we can conceive; but the total demoralization of accepting from France as a gift what it could not wrest from Austria as a right is inconceivable. If Italy gave Sardinia or any other province in exchange, it merely cut off one end of a field to add to the other. If Italy received Venetia as a free gift from France, it held it not by its own prowess but by the favor of France. The act of reception would acknowledge its own incompetency, when its second competency was the whole moving ground of its claim. Italia fará da se; Italy can and will look out for itself, has been the Italian rallying cry. Can it consent, without the utmost self-contempt, to have the cry turned to "Here, little fellow, I will take care of you"

Nothing is plainer than that Italy can not repose upon the battle of Custozza. That battle showed, indeed, the valor of Italian troops, which had been doubted; and the incompetency of their leaders, which had been feared. It was unquestionably an honorable battle to the Italians, but it was none the less a defeat, and a defeat which must be repaired. It was a matter of course that the French and Austrian sentiment was one of profound discontent" when the news of the cession reached Milan. A thoroughly independent and high-minded Italian would feel that assent would cost VICTOR EMANUEL his crown and the country a revolution. No wonder, then, that CIALDINI, the soldier of prowess and a statesman, who two years ago said, "We are to-day the allies of France and the avowed enemies of Austria," but who knows what may happen to-morrow? If does not mean to allow the fruit of France to be the tenure of Italian nationality, and advances into Venetia. Without rashly refusing to receive Venetia on suitable terms from France, he knows that the imperative condition precedent is the self-respect of his country, and that that condition is impossible while the present situation remains.

It is hardly possible that there was not an understanding upon the part of Austria that the condition of the cession of Venetia to France should be the cessation of hostilities in Italy. To that condition Prussia would not assent, and Italy could not. We anticipate, therefore, further war, unless Europe should insist that Austria be reduced from her position as a great power.

WELCOME, TENNESSEE!

EVERY good citizen must be glad that Tennessee has again resumed her full relations in the Union, and that it has been done deliberately and to the satisfaction of Congress, who are the immediate representatives of the loyal people of the country. It would have been better done, we think, by a simple concurrent resolution than by a joint resolution, but the latter requires the signature of the President, which it was evident could be given, only under protest, as the event proved; and as the precedent created that a State could only be restored by the consent of the Legislative branch it was superfluous to ask that of the Executive. Moreover, the formal declaration of Congress that the State was restored was unnecessary, and therefore unwise. Congress, supported by the loyal Union people, have definitely concluded that the late rebel States may exercise all their functions under certain conditions. That decision being reached, as fast as those conditions are satisfied the States in question should be restored, with as few words as possible. Mr. BINGHAM's preamble in the House was unnecessary, therefore, to have been wiser than Mr. THADDEUS's in the Senate.

But these are points of mere detail and taste. The President's conduct in the matter is open to graver objection. Had he replied to the resolution of either House, that when he signed the resolution he could not agree with the preamble, his course would have been precisely what was to be expected. But he undertakes to argue the point, and fails ignominiously. He says that if a State can only be restored to its national relations by the consent of the Government, it is not very consistent to assume that before that consent is given the State is competent to pass upon a Constitutional Amendment. If this be true, the President must first settle the account with himself. Either the Government may impose conditions or it can not. If it can, the conditions must seem such as are necessary, whatever form they may take. If it can not, if the late rebel States by the mere act of surrender resumed every relation in the Union, no part of the Government had any authority to require any condition whatever. This was so true last October as it is to-day. Yet on the 28th of that month the Secretary of State telegraphed to Provisional Governor Jonnson of Georgia, "The President of the United States will not recognize the people of any State as having resumed the relations of loyalty to the Union that admits as legal ordinations contracted or debts created in order to promote the war of the rebellion." Whence did the President derive authority to make such a condition?

The truth is, that this question is a point of mere political casuistry. It is unbecoming practical statesmen. It is what Mr. LINCOLN, with true insight, called "a pernicious abstraction." The President can not taunt Congress with inconsistency, for he is himself utterly illogical. He should certainly have learned that there are vital words in the life of nations that transcend technicalities, and that the readjustment of relations after so fierce a civil war, under a Constitution susceptible of such various interpretation as ours, is a matter to be approached in the calm spirit of fundamental principles, and not in the temper of hair-splitters. In the problem of reconstruction the Constitution is to be interpreted by the necessary intention of all government, and by the declared purposes of this Union. When the war began, speech, both rebels and Copperheads insisted that it could not be constitutionally resisted. Now that it is over, the same alliance contends that necessary and reasonable conditions of peace can not be constitutionally required. The loyal people of the country differ with them. Constitutionally they fought with, constitutionally they conquered them, and constitutionally they will do what is necessary to maintain their victory.

MAWWORM.

The New York Times informs us that "Progress with the Abolition leaders means, first, Emancipation; next, Suffrage; and, finally, Amalgamation." Yet the Times knows perfectly well that where there is one of what it calls "the Abolition leaders" who theoretically holds that Government had better let people marry whom they choose, there are five hundred of what it calls "Conservatives" who are practical amalgamationists. Why does not the virtuous Times thunder against those who notoriously practice what it denounces, instead of snarling at those whom it assumes to theorize upon the subject?

In one of his speeches in the great Senatorial campaign in Illinois, Mr. DOUGLAS, in the spirit of Times and Journal News, insinuated that Mr. LINCOLN was an amalgamationist. Mr. LINCOLN replied that he really could not see why he should marry a woman whom he did not fancy simply because he believed in the Declaration of Independence. So say the friends of Mr. LINCOLN now. They really can not see why marriage should not continue to be regulated by inclination merely because they believe that the peace of the Union requires the equality of all citizens before the law.

A LITTLE COMFORT.

Mr. Percrutin V. Nassy, that zealous laborer in the democratic vineyard, is cheered by the political prospect. A stanch adherent of the chief dogma of "the great Democratic party," that every white man is born with an indissoluble right "to wallop niggers," his words of encouragement to all true Democratic believers must be most timely and refreshing. We leave our readers not to omit his letters, in which he examines his observations and hopes and fears. His comments upon that jubilee of the Democratic brethren, the Philadelphia Convention of Messrs. Randall, Pendleton, Wood, Vallandigham, Raymond, F. Wood, &c., we shall anticipate with pleasure. In a late letter Mr. Nassy says:

"I notice with joy the work in this part of the Democratic vineyard which cheers me. The demonstration our friends made in Memphis, the resolv ns drafted by Rosse, and the call for a Jackson Convention in Philadelphia, all tell how competent to comfort the souls of the Democracy will encouraging words be received. It is bringing forth fruit. Only last week five Northern men were seen within our or thi section—they stayed in the night to engage hanjin, leavin' their goods as a prey for the vigilantes; six niggers saw his killed, and one Jhorse or other died. Truly there is every thing to encourage us."

PUTTING TOO FINE A POINT UPON IT.

One of our excellent "conservative" journals, the earliest and strongest supporter of the Philadelphia Convention, objects to the admission of what it impolitely calls "Copperhead" delegates. But this is the very ecstasy of folly.

The worthy "conservative" is going with all his heart into a convention with the late rebels, and refuses to sit down with the late friends of rebels. If Governor Jonnson should come, the "conservative" would offer him a pious welcome; but the Honorables Fernando Wood, Clement L. Vallandigham, and George H. Pendleton must be shown the door, or the "conservative" will exclude himself!

But will our good friend explain of what office the Honorable F. Wood is guilty that His Excellency Governor Orr has not committed? Is it pardonable in Orr to have taken up arms against the Union, and unpardonable in Wood to have cheered him on at a safe distance? Is a rebel competent to advise upon the true policy of reconstruction, and a Copperhead incompetent? Our "conservative" friend puts too fine a point upon it. May not a Copperhead repent as well as a rebel? How is the power and territory of this Union not been as distinctly demonstrated to Mr. Pendleton as to Mr. Alexander H. Stephens? "Those whose sympathies were with secession are not ashamed in the call," says our conservative. Yet the secessionists themselves are not excluded. The inference is plain. Only those whose sympathies were with secession are invited. And they will come. Our "conservative" friend will discover that the men and the spirit that controlled the Democratic National Convention of 1864 will control the Philadelphia Surrender Convention of 1866.

LITERARY.

The Harpers have just published "Felix Holt, the Radical," by George Eliot, the author of "Adam Bede," the author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," and "Romola." The first impression upon reading it is of exquisite relief from a grievous incubus of sensuality and crime in which so many of the popular current novels immerse us. It is a great delight to be lifted out of this miasma into the serene air of great principles, to feel yourself in the hands of a master, and to balance your pleasure between the earnestness of the story and the profound human interest of the tale upon one hand, and its rare literary art upon the other. The simplicity, the insight, the delicate appreciation, the tender sympathy, indeed the high and spiritual qualities of the book, are such as belong only to great gifts and deep experience. Miss Evans has what may be called a manly mind, yet with the most thoroughly feminine sensibility. She is so thorough, indeed, that every man must learn from her books what he did not know, and revere in woman a still greater and nobler quality than intellect can be had suspected. This fascinating complexity of nature is nowhere more subtly portrayed than in Esther Lyon, who is the heroine of the new novel.

Felix Holt himself is a true radical, a thought without whose conscious flexibility the most wise or outline which gentler conditions of life would have given him. But he is neither a saint nor a cognizance. Indeed, he has all the faults in his character so grand as almost to outrun sympathy. An educated man of the working-class who deliberately sacrifices the resources of the method of his energy, ambition, and intelligence usually accord to wealth and distinction, and who devotes himself, without interest, or ambition, or hope, to the welfare of any kind, to poverty and his own class in order that, feeling him to be one of them, they may heed what he says, and believe that he is the best good also be, is not a common man; and to describe him and take up and that you will express with him do not disturb your faith in his simplicity and admiration for his nobility, shows a very uncommon talent. To trace with delicacy the subtle influence of each a man upon a woman seemingly his opposite, to show the forces of such a nature, gradually developing a head of gain in it, in taking the measure than the beauty and grace which were already apparent in her, and which merely concealed the other, as the original elements of a palpitating power which lay like lighter modern lyric over-written—this is an intellectual feat and a triumph of art which the author of "Felix Holt" has fully accomplished. For new novel seems to us in many points superior to any she has written, and it must rank among the very few really good novels in English literature.

"Inside: a Chronicle of Secession," by George F. Allen, Boston, 1866, is a tale which is not new to readers of Harper's Weekly. Those who read it as it serially appeared in our columns will agree that we have had no picture of the inside history of the war in "Confederacy" during the war which could be in any way compared with the vividness and mental variety of this. Numerous books and publications we have received many letters from the section of the country in which the scene of the story is laid, that as a rare delineation and blank fury of some of these were plainly the wincing of an uneasy conscience, while to the fierce and unrepentant rebels one of others showed how true and tender was the touch of the author. Written by one born and bred and always living as a Southern slave State, yet always faithful, by the most profound patriotic instinct, to the country, one who during the ragings of the storm of secession and civil war was not in the least unkind or ungenerous to whatever is noble in character and life in that part of the country. And the word was kept, and the life of are what may be called renegade Yankees. The true Yankee, of which Abraham Lincoln was the type, is one of the truest of men. But a renegade, a Yankee who is ashamed of the influences that make him such, and of the essential significance of the word, is among the most contemptible. "Inside" delineates also with remarkable skill the various shades of secession feeling within the "Confederacy." The honest of purpose; the sophistication of prize; the assumption of arrogant ignorance; the dubious fanaticism of superstition; the sincere doubt; the sturdy conviction; the sentimental sensitiveness, every aspect of the feeling is fairly presented. Moreover, the universal and insensible influence of slavery, which inspired the war, is every where evident although nowhere intruded. The novel is wholly American. Its startling reality and power of delineation of the aspect of one part of the country is monstrous a period will give it kind of bias—value entirely unique in our literature. The reader is indeed no man who, however heartily he may have aided the rebellion and honestly thought that Yankees were mere vermin to be exterminated, will not be glad to read this book honestly thank God that whatever the present feeling of sore exasperation may be, the cancerous root of discord between us all has been cut away with the knife.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

July 24:

In the Senate, the Civil Appropriation bill was considered, and an amendment was adopted increasing the salaries of members from $5000 to $7000.—The amendment appropriating $1,000,000 for a bull pavilion for repairing the levees on the Mississippi was adopted.—The bill for the equalization of bounties was debated, but this action was afterward reversed.

In the House, a message was received from the President on the joint resolution admitting Tennessee. He had signed the measure. The resolutions and papers from that State were referred to the Committee on Elections without debate, in a favorable report, and the three members were sworn in.

July 25:

In the Senate, Mr. E. G. Ross was sworn in as Senator from Kansas, vice Lane deceased.—Mr. Joseph S. Fowler, Senator-elect from Tennessee, took his seat.—The bill (No. 4, 1867, had the credentials presented by Mr. Sherman, and took the oath.—The Senate then went to the 4th day of adjournment on Saturday at noon.

In the House, the Senate bill to amend a bill to incorporate the National Farm School for Orphan and Destitute Children of Soldiers and Sailors, and other related objects, which was read a third time and passed.—Mr. Williams, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a bill to restore the possession of lands confiscated by the authority of the United States to their owners. It makes it the duty of the President or commanding officer of the military forces of the United States in the late rebellious States to issue a proclamation of any person dispossessed of property for enforcement in the name of the United States, on the application of the owner. The bill was passed without a division.—A bill was reported and passed, providing that the Secretary of the Interior shall have power to grant writs of Ashera copies in all cases where any person may be deprived of liberty in violation of the Constitution of any treaty or law of the United States. The act is to be in force in the States lately in rebellion, with any military officers, or with having aided or abetted the late rebellion, until the reinstatement of the United States prior to the passage of this act.

July 26:

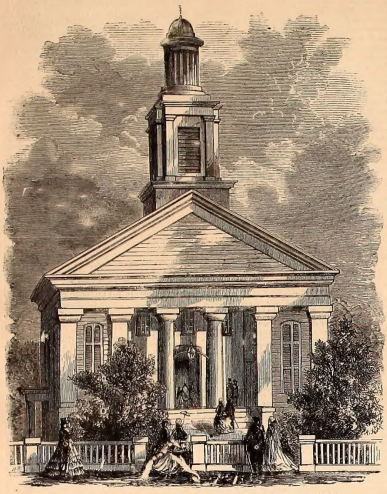
In the Senate, the credentials of Mr. Patterson, Senator-elect from South Carolina, were laid from the table and read. Mr. Sumner moved that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report whether Mr. Patterson can take the oath required by the act of Congress and the test oath.—Mr. Sherman moved that the motion was carried: yeas 30, nays 14.—The House amendments to the resolution for the relief of the suffering territory of the rebellion were concurred in, and the resolution was to be forwarded.

In the House, a bill was passed, directing the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be laid down Minor lines for a rifle-ste mook and statue of the late President Lincoln, and the Adjutant-General to the Railway Company, was passed. Mr. Price stated that as this road would run on the Interior line, it would be necessary to cut down a number of four hundred miles between each of the three lines of communication.—The amendment was lost by a vote not be competing.—The House joint resolution in relation to the appointment of Cadets at West Point, declaring that no such appointment shall hereafter be made without a non-accompanying statement in detail of the services, was set aside in consideration of which the house is a Democrat, was adopted.—The House joint resolution in relation to the release of the Fenian prisoners in Canada,—stated the action which the United States have sent taken,—and gave rise to a debate of much interest. Mr. Banks favoring the resolution, and Mr. Stevens taking the opposite view of a Committee, to whom the subject should be referred, and to report at the next session. The bill was passed by a vote of 120 to 37.—The Senate amendments to the Conference Committee on the Tariff bill was disagreed to.

July 27:

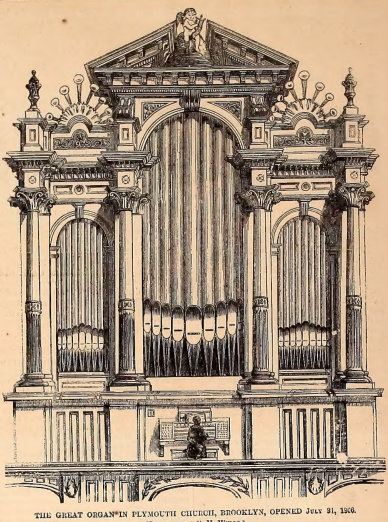
In the Senate, the House bill amending the Neutrality laws was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

—Mr. Patterson, of Tennessee, was admitted to his seat, and took the oath.—The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill (No. 4) to admit Nebraska into the Union, but it was not signed by the President.—Nashville Convention.



—State into the Union.

In the House, Mr. Bestwell, of the Judiciary Committee, made a report on the alleged complicity of Jefferson Davis in the assassination of President Lincoln.—Mr. Stevens reported back the Senate's amendments to the bill providing for the payment of Pennsylvania claims, $50,000 for repairing and building levees on the Mississippi River were passed.—The Senate bill was passed to increase the salaries of members of Congress to $5000 per annum, and the Senate's bill was passed.



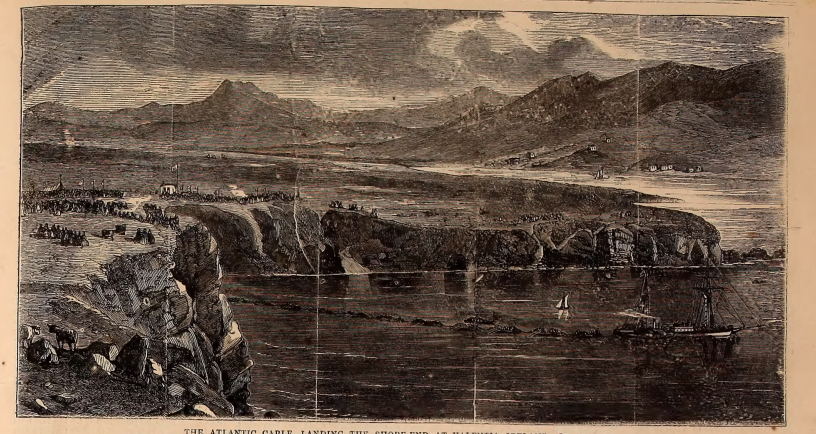
July 28:

The Senate, after agreeing to the report of the Conference Committee, increasing the pay of members of Congress, and providing that the increase shall not apply, agreed to the report of another Committee, and granted the boundary line between Nebraska and Dakota that they were entitled to their pay for the three years, and either served the whole term or were discharged by the President previous thereto, $100, those for less than three years, $50.—After the passage of a resolution declaring the 28th inst. to be a legal holiday, and appointing officer, the Senate adjourned.

In the House, a question of privilege of interest during this last day of the session was the question of the bounty to soldiers. The Senate had passed a bill to amend and extend the bill increasing the salaries of members of Congress from $5000 to $7000, and the House bill, which was the House bill, but modifying the existing pay for mileage of members. The House had refused to concur in the Senate's bill, but modifying the existing pay for mileage of members. The House had refused to concur in the Senate's bill, but modifying the existing pay for mileage of members. The House had refused this. A Committee of Conference was appointed, which recommended that the House recede from its disagreement to

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S CHURCH AT INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA, 1848-9.
[SKETCHED BY EDWIN DEARIN.]

THE GREAT ORGAN IN PLYMOUTH CHURCH, BROOKLYN, OPENED JULY 31, 1866.
[SKETCHED BY C. H. WELLS.]



BEECHER'S CHURCHES.

As an interesting contrast we print, this week, a picture of the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER'S meeting-house at Indianapolis, Indiana, where he passed the greater part of his ministry at the West; and a picture of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, where he has drawn crowds of listeners for now nearly twenty years. The Indianapolis church was Presbyterian; the Brooklyn is Congregational. Mr. BEECHER'S settlement at Indianapolis lasted from 1839 to 1847. He then left a pulpit which he had made famous throughout the West, to occupy another which he was to make famous throughout the world.

HENRY WARD BEECHER and his sister, Mrs. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, are the most gifted and distinguished of thirteen children of Dr. LYMAN BEECHER. The mother of both was Dr. BEECHER'S first wife, ROXANA FOOTE, a woman of extraordinary intellectual ability, and equally extraordinary strength of personal character. Dying in HENRY'S childhood, his impressions of her are derived through his imagination rather than through his memory. To this day he bears her in his thought as his chief ideal of womanhood, and as the chief guardian genius of his life: nor, in his sermons, does he ever pour forth a nobler eloquence than when, in some rapt and fervid moment, he rejoices, like Cowper, "his mother's picture."

PLYMOUTH CHURCH (HENRY WARD BEECHER'S), BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.—[SKETCHED BY C. H. WELLS.]

THE ATLANTIC CABLE—LANDING THE SHORE-END AT VALENTIA, IRELAND.—[See Page 502.]

Mr. Beecher is now fifty-three years of age—almost entitled to rank as one of the venerable celebrities of old Litchfield, that famous birth-place of successful men. But probably no man ever crossed the half-century boundary of his mortal life more thoroughly a boy than Henry Ward Beecher.

The date of Mr. Beecher's settlement in Brooklyn was October, 1847. In the summer of the next year his church was burned. Like generals whose horses are shot under them, both he and his father had their pulpits consumed from under their feet. While the present Plymouth Church was building the congregation worshiped in a large one-story tabernacle in Pierpont Street. If the present edifice should follow the fate of its predecessor, perhaps out of its ashes would arise that once projected but now abandoned new structure which was to hold six thousand persons, and overlook Brooklyn Heights as a monument. Mr. Beecher's congregation is always too large for the building. The 900 pews, together with the aisle and wall seats, give sittings for about 2700 people. After cramming the doorways and stairs the total audience numbers about 3000. The sum-total of new-cents for the current year is the rather as smiling figure of $42,000. In 1862 the Sunday School-room was rebuilt and enlarged at a cost of $14,000. The school now numbers 1100 scholars and teachers. The church has about 1700 communicants.

In 1863 Mr. Beecher made a trip to Europe between the months of May and November, and performed in England a service to the United States which can never be forgotten by his grateful and admiring countrymen.

From the beginning of Mr. Beecher's residence in Brooklyn he has been an incessant public speaker in all the New England lyceums, and has frequently made short and quick journeys into the Western States to speak on the great public questions of the day. He has probably given more public lectures than any other man in America.

On the establishment of The Independent in 1848, Mr. Beecher became its familiar weekly "Star Contributor"—so called on account of the (*) appended to his articles. During the years 1862 and 1863 he was the Editor-in-Chief of that journal. He now contributes to it every week a sermon. These sermons are taken down by a short-hand reporter, and are sometimes revised by the author, and sometimes not. Mr. Beecher is great in many and various respects, but is nowhere so great as in the pulpit. He is undoubtedly the most brilliant preacher who has ever appeared in this country. As a man of genius, as a Christian minister, as a practical worker among men, as the most delightful of companions, in short, as just Henry Ward Beecher he is one of the rarest of the rare men of our time.

Just at present, however, the chief lion of Plymouth church is not its minister but its organ—a sketch of which we herewith append:

In January, 1865, Plymouth Church Society, of Brooklyn, made a contract with a Boston firm for an organ, which was to be the second largest in America, and to be finished in January, 1866. The original sum voted by the Society was ten thousand dollars, but since it has been increased to about twenty-five thousand dollars. The organ is now completed, and was opened July 31. This instrument, constructed by E. and G. G. Hook of Boston, measures from the basement to its highest point forty-eight feet four inches; its depth is twenty-three feet, and the width from side to side twenty-nine feet. The organ has four manuals, in each of which are fifty-eight keys. The compass is from C to A; in the pedal there are thirty keys, from C to F. This embraces the entire range of the musical scale—ten octaves—which is as great a difference in sound as the human ear can easily appreciate. The tone of the lower notes, which are very often so muffled as to give but little variety, are expected to be very clear and distinct.

The wind is supplied by four bellows and two reservoirs putting in motion a pneumatic lever, which is applied to the organ. The couples throughout are attached to it, so that all four manuals can be played at once almost as easily as the key-board of a grand piano. Every register in the organ is operated by the pneumatic power, and secures a uniform and very easy motion in all weathers. The cost of this arrangement has been great, as it involved the making of a large number of small bellows placed in different parts of the organ. Its advantage is obvious, and is an improvement on the many organs in which is required a weight of some five or six pounds to bring down a key. Four engines, with upright cylinders six inches in diameter, with a 12-inch stroke, move levers attached to the four bellows. The engines are perfectly automatic in their motion, the water being supplied from the main pipe of the Ridgewood aqueduct.

One feature in this organ, which belongs to it alone of all the organs in this country, is a stop called the Tuba Mirabilis. All the pipes of this stop are made of pure tin; the bass pipes, which are shaped as trumpets, project over the top of the organ horizontally, and form a pleasing effect by the peculiarity of their position, and by the fine contrast with the black walnut. They are reed stops of eight feet and four feet pitch, of enormous power, at the same time recommended as smooth and musical in their quality. They have somewhat of the effect of a trumpet in their tone, but are of greater power. Some idea may be formed of these two registers by the fact that the two combined are almost equal to the strength of the remainder of the organ.

The organ, as it now stands, is the largest ever

THE ATLANTIC CABLE—VIEW OF HEART'S CONTENT, NEWFOUNDLAND.—Sketched by Theodore R. Davis.—[See Page 502.]

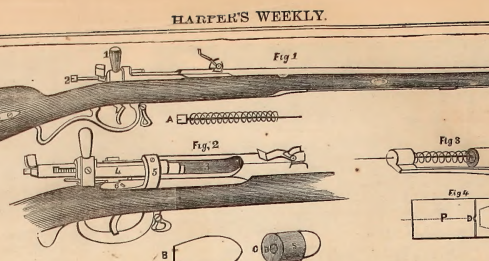

Fig. 1.—A, Lever that locks cylinder; 2, Needle drawn back ready for projecting into cartridge.—Fig. 2.—3, Chamber for cartridge; 4, Cylinder holding needle-case; 5, Cylinder that passes under bend; 6, Trigger that pushes on spring F in Fig. 3.—Fig. 3.—Case containing needle; F, Spring lifted by trigger 6 in Fig. 2.—Fig. 4.—Section of cartridge; P, Powder; D, Detonating powder; S, Hole of subst; S, Subst holding the ball: Dotted line shows the passage of needle on to detonating powder at D, through the gunpowder, marked P.

THE PRUSSIAN NEEDLE-GUN.—[See First Page.]

built in America. The Boston Music Hall organ is the largest on the continent, but was built in Germany. The cost of the instrument is about twenty-five thousand dollars—a very low figure considering the immense labor expended on its construction.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE LAID!

We think we may now assume that this great international enterprise is at length successfully accomplished. On pages 501, 504, and 509 we give several illustrations of this work, which need no explain'thensheets. From the London Daily News we abridge the following description of the landing, July 6, of the shore-end of the cable at Valentia, the European terminus of the line:

"At 1 P.M. the line of boats was perfect, and before 3 the cable was successfully landed, and to the breach up into the white hut. Signals were interchanged between the ship and shore immediately. Mr. Willoughby Smith and Mr. Collett, accompanied by Mr. Curtis Field, who, with characteristic energy, had seen Glengariff, hurried through a two days' land journey in ten hours, went into the receiving room and in a few minutes, working beautifully, all well," was announced as the message from the ship. The Grey Dam stood out to sea, and proceeded to lay the rest of the shore-end, consisting of some 20 miles of thick and heavy cable. At 3 this morning she telegraphed that her work was done, and after buoying the spot intended to be her lifeless return, steamed for the Great Eastern at Berehaven. The whole affair was accomplished before those on board the Great Eastern or those who were journeying thither by way of Glengariff, knew it had been commenced, and in its beginning and end presented a striking difference to the ceremony of last year. Earnest gravity and a deep-seated determination to repress all show of the enthusiasm of which every body was full were very manifest. The excitement was there, but instead of above the surface. Speech-making, hurrahing, public congratulations, and vaunts of confidence were, as it seemed, avoided of a set purpose.

"The 40 knots, each a boat's length apart, were first steadied by a guide-rope from the ship, which kept them in position. Mr. Temple, Jun., superintended the arrangements of them, and made constant flag signals to the ship and to those in charge of the boat next to it. Before commencing operations the local boatmen were extensively exhorted not to regard their error of last year, when they delayed matters at a critical time for nearly two hours, by dragging the cable into the sea that they might show their own success at having so nearly landed it. The faithful promise they made were duly kept, and with the exception of an unimportant misapprehension of a signal, which meant nearly delayed the paying out, the cable was laid with the single hitch. Strong and heavy as was the shore-end of 1865, that brought from the William Corry yesterday was more gigantic and ponderous still. The few boatmen who remained from last year nearly made it stiff by their electrical rosin were, it is true, dwarfed by their size to the same trench. The cable, though similarly strong, are comparatively slender, having been made with more care as the cable designed to remain for all time, and for a double reason. First, as they are to lie buried in the earth, unsubmerged by tides or weather, it would have been a useless waste of money and material to manufacture them of the same enormous weight as those intended to brave the fury of Atlantic waves breaking upon their coast. Secondly, more weight would have required to carry it up the cliff. It is the strongest made it difficult to carry it up the cliff. It is the strongest wire cable ever made, and, in short, long, is as little flexible as cable and rope can be. Thanks to its enormous weight, it was payed out almost straight from the ship, and for the first very few yards, from the line choked out for it. There was something far more touching in the quiet and reverent solemnity of the proceedings yesterday than in the slightly boisterous joviality of the passatory last year."

We may heard that on Friday, the 13th of July, the deep-sea line had been spliced to the shore-end, and that the telegraphic fleet, consisting of the Great Eastern, with the cable on board, accompanied by three other vessels, had set out upon its voyage. On Sunday morning, July 29, brief dispatches reached New York from Valentia. The Times, announcing that the Great Eastern and her consorts had reached Heart's Content—now well named—on the morning of the 28th, and that the cable had been laid, was in perfect working order, and that they were then in telegraphic communication with Ireland. It seems that the operation this time was a perfect success, not having been marred by a single important misadventure. The whole distance sailed by the fleet was 1864 nautical miles; the whole length of cable payed out was 1866 miles, showing a "slack" of only 32 per cent. The rate of sailing was very uniform, the least distance run in a single day having been 105 miles, the greatest 138 miles, the average rate being a little less than five miles an hour. During the fourteen days constant communication had been kept up between the Great Eastern and the station at Valentia Bay.

The first message sent over the cable after being laid was this: "A treaty of peace has been signed between Austria and Prussia." This message ran had Heart's Content on the 29th, having been sent from Valentia, we suppose, only a few minutes before. It is of intelligence eleven days later than had been received by steamers. The telegraphic line to connect Heart's Content with St. John's, and thence with the United States, has to be completed. Until this is done dispatches must still be sent by vessels between these two points; so that as we write (July 30) New York is still distant a full day from Europe. The missing telegraphic link will be soon supplied; when this is done, if the lines work as is anticipated, there will be almost instantaneous communication; indeed, taking into account the difference of time between the two places, we may receive dispatches from Europe a little earlier than are received by the use of chronometer—they were sent.

It is also announced that the Great Eastern will immediately be sent to endeavor to recover the cable lost last year, and to relay it. If this succeeds there will soon be a double line across the Atlantic.

The first attempt to stretch a telegraphic wire across the bed of the Atlantic was made in the summer of 1857. The cable was coiled half on board by the United States steamship Niagara, and half on the British steamer Agamemnon. They began to lay it in mid-ocean on the 26th of June, the Niagara proceeding toward the American coast, the Agamemnon toward Ireland. After 146 miles had been laid the cable broken the attempt was given up. The following August it was renewed on a different plan. The shore-end was laid from Valentia Bay, and the Niagara began paying out on the 7th, the purpose being that the Agamemnon should begin operations when the Niagara had exhausted her half of the cable. On the 11th, after 335 miles had been laid, the wire broke again. The third attempt was made with the same result in 1858. The end of the cable were joined in mid-ocean on the 29th of July, and on the 6th of August the two ships arrived simultaneously at their respective destinations. This cable worked for a time, but the electric current grew weak and finally failed altogether.

The cable, in 1858, had a breaking strain of a little over three tons, or was capable of bearing five miles of its own length in water. The present one will bear a strain of eight tons, or twelve miles of its own length in water.

JEAN RATHBURNE'S LIFE.

A spring long and cold, a short and fervid summer, an autumn bearing scant fruit—that was Jean Rathburne's life. And one shade of the dead, and the long, wild grasses are tangled above her grave by vagrant winds which wanton through them.

It was the will she left behind her that was the key-note to her life, and made it significant—a strange will, yet perfectly legal, and proved in court like the rest of them. She bequeathed, after a few trifling legacies, all her fortune—some three hundred thousand dollars—under the supervision of competent trustees, to further the happiness of seven young orphan girls. It was, of course, the income which was to be used thus, the money itself was to be a permanent fund, and those whom it enriched, when they married or otherwise ceased to need its aid, were to have their places filled by the trustees. She chose the seven girls herself, and made provisions, when any of the number should die, for the election of others in their stead.

So much for the bequest, briefly. It was not to make the girls good merely, or respectable merely, or well-clothed and well-fed merely; but, if possible, to make them happy, to indulge their whims, and give their individualities a chance. For she said, and this voice from her very grave was the only expression of affection she ever knows to utter:

"One woman, who has found life very sad, would like to make it brighter for some of those who will live after her."

That was all, a quiet, calm statement of facts—she had found life very sad—but did any wail ever come out of bitterer depths?

Her parents had died before she could remember them, and left her a fortune and a guardian; left her, too, with a nature at once shy and sensitive, with a tendency to moodiness and hypochondria, which needed, sorely, the influence of a warm, loving, cheerful home.

Instead of that Sampson Dreddils and his wife starved her and froze her. I do not mean literally; there was fire and food enough in their great, comfortable house, and Miss Rathburne, as an heiress should, was served with the best.

But she was always Miss Rathburne—never Jeanie, or darling, or mother's blessing, or heart's delight, or any of those fond, foolish names familiar to the lips of happy mothers. She knew well enough that no one loved her, and that strengthened her shyness, and deepened her despondency.

So she grew up to twenty-one—a long, cold, cold spring, as I said. Then her fortune came into her own hands, and with a certain Widow Dreddils, a sister-in-law of Sampson?to matriculate the establishment, she went into a house of her own. The widow carried with her the old Dreddils influence, and the new home was at first scarcely other than a repetition of the old. Except that now Miss Rathburne began to go into society, and was enough of an heiress to be received there with favor.

She was not pretty, yet her figure was lithe and slender, her complexion was clear, and if she had ever been animated might have been bright. Her eyes were large and dark, but the fire in them smouldered rather than sparkled. If she had had a little self-esteem, if some one had told her now and then that she was handsome, she might have been so; for many a woman sets up for a beauty on far less capital. But compliments never flowered for the Dreddils soil, and Jean had grown up feeling herself hopelessly plain, till the feeling had affected the very line and lineaments of her countenance.

She had no taste in dress either—women seldom have who do not see any charm in their own faces. She wore colors which neither her skin nor her hair nearly always, and her gowns detracted from the grace of her figure instead of being skillfully chosen to enhance it.

According to some creeds all this should have made her good by making her humble, but it had not. She grew morbid. It nourished secretly a bitter, cynical pride, a grudging sense of injustice, a hard self-contempt—noxious weeds which do not flourish in healthy natures. The poison of Jean Rathburne's pilgrims walked, and "the herb called heartease flourished."

This was just the state—sick of herself, at odds with the world, yet desperately bent on wringing happiness out of something—in which Jack Brevoort found her.

He did not love Jean Rathburne—you are not to suppose that for a moment. At her brightest and best she would never have been his style; besides, a little blue-eyed girl, at home in his mother's nursery, a poor cousin, held so much heart as he had, and was more to him than any one else ever would be. But she lacked money just as entirely as he did, and it is not in such cases that two impecunious make an affirmative. Of course, he could be much more dangerous to Miss Rathburne's peace than if he had really loved her, for his coolness would enable him to take advantage of all openings. He sorely needed money, and he had settled it with himself that he must marry it. He thought for it, which should, of course, have a special kindness for the old Brevoort blood, had placed her in his way on purpose.

He meant to make her in love with him; so he commenced, like a skillful tactician, by trying to make her in love with herself. For the first time in her life herself studied with unmistakable interest. He noticed her tastes, and showed quietly his appreciation of them. He gave her hints about dress, and she grew handsome rapidly—much to his satisfaction; for, though he would have been ready to marry her in any case, it would be much more agreeable to have a wife who furnished to spectators an excuse for one's choice in something besides dollars and cents.

It was not altogether the new colors that she wore which improved her. A subtle flame ran through her veins which kindled the smouldering fires in her eyes. Her cheeks were pale no longer, or her face spiritless. When she looked in his direction it seemed to her, in contrast with her old self, a radiant vision. And when with this new Jean Rathburne Jack Brevoort began to fall in love he did not dream of the startle her.

This was the summer of her life—fervid as short; it lasted three months. This time only, to her sad, careless existence knew happiness!

Brevoort was an ardent lover. He was gifted in the art of seeming to a degree amounting to positive genius. Then Jean was too wordily honest herself to doubt the honesty of others, and too delicately generous ever to remember that she was rich and he was poor. So her summer was warm and bright, and all her roses bloomed!

It was something to see her in these days—her old, dead-and-alive self no longer; in its stead a sparkling creature, melting into the unspeakable glory of a mutual understanding. How a man who truly loved her would have delighted in what Jack Brevoort watched with the cynical coolness of Mephistopheles!

He hurried on the preparations for their marriage when once she had accepted him. He could not do without her, he said, longer than till fall. It was the truest word he had uttered since he began his courtship; but the need he had of her was of a nature he would not have found it pleasant to communicate. She thought it was the eagerness of love.

It was to make some of the arrangements which his approaching marriage rendered necessary that Brevoort went out of town for a couple of days; and of course, in his character of impatient lover, he must write day by day to his betrothed. The first letter—Jean Rathburne's first love-letter—was full of subtly sweet words, tender phrases, allusions which made her pulses beat fast. She read it till she knew it by heart, and then kept reading it over to see if she had forgotten any thing.

The second she opened with fingers trembling with expectation. It commenced with "Dear Hal!" Her delicate sense of honor made her fold it up again, for she understood at once that it had been sent to her by mistake. But as she doubled it over she caught her own name. She would have been more than woman if she had not read it then.

It was simply the letter of one fast young man to another, about betting and debts and losses. It was not her taste; but she loved him enough to have excused it but for this passage:

"George can not say that I am not making effort enough to pay him. I am to marry Miss Rathburne in October splendid woman as she is, she is not my style. I would have been, I verily believe, if she had been a little finer. However, a man who owes forty thousand dollars, and has some eighteen months left short pay, can't afford to indulge in the luxury of a heart. I believe I got rid of that superfluity some time ago."

Those were words which no sophistry could ever beguile her into forgiving. Her summer was over. The untimely black frost had come.

Who "Nell" was she did not care, or "George," or "Hal." She had no curiosity at all. Enough for her that love had fallen here.

She looked in the glass with cool, clear, sad eyes, and lost forever all the fond self-complacence of recent days. There was nothing about her to love, after all. She had been deceiving herself yet more utterly than she had been deceived. The very depth of her self-abasement made her patient.

It was morning when the letter came, and at night Brevoort was to return. So she sat all day and waited, without knowing how long the hours were, or feeling once the weariness of delay. She felt as if her heart and her pulses were standing still, waiting also. She was too much benumbed to care for any thing. Through the weary day the only thing like occupation which she attempted, was to draw one check for fifty thousand dollars in favor of Jack Brevoort, and sign it.

At last he came. She heard the well-known ring, the firm, quick step in the hall—how she had loved to note and remember every one of his peculiarities! Then he opened the door, and came up to her as usual.

She made a slight gesture of warning, and that, or something in her face, repressed the enthusiasm which would otherwise have expressed itself in caresses.

"I believe forty thousand dollars is the amount of your debts?" she asked, in a clear, metallic tone.

For once his self-possession failed him. His knees shook under him, and he sat down.

"Who told you?" he gasped.

"Yourself."

She took out the letter, and laid it in his hands. He looked at it, and knew Jean Rathburne well enough to give up his game.

"I am sorry you found it this way, though I'm not quite so heartless, perhaps, as that letter makes me seem. I should have been kind to you. But you may as well despise me through and through."

"Just as well," she answered, dryly. "Of course I withdraw from my promise to marry you; but your gentlemanly debts must be paid. I never debts must not be frustrated by my troth-breaking. Here is a check for fifty thousand dollars. Make your terms of time, but don't ever overestimate of your liabilities will cover any little items you may chance to have forgotten, and make you a free man again. You can afford to have a heart."

"Do you think me mean enough to take it?"

"I think you will take it. There is a kind of justice in it too. I would have given you several times as much, freely, if you had loved me as I loved you. You deserve something for the sweetness I must have seem to you to act a part so long."

Her voice softened while she spoke to a tender, womanly pathos. He looked at her, with her sad, downcast eyes, her heavily-falling hair, her pale face.

in its very wee wee sweet, and he came nearer to loving her than he had ever cared before.

"You can't forgive me," he said, "and I won't ask you."

Then he took his hat and went away, leaving the check lying on the table.

She sent it to him next day in an envelope, without an additional word. Pride bade him return it; but his generosity constrained him. Jean Ralli burns smiled grimly when the check came back to her from the bank, punctured, like a railroad ticket, with little round holes.

Pride would have kept some women, in her place, in the midst of the world. She was prouder still, and disregarded the world altogether. She never was seen any more in society. She had had her day—her summer was gone, with its roses. She chose to pass the autumn alone. She purchased off the widow Dreidle, and sent her away. She did not feel young or volatile enough to need a nursemaid any more.

If she suffered, no one knew it. As I said, the only complaint she was ever known to utter was that sentence in her strange will.

She died young. Natures like hers wear out fast, when no spring of hope sustains them. Without doubt she was thankful when "the life that had been so sad" was over. She did not know, there under the linden, that the first tears Jack Brycott had wept in years were shed above her grave.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the Southern District of New York.)

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XII.

Now, little readers, before we go any further in this pleasant yard in work; I must tell you one thing—you will find two sorts of hard words in my chapters. One sort I put in myself. Not very often, but just now and then one, which perhaps gives my purpose better than a short word, and likewise gives little readers something to do. I like to send them to the dictionary once in a while—it is a good habit. But there is another sort of hard words that creep in—very hard words; for they are not to be found in any dictionary at all, nor even in any other books, nor learned once. So what are little readers to do then?—why just ask the printer! Perhaps he knows the meaning of "-sulimmary," which I put in one of my last chapters, but I confess I don't —so you must just ask him.

It was not the fashion in Mr. May's house for the children to take the lead in conversation. A strange, old-time notion prevailed there, that those who had lived longest in the world knew best how to talk about; or at least "had the right of way," as they say on the railroads. So, though the children were always allowed to express their opinions, and make known their wishes in proper time and place, it was well understood that mere opinions nor wishes were of importance enough to take position in the front rank of affairs, but must wait, slowly folded and held in, until their turn came. And thus it fell out to-day that dinner was over and the dessert set on, and even that nearly finished, before a word could be said about Lily and her strange appearance. Mr. and Mrs. May were discussing some matter of which the young ones understood not a word, but to which Sam gave his undivided attention; and the children were obliged to keep pretty quiet, and to speak softly—when they spoke at all—to each other. Jack, indeed, contrived to say a good deal without speaking a word—knitting his eyebrows, and rolling up his eyes, and making all sorts of inconceivable signs of wonder and admiration; which Lily could not help seeing, do what she would. Little Primrose whispered,

"Oh, Lily! did you really get it done?" and Lily deigned no reply whatever either to words or looks, but went on eating her dinner as fast as she could; so that Clover, really anxious to know the history of such a strange-looking face and neck, yet ventured to ask no questions, but just showed her sympathy by helping Lily to every thing she wanted, and that Clover herself could reach.

At length Mr. May, having finished both his discussion and his apple, found leisure to notice the children, and very soon saw the contrast between the delicately-clean hands of Clover and the dirty, imperfectly-scrubbed ones of Lily. Mr. May was very particular about hands.

"Had you no soap and water in your room, Lily?" he asked.

"Yes, papa—but—I couldn't get it off!" Lily stammered out with much difficulty.

"It's these diggings, papa," explained Jack.

"Oh! But I thought they were to have gloves?" said Mr. May, looking across the table at his wife.

"And they have," she said, with a smile.

"I could gloves they must be," said Mr. May, in an ironical tone. "And the sun-bonnet also, extremely valuable."

"Papa, I didn't wear them," said Lily, in whose eyes the drops were gathering fast.

"I inferred as much."

"It was the first time, you know, papa," pleaded Clover, her own eyes growing very misty. "And Lily was so eager—and I think she forgot all about it till she was quite down there."

"No," said Lily, resolutely, "no, papa; I only forgot for a minute—just till I was three steps down the hill. And then I was in a hurry, and I wouldn't go back."

"No excuse at all is the best one that ever was made," said Mr. May, his good-humored smile coming back on his instant. "The whole truth always. But believe me, my dear, hurry is a bad digger and planter and every thing else; let rose help you about that. And be content to have tiger-lilies in your garden; don't transform yourself into one."

"Papa, I don't feel cross," said Lily, understanding the "tiger" in a very literal way. "At least I didn't till Jack made faces at me."

"No, no," said Mr. May, laughing; "that is not what I meant. A tiger-lily, my dear, is a fiery red flower, with black spots. Come away, Jack, and let your sister alone. I have an errand for you."

Poor Lily! such a picture of herself was too much; and her father's amused tone gave it full effect, and was even worse than Jack's laugh. She controlled herself just for one minute, until they were both out of the room, but the next found her on her knees, sobbing out her grief in Mrs. May's lap.

"I hate digging!" she burst forth, "and the spade, and the garden, and every thing else! And I don't care who has it all, for I don't want it."

"Oh, Lily!" exclaimed little Primrose. "Not your beautiful garden?"

"No!"

"But where will you put your seeds?" said Primrose, while Clover stood silent and sad.

"In the fire!"

"Poor Lily!" said Mrs. May, gently stroking the head that moved restlessly in her lap; "she is tired and troubled, Prim—don't talk to her just now. When one is troubled, you know, nothing seems pleasant."

Lily burst into a gentler fit of tears at that, relieving her head with a hand and muttering it with kisses; and Clover drew Primrose softly away to the other side of the room. Sam was standing by the mantelpiece, but he did not speak a word; and the silence was first broken by Lily herself.

"Mamma, I didn't speak truth—I don't hate my garden—I don't hate it! I—I don't! And I tried so hard, and I was so disappointed!" and the hot tears dropped down again very fast.

"Yes, I know all about that," said her mother, soothingly; "I watched you all the time, Lily, from my window."

"Oh, mamma, why didn't you call me?" said Lily.

"I thought you were learning so much that I would not interfere."

"Mamma, are you laughing at me?" said Lily, raising her head.

"Indeed not, my child."

"But I think you were mistaken, mamma; I don't think I learned any thing," said Lily, sighing. "I dug it carefully—and so little!"

"Who thought she could dig her garden without help and without teaching?" said Mrs. May.

"Mamma, is that what you mean? Yes, I did learn that," said Lily.

"And you learned the value of a spade like my grandmother's needle," said her mother, smiling.

"Ah, mamma! how well you know me," said Lily. "You thought that was coming."

"Yes, I thought. And you have learned, too, that the way to enjoy one's garden is not to stay in it the whole morning."

"Yes, indeed," said Lily, laying her face wearily on her mother's knee. "I'm as tired as I can be."

A little lesson on self-control, a little lesson on patient perseverance, a little lesson on self-control, said Mrs. May. "That is the morning's work, Lily."

"Yes, mamma. And a great big lesson on obedience; for if I had worn my sun-bonnet and gloves papa would have called me a tiger-lily."

"Mamma," said Sam, "if lessons are over, may we have a little play? I have a new game in my pocket."

"Play away," said his mother, "if you will only let me look on."

"A new game!" cried Lily, forgetting all her sorrows in a moment.

"Yes. Come, Clover, come, Prim;" and Sam drew up a chair to his mother's side, and the children clustered round him. Sam put on a face of grave importance, and took out of his pocket a rather large package, carefully done up and tied.

"Now," he said, "before we begin our game I must distribute the contents of my package." And carefully opening one end Sam took out a very small paper bag with something printed on the outside.

"Convolvulus minor—mixed," said Sam, reading off. "Who is the happy owner of this?"

"Oh, it's our seeds! our seeds!" cried Lily, while little Primrose clapped her hands and said, "Oh, mamma!" and Clover's face fairly all over with pleasure. "Sam, you're the very best fellow that ever was! That's mine, Sam—give it to me, please!"

Sam laughed, and tossed the little packet into her lap; and Lily looked at it, and read the name with a joy that fairly sparkled in her eyes.

"Convolvulus minor," she repeated. "Yes, you dear little beauty, you belong to me. What comes next, Sam?"

"Oh!" cried Primrose, with a long-drawn breath of intense gratification, "that's mine!" And no packet of gold dust could have been so received and handled and smiled over.

"Hyacinth bean," read out Sam, turning with bright eyes to the now quite oldest little sister, standing so quiet at his side, but with every finger trembling with eagerness. And how they closed upon the little packet! and felt of the bean through the paper, and knew they had never handled such riches before!

Then followed "Zinnias," again for Clover, and "Asters" for Lily, and "Sweet Peas" for Prim; and then one and another, through the whole fracas of labor-dirt and sun-burn, which made bear was full of happiness as it well could hold.

"Mamma," said Primrose, "they feel so different! Some are hard and sick all out, and some don't feel as if there was any thing at all inside. Do you think they can be empty, mamma?"

"Listen," said Mrs. May, shaking one of the "empty" papers at Prim's ear.

"Oh, I hear them! It's not empty! The seeds go rattle, rattle!" cried Prim. "And look, mamma, when I hold it up to the light, so, I can see such little, little seeds inside! Are they not?"

"Such pretty papers!" said Lily, admiringly; "white ground and pink names. But how can some of these seeds grow? They look just like dust. Mamma, what makes seeds so different?"

"What makes plants so different? At the command of the Lord 'the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind.'"

"How wonderful it is!" said Clover, using her favorite phrase. "But I wish I understood how such little dust-seeds can grow to make plants."

"That will be good work for a rainy day," said Sam. "To-day we must put some of these in the earth, so that they may grow."

"Mamma, will all the little seeds make little plants, and all the big seeds big plants?" said Primrose.

"I will see. If I were you," said her mother, "I would write down a description of each kind of seed, and then of the sort of sprout or leaf that each sends up first, and then of the full-sized plant."

"Oh, that will be perfectly delightful!" said Clover. "I like to write about things. Mamma, what a useful person you are to Lily!"

"Ay, and to do," said Sam, wrapping his arms, child-fashion, round her neck. "But now, children, I would have room for a while by myself, and then we'll go out to the work-shop and sow seeds."

BABY CASTLE.

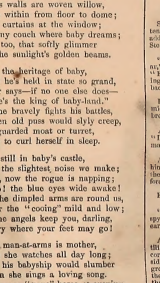
BABY owns a tiny castle
On the carpet plains of home,
And its walls are woven willow,
Fine within from floor to dome;
Snowy curtains at the window;
Downy couch where baby dreams;
Lucca, too, that softly glimmer
In the sunlight's golden beams.

That's the heritage of baby,
And he's held in state so grand,
Mother says—if no one else does—
"He's the king of baby-land."
Here he bravely fights his battles,
When old puss would slyly creep,
Over guarded meat or tarret,
Just to curl herself in sleep.

All is still in baby's castle,
Not the slightest noise we make;
Surely, now the rogue is napping;
Peep! the blue eyes wide awake!
See! the dimpled arms are round us,
Hear the "cooing" mild and low;
May the angels keep you, darling,
Every where your feet may go!

Baby's man-at-arms is mother,
And she wears his dainty long;
When his babyship would slumber
Then she sings a loving song.
Soon comes "papa" home at evening,
Storms the castle all so gay,
Makes a prisoner of baby,
Bears him joyfully away!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.



HOW was Jonah punished?—Whaled.

They are fond of titles in the East. Among the other high-sounding titles, the King of Ava has that of "Lord of Seventy-four Umbrellas." This looks as though he had prepared for a long reign!

COUNTER-ATTRACTION.—A pretty saleswoman.

A gentleman, residing near Boston, drew the attention of the town-crier to a dough in the road as a nuisance, but no notice was taken of it.

One day at dinner, for his amusement, that two councilmen had walked into it by accident, and were meandering about in the ruins, when he addressed them thus: "Gentlemen of the town council of Boston, I have often appealed to your honorable body against the nuisance, but I never had any attention paid to my petition. I now come forth to express my delight to see you at last moving in the matter."

The mayor of a country town was questioning the boys at the ragged-school, and he asked them what were the pomps and vanities of this wicked world. He asked them one by one, but they could not tell him. At last a little boy near the bottom said, "I know, Sir. The mayor and corporation going to church, Sir."

A Chinese widow fancying the soul of her deceased husband, and being asked the cause of so singular a mode of showing her grief, answered that in lopping the head made her promise not to marry again while the mortar of the tomb remained damp, and as it dried she slowly drove on harm in aiding the operation.

A QUEER PARCEL.—The following somewhat remarkable advertisement appeared in the columns of a recent number of a newspaper: "Lost, by a poor lad that up in brown paper with a white string, a German flute in an oversack, and several other articles of wearing apparel."

A SOVEREIGN REMEDY FOR THE SCOURGE OF CATTLE.—A pound.

THE WOODMAN'S REPLY.

No mamma this 'ere tree
Can't be no longer spared;
It ain't no odds to me
If Mister Brown has squared;
But Muster Brown sez, "Green,
You chop that there tree down."
And when he say he means
Sure-ly, do Muster Brown.

I don't possess the 'tel
To bargify with you!
A lady born and bred
Is safe to speak what's true.
But put a value I
A job from Mr. B.,
And little 'tis I makes
Out of the likes of Ba.

Your heart-strings, and all that,
Round this 'ere tree you may clasp—
To contrastize you flat
Would not be quite the thing!
But if you talk of shade,
There's other boughs than these,
And other folks have played,
Mayhap, round other trees.

It's werry good to feel
A fair lady's arms around
Yer stains of oak or deal,
And old straw hats therefore—
To keep, if you've a mind,
The flithy thief makes you weep;
I've got no fault to find,
If they're your own to keep.

But this 'ere old axe-stick,
As you don't want cut down,
Becuse me, mum, you see,
Belongs to Muster Brown.
To him you should apply,
Though 'tain't no use, I think;
And if you love, you do,
Should like your health to drink.

SOLUTION OF HAUNTED HOUSES.—A haunted house is a testament of any number of ordinary stories, to which is added an extra-ordinary one, in the form of a Ghost Story.

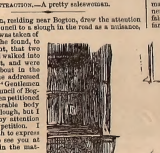
"Johnny, my dear, run to the store and get some sugar," said a mother to her precocious son of eleven years. "Excuse me, ma; I am somewhat hollowed this morning. Either bring me a cold bun to bring, piper of tobacco along."

It was a starving corset maker who then rented his miserable complaint: "Shame that I should be without bread—I that have stayed the stomachs of thousands."

A young poet out West, in describing Heaven, says, "It is a world of light, flooded with girls." Where's the man that won't repent now?

A shiny doctor of divinity, whose physician had ordered him for a time on a purely vegetable diet, declared on the ground that "he should not be able to say grace before meat."

FACES IN THE FIRE.—Hob-Goblins.



"A stethoscope," says a young medical student, "is a spy-glass for looking into people's chests with your own ears."

A Tennessean, in London, being asked about the fertility of the soil of his State, declared that they "raised corn enough there to make whiskey for all the world, besides what is wanted for bread; and that the pumpkins grew so large it was customary to split a full-sized one in the middle and scoop out either half for a flat-boat, while the little ones made admirable canoes."

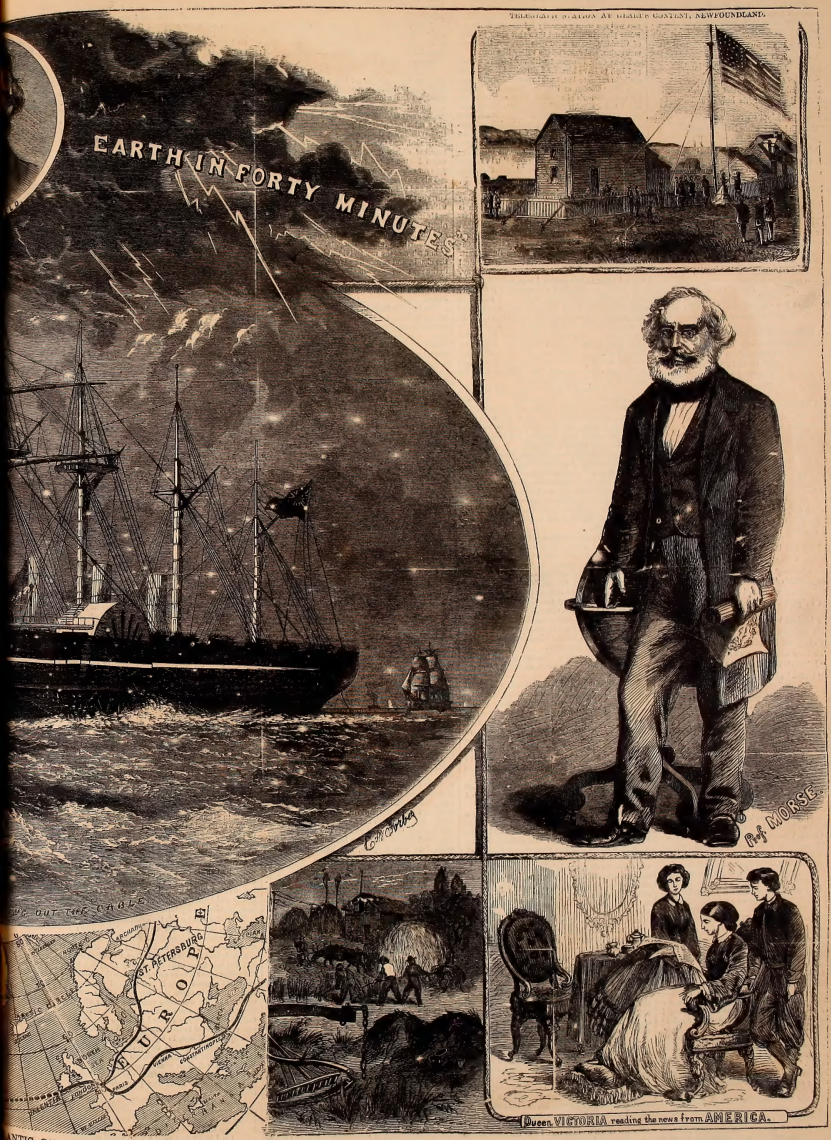
"Master," said the clown of a circus, "what is the difference between composition and baldness?" "Difference? there is none." "Oh yes, there is. Eh? give you an instance: Macduffius's sticking composition of Rowland's an occupation, isn't it?" "Yes." "Well, he hasn't any business there, sir!"

FASHIONABLE.—The latest style of bonnet has turned up. It is described as consisting of two straws, tied together with a blue ribbon on the top of the head, and two tassels suspended at each of the blue ends of the straws.

The latest novelty in the "feminine line" is patent epaulettes, now for sale in many city fancy stores. A married old bachelor says that the way things are going now, a man that needs a wife will only have to step into a milliner's shop, purchase a waterfall, "plumpers," false cheeks, false calves, etc., put them together, and have one without further trouble.

QUESTION AND ANSWER.

Mamma. "WHO WAS THE FIRST MAN, 'LINA?"



'Lina. "I FORGET."

Mamma. "ALREADY? WHY, ADAM, TO BE SURE! AND WHO WAS THE FIRST WOMAN?"

'Lina (after a thoughtful pause). "MADAM!"

THE GIRDLERS OF THE EARTH.

ANTIC CABLE LAID.—[See Page 502.]

THE WELCOME.

(Respectfully dedicated to the Signers of the Call for a "Convention of Loyal Southerners," which is appointed to meet at Independence Hall, Philadelphia, on Monday, September 3, 1866.)

Room for the Spartan Band
Of brothers true and tried!
The joy and hope of this fair land,
Its glory and its pride!
Faithful amidst the faithless found,
Where'er they trend 'tis holy ground.

From Mississippi's streams,
Hurrah! they come! they come!
The eagle of that State
Well knows its ancient home;
From Carolina's groves of pines,
And where the dark "Palmetto" shines,

City of Penn! thine arms
Extend, and wide unfold;
With welcome greet the trusty ones,
The loyal and the bold!
Honor the vet'rans brave who fight
In treason's camp for Truth and Right!

Come from Virginia's shore,
Where, standing o'er the chain,
Fair "Liberty" exults
That "Tyranny" is slain.
From where the orange-blossoms blow,
To where Arkansas' waters flow.

Let maidens' smiles reward
The banner-bearing bands
Who carry "Freedom" in their hearts
And "Union" in their hands!
Bring forth the best from "Beauty's" bowers
And strew their thorny paths with flowers.

In Alabama's chart
Dwells many a gallant son,
Tennessee's mountaineers
Are valiant every one:
Let the loud summons read the air
Where the Lone Star is sparkling fair!

As in the noble hall
They weigh their hopes and cares,
With cheers we'll gild its wall,
And carpet it with prayers.
Meet guerdons to such men of worth
From the free millions of the North!

Call all our brethren forth:
From sea to sea
And where the bird broods on her nest,
Louisiana's land.
Call all—and on the roll of Fame
Blazon in gold each loyal name!

Now hushed be every voice—
No sigh, no sound be heard;
Let every soul rejoice—
To hear the whispered word.
'Tis "Liberty" from shore to shore,
And "Union" now and evermore!

JOHN.

INCH BY INCH.

ONE fine morning in August I arose at early dawn, and had just finished dressing myself, when an old black woman put her head into my room, exclaiming: "Hy, is you dressed, massy?" and seeing that I was, she went on: "I bring de coffee and cigars; how de dis morning, massa?"

"Come in, Judy," I answered; "I'm all right. But what is the matter? You don't look well."

"I is rader poorly, tank God!" she replied.

Judy did not leave the room, as usual, when I had taken my coffee; so, knowing that she had got something on her mind, of which she wished to disburden herself, I said: "Well, Judy, what is it?"

"Will massa look at de 'ometer bum-by?"

"Look at the barometer? What for, Judy?"

"I tink we is gwine to hab hurricane."

"A hurricane! Why, there never was a finer morning came out of the heaven."

"Dat for true, massa; but we is goin' to hab hurricane for all dat. Massa no go to Paradise dis day."

"Not go to Paradise! Why not, Judy?"

"Paradise nice place in fine weather; but him too much open for mountains for safe in hurricane."

"Well, I'll look at the glass as soon as I have finished my coffee; but as to not going to Paradise, that's out of the question."

The old woman left me; and, finishing my coffee, I stepped out to examine the barometer. It stood at 30.60, and, as I have said, the morning was a splendid one; so, knowing that there was a young Judy at Paradise who was expecting me, I laughed at Old Judy's fears, and determined to start.

At this moment my friend came bustling out of his room. "Ah!" he cries, "good, Tom! Judy says we are going to have a storm, and she's always right."

"Nonsense!" I replied. "The glass is as firm as a rock; and as to Judy's feelings, that's all nonsense."

"Ah! but I tell you it's no such thing. I've been in four hurricanes, and Judy has foretold every one of them. We may not get it to-day; but she's better than any weather-glass; so, if you take my advice, you will defer your trip to the Gordeo."

"Stuff!" I replied. "I gave my word, and go I shall! I don't want to drag you out, if you're afraid, but you must not think to frighten me."

"Ah, my dear boy!" answered my friend, "when you have had one taste of a West Indian hurricane you will not want a second; besides, there is not a worse place in the island than that same Paradise of Gordon's. The wind gets between those two mountains, and rages up the valley like mad."

I was duly impressed with my friend's advice, and loth to leave him, for I perceived that he was really in earnest; but, truth to say, there was a certain Mary Gordon at Paradise (the name, by-the-by, of her father's plantation), for whom, as sailors say, I had a sneaking kindness, and nothing short of the slightest presence of the tornado would have stopped me. Besides, I was in full health and spirits: and it was not likely that I, who had been knocking about in all parts of the world, could sympathize with the feelings of an ancient black woman, or with those of the climate-worn and sensitive old planter with whom I was staying. Mounting my horse, therefore, with a black boy for a guide, I started on my journey.

I rode at a brisk pace, for there is something in the early breeze of a tropical morning which is peculiarly refreshing, and diffuses a buoyant elasticity into your frame, which is only to be restrained by active exercise. In addition to this, the scenery through which I was travelling was of the most enchanting description; while I, with a light heart, was speeding on to seek a crede hourt in a tropical "Paradise." I had got about one-third of the way, when I came to two roads. I was somewhat puzzled which to take, for I had forgotten my guide, and had often been told that I felt certain I had left him far behind. I was about to take the one to the left, when a voice behind me exclaimed: "Him dy wrong way, massa, he left in de right way." I turned round in surprise, and there I found my little black g ide clinging to the horse's tail. The honest, generous, loving soul had run after me, and, took no notice of it, though the young rascal had in his hand a pointed stick, with which at times he gave a hard hit to the animal's rump.

The road, though it proved a very bad one, was wild and picturesque in the extreme. It followed the course of a deep gully, whose sides became more and more precipitous as I advanced, but were covered with a green and luxuriant vegetation, consisting of bushes and creepers, the blossoms on which were marvellously beautiful.

After wending for some distance through the bottom of this ravine, I at last emerged into the open country, at a spot of peculiar beauty. On my right and left rose high mountains, whose peaks, now and then visible through the clouds, seemed to reach the heavens. The whole of these mountains were clothed with a perpetual verdure, while before me was a valley spreading out in grassy slopes to the edge of the sea.

I had never seen any thing so truly grand. I was fascinated; for in no part of the world is the imagination so powerfully affected by scenic effect as in the tropics. The majestic grandeur of the mountains, the mingled beauty and variety of the vegetation, and the deep and sombre forests, were all new to me. Then the strange convolutions of the clouds, which, pressed by the wind against the opposite side of the sierra, came rolling and tumbling over the mountains, now concealing and now disclosing some of the most romantic spots in nature, excited in me such lively and rapturous interest as could not be easily forgotten.

"Massa no get to Paradise dis day if him 'top looking at de mountains all de moaning," said my little guide.

Admonished by this I again started. I had not proceeded much further when I perceived that Old Judy's prognostics were not without their significance, for a brilliant though ominous cone presented itself to my view. A tremendous bank of black clouds had risen from the sea, out of the bosom of the ocean, and hung almost stationary on the distant horizon. I was looking at this when all at once it seemed to me as if the entire body and mass after mass of murky vapor rolled up, and spread themselves athwart the heavens.

"Hurricane do come, massa, very near!" cried my little Cupid. "Ole Judy always right; and massa no make haste de rain catch we."

I did not like the look of the cloud, for it was a strange and magnificent sight upon which I was gazing. One half of the heavens was black as night, and the other half was of a deep blue, the sky without a cloud. Never, perhaps, did the eye of man rest upon a greater contrast, never was a scene of greater beauty and grandeur, and at the same appalling magnificence. The contrast reached its climax when suddenly from out the dark pall flash after flash of lightning burst forth in the sky, and the thunder, after growling hoarsely in the distance, was echoed back by the mountains, reverberating from cliff to cliff, and from peak to peak. It was Peace and War personified; but, alas! the blue sky, the emblem of peace, was being fast swallowed up by the rolling wreaths of black, and the majesty of angry nature, was hastening to blot out all that remained of tranquillity and beauty.

At last I turned to my little guide for advice and my guide seemed impressed with the necessity of exertion, and I found myself, as it were, vying with the storm; but before I could reach my friend's plantation the clouds were flying over my head, and the wind was howling aloft as though a gale was blowing; though, below, there was a fresh breeze of air, not a leaf stirred, and not a ripple ruffled the sea.

Paradise now appeared in view; and it well deserved its name, for a more beautifully situated place I had never seen. By the time I reached the house it began to rain, and, leaping from my horse, I dashed up the steps into the hall. I was warmly greeted by Mr. Gordon and his two daughters; for though Mary was not quite so demonstrative as Grace, the glance of her eye and the rose upon her cheek told me that I was welcome also.

"Very glad you are come," said Mr. Gordon, "though we did not expect you. But how is it the colonel is not with you?"

"He would not come because Old Judy prophesied we were going to have a hurricane. I laughed at her at the time, but I fancy I made a terrible mistake."

"No doubt of it. That old woman is always right; the glass has gone down like a lump of lead, so let us get our breakfast at once, or we shall be done out of it. Here's Mrs. Seuter and her girls; I think you know them."

Mrs. Seuter was the widow of a Scotch planter, very fat and very fussy; but with the remainder of the party I was on nothing to do. During breakfast the wind increased in violence, and by the time it was over the hurricane had commenced in good earnest.

Mr. Gordon seeing this, immediately set about making preparations to withstand it. Windows and doors were carefully barricaded, and the most portable articles of value, together with a quantity of provisions, were conveyed down a trap-door into a cellar, built on purpose for safety during hurricanes.

This was scarcely accomplished when the fieldhands and the whole population of the village came hurrying up to seek for shelter and companionship with their master and his family.

Meantime the storm had become as black as night, the clouds as they advanced descending almost to the surface of the sea, which was now lashed into the wildest fury by the gale. Every now and then flashes of the most vivid lightning burst from the clouds, and descending were instantly engulfed in the sea; the most massive cloud appeared from beneath the white foam, and apparently ascending toward the sky were met by other masses hovering above.

The thunder burst in appalling crashes over our heads, waking up the echoes of the neighboring mountains, and the rain came in no very feeble imitation; the rain, too, descended in cataracts: it seemed as though the flood-gates of heaven were opened and the eternal waters were pouring down upon us. To add to the awfulness of the scene, it gradually became as dark as pitch, the wind every instant increasing in violence.

About eleven o'clock the noise of the gale was something I had never before heard, and yet every moment it seemed to gain in power and strength till it increased to such an overwhelming roar that the strongest efforts of the human voice, in closest proximity, were quite unheard.

The building began to show by its quakings that from time to time we had to do battle of greater and greater fury. The negroes were therefore roused from their stupor, and by signs desired to go below.

The house by this time had become little better than a rocking vessel, while a shower of shingles and tiles was every instant swept from the roof. Very soon all, save Mr. Gordon, were safely conveyed below, Mary and I being the last to descend. As we did so I could rush proclaimed that something had fallen; and I looked back to see if any accident had happened to my host. When I got back to the room I found him uninjured; but a sudden blast in the chimney had driven down a light that closed an extraordinary sight to me. The air was filled with missiles of all descriptions—branches of trees, large stones, boards, all sorts of moveables, which were driven along with incredible speed.

Suddenly a violent shock was felt, sending a thrill through my heart, for I expected to see the whole house come falling upon us. The clouds had once more descended, but, when again convulsed the earth, the rapidly repeated flashes of lightning only rendering it more impenetrable: while the roaring of the gale and the crashing of the thunder, made up a hideous tumult such as appalled the heart, and almost annihilated the mind.

I have but a faint recollection of what afterward transpired, till I found myself descending the ladder with Mr. Gordon; but I know that before we closed the trap-door I had resumed the entire, and the vibration of the walls told me they could not stand long unless it abated. When we had done this, the sounds from above were now every now and then startling and appalling, we were in comparative quietude, and were enabled to relieve our overcharged hearts somewhat by thoughts and feelings. To hear the sound of our own voices, and communicate our thoughts by words, afforded a soothing balm by which we half for the last hour been encompassed, was a comfort which words can not express. The child to poor Mrs. Seuter must have been immense, for now she could hear herself speak, and listen to her own groans.

"The Lord preserve us!" she exclaimed; "but this is awful. I shall die with fright. If I had never left Aberdeen I should not have——Gracious powers, what's that? We shall all be swallowed up!"

At this moment there was a report, and then a rolling crash over our heads, which made the earth shake beneath us.

"Heaven have mercy!" said Mr. Gordon, quietly. "I expected it would not hold up long."

This was followed by a wail among the negresses, and a young girl rose up, exclaiming: "Oh, me God! I feel my conscience pain; warra I do now? Tan sway dee—tan sway—let me go fetch him."

"Clough-loo!" replied an old woman; "you is mad, girl; you no can pass piccaninny foo. Tan till. Garramighty tan care ob piccaninny now—nobody else can."

This, however, did not seem to afford much comfort to the poor girl, who did nothing but sit and wail.

My mind had hitherto been so occupied that I had not time to take in the peculiarities of the scene by which we were surrounded. Imagine to a large, dark vault, lit only by the feeble rays of two candles and a lamp which hung from the ceiling, there was just sufficient light to give every thing, except those within the radius of these lights, a grotesque or diabolical aspect. The negroes in the farther end of the cellar huddled on the floor, squeezed the very personification of spirits of darkness awaiting their condemnation; one old negro, tall and spectral, in the back-ground, looking like a malevolent demon gloating over their fall.

During more than an hour we remained in a state of incertitude as to what was going on above us: all we knew was that the noise of the storm had sensibly diminished. At last I could hold out no longer, and mounting the ladder, I endeavored to open the trap, that I might see what was the state of things above ground. I undid the latch, and succeeded in lifting the door; but my strength was not sufficient to lift it. I called up Mr. Gordon and one of the negroes; but our united strength failed to move it; and at last, after repeated efforts, we were fain to give over. The fact was clear that the ruins of the house had fallen over us, and till assistance could be obtained from above we were prisoners. Our provision was by no means a moveable one, for we had no idea when, even if ever, we should be released, and our stock of food was very scanty. But there was not the worst evil we had to encounter, for presently, as we sat, a low mysterious rumbling came from the bowels of the earth. A few minutes elapsed, and then the noise increased—reached us—the earth rose under our feet—the whole edifice reeled—the walls cracked—and the roof of the cellar, with the trap-plift torn away, and fell among the negroes, whose wild and despairing cries rent the vault. It was a moment of intense agony. We all stood transfixed with awe, for we expected nothing less than that the earth was about to open and swallow us up.

At some time in the earthquake passed than a new danger menaced us. Through one of the cracks in the wall water was flowing rapidly, and the floor of the vault was already covered some inches deep. At first, neither Mrs. Seuter nor the negroes seemed to comprehend this; but as the water rapidly increased, Mary, who never became alarmed, cried:

"Why," she exclaimed, starting up, "we shall all be drowned! Is there no means of escape? Must we look for no way of escaping us?" she asked of me.

"None whatever," I replied. "We are in the hands of God; He alone can help us, if it is His good pleasure."

The old lady's countenance became ashy pale, and then she threw up her arms and shrieked: "I can't die—I won't die! Will nobody save me? I'll give any thing—I'll buy your freedom, and make you rich," she continued, turning to the negroes.

"Esa, ma'am, we save you if we can; we no let backra ladies die if we help it; but negger life as good as yours, I tink, and we, when de water come ober de head, we no help ourselves: we all be like den—we all big free, and rich too, de Lord be praise!"

As the water rose it was quite a study to watch the faces of those about me, particularly of the negroes. They seemed to transition from anxiety to fear, and from that to the wildest despair, would have been ludicrous in the extreme had not our situation been so appalling.

While all around were crying and wailing, however, Mary and Grace were perfectly quiet. Their mother had not left them for an instant, though the water had now reached above their knees. In the faces of these two girls might be read that unconquerable principle of that high and enduring attitude, which is a special characteristic of Anglo-tropical women. The contrast between their calmness and the wild despair of Mrs. Seuter and the negroes was very noticeable. It was a time to try the courage of any one. Mr. Gordon I knew was not wanting in courage, but his fortitude seemed to have forsaken him. His looks were wild; the muscles of his mouth twitched and quivered, and now and then he muttered something that I could not hear.

Inch by inch the water rose till it reached my waistcoat. Now but by one the buttons disappeared, as each minute our enemy gained upon us. Still I was loth to relinquish all hope. Meantime, not a word had been uttered or a prayer made aside by Mr. Gordon or his daughters. Mrs. Seuter had ceased her cries, for she had persuaded a tall negro to hold her up against the cellar wall, and was grasping one of the candles with great satisfaction. She was in a fool's paradise, for she did not remember that the height of the vault was above the negro as in herself, and that the moment the water rose high enough to endanger the life of the negro he would in all probability leave her to shift for herself. No there was no help or escape for us, and all we could do was calmly to wait the approach of that death which, ere long, appeared to be the only moment of more awful suspense could not be contemplated. I have been through many perils, but never any which like this. A man may be brave, he may his blood is hot, and the tide of battle carries him on; but to stand still and see the grim destroyer coming nearer and nearer, minute by minute, inch by inch, requires a very different sort of courage.

The water had by this time reached almost to our shoulders, and I felt my strength giving away. I wanted to call aloud, to shriek for help; there was something so horrible in the idea of being thus drowned, like rats in a hole, to my thinking that from it. All this takes little time to describe; but the rise of the water was so slow that more than half an hour had elapsed since it first entered the vault. And now again came the rumbling of the earthquake, and the sickening sensation of its shock. The place shook, the water was agitated, and partially subsided. For a time I could not believe my eyes; I expected to see it rise again; but it subsided, and, to my great joy, I found to my joy, that it was rapidly diminishing. It was certainly a moment of intense relief, though our danger was not all over. We were not saved from immediate death; but how were we to be extricated from our living tomb? How were we to make our situation known to others?

For several hours we remained in this state—part of the time with the additional horror of darkness, for the lights had burned out, and we had no others to replace them. I can't tell if I or any one else slept, for I was in a state of mind and body equivalent to a state of stupor, for not a word was uttered. At one time I fancied my senses were leaving me, for my brain was filled with strange, unearthly visions.

time I was suddenly aroused by the most appalling shrieks.

"What is it?" asked I. "What is the matter?"

"The water coming in again! Don't you hear it?" cried Mrs. Secter.

I listened. There was a noise certainly, but it did not appear to be that of water; then it ceased. I felt about me; my senses were so numbed that I could not tell if the water was rising or falling, or, indeed, if there was any water at all. I listened again, and most certainly there were sounds, and that they came from above was unmistakable. At first they were indistinct, but each moment they became plainer, and at last I could distinguish the blows of picks, then the noise of shovels, and these at last accompanied with the shouts of human voices. Help was truly at hand. The sense of reprieve from such a situation was more than the mind could comprehend, and with indifference, and we all joined in the shouts of the negroes to their comrades above. A few minutes after this, to our inexpressible delight, the trap opened, and a gleam of sunlight lent its light upon us.

I shall not attempt to depict our feelings or the relief (as we termed it) from above and below; nor shall I be able to give any correct notion of the manner in which Mrs. Secter conducted herself in the frantic joy of her joy. I only know that Mr. Gordon and his two daughters embraced me in their excitement, and that I thought the latter experience very embarrassing.

Our final deliverance was delayed for some time for the want of a ladder. While one was being procured the women and people above were very anxious to know if we were all safe.

"Our Massa Gordon," said one.

"And de Missa Grace and Mary," exclaimed another.

"And de leetle buckra, Massa Onzon" (the nearest approximation to Spunyarn a negro could make), "he all right too."

"Mr. Spunyarn, me piccaniny!" cried the poor young mother from below.

"Ah, Psyche!" answered a man's voice from the trap, "you is hurt, girl. You let your child in de bed, and you tink nothing do him, but run way and take care ob yourself; but be all right, tank God!"

It is singular, but nevertheless true, that amidst the wreck of the negro village the child was found unhurt, and a few minutes after we reached the ground, was in the arms of its mother.

The first thing we did on arriving at the surface was to look round to see the devastation which the hurricane had produced.

The scene of destruction which our eyes fell upon was somewhat like baffles description. The whole face of the country was, as it were, changed. It looked as though a burning blast had traversed the island, for, with scarcely every thing was green and luxuriant, all was now bare and black. So marvelous a transformation in so short a time I had never seen. Vegetation, human habitations, and animal life had all vanished.

Paradise itself was a mass of ruins, and the sugar-works were greatly damaged; but Mr. Gordon bore his loss with great equanimity.

Our rescue was due to a party of hands employed at a cane about a mile and a half distant from the house, where Mr. Gordon had a landing-place, and who, although they had been exposed to the full fury of the gale, escaped uninjured, and at daybreak started to look after the safety of their master. We were immersed in the vault for more than twenty-four hours—the longest day and night, by far, that I can remember.

RESOURCES AND PROSPECTS OF AMERICA.

A most valuable work on the Resources and Prospects of America has just appeared from the pen of Mr. Morton Peto. In a volume of moderate size, he presents us with a great mass of statistical information, carefully compiled from the bulky Reports of the Commissioners of the Census of the United States, and from other sources not easy of access to readers in general. The work is, however, far from being a mere compilation; on some parts of the subject the author writes from personal observation, on every part he freely offers his own opinions and reflections.

Sir Morton Peto begins by referring to the remarkable rise in the prosperity of America even during the trying time of the Civil War; for this he accounts by attributing it to the "wonderful elasticity of the resources of the United States." The national debt, which was only sixty-five million of dollars at the commencement of the war, or thirteen million pounds sterling, is now almost three thousand million of dollars, or six hundred million pounds sterling; but such is the confidence of the people in the resources of their country that they regard it to be all paid off in thirty years, or even in a shorter time. "From the President at Washington," Sir S. M. Peto says, "down to the humblest agriculturist in the Far West, I found but one prevailing feeling respecting the debt." He was evidently the experience of the past. He was told "that the debt entailed by the war of 1812 was wholly discharged from the ordinary sources of revenue in a period of nineteen years; and that practically the burden of that debt had never been felt by any body, though, considering the difference in the comparative revenue of the population is in part due to the facility with which the means of subsistence and of comfort are obtained by all who are capable of work, but in great part to immigration. The population of the United States was only 5,305,925 in 1800, and in 1860 it was 31,429,000; but it is calculated that "of the whole population in 1863, the immigrant of the present century and their descendants number more than twenty-one million, or two-thirds of the whole." The immigrants are derived from all countries of Europe, but in greatest numbers from Great Britain and Ireland. Of late Germany have recently settled in California. The encouragement afforded to the settler is very great. If he is the head of a family, or twenty-one years of age, he receives from the Government, substantially as a free gift, one hundred and sixty acres of land; and each of his children attaining the age of twenty-one years, receives the like. If he chooses to pursue his trade, or to seek employment as a laborer in any of the large towns, he finds ready employment. In parts of the country, he finds wages much higher than in Europe, and the necessaries of life comparatively cheap. The high price of labor generally compels the settler who becomes a farmer to depend on himself and his family for the cultivation of his farm, but he can confidently reckon on profits more than sufficient for his support. The increase of population in some of the northern States has been extremely rapid. Minnesota in 1849 had a population little exceeding four thousand; in 1860 the population exceeded six hundred and seventy-two thousand; and in 1864 it was estimated at three hundred and fifty thousand. Wisconsin had only 5,316 inhabitants in 1830, and in 1860 it had 775,881. Indiana had a population of 4875 in 1800, and in 1860 a population of 1,350,428. The annual produce of wheat in this State is now about thirty million bushels, and of Indian corn upward of seventy million bushels.

The prosperity of California began with the discovery of gold, but it is already a wheat-exporting country, and seems likely to become the granary of the Pacific. The main wealth of the State is generally due to their agricultural resources. Sir S. M. Peto says: "I hope I shall not wound the susceptibilities of my American friends if I say that I regard their country as essentially agricultural, and by no means essentially commercial or manufacturing. But I think their own results establish my position. Of about 8,217,000 heads of families and other individuals whose occupation is recorded in the returns of the census of 1860, it appears that upward of three million, or more than one-third, were directly connected with the labor of the soil. . . . On the other hand, the number of merchants and clerks in America is only three hundred thousand. . . . The population of manufacturing centres does not assume a very large proportion to the whole population."

The American estimate of American manufactures, and the number of people engaged in them, is only reached "by including all the fishermen, blacksmiths, carpenters, millwrights, engineers, machinists, seamstresses, painters, varnishers, printers, hatters, masons, mariners, millers, sawyers, shoemakers, and other mechanics who work at their trade in the community." Manufacturing industry, properly so called, is almost entirely confined to a few of the Northern States.

The extent of improved land in farms in the United States, according to the census returns of 1860, was 163,110,128 acres; the extent of unimproved land included in farms was 244,101,818 acres; and the uncultivated territory not yet included in farms was 1,466,889,054 acres. The rapid progress of agriculture is shown by the fact, that while the cash value of the farms under actual cultivation in 1850 was estimated at $3,967,341,899, it had risen in 1860 to $6,645,045,000—being an increase of no less than 103 per cent. in these ten years. The improvements in agriculture have also increased even during the war. In consequence of the high price of labor, the farming is generally very imperfect; yet, making due allowance for the climate, the American farmer is able to produce a bushel of wheat at much less cost than the most scientific farmer in England. The wheat, well protected by the deep snow in winter, comes rapidly forward in the cool weather of spring, and the rich liquid sunshine of the summer months brings it to great perfection. Wheat and Indian corn are the grains principally cultivated in the more northern States of America. Rice is grown in some parts of the South. Indian corn supplies the principal part of the food of the people, both in the North and in the South. It is extremely easy cultivation, and its productiveness is far beyond that of other grains. Peas and beans are little grown in the United States. Potatoes are produced in great quantities in the Northern States, and sweet-potatoes in the South. Turnips are little cultivated, the climate being too dry. The dairy produce, both of butter and cheese, is large. The improvement of quality in American cheese since it began to be exported to this country has attracted the notice of almost every consumer. It is accounted for by the establishment of a great "cheese-factory" system in the dairy districts of the State of New York and neighboring regions. "Each farmer sends his milk to the dairy, and is credited for the quantity supplied. Skilled operatives are employed at the factories to make the cheese, and it has been found that huge factories turn out an article of far better quality than can be made in private dairies." The prices of grain and dairy produce in America depend mainly upon the prices in London. The export of wheat from the United States in 1863 amounted to 77,396,682 bushels, of which 47,082,926 bushels were exported to Great Britain and Ireland. The grain-trade was rapidly developed after the opening of the Erie Canal in 1825, and of late years it has increased with wonderfully accelerated rapidity: much grain produced in the North-western States finding its way eastward by the Erie Canal, much of it from the lake ports by the St. Lawrence, and much of it by the railways. Milwaukee, in Wisconsin, which was scarcely inhabited twenty-five years ago, and which exported only 4,000 bushels of grain and flour in 1841, exported 18,712,380 bushels in 1863.

Wool is not yet an important article of produce in the United States, although in some places there are fancy farms, where great attention is paid to the breeds of sheep; and merino sheep of unusually fine wool, and of great weight, are to be found in Vermont; but California is expected soon to become a wool-producing country. The climate of the Atlantic States is not suited to the silk-worm, and attempts at silk-culture there have failed; but Sir S. M. Peto is that it may succeed admirably in the Pacific States.

Nowhere in the world in the feeding of swine so important a branch of agriculture as in some parts of the United States. Cincinnati has long been celebrated for its trade in pork. The hog is killed, cut up, and packed by machinery. Cincinnati kills and exports four hundred thousand hogs per annum. Chicago has, however, lately acquired even greater importance as a pork-ex- rting town. A million of hogs are killed annually in Chicago. It is now, indeed, not only the largest market in the world for pork, but also for corn and timber, although it was but a mere Indian trading-station till 1830, and its pork-trade began in 1850 with the "packing" out of a couple of three hundred hogs.

The high price of labor has stimulated invention, and no people have so abounded as the Americans in labor-saving contrivances to supply the want of human hands. Many of these machines—as the sewing-machine—have been brought to Europe, and some of them are extensively used in Britain. It is though less important to us from the comparative cheapness of labor. As might be expected, many of the American machines are intended to facilitate the labors of agriculture.

Of the textile manufactures of America, that of cotton is by far the most important, but the number of spindles is not much more than one-sixth of that employed in Britain; moreover, much of the cotton spun in the States is for the cotton-producing States, to be used in the form of cordage, or made into cotton bags and packing-cloths. Woollen clothing is largely produced in the United States, great quantities of cotton goods of British manufacture are imported. The linen manufacture is inconsiderable. Sir S. M. Peto does not hesitate to condemn the whole system of protective duties, by which American manufactures are unnaturally fostered, as injurious to America itself and to the world. As to the protective duties on cotton goods, he says: "If any class of the American thereby unnaturally raising the price of an article of the largest consumption among every class of their own community, but they are thereby raising the price at their own expense as growers and exporters of the raw material from which these articles are made; and all that they are doing by raising the price is to cause the world to use less of the article, and to encourage other countries to grow it."

Sir S. M. Peto is very zealous in his advocacy of free trade. He expresses his confidence that as the people of America come to be taxed for the exclusive benefit of agriculturists, so the people of America will ere long refuse to be taxed for the exclusive benefit of manufacturers. The whole question has a special importance at present, in view of the commercial relations between the United States and the British provinces in North America. It seems almost impossible that any other system than that of free trade can long prevail between countries so situated as those on the northern and southern banks of the St. Lawrence. Under an opposite system, smuggling on a vast and ever increasing scale to a most formidable magnitude on the long line of the frontier.

The mineral wealth of the United States is very great. Gold is found in some of the Eastern States, particularly in Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia; and the gold-bearing region of the West—still very partially explored—includes the States of California and Oregon, and the Territories of Utah, Nevada, New Mexico, Arizona, Washington, Colorado, Montana, and Arizona—an area of more than a million of square miles, extending from British Columbia on the north to Mexico on the south, and from the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean. Silver-mining may be said to be only in its infancy in Nevada, New Mexico and Arizona, which were acquired from Mexico in 1848, silver-mines have long been worked. In the bank of another river, under a better government, they will now probably soon become greatly more numerous and productive. An enormous lode of silver ore, known as the Comstock Lode, has been discovered in Nevada, and nearly one hundred different companies have obtained the right to work parts of it. A fine city, called Virginia City, has sprung up in close proximity to these mines, with a population already estimated at ten thousand; and the whole of Nevada is rapidly increasing in population, while new silver-mines are continually being opened in different localities.

Iron ore exists in great abundance in the United States, and is widely distributed. Perhaps in no part of the world is more abundant than in the State of Missouri, where great hills are entirely formed of it. Little, however, has yet been done in the State of Missouri. Missouri to account. The district is deficient in coal, and the railway system is too incomplete to supply this want. Another district, extremely rich in iron ore, but hitherto almost unproductive, lies in the northern part of Georgia, passing into Alabama. It is in Pennsylvania and New Jersey that iron ore is at present most largely worked. There are iron-producing districts also in New England, New York, Ohio, Virginia, and both the Carolinas; and during the last ten years a considerable amount of capital has been invested in coal-fields, both in Illinois, on the southern shore of Lake Superior. But the iron-masters of America can hardly hold their ground, as yet, against competition with imported iron. The vast supplies of iron ore which America possesses are rather to be regarded as a store for future ages than as a source of wealth to be largely developed in the present. There are very rich mines of copper on the shores of Lake Superior, near Keweenaw Point, where masses of native copper of extraordinary size have been found. Copper-mines have also been established in New Mexico. Lead ore is wrought, but not to a great extent, in Missouri, Wisconsin, and Iowa. Quicksilver has been found in California, and the produce is at present considerable.

The coal-fields of America are the greatest in the world. They are computed to be thirty-six times the extent of those of Great Britain and Ireland. They are chiefly situated in the basin of the Mississippi and its tributaries. The whole annual produce of coal, however, does not yet amount to much more than fourteen million tons, or about one-sixth of that of Britain. Wood is the ordinary fuel for domestic purposes, and is even employed for steam-engines, while the American engineer disperses steam wherever they can, and avail themselves of their "waterprivileges." The abundance of iron, coal, and limestone in America, however, is suggestive of great expectations concerning the future, when the country shall be more densely peopled, and able to make use of its own mineral treasures.

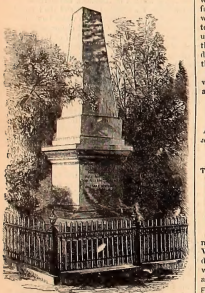
Sir S. M. Peto devotes a chapter to petroleum, or rock-oil, and gives a most interesting account of the American oil-wells. The oil which is derived from oil-springs was merely collected by skimming it from the surface of streams in which it floated till 1859, when a well was sunk in Pennsylvania, and at once began to yield 400, and afterward 1000 gallons a day. Numerous companies were formed, and search for oil began throughout the whole district. Many of the experiments were unsuccessful, but when oil was found the fortunate adventurers were suddenly enriched. Some of the wells yield oil without the trouble of pumping: it flows from them in a copious stream. Some wells yield from a single acre one even 3000 barrels daily. Towns have sprung up in the oil-district of Pennsylvania; and in Oil City business is now transacted to the amount of £3,000,000 annually. Other parts of America have also been found to be rich in oil. It would be out of place here to do more than merely allude to the oil-wells of Canada; but there are oil-fields in several parts of Pennsylvania, in Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, while it is said that indications of oil have been found in many other States.

Our limits do not permit us to follow Sir S. M. Peto in his review of American commerce—the foreign trade, the coasting trade, and the internal trade on the lakes and rivers—to which he devotes a section of his work. One fact claims particular attention, that no less than one-half of the export trade of the United States is for cotton. The next point to this is the export trade to France; but the third largest export trade is to the British provinces in North America, while the exports to other British possessions are very considerable. From this may be seen the vast importance to both nations of continuing maintaining friendly relations.

Sir S. M. Peto devotes another section of his work to railways. The rivers of the country, great and numerous as they are, do not afford sufficient for the purposes of its internal commerce. The railway system of America is great and rapidly extending; but the railways are as yet in most single lines, and their construction is so imperfect that the rate of traveling is far less rapid than in Britain. Sir S. M. Peto enters very fully into the whole subject. He visited America, indeed, in the capacity of chairman of the London Board of Control of the Atlantic and Great Western Railway, and his suggestions on the construction and management of railways will scarcely be disputed by any American as those of a stranger, but with the respect due to one whose interests are identified with their own, and whose experience gives value to his counsel.

The South is treated in a section by itself. Differing from the North in its climate and in its products, it differs still more in consequence of slavery, now happily abolished, but so recently that the results of the change have scarcely yet begun to appear. There are as yet, few lines of railway between the North and the South. The Southern people, in the time of the past, did not wish to have them, for they were afraid of the use which might be made of them to carry away the slaves, and of the facilities for such communication with the North. The Southern States have for a long time been comparatively stationary in population. Immigrants did not flock to them, for the white man laboring with his own hands was despised both by the slaveholder and by the slaves. All this must now be changed. There is much land in the Southern States which invites settlers. Even in Virginia the "improved land" amounts only to 11,457,821 acres, while 15,679,215 acres are "unimproved;" whereas in New York the improved land is more than double the extent of the unimproved. Much of the uncultivated land in the South is adapted for the cultivation of cotton and other articles of commerce. The settlement of it also is well suited to wheat. Of the products of the South, the most important—besides cotton, rice, and sugar—is tobacco—snuff. The cultivation of the sugar-cane is limited to the most southern regions, and has of late decreased. The system of free labor has successfully introduced from China is admirably adapted to the climate, not only of the South, but indeed of almost all parts of the United States, and its cultivation has rapidly extended, especially in the Northwestern States.

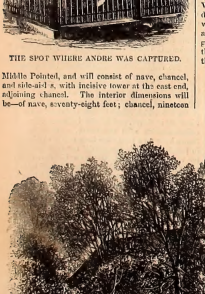
Sir S. M. Peto's work is so full of information that what we have been able to extract is but a little portion of it. The spirit in which it is written is also excellent. It is the work of an Englishman who loves his own country and her institutions, but who regards America and Americans with the most kindly feeling. It is calculated to dispute prejudice, and to promote good feeling on both sides of the Atlantic.



---

* There is a wide error in this statement. From 1790 to 1850—a period of sixty years—the population in question was over 30 per cent. This would double the population in a little more than twenty-three years; and from there were less than 20,000 persons who had immigrated. Now, if we suppose the one-third to be derived from immigration, it would not be unreasonable to assume the population would go on in such a country as this to double once in twenty-five years. By this estimate, the population in 1870 being 4,000,000, would be: 1825 (save ben 6,000,000 (below the mark); in 1850 it would have been 12,000,000; and in 1875 there would have been fully 24,000,000 of persons descended from the original population of 1776. The present population of Britain has been at least 25,000,000. The actual population in 1869 was 31,000,000, or 7,000,000 less than the above estimate would indicate.—Ed. S. M. Peto's 31,000,000 to be accounted for as immigrants and their descendants.—Ed. HARPER'S WEEKLY.

THE MEMORIAL CHURCH TO WASHINGTON IRVING AT TARRYTOWN, ON THE HUDSON, AND CLASSIC VIEWS IN THE VICINITY.



WASHINGTON IRVING died November 28, 1859, and was buried in the cemetery at Tarrytown. Since then two attempts have been made in that village to perpetuate his memory by a Memorial. One of these—a Bridge over the Pocantico, at the spot where ICHABOD CRANE, the school-teacher of Sleepy Hollow, was thrown from his horse by the dreadful onslaught of the headless horseman—failed, we may suppose, from want of interest in the plan. The other, a Church, projected by the rector, wardens, and vestry of St. Mark's Episcopal Church, is rapidly becoming an accomplished fact. The corner-stone of this memorial edifice was laid July 4, by Bishop POTTER. The site is well chosen, being on the principal street of Tarrytown, a few feet from the spot where Major ANDRÉ was captured, and ICHABOD first saw the spectre. The building is of the style of architecture known as

THE SPOT WHERE ANDRÉ WAS CAPTURED.

Middle Pointed, and will consist of nave, chancel, and side-aisles, with incisive tower at the east end, adjoining chancel. The interior dimensions will be—of nave, seventy-eight feet; chancel, nineteen feet six inches. The entire width will be fifty feet. There will be a clear-story lighted by triangular arched windows, traced. The tower will terminate with bold gables, and at southeast angle will be further support of with an octagonal stair turret, which in its turn will be carried up above the main tower, and will be finished with tall spirelet. Eventually, a marble statue of IRVING will be placed in the vestibule. The edifice will seat about five hundred persons. Messrs. RENWICK and SANDS are the architects.

THE OLD DUTCH CHURCH.

THE OLD MILL.

Near by is the monument which marks the spot where ANDRÉ was captured. It is of simple design, and on the east side bears the following inscription:

ON THIS SPOT
The 23d day of September, 1780, the Spy,
MAJOR JOHN ANDRÉ,
Adjutant-General of the British Army, was captured by JOHN PAULDING, DAVID WILLIAMS, and ISAAC VAN WART,
All natives of this county.
HISTORY HAS TOLD THE REST.

The People of Westchester County have erected this Monument, as well to commemorate a great Event, as to testify their high estimation of that Integrity and Patriotism which, rejecting every temptation, rescued the United States from most imminent peril, by baffling the arts of a Spy and the plots of a Traitor.
ERECTED OCTOBER 7, 1853.

In the Sleepy Hollow Cemetery, a little to the north, is the burial-place of the IRVING family. Within the inclosure, ranged in two lines, are the different graves. Each has a plain head-stone of white marble, on which are inscribed the name and age at death of the occupant. As will be seen, the grave of GEOFFREY CRAYON does not differ from the rest of his family. The inscription simply tells that

WASHINGTON,
SON OF WILLIAM AND SARAH S. IRVING, DIED
NOV. 28, 1859,
AGED 76 YEARS 7 MO. AND 25 DAYS.

Within the cemetery inclosure is the old Dutch church erected by FREDERICK PHILIPS and CATHERINE VAN CORTLANDT, his wife, in 1699. Here ICHABOD led the choir, and worshiped with the Dutch burghers and matrons and damsels of famous memory. The edifice is still used occasionally. A few feet from the church, at the bottom of the hill, stood—for a new structure has replaced the old—the ancient bridge, which here spanned the smooth and silvery Pocantico. The church side of the river was in ancient times a place of refuge for those chased by the fiends and goblins which frequented the gloom of WILEY'S swamp, now made quite safe by the improving hand of man. Here was the "opposite side" to which ICHABOD was hastening when so rudely attacked by the strange rider. Near by is the old mill, built a few years before the church by the same public-spirited individual. The walls yet show the opening through which the distrustful settlers bargained with the Indians when, with friendly intent, they journeyed from Ossining and Sepparon to dispose of their products. It continues to do its duty well, as the writer of these lines can testify. The photographs from which these sketches were made were taken by G. G. ROCKWOOD, 839 Broadway, New York.

THE MEMORIAL CHURCH AT TARRYTOWN, NEW YORK.

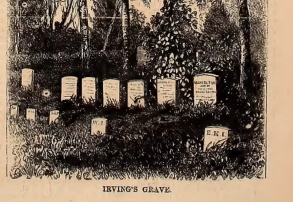
RECEIVING RATIONS.

When this sketch was made in June last, more than 20,000 of the people of Alabama—whites—



BRIDGE OVER THE POCANTICO.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

NEW IBERIA, LOUISIANA.

Is considered the head of the Teche navigation, although boats can get up while high-water lasts to Martinville, and in times of flood the navigation of the lakes and bayous is almost unlimited. New Iberia is a brisk little town, now stagnating under the prevailing dullness of business all through the South. The majority of its inhabitants appear to be French, and with the manners of New Orleans. Stores and drinking-houses are thrown wide open on Sunday, and there is card-playing and billiards all day. The churches, also, are open for the convenience of such as choose to go—principally of the female population, or young men who go for the sake of the company of their sweet-hearts. This is a point at which a good portion of the cotton lands driven from Texas arrive. The herders and Grovers—rough-looking fellows—are often seen riding along the streets. There are no prominent buildings of any account, the county buildings being at Martinsville. It has the characteristic features of many of the little towns in West Louisiana, and for that matter might be a little bit of Yorkville or Manhattanville but for the different appearance and language of the inhabitants.

IRVING'S GRAVE.

were receiving Government rations; and it is believed that 10,000 more were probably sharers in the supplies thus drawn.

The much-abused Freedmen's Bureau has succeeded in persuading the negroes to go to work; so that they no longer look to the Government for support, except in the matter of obliging their employers to give them their just dues, not always paid with grace. With the whites the case is different; the curse of laziness, which the presence of slavery inflicted upon them, is hard to overcome; ignorant as the negroes—and even falling behind them, now that the latter are seeking education—they are almost entirely without ambition beyond the simplest wants of nature. They are, however, generally engaged in cultivating land to a limited extent, and the crops secured, the Government will withdraw its support and leave them to their own resources. Much of the money expended by the Bureau has gone to the support of the poor white people of the South, the greatest sufferers by, and victims of the war. That numbers of them must have starved to death without such assistance is undeniable; your bitter Southerner and Unionhater never thinks of this, or else chooses to ignore it, when engaged in the favorite occupation of denouncing the Freedmen's Bureau.

NEW IBERIA, LOUISIANA.—Sketched by our Special Artist, A. R. Ward.—[See Page 508.]

The picture represents claimants for relief pleading their cases, and receiving orders on the Commissary from Major Pierce—an officer, who is one of many that I have met, sacrificing their personal comfort and desire to be at home to a sense of duty; and, of all trying positions, it is hard to imagine any thing worse than that of a Bureau officer, stationed away from troops, among a covertly hostile population.

A. R. W.

DOUBLY PAID.

One very warm summer day the Emperor Paul fell asleep in his arm-chair after dinner near an open window, which commanded a view of the garden at Katchéina, while some of the court ladies were whispering together in an adjoining apartment. A daring young officer, who was a great favorite with the latter, perceiving them assembled their window, was about to commence a conversation with them, but they signed to him to beware of disturbing his sleeping Majesty.

"Do not betray me," whispered he, "and I will have some sport!"

He looked cautiously around, and seeing that he was not observed, or at most by the window of the next room and called out in Stentor tones the drowsing watch-word of the guard: "Eberhall!" then darted instantly into the bushes and escaped unperceived.

The Emperor started up from his nap in a terrible rage at such an impudent jest, but could obtain no other answer from the ladies, who naturally desired to shield their friend, than that they did not know who it was. He then sent for the commandant and ordered him to produce the offender within an hour. The latter interrogated each individual of the guard and everyone he met, but could learn nothing; and at last in his despair, for a command from Paul was not a matter to be trifled with, he summoned a young soldier and said to him,

ALABAMIANS RECEIVING RATIONS.—[Sketched by A. R. Ward.]

"I will give you two hundred rubles if you will say that you woke the Emperor in that manner. He will probably cause you to be punished, but why should you care for that?"

The soldier, who was a resolute man, agreed to it and received the money, and exactly an hour after the order had been given accompanied the commandant into the Emperor's presence. But the man will—his Majesty's anger had died away. Looking intently at the soldier, he said, "A superb voice! give him three hundred rubles!

Via ALBANY.

JUST AS MR. Wallabout reached the wharf the boat swung off. While she might have jumped, she had not the ready-made courage; when she had acquired a stock, the distance was hopeless. It was the last boat of the morning to the last train for Jane Roseville, and Mrs. Wallabout looked after it in despair. Mr. Wallabout and the little Wallabouts were at Jane Roseville expecting her. They would drive down to meet the train, and Mr. Wallabout would be displeased. Mr. Wallabout was a precise person, who disapproved of errant females, and did not believe that people lost boats and trains except through carelessness. He had never lost a train in his life.

Mrs. Wallabout stood on the wharf, holding fast her umbrella, her travelling-bag, and her brown paper parcels, and took counsel with herself. Her guardian-angel advised her to retreat to a hotel and try a new day and a fresh start; but Mrs. W. was a bent shrunk from the notion. Hotels look bleak to solitary women; and people stare so! Then her evil genius mocked the Albany boat.

"To be sure Albany is fifty miles beyond Jane Roseville," argued this evil principle; "but then you hardly reach the fort. You take your state-room. You have a cool night on the water; and you arrive at Albany in time to drop down to Jane Roseville in one of the early morning boats, and have saved three-quarters of a day from New York."

"So I can," murmurs Mrs. Wallabout, clutching at her parcels with renewed energy, and hurrying off to the ticket-office. Mrs. Wallabout-angel is gone! and, by-the-by, is it not astonishing what a muddled race mere these same guardian-angels, and how attentive they are sure to prove to our evil genius, however absurd! The very first step brought this unprincipled principle out in its lie! He had said so! Mrs. Wallabout, "Via Albany" to state-rooms." There were no state-rooms to be taken. Mrs. Wallabout offered five, seven, ten dollars! The boat would not buy one.

"You can have a berth, ma'am," said the shrewdest, severely, evidently feeling that Mrs. Wallabout did not appreciate her blessings, "or you have will be plenty o folks that would be thankful for as much as that!" and though Mrs. Wallabout even then could have come back, she again declined the fate. Fate in the turban and meekly laid her bundles on the shelf, on which she was shortly to be packed away for the night, though she sighed to think that "Mr. Wallabout would disapprove more and more; he considered these crowded cabins so unhealthy!" and this evil genius pitilessly mocked.

Mrs. Wallabout went up on deck and sat down in the most remote place possible. Mrs. Wallabout was pretty—have I mentioned the fact?—and all unconsciously displayed a pair of trim little boots, resting on the round of a chair in front of her. A kind-hearted gentleman, seeing this pretty young woman discomfited by herself, took upon him to furnish her with an agreeable object of contemplation by marching up and down in her neighborhood, and testowing on her long and admiring glances. Mrs. Wallabout, waking up to the fact, grew rapidly uncomfortable, looked the other way, tried to feel indifferent, tried to look unconscious, wished Mr. Wallabout was there, and was sure he would think it highly improper. More ben-volent gentlemen paying under her hat-brim and darting at her perversity! Mrs. Wallabout at last settled herself to think what she had done to attract attention! wished she could box their ears—was sure if she was a man she would leave unprotected women in peace! remembered that Mr. Wallabout believed that no woman was ever annoyed by undressed attention who was not in a very disagreeable! and went down to the cabin, oppressed with a general sense of evilliness, and of Mr. Wallabout's disapprobation.

In the cabin—but prudence forbid that I should blot at what Mrs. Wallabout saw and heard that night, when frantic women without berth or stateroom strewed the floor like leaves in Vallombrosa! At the earliest dawn of day the kind-hearted lady was out on deck again, but was almost instantly driven below by more benevolent gentlemen, for whom she was now painfully interesting. The boat was late; also Mrs. Wallabout's bag was missing. Think of that, when Mr. Wallabout never lost sight of his bag! The implacable spirit had no consolation for her. "Can't answer for any thing, ma'am, that is left in the berths!" Mrs. Wallabout saw the dock-men seize them. They were very late, and her impatient little heart was fit to jump out of her bosom. She went over and over what she should do: how she would spring to the wharf the moment—no, the instant—that the boat touched; how she would run for life and the Jane Roseville boat; what streets she should take; what short cuts she could make. She had her shawl and her bundles on one arm, her ticket in her glove, and her umbrella ready for the start, and was quite worn out, dear little woman! with so much rapid mental exertion, when the St. John came in at her pier, just about an hour too late for the Jane Roseville boat. Mrs. Wallabout could have cried. What would Mr. Wallabout say? Say what he would, there was nothing now but to take the train. Where was the depôt? Mrs. Wallabout hired a man to show her the way—just ten steps—and she gave him fifty cents—five cents a step; and Mr. Wallabout disliked extravagance, though he was not pecunious; but this was a magnificent colored man, and he overawed Mrs. Wallabout, naturally timid, and now nervous and discouraged.

In the depôt a tall man eyed her earnestly. Mrs. Wallabout shrank away, thinking him one her benevolent gentlemen; and presently she discovered in him Mr. Pawlett. She knew Mr. Pawlett, and she was so tired of being alone that she seized on him almost as if he had been Mr. Wallabout himself. She handed him over her umbrella; she stood on him her parcels; she put him in her ticket in charge; she hung her shawl on his arm; and then she felt herself a free woman, and could have snapped her fingers at a host of benevolent gentlemen. For Pawlett, whether he was overawed with the bundles, or dazzled by Mrs. Wallabout—who can sort all the influences for her high-spirited sex—or was simply stupid, I am unable to state; the result was the same. They seated themselves in the car; they sat three hours and a half at the least; they looked about them; they could have corrected their mistake a dozen times. It is inconceivable that they should have taken the Harlem train; but they did it, and were well under way before they discovered their mistake. With such hesitation did Mr. Pawlett commit the fact to Mrs. Wallabout. Mrs. Wallabout made a wild movement, expressive of jumping out of the car window. She also devoted herself to herself whether or not to cry, and give Mr. Pawlett a piece of her mind, but concluded to do nothing of the kind—nurse in a new situation, and leaned back in her seat with a despairing "What will Mr. Wallabout say?" Pawlett laughed, but was very kind and generous. The conductor, very sympathizing except about the correspondence of the month, advised them to get out at the next station, take the train for Hudson, and wait there for the afternoon train.

Mrs. Wallabout heard in the silence of despair. "Wandering all over the country with a strange man! What was loss of train and bag to this? The next station consisted of a dispirited depôt and an intolerable grocery. Pawlett got ice in the water, and there were flies in the lemonade. What if they should meet Mr. Wallabout? Mr. Pawlett had just demonstrated that there was spiritual as well as physical storms. What if her moral mirror wind should blow her Mr. Wallabout? What if he should come on the platform at the corner? There was no consolation in a parasol. Mr. Wallabout would know the very swing of her dress-skirt. People could be known by the motion of their sky as quietly in the depôt; but then was not that like a detective? Suppose he should be in the Hudson train? And Mrs. Wallabout almost fainted over Mr. Pawlett. There was no slurring over the dreadful fact. Mr. Pawlett was a good-looking—yes, a handsome man, but he was simply not known in a lady might run away; and Mr. Wallabout was as strict in his notions of propriety. She wished the unconscious Pawlett at—not at a gentlemanly spot to make the situation tolerable, a hump and a squint —for that time only, and by particular request, of course.

Arrived at Hudson, worse yet. Mr. Wallabout had business at Hudson; others were there, and Mr. Wallabout was—yes, he was a little jealous. She heard his step a dozen times or more at dinner —that dreadful dinner, at which she could get rid of to the affliction of Pawlett. She would have liked to run away and hide her head under the bed-clothes, but Mr. Pawlett had insisted on her having had the drawing-room to themselves. Mrs. Wallabout sat down in a trouble. Why, was it not possible to say, "Mr. Pawlett, I am afraid of meeting Mr. Wallabout, who will never understand it, and I should like to be very quiet, and get down to the depôt?" Mrs. Wallabout was afraid to get rid of you, dear Mr. Pawlett, as fast as possible?"

Mr. Pawlett leaned over the piano. He fattered himself that he was playing very badly comfortable. Mrs. Wallabout commenced, and then—oh! Mrs. Wallabout's prophetic heart! in walked Mr. Wallabout. Pawlett continued playing. For Mrs. Wallabout a tingling, pricking sensation attacked her. Then she burst out in a cold perspiration. Then she fainted away, screaming that she had it! Pawlett say? What did Mr. Wallabout say? She could never have told you; but she knew what he said, and that was enough.

"I was afraid you would come."

There is no record left of Pawlett; but how pleasantly this decoy must have sounded in his ears, how soundest in his ears. Poor Pawlett! and poor Mrs. Wallabout, whom husband and wife were at last left together! Mr. Wallabout's reasoning that such reliance that demands explanation so much more significantly than words.

"I am very sorry," commenced the little woman, imploringly.

"That you met me? I suppose so."

"Sorry, Charles, you know—"

"How did you come here, Mrs. Wallabout?"

"I went to Albany."

"You went to Albany?"

"I was coming to June Roseville."

"And went fifty miles out of your route?"

"I had my dear, I lost the train, and the boat was late—"

"What boat?"

"The Albany boat. It was the last train—"

"The Albany boat was the last train? I should think it was—but the last you should have taken."

"But, Charles, I lost the last train to June Roseville, and I disliked to spend the night in New York, and I thought I could come down from Albany in the early morning, and the St. John was late; and I—we—I met Mr. Pawlett—"

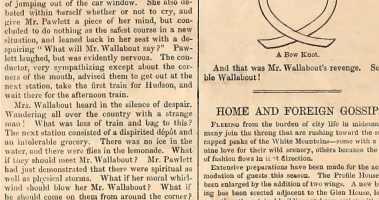
"I saw that you did."

"Well, if you won't hear me?"

"Am I not listening with all possible attention to hear what you and Mr. Pawlett were doing in Hudson?"

"We took the train—"

"To Hudson?"



"No—the Harlem train. We thought, we didn't know, we never—"

"And do you expect me to believe such a story as this?" interrupted Mr. Wallabout, sternly. "Why not make your story at least plausible. Say you came here to meet me or something of that sort."

"That was the very thing I dreaded," returned Mrs. Wallabout, naively. "I knew you would be angry, and it does sound improbable, but it is true; and isn't truth always stranger than fiction? and besides (brightening), even if you do think that, would tell a lie? I would be a goose to prefer Mr. Pawlett to you, don't you see?" clenching this notable argument by laying her little hand in his, with a positive appeal, that only a monster could have resisted.

Mr. Wallabout was not a monster. He looked long and fixedly at his wife, and then, with a covert smile, drew out a bit of paper and fell solemnly to work. Mrs. Wallabout watched him in an agony of apprehension. What could it be? a rough draft of articles of separation? Mr. Wallabout laid down his pencil, surveyed it critically, held it up; and this was what Mrs. Wallabout saw:

PLAN OF MRS. WALLABOUT'S JOURNEY TO JUNE ROSEVILLE, VIA ALBANY.

And that was Mr. Wallabout's revenge. Sensible Wallabout!

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

FLEEING from the burden of city life in midsummer, many join the throng that are rushing toward the mountain-ranges of the north in the direction of Lake George in search of relief from the heat and dust. Others become the tide of fashion flows in its hot direction.

Extensive preparations have been made for the accommodation of guests this season. The Profile House has been enlarged by the addition of two wings. A new building has been erected adjacent to the Glen House, larger even than the original building, and connecting with it by a covered passage-way. Sandwich Dome, an offshoot of Hitchcock, is crowded in size; and several other hotels in the vicinity have been materially enlarged and improved.

But travelers, rushing through on wings of steam, eager to reach the mountains of interest, whether that be the Tip Top House, Franconia Notch, The Flume, The Old Man of the Mountain, or the Willey-bowl," seldom give time or thought to the beauties of nature through which they fly. The usual route from New York takes in some fifty miles of the most charming scenery in the world, along the valley of the Connecticut River. If the tourist can spare a day or a night-bed, a drive of an hour or so will bring him to the head of Memphremagog, the scenes of which is by no means difficult. Indeed there is a carriage-path leading to the top of Owl's Head, the summit of this mountain the eye is delighted by a most lovely picture—the valley of the Connecticut, in all its luxuriant verdure, the river itself, glimmering like a thread in its circuitous wanderings through the green interstices. Still further on the journey may be broken at Lyons, Orford, or some town in that part of New Hampshire. Thence a carriage drive of a couple of hours across the country affords romantic mountain views, and will bring the traveler to pleasanter railroad route to the White Hills. Instead, however, of hastening forward to them, take a down train, dine at Plymouth—there is time enough—and then be afraid of meeting—they go on to Weirs, a little village on the borders of Lake Winnipesaukee. A little steamer, The Lady of the Lake, is in readiness, and an afternoon could not be more agreeably spent than in sailing on this lovely sheet of water. The lake is here studded with miniature islands, and the water is clear and pure. There is a good hotel at Weirs, and on the opposite shore visitors can find excellent accommodations. Although Lake Winnipesaukee is on one of the direct routes to the White Mountains, few tourists halt here, and the scenery is thus comparatively unknown. Take a carriage and drive to Meredith, a little village on the borders of Lake Winnipesaukee. Here is a most delightful excursion, supposing always that they were to be spent a leetry to stop and see with a really worth seeing. Tweezing "is a form" in any thing but enjoyable.

The Portland Press gives an incident of the recent fire there which exhibits to much nearness of zeal that we are almost ashamed to quote it. We do it in the firm belief that the "Fireman" spoken of was not an American:

"We hear of a creature in this city, which walks on two legs and wears a coat, and resembles a man. In fact the creature may be a man and belonging for his own employer while his father's house and his own effects were going to ashes. Until o'clock in the morning they kept on the shop reel, and by unremitting efforts saved it and the house in the rear of it from taking all night in a city of the magnitude of these and others men are sometimes thirsty. These men were dry, and applied to the creature to whose house and shop they had saved if he had any water. 'No,' the creature said, 'I have no water, but I have better, went down to the ice chest, pulled out several bottles of Hostetter's Bitters, poured in the pure a little water, tolerably clean, which had drained from the ice, mingled with it sugar and sliced lemons, and they tried these cooling drinks to the deserving crowd. Next day this creature was arrested, according to his deeds, and charged to him on the bones of the concern four bottles of beer, one bottle of wine, and a demijohn!"

Ice is one of the greatest luxuries of a hot day. Although sometimes the demand for it is in great on excessive warm days, yet it is not difficult to obtain it in some parts of the city, this is not owing to any scarcity of the article, but because of the limited facilities of delivering it. It is stated that the quantity of ice required for this market is about 250,000 tons per annum, of which about 50,000 tons are shipped to the Southern cities, the West Indies, and South America; and even Spain and Portugal have been purchasers to a small extent. To secure 250,000 tons for delivery in summer, it is necessary to put up in winter at least 500,000 tons, as the wastage is equal to one-half. A great deal of ice is put up in November, when the days are cooled to put down their meat in summer as well as in winter. Notwithstanding the immense quantities of ice required for this market, the dealers estimate that at least 100,000 tons will be left over this season. It may not generally be known that ice not used during the season for which it is intended is usually thrown away. If kept over it is not so good, become caked into a solid mass in the house, and can not be taken out with facility. It is found to be more economical to throw it away, and replace it with the fresh crop. The most extensive ice-houses, among the many from which our city is supplied, are at Rockland Lake, where there are two of these houses, each 250 feet long by 100 feet wide, and 50 feet high. Each is capable of holding 40,000 tons of ice.

One can scarcely help feeling that it was almost a just punishment which recently befell a man in Jersey City. He, like, one might attempt to frighten some girls by wrapping a white cloth around his body and personating a ghost. But his ruse was too true, who pulled out a revolver, and accurately fired six balls into his head and body. At the first shot the poor fellow fell, and the excitement of the men, who then went home and related the circumstances, and parties returning to the spot found life completely extinct, and the having put the dead to the former use, and the poor the region of the heart. The sympathy of the people toward the dog of the dead man has not been evinced.

"People about to marry," who wish to know the proper age, are referred to the following precedents: Adam and Eve, 0; Methuselah, 18; Ben Jonson, 21; Bacon, 24; Mozart, 25; Dante, Kepler, Fuller, Johnson, Burke, Steele, 29; Tycho Brahe, Byron, Washington, and Bonaparte, 31; Franklin and Sir Walter Scott, 35; Lamartine, Moore, 39; Chaucer, Hogarth, and Peel, 39; Wordsworth and Davy, 40; Goethe, 41; Sir Robert Walpole, 42; William Pitt, 31; Wilberforce, 38; Luther, 42; Addison, 44; Wesley and Young, 47; Swift, 48; Buffon, 56; Old Parr, last time, 120. If Adam and Eve married before they were a year old, and the veteran Parr buckled with a widow at 120, bachelor and spinsters may safely venture on the like, and find shelter under great names for either early or late marriages.

A Southern paper is responsible for the following:

One day a Mormon woman went to Brigham Young for counsel touching an alleged wrong of an officer of the church.

"Let me see, Sister—I forget your name."

"Why, don't you know the linguist reply." "Why, I am your wife!"

"What did I marry you?"

The woman informed the "President," who referred to an examination of the fact before they were

"Well, I believe you are right. I knew your face was familiar."

Every body is launching out in terrible denunciations against the "falsities" of woman. One writer says:

"Young gentlemen, lovely lambs, with a mass of gold curls covering her neck and shoulders, and with long ladies' dresses, are not girls. They are little fibbings, and then imagine, if you can, seeing one by one of the most badass disappear within the recess of a board cradle-box."

On the same subject the Mississippi Anchorage, delightfully applies "false colors" to "false eyelashes," "false hair," "plumpers," etc., remarks:

"Young gentlemen should keep on hand here as regards the ladies of their acction—they are all right, and need no artificial fairing; but we do advise them never to marry a woman till she has shed her eyelashes."

When you make a quotation be sure always to give the author his due. Many a good thing is lost or original is often greatly increased by so doing. For example:

Let not good or great content
Be higher and tall Highest,
Only for the best, the greatest
Labor and endeavor,
All the Year Round.

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime;
And departing, leave behind us,
Footprints on the sands of time,
By H. W. Longfellow.

Till I will could weep, for a time so sordid and mean,
And myself so lapsed and low!
A. Tennyson.

The mountain rill
Seeks with no surer flow the far lagoon
Than my unchanged affection flows to thee.
Park Benjamin.

Farewell! I've yet one solace left, which cheers my lonely hours,
And in that thought a thousand hopes are springing into life!
How beautiful the violan comes, smiled life's glittering lie shape—A Champagne bottle, and a box of fine cigars
From J. S. WALES.

The drying up a single tear has more
Of honest fame than shedding seas of gore
By Byron.

The girls are all a-fleeting slow
For some fellow's debris to follow;
Their smiles of joy, their tears of woe
Deceitful alike, unstable!
There's not one true in seven
Pages Papers.

But seen too oft, familiar to the face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace
Pope.

How guilt, once hardened in the conscious breast,
Intimidates the brave, degrades the great
Dr. Johnson.

But my friend is oh, so fine!
His legs seem'd taper'd to a line,
And I wrote 'mid anxious fears,
For I dread the thick of thin
From Harper's Magazine.

A wealthy old gentleman in Pittsburg, who had doubtless read with great interest the account of the most extravagant uncle ever suggest, awoke one morning a short time ago to find himself deserted. The dickie fair one and Storm, and Mrs. Storm behind in the distance, according to the trifle of $1000, and a note stating that the world was round and that he (Storm) would visit us in time of $20,000. She had taken the precaution to carry off her diamonds, and all her costly robes, together with a large sum of money which had been given her for her wrist.

Fortune is as fickle as fashion. A certain Mrr. Willart, of Hartford, an Englishwoman by birth, who has hitherto been in "affluent circumstances," has recently become the heiress of a large property, valued at $85,000,000. She, with her husband and children, are about starting for England to take possession of it. It is said she will return and make Hartford her permanent residence. When in full possession of her property, Mrs. Willart will probably be the richest woman in the United States.

A German professor of great learning, and patient in investigation, gives us some information, which he accepts as highly important for us to know. He asserts that an atom of oxygen under a glass is just two-hundred millionths of an inch in thickness, and that it weighs 15 ten-thousandths of a grain. And to think that for every inch of it there are a trifle we lambs $10,000,000,000,000 of them!

"Remarkable for delicacy, freshness, and purity."—BONNER'S unrivaled Coligny Water and Cologne for the Hair.—Christian Guardian, Toronto.

KELLEY & CO.'S GIFT ENTERPRISES.—The first to embark in the Gift Enterprise business in Chicago was the firm of S. A. KELLEY & Co., located at 103 Randolph st. Who does not remember their gift stores, which years ago or three years ago, where many purchased books and other articles, and were so lucky as to find in the envelopes tickets which entitled them to valuable gifts of jewelry or other prizes? Thousands of our citizens were thus fortunate, and therefore the best of evidence that Messrs. KELLEY & Co. always perform all they promise; that they are honorable men, and do business honorably and on the square. Their Concert which they now advertise, the drawing of which is to take place on the 23d of August, promises to be one of the most successful of the series of Gift Concerts that have taken place in Chicago.

1. The gifts to be distributed are all that they are represented to be. 2. The prizes will positively be distributed to those holding the lucky tickets after the drawing. 3. There is only a very large number of prizes that ever one's chances are decidedly in favor of drawing something. 4. The Concert, which S. A. KELLEY & CO. have confidence in their honor and integrity, and are eager to investigate to their entire satisfaction. These are some of the reasons why we feel safe in commending KELLEY & Co.'s Concert to the public. Let the people come forward and buy the tickets still remaining unsold. The drawing will positively take place on the day advertised. Tickets may be sent by mail for tickets, and will be promptly responded to.—Chicago Journal.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE.

Superior advantages in English, Classics, Science, Commercial, French, German, Piano Music, and Painting. Lawn Tennis, Croquet, Boating, and Military Drill for Gents. Eighteen Instructors. Term opens Sept. 19th.

Rev. MUNGO HAUGH, A.M., PRINCIPAL.
Claverack, Columbia Co., N. Y.

$5 SEWING $5 MACHINE.

FIRST PREMIUM and IMPROVED, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originality patented May 1, 1866. Improvement patented June 5, 1866. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with on-screw and bobbin, is complete in operation, sews with both of single thread at all kinds with extraordinary rapidity. Has self-regulating tension. Has no cog-wheels in the Wheel. Will gather, hem, ruffle, shirr, tuck, sew to and bind. Is the cheapest machine manufactured. Warranted not to get out of order in 5 years. It has received the approval of all the principal journals, and those who have used it.

"With simplicity double thread, it silently yet very rapidly does the stitching exactly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

Single machines, all complete, sent to any part of the country and safely packed in box, with printed instruction, on receipt of the price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Address all orders,

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY,
Office 102 Nassau Street, New York.

"The Mammoth Informer" given away to every body. Send stamp for it. Courtship made easy. 10 cents. Bridal etiquette, 15 cents. Laws of love, 30 cents.
W. C. WILKES, 208 Broadway, New York.

6000 AGENTS wanted to sell six new inventions, of great value to families; all pay great profit. $5 to $10 per day, and $1.80 pages, or 12 cts. and 32 pages a $3 sample gratis. Ephraim Brown, Lowell, Mass.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for $1. 100 Photographs of Rebel Generals for $1. 100 Photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cts.; 100 Actors for 25 cts. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N. Y.

DEMOREST'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE, universally acknowledged the model Parlor Magazine of America. Aug. number now ready. Sold everywhere.

100 PHOTOGRAPHS OF FEMALE BEAUTIES will be sent for 50 cents. SPANISH, ENGLISH, LIBERTINE, and ACTRESS. Address A. STAR, Station A, Box 59, New York city.

BABY-JUMPERS.—A new invention. Price $8. Beware of worthless imitations. 44 New York State Rights for circular to LEWIS S. TIBBALS, 478 Broadway, near Spring Street, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $10, $16, $23, and $30. Price of the office, with Press, $15, $28, $40, and $70. Send for a circular to the LOVE PRESS COMPANY, 22 Water Street, Boston.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

for Merchants, Druggists, and all wanting to print handy, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Davis & Co., Derby, Conn., or 10 cts. ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 24 Ann Street, New York, and 26 Lincoln Sq., Boston, Mass.

NEW PHYSIOGNOMY; or, "SIGNS OF CHARACTER," methodized through temperament and external forms, and in "The Human Face Divine," with over 1000 illustrations. Price, postpaid, $5. Address FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

"HOW "to Dress."—Whiskers in 6 weeks. Guessing extended. Fortune-telling. Ventriloquism. &c. 30 cts. each. Send for sample copy, postpaid. price $1. L. N. WELLS & CO., Publishers, 81 Park Row, New York.

Important to European Travellers.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST.

BY W. P. PETRIDGE.

A New and Revised Edition (the Fifth Year) of this Valuable Book will be ready in a few days.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BARTLETT & DEMOREST'S SEWING MACHINE, with valuable improvements. makes the Elastic Lock Stitch, and is in every particular the no plus ultra Agents wanted. Samples, $35. 472 Broadway, New York.

AGENTS WANTED for the Desideratum Holder for fastening neckties, looping up dress skirts, &c., &c. Our Agents, male and female, make $5 to $10 per day. Circular sent on receipt of stamp. Sold by C. Springfield, Mass.

INVEST ONLY ONE DOLLAR
FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE
PORTLAND SUFFERERS,
BY THE LATE DISASTROUS FIRE.
NEW YORK CHARITABLE GIFT CONCERT,
Irving Hall, New York, Monday Evening, September 24th, 1866.
Admission Ticket to One Dollar Each.

150,000 Tickets and 150,000 Gifts, being one to each purchaser of a Ticket.

The Gifts will be distributed by a Committee known by the subscribers as the ticket-holders may decide. GIFT SPECIAL NOTICE.—The net proceeds will be devoted to the relief of the Portland Sufferers, and will be handed over to the Mayor of Portland.

SUBJOINED LIST OF PRESENTS.—1 Present in Greenbacks, $25,000; 1 do in Greenbacks, $5000; 1 House and Lot in City of New York, $5000; 1 Lot in City of New York, $25 0; 1 Improved Farm, $1000; 1 Splendid Mahogany, $500; 3 Beautiful Gold Watches, $250 each, $750; 50 first-class Sewing Machines, $100 each, $5000; 1 Splendid Gift Tasting of Cut Glass, $300; 10 Beautiful Opera Glasses, $25 each, $1000. The balance to consist of the following: Diamond Rings and Breast Pins, Suits, Ladies' Work Boxes, Writing-Cases, Kid Gloves, Silver Tea Sets, Music Boxes, Splendid Gold Pens and Pencils, Photograph Albums, Musical Instruments, Parlor Furniture, Assorting Envelope Cards for Parlor Amusement, Engravings, and Card Photographs of distinguished Personages, &c., &c., $20,000.

CLUB RATES.—20 Tickets to one Address, $4 50; 50 Tickets, $17 50; 100 Tickets, $35; 250 Tickets, $80; 500 Tickets, $150; and 1000 Tickets, $285 00. Orders filled by express. Money can be sent in Post-Office Orders, Registered Letters or drafts, at our risk. Reliable Agents wanted in every town. Address

HITCHCOCK, WALKER & CO., New York Agents.

REFERENCES.—Frank Leslie, Esq., Johnson, Fry & Co., Cutler, Tower & Co., Berlin & Jones, New York; John W. Pye, Esq., Kennedy Miller, Esq., Portland, Me.; Bamford & Baldwin, Chicago, Ill.; Wells & Co., J. R. Hawley & Co., M. J. Levy & Co., Cincinnati.

To the Martyrs of Liver Complaint.

Among the wonderful medical properties which have rendered HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS preeminent among the health-restoring preparations of the age, its anti-bilious virtues are not the least remarkable. No words can do justice to its marvelous effect upon the diseased liver. Perhaps the simple words of a convalescent suffer, who, shaking off the yellow garb in which he recently lay, tells the story as clearly as may be. It does go right to the spot. It operates directly upon the disordered organ, and whether sudden activity or a state of paralysis, restores it to a condition of health. The Skin as at the Stomach, pain between the Shoulders and in the Right Side, the Sensation of the Nightmare, Unstrung Nerves, Nausea and Languor, Dimness of Sight, Colic, Palpitation of the Heart, Dry Cough, Low Fever, and other symptoms which indicate the various phases of Bilious and Chronic Liver Complaint, are one and all promptly relieved, and finally removed, by the action of this famous preparation. Which is at once the best corrective of fever, the quickest and most genial of aperients, an infallible regulator, and a powerful restorative. Persons of a bilious habit, who use the Bitters as a protective medicine, will never suffer the pains and penalties of Liver Disease or Bilious Remittent Fever.

MERWIN & BRAY,

262 BROADWAY,

MANUFACTURERS OF THE CELEBRATED BALLARD BREECH-LOADING RIFLES, MILITARY AND SPORTING STYLES.

These Rifles carry a round ball with the accuracy and penetration of a rifle, and the rapidity of a shot gun. They are unsurpassed for every purpose.

SOLE AGENTS

for the well-known Eagle Arms Co.'s Cartridge Revolvers, Belt and Pocket size. These Pistols require but four motions to load and discharge, a degree of perfection never before obtained. Are sure fire, and carry a much larger ball than any other revolver of the same weight and size. Also Agents for the Whitney Arms Co.'s Colt's model Revolvers, and the New York Metallic Ammunition Co.'s Copper Cartridge of every style and size.

Dealers in Arms and Ammunition of all Kinds. Illustrated Circulars furnished when desired.

262 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

TRADE MARK

OF THE

MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,

To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE. In all the goods of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and infringements on the patent of the Magic Ruffle Company. The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction to consumers. Office of the Company No. 95 Chambers street, New York.

Great $3.00 Sale

By the AMERICAN TRADE AGENCY, immediately organized, and determined to sustain their reputation as the small dealers in the city. Every article warranted as represented. Agents wanted every where. Agents receive reliable presents of valuable character. Valuable premiums guaranteed to every purchaser of our packages. Package $3 each, sent to all parts of the country. Send for circular to

BOARDMAN & CO., AGENTS,
125 Washington street, Boston.

Allcock's Porous PLASTERS.

WHOOPING-COUGH CURED.

Cayuga, Hinds Co., Miss.

T. ALLCOCK & CO.: Gentlemen,—Please send me another six dozen of your Porous Plasters. They are in great demand in this section of the Yazoo Country. They set like a charm. I could have sold two dozen this week if I had had them. Send as soon as possible, and oblige,

Yours, respectfully, JOHN L. WILLIAMS, P. M.

ASTHMA CURED.

Mr. Wm. Hoy, of 340 Spring Street, New York, writes, Jan. 1, 1866: I have been afflicted with asthma for upward of ten years, and have tried numerous remedies without avail. I was advised by a friend to try one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I said I had tried several kinds of plasters without any benefit whatever, and would not try them at all. My friend gave me one of Allcock's, and urged me to use it. I did so, and have now worn them steadily for nine months, and find myself entirely cured. I have been for many years Agency, Brandreth House, N. Y. Sold by Druggists.

NEW BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC

BY L. O. EMERSON.

THE JUBILATE, by the author of the "Harp of Judah," "Sabbath Harp," "Golden Wreath," &c., containing all the excellent features of his previous work with many new and attractive features. UNIVERSITY, WESLEAN, and TOWN COLLEGE COMMENCEMENTS, SOCIETIES, CONVENTIONS, and CHOIRS will find this the best book for many years. Price $1 38 a copy, on receipt of which it will be sent postpaid. For Orders, $15. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

HOME EMPLOYMENT.

A GOOD MAN WANTED in every Town and County in the United States to engage in a business that will last First-rate pay allowed. The only qualifications required are Good Integrity. Address with stamp, for particulars, Dr. O. PHELPS BROWN, No. 19 Grand st., Jersey City, N. J.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, BROOCHES, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and sent by mail or express, to suit you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every town and county. J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Large Profits

Can be made in the SPECIAL BUSINESS. Complete outfits of sold and silver plated goods furnished by J. E. METCALF & SON, 101 Union Street, Boston. Send for Circular.

WHISKERS!

DR. LAMONT'S CORDIALA will force Whiskers or Mustaches on the smoothest face or chin. Never known to fail. Sample for cold sent free. Address

REEVES & CO., 18 Nassau Street, New York.

AGENTS WANTED.

$2000 a year. Salary and Expenses to Male and Female Agents, to introduce a new and useful invention, absolutely needed in every household. Agents preferred to work or canvass in one town $2 to $50 per day. For particulars address at once H. WILCOX, Cleveland, Ohio.

GOLD PENS.

If you want a GOLD PEN, send to E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau St., N. Y., and by return mail receive circular showing styles and prices. Inquiring does at 50c. ea.

DEMOREST'S YOUNG AMERICA, a new Article and splendidly Illustrated Monthly Magazine for Boys and Girls, soon to be issued. Yearly, $1 50; each number, 15 cts. Address W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

Have selected the following kinds from their Stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show. All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

PRICE LIST.

YOUNG HYSON, 50c., 60c., 75., $1 00; best, $1 25 per lb.
GREEN TEAS, 50c., 60c., 75., $1 00; best, $1 25 per lb.
MIXED, 75c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 25 per lb.
JAPAN, 75., $1 00; best, $1 25 per lb.
OOLONG, 75c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 25 per lb.
IMPERIAL and GUNPOWDER, best, $1 25 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 50c., 60c., 75., $1 00; best $1 25 per lb.

All teas, villages, or manufactories where a large number of men are engaged, by canvassing together, can reduce the price of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to the

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
(Post-Office Box 5643.) 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church, New York.

For further particulars, getting up Clubs, &c., see Harper's Weekly, June 23, 1866.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

LIST OF NEW BOOKS,

Franklin Square, N. Y., August 1, 1866.

GEORGE ELIOT.

Felix Holt, the Radical. A Novel. By the Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

W. J. C. MOENS.

English Travellers and Italian Brigands. A Narrative of Capture and Captivity. With a Map and several Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE.

Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe and the East. Being a Guide through Great Britain and Ireland, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Spain, Russia, Denmark, and Sweden. With a Railroad Map, corrected up to 1866, and a Map embracing Colored Routes of Travel in the above Countries. Fifth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form. $7 50.

Rev. J. G. WOOD.

Homes Without Hands: Being a Description of the Habitations of Animals, Classed according to their Principle of Construction. With about 140 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 50. Half Morocco, $6 75.

NAPOLEON III.

History of Julius Cæsar. Vol. II. Superfine Edition. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

COLONEL MARCY, U.S.A.

Thirty Years of Army Life on the Border. Comprising Descriptions of the Indian Nomads of the Plains; Explorations of New Mexico; a Trip across the Rocky Mountains in the Winter; Descriptions of the Habits of Different Animals found in the West, and the Methods of Hunting them: with Incidents in the Life of Different Officers of the Army. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

AMBROSE SPENCER.

Andersonville Prison. A Narrative of Andersonville, drawn from the Evidence elicited on the Trial of Henry Wirz, the Jailer, by Order of Brigadier-General N. P. Chipman, Judge-Advocate. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

Lectures on the Study of History. Delivered in Oxford, 1859-61. To which is added a Lecture delivered before the New York Historical Society in December, 1864, on the University of Oxford. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DAVID and CHARLES LIVINGSTONE.

The Zambesi. Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi and its Tributaries; and of the Discovery of Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa. 1858-64. With Maps and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00. (Uniform with Livingstone's South Africa.)

COL. HARRY GILMOR.

Four Years in the Saddle. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

DR. GUERNSEY and MR. ALDEN.

Harper's Pictorial History of the Great Rebellion. Part I.: From the Beginning of the Conspiracy to the Close of the Peninsular Campaign of 1862. With more than Five Hundred Illustrations. (The Illustrations of each Campaign are given in large folio, each equivalent to 6 octavo pages. The Illustrations of the Second Part will be issued in Monthly Volumes.) Price $6 00, in Cloth, Gilt, with Beveled Edges. $7 00. Sent free by mail to Agents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR AUGUST, 1866.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $4 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or for $20 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements for their Magazine, at the following low rates:

One Page	$250 00
Half a Page	125 00
One Column	75 00

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$4 00
One Copy for Three Months	1 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, or for $20 00. Postage unnecessary in advance.

The Four Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Cloth Binding	$7 00 per Volume.
Half Morocco	10 00 "

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for inside, and Two Dollars per line for outside Advertisements, each insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

IN A BROADWAY STAGE.

POLITE BUT SARCASTIC YOUNG GENTLEMAN (who resigned his place to Fashionable Young Lady). "Had you any something, Madame?"

YOUNG LADY. "No, Sir."

GENTLEMAN. "Ah! Beg your pardon. I thought you said, 'Thank you!'"

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN
GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York.
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our personal attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

Snow-White Steel Shirt Collar,
$1; Cuff, $2; Bosom, $5. "Self-adapting." Patented April, 1865. Sent by mail. WILLCOX & FOGGAN, Inventors of the Machine and Manufacturers, Newton St., N.Y.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Canes, Revolving Rifles,
Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.
In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.
Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Ilion, N. Y.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING
B. T. BABBITT'S BEST MEDICINAL SALERATUS, "made from common salt." Breast made with this Saleratus equal to oven baked, nothing but common saltwater, in 1 hour. Nos. 64, 75, 66, 81, 68, 69, 70, 72 and 74 Washington street, New York.

GRAND NATIONAL CONCERT,
For the Benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home Fund, at Grover's Theatre, Washington, D. C., on Thursday Evening, August 9, 1866.
300,000 Tickets, at $1 each. 75,000 Presents, valued at $250,000, consisting of Fine Residences, Lots, Pianos, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silverware, &c., &c.
MANAGING DIRECTORS: Major H. A. HALL, President Soldiers' and Sailors' Union; Col. CHARLES CAPEHART, Major M. H. ALBRIGHT; WILLIAM S. NOURSE, TREASURER; Riggs & Co., Washington, Cashier National Bank of the Metropolis.
TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE, WASHINGTON, June 27, 1866.
Whereas H. A. Hall and others, as "managing directors of the "Internal Revenue Concert" to be held in Washington, D.C., on the 2d of August next, have applied to me for the license required by the 9th section of the act of June 30, 1864, to conduct a lottery for the distribution of certain property by lot or chance, and have furnished evidence that the proceeds of said lottery are to be appropriated to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home Fund, and have given the bond required by said section, with sureties satisfactory to me, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties required by said section, and have complied with the requirements of law in relation to said lottery, and have paid the special tax therefor: Now, therefore, I, E. A. ROLLINS, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, do hereby grant this license to said H. A. Hall and others, to conduct the lottery aforesaid, at the time and place above mentioned, and for the purposes above specified, and for no other purpose, and in no other manner, and at no other time or place, and subject to the provisions of the law aforesaid, and to the regulations of this office relative to lotteries.
E. A. ROLLINS, Commissioner.
WILLIAM S. NOURSE, Secretary,
Washington, D. C.
WE REFER, BY PERMISSION, TO
Major-Gen. Winfield S. Hancock, U.S.A.; Gen. Robert C. Schenck, M.C., Ohio; Gen. Hulbert E. Paine, M.C., Wis.; Gen. John H. Ketcham, M.C., N. Y.; Gen. Samuel Shellabarger, Gen. J. N. Haskell, Iowa; Gen. Ely S. Parker, U.S.A.; Gen. O. V. Dayton, N. Y.; Hon. Thos. W. Ferry, M.C., Mich.; Hon. George Lowrey, M.C., Penn.; D. C. Lothrop, Esq., D.C.; Major J. C. Doughty, N. Y.; Hon. Richard Wallach, Mayor, Washington, D.C.; Hon. Henry G. Deming, M.C., Conn.; Hon. Thos. C. Fitzpatrick, M.C., Ill.; Hon. Samuel J. Randall, M.C., Penn.; Hon. T. G. Pegram, M.C., N.Y.; Hon. Henry Winter, U.S.S.; Hon. Jas. Harlan, U.S.S.; Hon. E. F. Wad, U.S.S.; Hon. Rodney W. Whaley, M.C., West Va.; Hon. Wm. D. Kelley, M.C., Penn.; Hon. A. G. Hall, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. Leonard Myers, M.C., Penn.; Hon. William A. Newell, M.C., N. J.; Hon. George W. Julian, M.C., Ind.; Hon. Reuben E. Wilson, M.C., Penn.; Hon. J. B. Grinnell, M.C., Iowa; Major G. M. Van Buren, N. Y.; Gen. H. B. Hoyes, M.C., Ohio; Hon. S. T. Hulmer, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. G. E. Latham, M.C., West Va.; Hon. James A. Norvin, M.C., N.Y.; Hon. Thomas T. Davis, M.C., N.Y.
All orders must be addressed, with stamps enclosed, to Lock Box 37,
Washington, D. C.
Tickets sold by G. M. VAN BUREN & CO., 254 Broadway, New York.

PEABODY'S BREECH-LOADING MUSKETS, CARBINES, AND SPORTING RIFLES,
FOR METALLIC CARTRIDGES,
MANUFACTURED BY THE
PROVIDENCE TOOL COMPANY,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
These arms are made in the most perfect manner, are interchangeable in all their parts, and are unequalled for symmetrical appearance, simplicity, accuracy of fire, and strength. They have been received with unmistakable favor in our own and several other countries, and can now be supplied in large numbers. Send for descriptive pamphlet and illustrated price-lists, printed in English, French, German, or Spanish.

POLLAK & SON Meerschaum Manufacturers, 502 Broadway, near 4th st., N.Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes $4 to $80 each.

Dr. Foote's Advertisements.
OLD EYES MADE NEW, without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.
COMFORT AND CURE FOR THE RUPTURED.—Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.
MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.—400 pages—100 Illustrations. $1.50. Sent by mail every where postpaid. Contents Tables sent free. Address the Author, E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

Mosquito Nets
WITH PATENT POLTABLE FRAMES.
G. L. & J. B. KELTY, 447 Broadway.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL POMADE
The best hair restorer and dressing. Sold by druggists.

CROSBY OPERA-HOUSE.
GRAND ART ASSOCIATION.
The Association will, upon the first of October next, award to its members
Three Hundred and Two Premiums,
Such as have never before been offered to their subscribers by any National Art Union.
FIRST GRAND PREMIUM,
THE CROSBY OPERA-HOUSE.
COST OF ERECTION AND ACTUAL VALUE, $600,000.
SECOND PREMIUM: BIERSTADT'S Great Work, entitled "The Yo Semite Valley." Valued at $20,000.
THIRD PREMIUM: CROPSEY'S Great work, entitled "An American Autumn." Valued at $8 00.
FOURTH PREMIUM: BUSSLER'S Great National Painting of the American Authors, entitled "Washington Irving and his Friends." Valued at $5000.
FIFTH PREMIUM: HART'S charming and celebrated painting of American Scenery, entitled "Woods in Autumn." Valued at $5000.
SIXTH PREMIUM: CONSTANT MEYER'S celebrated Painting, entitled "Recognition." Valued at $5000.
SEVENTH PREMIUM: BEARD'S great Western Landscape, entitled "Dred on the Prairie." Valued at $4000.
EIGHTH PREMIUM: GIGNOUX'S magnificent Picture, entitled "Alpine Scenery." Valued at $3000.
NINTH PREMIUM: VOLK'S splendid Bust (from the life) of Abraham Lincoln. Valued at $2000.
AND ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SEVEN WORKS BY THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS ARE:
Bierstadt, Beard, Bradford, Church, Cropsey, Cadwell, Coleman, Dana, Gignoux, Sanford R. Gifford, James M. Hart, Huntington, William Hart, Geo. H. Hall, Hubbard, Hoe Ives, Jones, Constant Johnson, Kensett, Lentz, Lafarge, Lambdin, Constant Meyer, McEntee, E. Moran, fort sensel, shattuck, sonntag, Suit, Edwin White, Will Jansen, Ghent, Lang, Gourney subers, full catalogue of which will soon be issued announcing to PURCHASERS NAMED IN Whitridge, the following Sub-scription Books will be closed on SATURDAY, the 22d of SEPTEMBER, 1866, and on the FIRST of OCTOBER following the award of Premiums will be publicly made at the Opera-House.
DETAILS OF THE DRAWING.—The Subscription Books, on being closed, will be placed in the hands of the following gentlemen, who have kindly consented to act as the Committee to conduct the award of Premiums: WM. F. COGSWELL, Pres't Union Nat. Bank; JAMES T. HALL, Treas. C. & H. Q. R. R. R. Co.; H. D. HALL, Hall, Kimbrek & Co.; GILMORE BINGHAM, Ewing, Fridge & Co.; J. C. DORR, Pres't of Mechanics' Bank; JAMES H. BOWLING, Pres't Nat. Bank; JAMES C. FARGO, Sup't American Express; THOMAS E. DUNCAN, Engraver; I. V. SIMMS, Mason & Scott, Elevator; J. A. HALES, Pres't Second Nat. Bank. THOSE gentlemen, together with each other from different parts of the country as they may select in their number for the purpose of fairly and equally distributing the shareholders at large, will have the sole management of the award as will in detail.
The plan of the award reduced to the following: Two hundred and two thousand numbers, representing the certificates issued, will be placed in one wheel, and three hundred and two tickets, inscribed with the names of the premiums to wit, the Opera-House, three hundred paintings, and the bust of Lincoln, will be placed in another. From these wheels a number and a premium will be drawn simultaneously, the number drawn, in each instance, taking the premium drawn with it. The Premiums will be ready for Delivery immediately upon the result of the award being known; and the person by whom the First Premium is drawn will receive a Conveyance in fee of an Unencumbered Title to the Crosby Opera-House, subject only to the existing leases, the rents to accrue to the party to whom the property shall be awarded from the day upon which the drawing takes place. Information relative to the title and legal arrangements will be furnished on application at the real estate office of Messrs. Isaac & Lyall, Chicago.
CERTIFICATES, FIVE DOLLARS.
NOTICE.—To those persons who wish to secure particular numbers, the Actuary desires to say that it is found to be impossible to fill orders for certificates otherwise than in regular rotation. The certificates are divided between the principal sales in Chicago and New York—one-half being in New York—and the remainder will continue to be kept for sale in the New York office, from which they are distributed to sub-agents in every town, city and town. To one retained here one hundred are sold in other towns from New York and Chicago, will be placed in another. From these wheels a number and a premium will be drawn simultaneously, the number drawn, in each instance, taking the premium drawn with it. The Premiums will be ready for Delivery immediately upon the result of the award being known; and the person by whom the First Premium is drawn will receive a Conveyance in fee of an Unencumbered Title to the Crosby Opera-House, subject only to the existing leases, the rents to accrue to the party to whom the property shall be awarded from the day upon which the drawing takes place. Information relative to the title and legal arrangements will be furnished on application at the real estate office of Messrs. Isaac & Lyall, Chicago.
CERTIFICATES, FIVE DOLLARS.
NOTICE.—To those persons who wish to secure particular numbers, the Actuary desires to say that it is found to be impossible to fill orders for certificates otherwise than in regular rotation. The certificates are divided between the principal sales in Chicago and New York—one-half being in New York—and the remainder will continue to be kept for sale in the New York office, from which they are distributed to sub-agents in every town, city and town. To one retained here one hundred are sold in other towns from New York and Chicago, will be placed in another. From these wheels a number and a premium will be drawn simultaneously, the number drawn, in each instance, taking the premium drawn with it. The Premiums will be ready for Delivery immediately upon the result of the award being known; and the person by whom the First Premium is drawn will receive a Conveyance in fee of an Unencumbered Title to the Crosby Opera-House, subject only to the existing leases, the rents to accrue to the party to whom the property shall be awarded from the day upon which the drawing takes place. Information relative to the title and legal arrangements will be furnished on application at the real estate office of Messrs. Isaac & Lyall, Chicago.
And different in other to 6 Broadway, And 472 Grand or Opera House, Chicago, Illinois.
NOTICE.—In ordering certificates please name nearest agency desired. Send draft, post-office money orders, or greenbacks, with address of nearest agency, and receive carefully return by express. Every effort is fully regular.
All orders for certificates and communications should be addressed to U. H. CROSBY, Actuary, A. A., And different in other to 6 Broadway, And 472 Grand or Opera House, Chicago, Illinois.
SPECIAL CARE.—The Crosby Opera-House Art Association is no gift enterprise, and must not be confounded with Dollar Gift Concerts which have been advertised to take place at the Opera-House without the authority or consent of the Proprietors.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.
CAPITAL PRIZE 30,000 DOLLARS.
THE NORTH AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT
Will positive by be given at
WABASH AVENUE RINK, CHICAGO, ILL., August 22, 1866.
THE FIRST PRIZE CONCERT TO BE GIVEN IN THE UNITED STATES.
NO POSTPONEMENT.
$50,000 Valuable Prizes, valued at $500,000, will be presented to Ticket-Holders, Including $100,000 in Greenbacks.
The time rapidly approaches, and the books will be closed on the 22d day of August.
With the help of our numerous agents, located all over the United States, we have reason to believe that every ticket will be sold before the day designated.
Number of Tickets Issued, 500,000. Price, One Dollar.
This is the grandest Inducement ever offered to the people of the United States.
EVERY OTHER TICKET DRAWS A PRIZE.

1	Gift in Greenbacks	$50,000
1	do. do.	10,00
1	do. do.	5,000
1	do. do.	4,000
1	do. do.	3,000
1	do. do.	2,000
10	Gifts in Greenbacks, $1000 each	10,000
20	do. do. 500 each	10,00
20	do. do. 100 each	2 00
20	do. do. 50 each	1,000
800	do. do. 10 each	8,00
1,000	do. do. 5 each	5,0-0
1	Gift, Residence in Chicago	25,000
1	Gift, Lot in Chicago, $5000 each	5 000
20	do. Piano, $500 each	10,000
20	do. Melodeon, $250 each	5,000
100	do. Ribbon, $20 each	2,000
200	do. Gold Watches, $150 each	30,00
200	do. do. 100 each	10,00
200	do. Silver Watches, 50 each	10,000
800	do. do. 40 each	12,000
1,000	Sets of Plated Teaspoons, $3 each	3,000
1,000	Gift Bells, $3 each	2,0 0
1,000	Plated Fruit Knives, $3 each	3,000
2,000	Gold Pens in Pens, $4 each	8,000
2,000	Photograph Albums, $4 each	8,000
2,000	Gold Pen Holders, $5 each	10,000
	229,043 Gifts	Worth $278,045.

The drawing will take place after the concert, where 50,000 persons can witness it. A committee will be appointed by the audience to take charge of the drawing. All agents and persons selling tickets will receive a certificate of the drawing as soon as published. Tickets are for sale at the principal News Agencies, Hotels, and Book-Stores, and at our office, 105 Randolph St. Ticket, $1 each; sent by mail on receipt of price, and seven stamps for return postage.
Great inducements offered to AGENTS, who are wanted every where. Write for our terms at once.
SPECIAL.—Purchasers of SEALED BANK-NOTE Tickets to one address for $4 5; 10 tickets, $7 50; 20 tickets, $13 50; 40 tickets, $25 25; 44 tickets, $25 01; 50 tickets, $31 50. In every case send the name of each subscriber and their Post-Office address in full. Gift, lock-office order, express, or in registered letter. Address as follows:
REFERENCES: Hon. John Wentworth, Chicago, Ill.; Gen. Benj. F. Butler, Lowell, Mass.; Lot U. Wilford, Wholesale Jeweler, Chicago; J. B. Ingersoll & Co., Publishers, Philadelphia; J. M. T. Gobrecht & Co., Wholesale Jewelers, Chicago; John E. Potter & Co., Publishers, Philadelphia, Pa.; James L. Harlem, Importer, New York; Van Valkenburgh & Co., Importers, New York; Hon. Schuyler Colfax; Hon. Holmes Conklin; Hon. Schuyler Colfax; Hon. Thurlow Weed; Hon. Horace Greeley, Publishers, Boston, Mass.
All communications should be addressed to A. A. KELLEY & CO., 105 Randolph St., Chicago (P. O. Drawer 1734).
☞ Proposals solicited from country papers for publishing this advertisement for one month.

50 PER-CENT SAVED MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP.
USING B. T. BABBITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH, and SAL-SODA MANUFACTURED. It does double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. The up in cans of 1 pound, 2 pounds, 3 pounds, 4 pounds, and 12 pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making hard and soft Soap. One pound will make 15 gallons of Soft Soap. No time is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.
B. T. BABBITT, Nos. 64, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS.
And others will find it to their interest to call on all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 65 Broadway.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

$200 A MONTH IS BEING MADE with our DU-PLEX PROVED STENCIL DIES, by Ladies and Gentlemen. Send for our free Illustrated Circular, containing samples and prices. Address
S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—No. 503.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 18, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

THE cable thus far works with success, but the means of communication between our great cities and Heart's Content are provokingly inadequate, and are not to be relied upon for promptness. This difficulty will soon be remedied, and then we shall be able to read in the morning papers all the important European news of the previous day. At the office in this city, of which we give an illustration on this page, telegrams for Europe are daily received at an expense to the sender of about a dollar a letter. Already the monetary quotations in this city and London are becoming equalized, and the uncertainty and suspense which have hitherto acted as disturbant elements are being obviated.

CITY AND VALLEY OF THE GREAT SALT LAKE.

WE present our readers with a panoramic view of GREAT SALT LAKE CITY and the VALLEY OF THE GREAT SALT LAKE, taken from a point north of that city, and embracing all the table land south of it, for a distance of more than twenty miles, where the mountains bound the horizon.

Great Salt Lake Valley is about 30 miles long from north to south, and from 20 to 25 miles from east to west. On the east it is bounded by the Wahsatch Mountains, and on the opposite side by the Oquirrh, or West Mountain Range. The highest peak of the mountains surrounding the valley is about 11,500 feet high, and is said to be covered with perpetual snow.

The mountain in the distance, in the centre of the picture, is 36 miles from the city, and forms part of a chain that lies west of Utah Lake. The lower chain seen nearer is the "Divide," over which is the principally traveled road to California via Nevada.

The Jordan River passes between the two distant points in the centre south of this view, and flows past the city, and empties its fresh water into the Salt Lake. Very fine trout and other fish are caught in the Jordan. The Great Salt Lake is about 16 miles northwest of the city, the northern part of the West Mountains terminating abruptly near its shores.

The cultivated lands in this valley are to the south and west of the city, on the borders of the different streams that rush down the mountain gorges or cañons to the Jordan. The waters of the City Creek, north of the city, are used for domestic purposes. The other streams adjoining the city are called Red Butte, Emigration, Parley's, Mill, Big Cottonwood, and Little Cottonwood Creeks; and the roads leading for the supplies of fire-wood and lumber are made on the sides of the different streams.

The principal entrances to the Valley of the Great Salt Lake are through Parley's and Emigration cañons, and all travelers agree that the view, on reaching "the Bench" from these cañons, is one of surpassing beauty and grandeur, showing at once the city, the valley, the glittering face of the famous Salt Lake in the distance, and the chain of mountains bounding the whole panoramic landscape stretching out before them.

Great Salt Lake City is divided into 21 wards, and is, from east to west, about 3 miles long, by 2 from north to south. Each ward has its school-house, sustained by voluntary contributions. A law, however, has recently been passed authorizing each school district to impose a tax for the maintenance of a free school; and in no case is a child denied admission to the schools whose parents are unable to pay for their schooling—in such cases the Ward Fund is drawn upon. The books in common use in the schools of the Territory are WELLSON'S, RAY'S, and M'GUFFEY'S. The population of Great Salt Lake City is upward of 20,000 persons.

There are some very fine buildings fast springing up in the city, and within the last six years, in this particular, the place has made astonishing progress. In fact, within that period East Temple Street, or Main Street frequently called, has been almost rebuilt, and is now filling up with imposing-looking stores and banking establishments. The principal stores are those of W. S. GODBE, WM. JENNINGS, KIMBALL & LAWRENCE, WALKER BROTHERS, and WOODMANSEE'S. GODBE'S store is palatial in appearance, and when the ideality of its architect finds its elaboration in the finish of ornamental plastering, above the rock-cut basement it will present a still more imposing appearance. Mr. JENNINGS'S store, on the opposite side, has a solider magnificence; and KIMBALL & LAWRENCE, WALKER BROTHERS, and others, are equal to many in the Eastern States. Then there is the new City Hall, the Theatre, and on the outskirts there are some splendid private residences. These are all the growth of the last six years.

OFFICE OF THE AMERICAN TELEGRAPH COMPANY, CORNER OF BROADWAY AND LIBERTY STREET, NEW YORK—TELEGRAMS FOR EUROPE.

In the fore-ground of the picture is the residence of President BRIGHAM YOUNG. The large square building south of it is the grand theatre, capable of seating about 2000 persons; it is pronounced by visitors far superior to any theatre on the Pacific slope, and equaled by few in the East.

The large building, in the course of erection on the Temple Block, is the new tabernacle, designed to hold from 12,000 to 15,000 persons, and it will be 250 feet long, 180 wide, and 80 feet high. The foundation of the Temple lies to the east of it. This Temple will be 150 feet long by 125 wide, with six towers, as seen in the engraving from the architect's plan.

Great Salt Lake City abounds with very fine gardens, and large quantities of choice fruit are raised. Peaches, apples, apricots, pears, apples, grapes, and all the various kinds of small fruits are cultivated in great abundance.

Great Salt Lake City, from the Bench view, as it first meets the eye of the visitor, is seen looking out as from a forest of fruit trees. Irrigation is the only reliable source of watering the farms and gardens; and the waters of City Creek are conducted down the sides of each street, and ditches are cut to lead the water into each lot.

"The Pioneers," about 148 chosen Mormons, entered the valley under the leadership of "President" BRIGHAM YOUNG, on the 24th of July, 1847, nineteen years ago. To their indefatigable labors, untiring industry, a new world has been opened to colonization and commerce, and in a few years more the railway will open up the Rocky Mountains to the tourists, will, doubtless, for a time at least, make Salt Lake City the Jerusalem of the West; as the Mormons in their earliest days were free to call their favorite city.

We can not close this notice without adding that with whatever differences of opinion may be entertained of the Mormon faith, the great virtue of labor can not be denied to the Mormon population; and high admiration is universally expressed of the executive ability of BRIGHAM YOUNG, who has redeemed the wilderness, made it a fruitful field, and "made the desert to blossom as a rose."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 18, 1866.

THE MASSACRE IN NEW ORLEANS.

THE late tragedy in New Orleans, terrible as it was, will be of the most salutary effect. Thirty years ago slavery shot Lovejoy in Alton for defending the right of free speech. Year after year slavery insulted, threatened, and mobbed Northern men for preaching the Declaration of Independence. For five and six years past slavery has exiled, tortured, hung, and burned Southern men for fidelity to the Union. But the sure mills of God grind slowly on, and slavery is abolished.

We have entered upon a new era. Already men are shot by stealth in the late slave States because they declare justice to be the best policy. Already school-houses are burned and teachers hunted away because they seek to enlighten the minds which slavery had darkened. Already the New York World and the other Northern lackeys of slavery denounce Southern men who were true to the Union through fire and flood as "cravens and cowards." In Memphis hatred of the principle of equal rights before the law massacres the most friendless and unfortunate part of the population. In New Orleans the advocates of the same principle, meeting to discuss the subject, are forcibly murdered. But still the slow mills of God grind on. The seed of equal rights will be watered, not drowned, by the blood of the sowers. It will surely grow into a harvest which no storm can destroy. It will be the natural fruit of national peace and prosperity; and in the happy day of its ripening those who sought to destroy the seed, whatever their station, whatever their temporary power, will be remembered only as the murderers of LOVEJOY and the assassin of LINCOLN are remembered.

It is of no importance whether the members of the Louisiana Convention of 1864 were wise or unwise, fanatical or moderate. Any body of men, any where in the country, have the unquestionable right of assembling under any call whatever to consider public affairs. The desire of discussion is their authority. Any number of citizens of the State of New York may lawfully meet where in the State to propose a new Constitution. One man alone may lawfully proclaim a new Constitution. There is no law upon debate or against proposition of any kind, however sweeping or radical they may be. But when men proceed from debating to enforcing their propositions they become amenable to the law and must answer for their overt acts. The Secession Conventions of 1860-61 were properly tolerated as the dangerous aspirations of the abolitionists had been previously properly tolerated. The Fenian meetings to found an Irish republic were perfectly lawful. But when the secessionists passed from declarations to deeds, and fired upon the forts, and seized the navy-yards, and stole custom-houses; and when the Fenians attempted with arms to make war upon a peaceful neighbor, the United States justly interfered.

The President knew, as every body else knew, the inflamed condition of the city of New Orleans. He had read, as we have all read, the fiery speeches of both parties. He knew, unless he had chosen willfully to ignore, the smothered hatred of the late rebels toward the Union men of every color. He may have considered the "Conservatives" wise, humane, and peaceful. He may have thought the Radicals wild and foolish. He knew that the Mayor was a bitter rebel, whom he had pardoned into office. He knew that the courts had denounced the Convention, and he was expressly informed that they intended to indict the members. He could not affect ignorance of the imminent danger of rioting and bloodshed. Still, if, as a matter solely within Louisiana is rightfully in the same relation to the Union that New York is, he had no authority to say a word or to do an act in that State except "on application of the Legislature or of the Executive when the Legislature can not be convened." Why did he presume, then, to judge of the authority of the Convention? Why was the President of the United States to do with the manner in which delegates to a State Convention are selected? If his own assertion be correct that to the present relation of Louisiana to the Union, the President convicts himself of the most extraordinary and passionate act of executive usurpation and federal encroachment upon the part of our history.

If, however, he had any right whatever to intervene in the absence of a demand from the Legislature or the Governor, it was derived from the fact that Louisiana is held by the military power of the United States, in which case her present relation to the Union is not what the President declares it to be, and the same law and absolute power to do in that State whatever is necessary to keep the peace. This we know, as he knew his own existence, that a single word to the military commander to preserve the peace at all hazards would prevent disorder and save lives. He did not speak that word. Assuming to plant himself upon the Constitution, which by his very act he violated, he telegraphed to the Attorney-General of the State. He threw his whole weight upon the side of those from whom he knew by the nature of things the disorder would proceed, and from whom it did proceed. He knew the city was tinder, and he threw it the fire-brand. He knew better and every disloyal ruffian knew from the President's dispatch that the right of the citizens to assemble and declare their views would not be protected. The Mayor of the metropolis was a secret but distinct invitation to riot. He announced to a city seething with passionate hatred of the Convention, that he would "receive no countenance from the President." It was simply saying, "The Convention is at your mercy."

And the mob so understood it. A procession of negroes carrying a United States flag was attacked. It defended itself; and the word which one word from the President would have stopped, and which in the full authority to speak if he could speak at all, went on to its awful result. The rebel flag was again unfurled. The men who had bravely resisted it for four years were murdered under its encouragement, and while they were still lying warm in their blood the President telegraphed that they were "an unauthorized body," and that "usurpation will not be tolerated"—words which he had no shadow of authority to utter except by the same right which usurped him to leave all those lives; a right which he declined to exercise.

The President, who has undertaken by his own arbitrary will to reconstruct the States in the war without consultation with the representatives of the people, says to the murdered men in New Orleans, "Why did you assemble peaceably without obtaining the consent of the people?" The autumn elections will terribly echo that question. Surveying the Executive action of eighteen months, its plain tone of cynics and apparent inspiration, seeing that it has left the President with no other party than the most vehement of the late rebels of the South, the Copperheads of the North, and the timid and trimming adherents of the Union party, while the great mass of sturdy Unionists in all parts of the country are left without leadership, and the ground they have always held, those Union men will write upon the back of every ballot they cast at the coming elections, "Usurpation will not be tolerated" and upon its face, "Why did you assume to act without obtaining the consent of the people?"

THE FALL OF A "GREAT POWER."

THE first message by the Atlantic telegraph was beautiful and appropriate, for it was a message of peace. It was also of signal historical importance, for it announced the fate of the Austrian empire. We said last week that we anticipated further war, unless Europe should insist upon the reduction of Austria as a Great Power. The news is that war has ceased, and ceased upon what seems to us the condition we named. For BISMARCK certainly began the war to weaken AUSTRIA. He has been marvelously successful in the field, and Austria consents to peace upon the terms he dictates. A campaign of less than a month has expelled Austria from Italy, and stripped her from Germany. It has reduced her population by nearly one-sixth, and of that which remains nearly one-half is German, which will naturally lean toward Germany and be a discordant element among the Sclavonians and Magyars, which make up the rest of the population.

A "Great Power," which declines to enter a Congress that wishes to divide her territory and submits the question to the sword, and which virtually by one great battle is then forced to yield and submit to division—forced to surrender a province of 5,000,000 of inhabitants, and withdraw entirely from the Confederation of states of which she was the honorary head—is too sorely humiliated both in her own eyes and in the view of the world to be considered the same Great Power that she has been. Mr. GLADSTONE, indeed, says that she ought to be comforted; that she will still retain 33,000,000 of people; that she will have fertile countries; that she will still have vast spaces of undeveloped territory, and that although she has not much sea-coast, still it would be hard to insist upon depriving her of Trieste. But is this the way to speak of a "Great Power?" If France should force England to relinquish Ireland, and compel her to agree not to enter future European Congresses, and a Spanish statesman, commenting upon the situation, should say that it would be hard to insist that England should give up Ireland, would Mr. GLADSTONE, or any Englishman, be consoled by hearing that England still retained Scotland and Wales, and might devote herself to binding more closely by her good influence the feal that En-gland was still a "Great Power" or a power upon sufferance?

Lord STANLEY, the new British Foreign Secretary, evidently anticipates the erection of "a strong, compact empire extending over North Germany." He does not call it by the name of Prussia, but by that it will come a German body with a Prussian head. This power in Middle Europe, with Italy as an ally, will certainly not be less formidable than France. Germany, France, and Italy, with England, would then be a natural alliance against Russia. Austria might be an advanced-guard of Russia, but that is not to be a "Great Power." There are ever gently, therefore, the case may be stated, it seems to be clear that the battle of Sadowa was a fatal blow to Austria; while the armistice agreed upon with the enemy was within striking distance of Vienna, and the entire acceptance of his terms—if the news be true—reveals a consciousness of impotence which is an utter moral defeat.

Yet under this heavy blow Austria sinks with little sympathy or sorrow from the world. For in the world's history Austria has done little for religious liberty, nor literature, nor art, nor science, have been enlarged or illustrated by her fostering care. She has been a "Great Power" by force. She has overrun provinces and held them by military despotism. By bayonets, prisons, and terror she has maintained dislike between the various and alien peoples. The empire has been a camp. Its law was the sword; and if it falls, it falls as despots fall who have lived by blood and rapine.

THE PERFORMANCE AT PHILADELPHIA.

MR. HERRON, of New Orleans, writes to the Chairman of the Democratic State Committee of Louisiana, declining seeing the massacre, he declines to serve as a delegate to the Philadelphia Convention. It is not surprising. There was a roar which fired upon the Congress or upon the members of the Convention who does not belong to the party of the Philadelphia Convention. The "Union" represented on this party is the party which states in Philadelphia is drawn exclusively from the Union men who "hate niggers" and scorn equal rights. They denounce Congress because Congress refuses to allow them to count in the basis of their representation the "niggers" whom they despise. They claim to be "conservative," because in South Carolina and in South Carolina shall have as much power at the polls as two or three voters in Illinois. They swear at Congress as "radical," because it demands fidelity. They go to Philadelphia, shouting Union men on the way, because they know that they shall meet in the Convention VALLANDIGHAM with the Union flag, and JEREMIAH BENDO WOOD, who apologized to ROBERT TOOMBS because he could not send him arms to fire upon Union men. They are coming to the Convention because they hope to rule it, and, with its assistance, to rule the country.

We are very glad they are coming. We anticipate with great pleasure the spectacle of their assembly. It will be edifying to see MR. VALLANDIGHAM with his foot upon the flag, and General DIX with his arms around his neck whispering fondly, "If any man hauls down the flag, shoot him on the spot." It will be suggestive to observe AUGUST BELMONT, who allowed a young Englishman to wear a rebel badge in his house, graciously patronizing the neophyte SEWARD, who at last owns that Tammany Hall is the only true Union League; and the genial JOHN MORRISSEY putting THURLOW WEED in his pocket; and ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, a paroled prisoner of the Government, who still justifies the constitutionality of secession, teaching Postmaster-General RANDALL the alphabet of constitutional Union.

We have never doubted what the result of this Convention would be. It will be either nothing or the reorganization of the Democratic party. MR. WEED and MR. RANDALL and General DIX and MR. SEWARD will act with the Democrats in the autumn elections, or they will return to the Union party. If they attempt a different course they will be mere by a second-hand FILLMORE performance of 1856. If they sustain the Democratic party, which has no more intention of disbanding itself than a snake of committing suicide, they will support a policy dictated by those who, like MR. STEPHENS, hold the doctrine of constitutional secession, and who believe that neutrality is impossible while a seventh of the population are excluded from all political power, and one section of the country is politically subjected to the other.

As for purging the Convention, it is simply impossible. Every body will come except the earnest and intelligent Union men of the country. Such men from the North and South and East and West are not expected nor invited. It is a Convention of those who oppose Congress, and who hold a low view of Mormons, of New Orleans, is a truer Union man than ANDREW J. HAMILTON, of TEXAS. From such a body how can MR. VALLANDIGHAM be excluded? He hates Abolitionists and Radicals as much as he; he defends the President and JEFFERSON DAVIS; believes in the equal rights of the States, and despises those who of the people of the States of any sort of an improper complexion. What more would a "Conservative Union" Convention have? The test question must be, in the nature of the case, what sort of a Union man is a man's Unionism. And the proofs in every case will be the same. "Do you go for putting down Radicals and 'niggers?'" is the "Do you love the Union according to Delegate STEPHENS?" "I do." "Pass in."

And when once in, the positive and not the negative element will control. How will the MR. HERRONS scaled "with their perfumed moderates;" not those who don't agree with all that Congress has done, but would like to see a better spirit shown in such; not trimmers but the boiling-hot element which will stir the pot. The Daily News has already notified MR. RAYMOND that he must not hope to enter. The Times, indeed, declares that MR. HENRY WOOD must be excluded. But the political contest in this country is between active and earnest forces. MR. WOOD represents one of them. MR. RAYMOND represents the other. But whoever falls between will be ground to powder.

"ALL RIGHT" AT LAST.

THE cable is "all right," but where is DE SAUTY? A pensive public, in the midst of its gratification and delight, looks eagerly at the signature of every dispatch, and still hesitates and doubts and wonders, for how can it be sure unless it reads, "All right, DE SAUTY." Indeed it is a cruel fate. The directors owe to the world a distinct reply to the question, "Where is DE SAUTY?" By what authority did the Great Eastern sail without him? For what reason was he left behind? What is he doing? Where is he doing it? Is DE SAUTY "all right?" Where is DE SAUTY?

Wherever he may be, however, the cable is here. Its success of the great step is taken in here. The mastery of man over the world in which he was placed to "subdue it," and it has been taken as nobelessly as if it were the work of mere elves. The difficulties in the papers were not even leaded. The headings were less tremendous than those which often announce ordinary events. The sun rose and set as a matter of course. For so great is the confidence of men in man that it appeared nobody was surprised that it should be done. But as the attempt had failed once there was a possibility that the present effort would not succeed, and no one allowed himself too warm an expectation.

We spoke last week of the influence of the Atlantic Telegraph upon the commercial relations of this country and Europe. In his reply to MR. PEABODY'S congratulatory dispatch, Secretary SEWARD rather unnecessarily suggested what in a certain case its political value might have been. But its general influence and value is the attempt

It is not the least agreeable reflection of the many which salute the completion of the great work, that the energy and inextinguishable enthusiasm of CYRUS W. FIELD are thus justified and rewarded. There have been many fanatics, and of many kinds, in this country, such as SAM ADAMS, ROBERT FULTON, CLI WHITney, JOHN C. CALHOUN, and JOHN BROWN, and to this illustrious company Mr. FIELD'S name will be added. Fanaticism is simply that quality of indomitable tenacity and persistence which accomplishes a purpose. It is the driving wheel of the world. It is the salt that saves society from stagnation. It seems foolish and impracticable until the work is done, and then the faith and energy which are derided as FANaticism are revered as Genius. Failure could not frighten Mr. FIELD, nor skepticism disheartenen, and eight years of unflagging devotion are crowned with complete triumph. He has not only caused two continents, separated by an ocean, to touch each other, but he has given every nation a new and doubtless lasting test of faith and tenacity, and he has taught the world a more generous sympathy with what seems visionary endeavor.

It is "odd" with Mr. FIELD; but is Dr. SAUTY, also, "all right?"

GENERAL SHERIDAN'S OPINION.

At this moment it is interesting and important to know General SHERIDAN'S view of the feeling of the late insurgent section. He is not an "Abolitionist" or a "Radical," in the ordinary sense. A late correspondent says:

"He said there was an undoubted change for the worse in the attitude of the South within the last six months, and bad symptoms appeared to be increasing. It not looked as if those influential people were cure more to precipitate their action. Nothing could have been more considerate than the disposition of the nation toward the defeated foe, even in the heat of passion and flush of victory: and had the rebels only manifested a temper correspondingly reasonable, all, they was very natural to be expected after such chastisement—there could have been no further difficulty. The South evidently had no statesmen, and never would, or would not consent to be so bought; for it should be clear that no class, once set free, will ever again forfeit their liberty: they ought to have forestalled their foes in giving freedom to that class in war, as afterward emancipation seems ought to have prompted, and the latter problems in making allies of people of those with whom they are bound henceforth to live. Instead, however, a spirit existed certain that the rebels had learned nothing from experience, and would, in fact, drive the country once into unfriendly hands. The safety of the public peace and of the private rights of Union men in the South should required the mediation of a sufficient military force; and if called upon to give his testimony it should be that the United States troops ought not yet to be withdrawn from the South."

Recent events in General SHERIDAN'S Department certainly tend to confirm his view.

THE "VENGEANCE" OF THE UNION PARTY.

JUDGE D. R. CURTIS, of Boston, an eminent "conservative," and therefore a very mild supporter of the late war, has written a letter in favor of the Philadelphia Convention, in which he says that he hopes that body will rebuke "the spirit of hatred" which he is pleased to remark is becoming rife with "true love of our brethren." Other eminent "conservatives," and especially those who fomented the NEW YORK riots of 1863, are equally concerned lest our neighbors and fellow-citizens should not be sufficiently loved. The charge is sometimes insinuated, sometimes loudly asserted, that Congress and the Union party demand vengeance upon the late rebels, and that the motive of the security they seek for national tranquility is nothing but the desire of revenge. The conclusion to which it is hoped the accusation will drive the country is, that if we would immediately inaugurate the reign of Christian charity we must turn the government, at the next election, to the patrons of the draft riots, with Mr. CLEMENT, of Ohio, at their head.

What, then, are the facts? The facts are simply that the party, the party of the most successful maintenance of the Union and Government, have neither asked nor executed one solitary act of retaliation or revenge against any individual or State concerned in the rebellion. Many soldiers and some civilians still hold, as the President constantly taught, that if there be a law of vengeance, and if any civilian is convicted by an impartial trial, he should be solemnly hung as a traitor. This may be impolitic, but it expresses such a feeling as a desire of vengeance is to minute words will justify. It is to say that if WILKES BOOTH had been arrested immediately after his crime, and had been lawfully tried and convicted, it would have been vengeance and an outburst of "the spirit of hatred," which Judge CURTIS tells us is inconsistent with "true love of our brethren," to demand that the law be executed. The simple truth is, that there was never at any time in any country so conclusive a victory won, after so tremendous and vital a struggle, in which the attitude of the victors was so perfectly reasonable and humane as that of the loyal citizens of the United States known as the Union party. The cry of vindictiveness is the mere angry sheet of a baffled faction, which Judge CURTIS and others condescend to swell. And it would be a curious inquiry whether it is not a "spirit of hatred" upon their part toward certain persons and political sympathies nearer home which inspires them to lend their support to the charge.

The only revenge sought by those who have saved the Union is a security that its peace shall not be imperiled by conferring increased political power upon those who tried to destroy it; and a belief that the basis of true political ambition led the insurrection shall be ineligible to political preferment at the pleasure of the loyal people in Congress. This is not vindictiveness, confiscation, executions, nor exile for the defeated. Yet the "Conservative" party which uttered a great cry of rage when JOHN BROWN, with a handful of men, made a raid over Harper's Ferry into Virginia, and smiled grim assent when the brave old man was hung, now when hundreds of thousands of men have died for the flag, carry against the Union and Government at such fearful cost of loyal suffering and blood, call it "vindictive," and "revengeful," and a proof of "hatred" if the United States, without hanging a single hair of a single head of the rebels, says firmly and only that they shall not have gained increased power in the Union.

INFLUENCE OF EARLY EDUCATION ON HEALTH.

IF we were to announce it as a fact that the general plan of training horses is injurious to them, not only lessening their strength and speed, but laying the foundation for disease, we should think that very many of the trainers and owners of horses would earnestly consider our views. The question is whether a similar announcement about the training of children in our schools would receive much attention from parents and others. Why? For it became a horse is really estimated to be of more value than a child, for this is certainly not true of many persons. What, then, is the reason? It is found in the fact alluded to in a previous article, that it is the common notion that the training of the mind may be carried on without any physical powers. One can not realize how deeply rooted is this error in the general sentiment, unless he has considered the subject carefully and critically. We see it continually in the modes of expression used by fond parents in relation to the influence of study upon the health of their children. There is evidently a sort of satisfaction mingled with their regrets, and to be "sickled o'er with the pale cast of thought" is a mark of mental superiority, not only in advanced but in young scholars, that the temptations lead strongly in that direction.

The fact is that the error lies in the supposition that all that is lost to the physical in such cases is so much gain to the mental. The individual is in no sense allowed to gain, many of mind and body most intimately connected, so that whatever injures the one must in some degree cause the other to be impaired and deranged. It is to be remembered that it is not more depression that the mind experiences after a long effort, but that the whole deranged nerve inflict a morbid irritation upon the mind.

Sometimes the error we are combating is carried to such an extent that the idea is entertained that mind is essentially refined and elevated by the impairment of the physical energies. This sometimes is, on the contrary, positively deteriorating; sometimes even corrupting. Much of the sickly sentimentalism and mysticism common in the literature comes from this source, marring largely our current literature.

Whenever there is healthy thought with impaired and deranged physical power, it is healthy in spite of this impairment and derangement. Though vigor of body is not essential to vigor of mind, it is highly favorable to it, and at the same time is not in the least inconsistent with mental refinement. We have seen many a pale face and feeble frame possessed of the highest proper course of exercise, without any loss of refinement of the mind, but with addition to its vigor, sometimes very decidedly manifested.

The injury which is done in education to the physical powers is not confined to the period of study, for the simple reason that we have in them the accumulated results of the harm inflicted during a long course of years, beginning with childhood. Even from the worst part of the injury is experienced in the earliest years, when the brain, the chief organ of the system, suffers from the most lasting condition, and therefore easily impressed. Mind and brain are so intimately connected that we are apt to forget the importance of the latter in training the mind; and so we say that if we puzzle and addle the soft brain with things only fit for brains of a much later period of life, we have only stored it in its growth and make it liable to disease. The foundation of many an attack of inflammation of the brain or other disease in adult life has been laid in childhood in the school-room.

Much is said, and very properly, of making children sweet and cheerful times in study. Brains well as muscles may be overburdened with work. But the difficulty is not altogether in the amount of labor, but also in the character of it. The more interested and satisfied the mind is in the work the less is the liability of harm to it. The child is eminently fitted for satisfaction or interest in the school-room. Learning is made too much a wearisome drudgery. The child is subjected to lessons and forms of statement and rules, of which he understands little or nothing, while the food which his mind naturally most craves is cruelly withheld. He wants to know about things, and his mind is crammed with mere words. As well might you feed your cattle on hay baskets in place of corn.

An attempt is made to relieve the tedium of the common mode of education by various incentives to competition; but this introduces an unnatural and feverish excitement, which really ministers to the harm that is done to both mind and body by the drudgery of mere drilling. The only remedy is to be found in so conducting education that the natural desire for knowledge may be suitably gratified. That the mind of the child has such a desire, and is not naturally averse to acquiring knowledge, is a fact that can be learned only by furnishing proper food to the mind in a proper manner. And it is just here that a great reform in education is needed. Not only should more time be given to physical culture, but the mode of mental culture should be totally changed. The change which we advocate is necessary both for the full and symmetrical development of mind and the highest physical culture in the process. The details of this change we should like to notice, but our limits forbid. The subject is one which deserves a serious examination from all who are interested in education, and it is high time that drilling in words and forms and technicalities should give way to rational and intelligent business of the teacher, and take its proper place as subservient to the educing of thought.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE CHOLERA.

JUST as we have the news that the cholera has become epidemic in Europe, it appears in America in becoming more alarming. Still the mortality report for the city during the week ending August 11th is very high. The total number of deaths from all causes, including those which occurred in the institutions was 895, of which 359, or considerably more than one-fourth, were from cholera. The latest reports from the islands and institutions are very encouraging.

Dr. Harris, speaking of the ravages of cholera abroad, says: "The fatal character of the disease at latest date in the city of Amiens, where 1900 perished in the first ten days out of a population of 65,000; at Antwerp, where from 40 to 50 have perished in a day; at Berlin, with more than 30 deaths in a single day; at Lille, with 270 deaths to 396 cases; and in various towns in Holland, this summer, where there is a total of 1846 cases and now in Southampton, London, and Liverpool, where the infection pervades every part, and in its old centres, and where, in cases that untreated in the first moments, the disease proves fatal in the vicinity of nineteen-fifths, are proving that the nature and tendencies of the present epidemic do not differ from those of the previous years."

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The Public Debt, of the United States, as it stood on the 1st inst., was $2,332,331,201 against $2,332,999,291, the reduction since the previous statement of June 1, in sixty days, of $668,090. The Treasury reported the former sum at $26,514,096, in the temporary Currency obligations of the Treasury, and $2,305,817,105 in bonds, interest and stock, including bearing stocks of 1868. The present is by far the most favorable statement of the progress in reduction of the debt which has been generally reported, $17,000,000 or $18,000,000 better than was generated by the Secretary of the Treasury in the maximum of the Public Debt, unprovided for in August last, of over hundred and seventy-five millions, or about $174,178,870. Since the 1st June the Gold Coin in the Treasury has increased from $90,000,000 to $97,000,000.

NEWS ITEMS.

The Assistant-Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau in Georgia has made application for authority to place Stewart County under martial law, on account of the intense excitement which prevails there on the subject of freedmen. The citizens have even joined with the officers in an attempt to arrest a man they were arrested and bound. A Judge killed with his own hands a freedman who, he alleged, was about to assault his wife. The trial of the negro was that he had defended his home against a gang of robbers.

The published report that negroes have been kidnapped in the coast of Florida and sold to Cuba is denied at the Navy Department. In consequence of the reports the Department has ordered the steamer Tuscarora, commanding the Gulf Squadron, to make a thorough investigation of the matter, and if there be any truth in the report to put a stop to the slightest foundation.

Attorney-General Stanbery has given an opinion that the nominations for public offices rejected during the session of the Senate can be legally made by the President during the recess.

John Rose died in Washington on the night of August 3, aged about 70 years. He was a native of Georgia and the next treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Nation that he was appointed by his former principal and again recognized as the Chief, which position he held for many years. He was also a delegate from the Western Cherokee Country for Interment.

The Johnson Club of Rochester met in New Haven, August 2. Nearly 200 people, including members and spectators, were present. Speeches were made, and read a lengthy address, condemning the policy of Congress and heartily endorsing that of President Johnson. Resolutions to the same tune were adopted. Thirty-nine delegates were appointed to the Philadelphia Convention.

The Republican convention at Chicago will, when completed, somewhat resemble Rock's monument on Queenstown Heights. The base will be 100 feet long, the shaft 80 feet, and a statue ten feet high, surmounting the whole. It will be built of Illinois and Italian marble.

One of three guerrillas recently captured and hung near Little Rock, Arkansas, proved to be a woman.

FOREIGN NEWS

THE GERMAN WAR.

On July 18 Austria and Prussia had formally assumed the command of the Austrian Army. In his address to the army he alluded to the "Holy Alliance," Customs, and spoke of the battle of Sadowa as an "undeserved disaster."

On July 14 the Federal Diet took its departure from Frankfort-on-the-Main for Augsburg.

Bismarck, and the support of his policy by the German States, the London Times says, of July 18, makes the following comments:

"Sixteen of the smaller States have accepted the Bismarckian proposals, and are said to be devoured. Three of the larger Sovereigns—Hanover, Saxony, and Bavaria—have declined. The Hanoverian Minister which 'always puts noon in the wrong,' and will appeal to the people of Europe against the violence of Prussia. There is no hesitation or doubt as to the issue of the war. The Prussians are honeycombed to be only one will in the Government, and will of the Prussian people, who, after overcoming all resistance, offers to abdicate his power into the hands of a National Parliament. It is not to be supposed that any will have no occasion to deliberate. The Executive of the future State have already been absolutely, exclusively, and irresponsibly vested in the Prussian Crown. On all other subjects the people representatives will have the power of veto, and will only be with the consent of the Royal and Ducal majorities of the minor Princes according to the pattern that seems best to them: and will doubtless give proof of more than German subtlety and ingenuity in drawing the limits of a Sovereign Power from which the prerogatives of peace and war have forever departed.

"It is no wonder if all Europe, if Germany, and even if Prussia herself seem as yet to experience some difficulty in realizing the full extent of the change which the events of the last three weeks have wrought on the destinies of that country. Germany has received the overthrow of the German action dictatorless. It is only now, when the veil laid and better examined pieces of General Gablenz have led the victorious armies of the Crown Prince and to Prince Frederick Charles to the gates of Vienna, that any thing like a consistent movement becomes perceptible among the ruins of Teutonic patriotism; and the news of the victory and Bronkowitz, of Brunen and Hamburg, of Hesse, Offenburg, and Nachtenburg, now join hands in response of Bismarck's programme of Federal Reform. With regions of North Germany, mostly Protestants, are united and heart, and, whatever changes fortune may have in store, the sufficient of the present war is to be the establishment of German nationality, at least so far as the line of the Main and the Bohemian Mountains.

"South of that river and of those highlands nothing like the same unity is seen to prevail. The victory of Aschaffenburg has thrown open to the Prussians the gates of the City of the Dead, and that mere Rump of a Diet has been driven in tumultuous flight to Augsburg. The Prussians entered Frankfort on Monday evening amidst the enthusiastic welcome of the inhabitants, and the Bavarian Commander of the Federals is so complete as to compel the Federal Government to vote for a time of truce and armistice with Prussia. It is possible that the march of invasion may continue side by side with the Diet, and that Prussia may conclude peace with the country beyond that river, and on the other hand the power over the Government of the entire kingdom will leave South Bismarck's calculations. Matters are nevertheless in a very different state even in those Transmaine and Middle districts. The appeal of the Emperor Francis Joseph to the Emperor Napoleon has produced its full effect which is to save the anticipate. The dread of a French Protectorate at the head of a new Confederation of the Rhine has acted as a deterrent through the veins even of the most reckless Democrat and Ultramontane of Wurtemburg and Baden. We hear every where of pamphlets and proclamations to the Germans, recommending a co-operation with Prussia as the very means of safety for the common Fatherland; we hear of threatened agitation against the Austrians in the foreign fortresses, Roman Catholic, half civilized States, that could not have been dared to look at the Gold of Austria which yet stands in the way of German union under Prussian supremacy, and does not shrink from the monstrous policy of calling in foreign interventies. Should the German Government, as it is expected, meet in Frankfort on Dresden at the beginning of next September, it is difficult to conceive that the resolutions from the Saxon and other States can be excluded from it. It was over for Carour and Metternich to say that they had no longer a voice in the Italian people, but when once awakened it can be silenced only by force. The first successes in Italy aroused within the limits which they would fain have pre-settled. The Austrian Army in the Italian Tyrol is now placed in the same order and alacrity as their Southern neighbors. The Archduke Albrecht Memorial have received a ghost which it may be beyond even his power to lay."

Advices by the cable of the 4th instant inform us that the Peace Congress is to be held at Prague. Some of the preliminaries of negotiations have already been agreed upon. Austria cedes Venetia to France, and France to Germany. Germany, on the cession of Venetia, the loss of the Austrian Provinces and Duchies, and the payment by her of a large share of the war expenses of her adversaries. Austria is to be divided into two Confederations, separated by the line of the Main. The Northern Union will include Prussia, Saxony, and the Southern Confederation by Bavaria.

The Morning, with news to the 27th ultimo, brings intelligence of an engagement that took place before Prague between the Austrians and the Saxons, in which the Austrians were defeated. A Hungarian legion has been formed, and it is reported that Hungary's claims to peace is not declared.

The Diet of Frankfort, with advices to July 26, gives very little news that had not already been anticipated.

The Prussian Minister of peace proposes the terms and approved by France are officially announced as follows:

The Austrian cession the liberation of Bavaria, of Germany and the organization of a new Confederation on an independent basis.

The north of Germany to form a union under the military and financial leadership of Prussia.

The annexation of the Elbe Duchies to Prussia, with the exception of the Danish portion of Schleswig.

The annexation of Hanover and Hesse Cassel to Prussia.

The maintenance of the integrity of Austria, with the exception of Venetia.

A more detailed version of the preliminaries, and perhaps the definitive terms, is given in Prussian papers.

Prussia to annex the Elbe duchies, the southern part of Hanover and Electoral Hesse, so as to establish a large and easy communication between the whole of her territories.

All the states to the north of the Main to form a confederation, of which Prussia should have the perpetual presidency, which she should represent abroad, and of which the military contingents should be under her war or her own army, should be placed under her command.

The free development of the Main States in order to form among themselves a distinct confederation, to which Austria, by means of her Germanic possessions, should be admitted.

Should these two Confederations think fit to establish relations between each other for affairs common to both, by means of mixed Parliamentary committees at Diet, the presidency to belong to Prussia, and the votes to be so arranged as to give no one to the Northern Confederation a vote to the Southern.

Austria to preserve the whole of her territory, with the exception of Venetia, which would be handed over to Prussia, and by her to France, to be given as a war indemnity to the latter power, but in this sum would be considered the portion of the Austrian debt which Prussia would take upon herself by reason of the cession of Venetia.

ENGLAND.

On Friday night, August 3, the bill for a renewal of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in Ireland was read a second time in the British House of Commons. Mr. Gladstone supported the Government, and expressed his admiration of the manner in which our Government had treated the Fenians in this country.

ARMISTICE IN ITALY.

On July 25 a suspension of hostilities for eight days was concluded between the Italians and the Austrians.

The Austrian fleet under the Italians have very successful in the Southern Tyrol.

THE NAVAL BATTLE AT LISSA.

The following is the official account, contained in a letter from Florence, dated July 21. The following official account of the late engagement between the Austrian and Italian fleets, dated "the Straits of Lissa, July 20," has been received at Florence: "The Austrian squadron having made its appearance, as expected, on the evening of the 19th, at sunset the Italian squadron weighed and steamed into the Port St. Georges. This morning disembarkation of troops and the naval victualling began, and that the enemy's squadron was in sight. The Italian fleet put out to meet them, and the engagement began. Admiral Persano hoisted his flag on the Afondatore and bore down upon the Austrian line, under a heavy fire. The iron-clad of the Austrian admiral's vessel was destroyed. The fight was very severe. The Afondatore fell foul of the ship which the admiral left, and which sank from a collision with the enemy at the commencement of the battle.

"The iron-clad gun-boat Palestro caught fire, and the flames reached the powder magazine. She blew up. Admiral Persano was obliged to leave the Re d'Italia for the Maria Pia, which latter vessel was directly afterwards sunk by the Austrian ram Ferdinand Max. The Austrian squadron remained victorious of the scene of action. The damages sustained by the enemy are considerable." Further intelligence is expected. The crew of the Re d'Italia were nearly all picked up by the Volta Emmanuele.

Further information received here (Florence) from Lissa says that the late Austrian manœuvres of the enemies were rank by the fire of the Italian squadron.

Deputy Bezzola is stated to have been killed in the engagement.

THE EXCITEMENT IN NEW ORLEANS—VIEW ON ST. CHARLES STREET.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 326.]

SUNDAY IN NEW ORLEANS—THE FRENCH MARKET.—Sketched by our Special Artist, A. R. Waud.—[See Page 526.]

THE MURDERERS AT SUNSET CANON.

I.

IN 1865- I was practicing law in Mariposa, California, with a friend and partner named Ichabod Thorne. We had a lucrative and free-and-easy time of it among the Mariposians and the wild, rough miners and cattle-raisers of the vicinity. The Vigilance Committee was then a thing of the past; there were rude court-houses, sheriffs, half-civilized policemen, and other formulæ, and frequently honest attempts at the administration of justice, to be met with even at the foot of the Sierra Nevada; and consequently my profession found employment and the emoluments of the situation arose. True, the Californians were still fond of taking justice in their own hands, and our prim, legal gallery was now and then robbed of its jury by the violence of the mob. But we were accustomed to regard such eccentricities good-naturedly, as arising from the mere force of habit, and were pretty well content so long as we could charge heavy fees, and have them paid in the bright yellow dust which was not only the cause of the presence, in that not very inviting region, of nine-tenths of the inhabitants, but also of nine-tenths of the crimes from which I reaped my own pecuniary harvest.

It was at the close of a pleasant showery Sunday, just at the commencement of the rainy season, which here endures for several months, that I sat in the "office" portion of our rude cabin in Mariposa, awaiting my partner's return. He had gone visiting the Gonzagos, some very dear friends of ours, at Sunset Cañon. This locality was about thirty miles northeast of Mariposa, in the very first of the towering Sierras, and was aptly and beautifully named, from the loveliness of the spot itself and the general grandeur of the surrounding scenery.

The cañon was the property of Santiago de Gonzago, who occupied it entirely as a residence. He was esteemed one of the best and wealthiest of the native Californians of that vicinity—perhaps of the entire country. He had a large number of acres in his employment, possessed more mules, sheep, and cattle than he could readily count, besides almost interested in large quartz-crushing claims further south, and the great cattle-like building of adobe, where he resided with his wife and his daughter Inez, was quite a primitive place of its kind. Gonzago was generally known throughout the country as "the Don."

Every claim our residence at Mariposa—a period of nearly two years—Thorne and I had been accustomed to spend our Sundays at the Gonzago Ranche, and month before this particular Sunday my handsome young partner had lost his heart, and was generally regarded as the accepted suitor of the fair Inez.

In the evening, late, Thorne came in from the Don's.

"You found them all well, of course?"

"Yes, and I had a jolly time. But have you heard the news?"

"None at all," I replied.

"Why that devil La Mort and his rangers are at work again. Only three days ago, in the Long Gully of the second ridge, four more were murdered in their cabin, and all their 'loot' seized, for, course it was the work of that French fiend; for, you know, we heard of him being near Fort Miller only a week ago, and he was then on his way up the valley."

"Pshaw! it is absurd to ascribe half the murders in California to that poor devil of a Frenchman. He's bad enough, God knows, but he is not ubiquitous."

Despite my ridiculing his suspicions I must say I was somewhat alarmed at what I had heard, and was glad enough to be assured by my friend that he had persuaded the Don to use additional precautions in guarding his house. This La Mort was a Frenchfreebooter and murderer, who had for many months been the terror of San Joaquin valley and the Tulare district. I never had the luck to meet nor exactly how he came by the terrible sobriquet by which he was widely known—for there were but few of his countrymen in California, and he was by no destroying band, of which he was the ostensible head, was mostly composed of Mexicans, with a few desperadoes from the jails and penitentiaries of the Eastern States. As is usually the case with criminals who are seldom seen, and who operate in wild and sparsely populated countries, this villain got credit for more rascalities than it would be possible for him to perform.

Just as we were preparing to turn in there was a knock at the door, and I admitted a stranger. The still falling rain, and consequent muddy ground, had hindered my hearing the approach of the horse which I now perceived standing in front of the house. The stranger was a man apparently of a dashing fellow, with short sandy whiskers, rather sinister green eyes, thoroughly dressed to meet the emergency of the weather, and with a certain official brusqueness in his manner and address. The moment I saw him I thought him to be a sheriff or sheriff's deputy from some neighboring county or town, according to his own statement, he proved to be.

"Is this Mr. U——?" he said, gruffly, but with a sort of politeness in his tone, which also appeared to contain a slightly foreign accent.

I bowed assent, and he continued:

"Farcour is my name. I am the chief of the San Francisco detective force. You have doubtless heard of me before?"

I somewhat surrendered my veracity to my desire to be polite by signifying that fame of Mr. Farcour, the famous San Francisco Detective, had penetrated far deeper into the interior than Mariposa.

"I am in the special employment at present," continued Mr. Farcour, "of a wealthy firm—Messrs. B—— & Co.—in San Francisco, for the capture of a notorious thief and scoundrel, through whom they have lost heavily. I was directed to come to you and your partner by Mr. Stanwix, their attorney at law. Here is my badge."

Detective Farcour then threw open his heavy riding-cloak and displayed an elaborately-mounted German-silver badge, or shield; but it scarcely needed this display, I thought, to determine the office of the wearer. In my professional capacity I had had to deal with numerous specimens of these gentry, and my present visitor's entire bearing was that of the Detective par excellence. Every word he uttered was given with that premeditated terseness which he would have employed in the witness-box, while confronting the criminal whom he had hunted down to justice; he accompanied himself with explanatory gestures of his left hand, nutlet, half-evil green eye of his would dance about in his head from one object to another as he spoke till you thought that he must have an interest in the owners's words, while at the same time it appeared wonderfully wide-awake. As I received and made a mental note of these observations almost immediately, and as I was well acquainted with Mr. Stanwix, my gentleman mentioned, and his client, I saw in the employment of the San Francisco firm alluded to by my visitor, I shook the latter by the hand and asked him to take a seat before the fire. On second thoughts I invited him to partake of the evening meal, the remnants of which still covered the little table in the centre of the room. He accepted my hospitality without any profusion of thanks, and ate like a very hungry man: while Thorne, very much after his own fashion, threw upon the bed in another corner of the room without undressing, and was soon sound asleep.

Detective Farcour, I found, had not intended to remain all night, if I had no objection, and, as I made none, all night he accordingly stadi—only leaving the house to attend to his horse, and had his horse in the rough shed which answered for that purpose immediately back of the house.

Farcour proved very fond of talking, and he talked well. According to his own account his exploits in his peculiar branch of niveture were of a most marvelous character. He appeared to have spent his life in chasing thieves and forgers and murderers all over the inhabitable globe. It made a wide range of country, as I said. Indeed, one or two of his yarns were, to my own knowledge, entirely without foundation; but then he was very entertaining, and I let him run, but only at times, so that I threw no cold water on his garrulity by letting him see that I knew him to be a liar. His powers of memory must also be very marvelous. By a sudden twist of his short, stumpy nose he would make himself appear nigh a century old, or another skilful contortion of the same organ would give him the fresh, blooming appearance of a country clown; while his flexibility of voice accompanied his assumed characters with equal skill.

It was some time before it occurred to me to ask him the object of his presence in Mariposa. I suppose my surprise when he did so must have implied that he was in search of the famous La Mort.

"La Mort!" I exclaimed. "Is it possible that that villain can be captured?"

"There is one man in California who can and will capture him," said Farcour.

"And who may that be?"

"Modesty forbids me mentioning names," was the complacent reply.

"Oh! Ah!"

Then this intensely modest man proceeded to give me recitals of numerous desperate exploits of his own, matters which he had had with the redoubtable freebooter, all of which bore marks, both chronologically and otherwise, of being strictly untrue. He heard my recital of Thorne's intelligence of the murder at Long Gully with an impassive countenance, and then said, knowingly tapping his nose with his forefinger, that he had known all about it hours before, and more too—a glaring falsehood, if his introductory statement that he had just come from San Francisco, were true.

Among other accomplishments of Detective Farcour his facility as a "puny" swordsman was one of distinguished merit. I always flattered myself that I was peculiarly non-committal, even for a member of my profession, but Farcour's interest, I see, was confined, I was mortified to find that my guest had actually pumped me dry. He knew all about my business, knew of the partnership with the merchants of Sunset Cañon, knew of Thorne's visit there and recent return thence, and pretty much every other thing else that could be of any interest. It was so disgraced at this that I was not displeased when he signified a desire to retire. Showing him to our "spare bed" in the back room of our shanty, I threw myself beside my partner, and was soon in a strange, grotesque dream, in which law-offices, clients, murderers, and Detective Farcours generally were senselessly jumbled up together; but not before several sonorous and healthy snores from the guest room apprised me that Mr. Farcour was fast forgetting the fatigues of his long ride in the arms of nature's sweet restorer.

II.

We were all awakefed rather early in the morning—that is, Farcour and I were—by the cool and early risers—by a messenger from Gonzago's Ranche, who thundered at the door with noise enough to awaken the dead. I, being the first awakened, promptly recognized the man below to be one of the Don's peons. He was standing at the door, with his face perfectly livid with passion and excitement, and the mule from which he had just dismounted was covered with foam and breathing hard.

"What is the matter, Pedro?" I exclaimed, dismayed at the man's horrified appearance; and at this moment Thorne also came to the casement, while I could hear my partner in the night before bustling about in the room behind me.

But the man was too breathless and terrified to speak. Thorne opened the door, and we soon had him inside, when he sank exhausted in a chair. A pull at my flask of whisky revived him, and he gasped faintly, "La Mort!"

"What's up, my man, what's up? Out with it!" said the light of Thorne.

The man spoke English very imperfectly, and we had some difficulty in comprehending him.

"They're—they're murdered!" at last we made it out.

"Murdered! who?"

"The Señor, Don de Gonzago!"

"Impossible!"

"Sí, Señor, and both the others!"

"What!" almost shrieked Thorne; "not Inez? surely not Senora Inez?"

"Sí, Señor! Sí, sí, oh, oh!" and the poor man began to rock himself to and fro, and to groan and whine, old woman like, in the extremity of his terror.

Thorne's grief and rage at this horrible news was indescribable, and it scarcely exceeded my own. While this new blow exercised, word by word, from the messenger, Mr. Farcour had said very little. He had sat in the midst of us, with a notebook in his hand, busily making memoranda, and watching every thing keenly with those little green eyes of his, but without displaying the least emotion. In spite of my grief and horror I could not withhold a sort of admiration for the utter impassibility of the detective under these trying circumstances. He was a passionate, he unquestionably at the same time possessed the best qualities of a good officer.

The horrible intelligence spread through the town like wild-fire, and in a short time our little office was besieged by the curious and horror-loving of all sexes and ages, both American and Mexican. Detective Farcour took command of every thing with the ease of a man who understands a position, and at once he took advantage of it. The people soon became aware of the nature of his office and the object of his visit to their town. They therefore looked upon him as their natural leader in this emergency, and I was glad enough to relinquish any responsibility which I might otherwise have had to myself and to assume. In a short time upward of a dozen stalwart and eager men were mounted in front of my office, awaiting for us to accompany them on the pursuit of La Mort and his gang; for at first no one doubted that this redoubtable wretch was the author of the crime. The influence of Gonzago, his wealth, and the general esteem in which he was held, served to render this tragedy doubly impressive, and every one appeared to be anxious to do something toward achieving the ends of justice.

When we were about to start Detective Farcour, in his most commanding manner, called together a sort of council-of-war in the office. He was hardly the same man, in appearance, of the night before. A broad-brimmed hat shaded one of the wicked-looking green eyes, and he wore a black wig of vast and voluminous proportions. This, he explained, with a knowing wink, was his remaining green eye, was for the purpose of deceiving La Mort and his comrades, to many of whom he professed to be personally known.

"Gentlemen"—said the wiry detective, with another knowing wink, and with the air of a Major-General addressing the members of his staff on the eve of an offensive movement requiring peculiar strategy—"Gentlemen, you have all got but vague notions of the diabolical cunning of this great criminal, while I, from my professional habits of quick, comprehensive, and lynx-eyed observation, have already grasped all the circumstances of the case, and now know all about it. This murder has been the work of no marauding band—no violent operation, you may, but it is the consummation of one individual two at the utmost. Is La Mort the chief actor? Perhaps he is; and, again, perhaps he isn't. Do not let us be easily governed by our unruly prejudices. Let us first look among ourselves, and see if there is no one at whom the long, marble, unerring finger can point. Will any of you gentlemen oblige me with the loan of a pair of wrist-bands—you understand, hand-cuffs, of course?"

As Detective Farcour approached the conclusion of this rather egotistical speech his single reddish green eye seemed literally upon my friend and partner, Ichabod Thorne. The handcuffs were drawn with a flourish from the pocket concealed by the long coat, and, with a slightly jingling the two bracelets against each other. Apparently satisfied of their soundness he approached Thorne with a sinister smile, and said, politely, "Allow me, Sir?"

I could not forbear smiling at what appeared to be the humor of the detective. Thorne, however, still intoxicated by the terrible stroke which had visited him, was in no humor for jest or play, and roughly put out both hands to repulse the detective. But, to our astonishment, there were just two little clicks, and Thorne found himself securely handcuffed.

"Take them off, you cursed fool!" he growled, with an oath. "This is no time for fooling!"

"I agree with you perfectly," said the Detective Farcour, "and that is just the reason why I am not fooling. I never fool during business hours."

"What do you mean?" exclaimed Thorne, his face now fairly white with anger.

"Gentlemen," said the Detective Farcour, very coolly disregarding the question, and turning to the rest of us; "gentlemen, excuse my abruptness, but business is business. Behold, then, in this man Thorne the perpetrator of having murdered three innocent, helpless human beings. All I mean to say is that a reasonable amount of suspicion rests upon his head; and experience has taught me that when suspicion rests upon a man, guilty or not guilty, grab him; for nine times out of ten he is guilty."

"Come, come," said I, getting angry also; "let us have done with this farce, and be off!" And at this I and the other members of the party, likewise regarding the matter in the light of an unseasonable joke, began to show signs of impatience.

"Farce!" exclaimed the detective with some dignity; "gentlemen, this is no farce. This gentleman" (indicating Thorne by a motion of his head) "tried to murder me in the murderer's room, and I turned here last night at half past ten o'clock. Is that no ground of suspicion?"

"No, certainly not!" said half a dozen voices in concert.

"Very good, gentlemen," resumed the detective, cool as before; "but do you see those two little specks of blood on the shirt-sleeve of the prisoner; and that one big spot of the same sanguineous, red current of life on his buckskin boots? Are those, gentlemen, no grounds of suspicion?"

We all looked curiously at the portions of Thorne's dress indicated (and none more curiously than the prisoner himself), and we made no answer, for there, sure enough, were the little specks which blood alone can leave. Thorne saw them also, and was considerably confused.

"Gentlemen, what can you see this?" continued the detective; "is this no ground of suspicion?" and with these words, with a quick, dextrous movement, he put his hand in my partner's breast-pocket, and drew a long dagger, the bright blade of which was slight, by dimmed with dry blood. "Perhaps," continued Farcour, "some of you gentlemen can see this little sticker before. At any rate the jewels in the hilt are also worth a moment's notice;" and what this engraved upon the blade?" He looked at it attentively, and read in slow, distinct tones, "Santiago de Gonzago, from his friend Pedro de Calderon, 1834."

Thorne looked absolutely stunned with surprise and alarm. We had all seen the dagger often, and there was a general shrinking from my partner's side. I alone remained near, perfectly confident of his being the victim of some villainous trick. A further search of the prisoner, who submitted quietly, produced the following memorandum, hastily scrawled in lead-pencil on the fly leaf of his note book:

"Ten steps northward from the great pine-tree: then twelve steps eastward into the chaparral; stop and dig."

"Do any of you gentlemen happen to know of a particular pine-tree at or near the place of the murder?"

Yes, we knew of an enormous pine just outside of Gonzago's corral, and that it had often been considered as a kind of landmark for travelers from the West to the quartz mines of the Sierras.

"Then, gentlemen," said the detective, "you may at once proceed to Sunset Cañon. If I am not much mistaken we shall find some treasure in close proximity to that big pine-tree."

"Wait," said I. "Let me see that paper." I took it and examined it closely. It was written in a hasty, trembling hand, but I had no hesitation in declaring that it was not in my friend's handwriting.

"I hope that is so, Sir," said Farcour, with a shake of his head, as much as to say that he did not believe what I asserted. "I hope that it is, Sir; but then, you know, when a man is excited, and in a hurry, and perhaps in the dark, he isn't always particular how he writes, you know."

If an assassin ever had a fiend to aid and applauded my friend's guilt in trumpet tones I would have disbelieved it. Thorne himself was now perfectly self-possessed, and answered to his every thing easily. The only explanation he designed to offer was, that he was the victim of a malicious trick, which he could not account for, and its perpetrator properly punished. But it was not without great alarm that I noticed the impression which the detective's words had made upon the wild, rough characters who thronged my office. They did not know Thorne so well as the rest of us, and how they would join with scowls of suspicion and positive hatred; while Dan Mifflin, a gigantic miner, who was the bully and acknowledged chief of the camp, suddenly placed one hand upon his revolver, and with the other made a rapid and ominous motion under his chin, accompanied by a strange sound in the throat, indicative of the operation of a hempen cravat.

Nevertheless, no violence was offered, and in a few minutes we had started for the cañon; I riding by my friend to assist him in managing his horse, as he had but little use of his hands on account of the handcuffs.

We reached the cañon fully three hours before sunset, and found the rather unusual population of the ranche in a state of great excitement, the women and children standing about in the sun in whispering groups, the men in a restless, wild way, as though their wrist was made known, was a subject of much interest. We entered the kind of rude court-yard of the ranche, and dismounted in silence. The principal building, in which the murdered Don and his family had resided, was a large one-storied adobe house, with a wide veranda in front, the whole comprising some five or six apartments. The assumptions peons had made no attempt to remove the dead bodies, which had been found where they had been found in the morning. I was even more alarmed when I saw the expressions of horror and hatred with which my friend was shackled friend when they learned from some of our party the nature of the improvised examination which had taken place in the lodging-house of Mr. Farcour, and which we were followed by our detective at our head, we were followed by nearly two hundred people, with either a sullen or fierce air, adhere to the superstition that if a murderer touch the corpse of his victim his guilt will instantly become by a sudden gush of blood from the wounds he has inflicted. Thorne bore himself even better than I had expected; for I feared that he would completely overcome by the sight of his murdered friends, and that his emotion would augment the disfavor in which he was already evidently held.

I will not dwell upon the sickening details of this ghastly spectacle. The first batchelmor we entered contained the dead body of Don Gonzago. The former had probably been slain in his sleep, and had barely stirred after receiving the deep stab which had penetrated his heart. The poor wife had probably been awakened in time to grapple once or twice ineffectually with the assassin, as the body bore a number of wounds, and inflicted, unnatural position on the floor indicated that its owner had sprang or been flung from the couch. In order to allow the Mexicans and one or two of our own party, Thorne took each of the dead bodies by the hand and gazed long and earnestly in their ghastly faces; this action, of course, being followed by none of the anticipated gush of blood from the now cold wounds.

I pitied him sincerely at the conclusion of this trying ordeal—that is, in that portion of it where we visited the chamber of the murdered Jem, whom he had loved with all the affection of a strong and earnest disposition. The poor girl had, also, probably, never awakened to the cruel blow which had deprived her of life. She had received two stabs, both in the breast, and either one of them sufficient to have effected immediate death; and the body was now lying in an easy posture on the couch, with a pleasant, natural expression on the pale, beautiful, upturned countenance, whose loveliness, after the eyes had been closed, was not in the least distorted by the violence of the agent that destroyed her. Almost every one knew of Thorne's former intimacy, and he was narrowly watched as he approached the dead. His grief was simple and noble. He knelt down, and silently wept upon the cold, dead hand, while one or two of those strong, terrible sobs, which can only be wrung from a heavy, manly heart, escaped him; a moment more and he was himself again, and upon his feet. His action here would have created a favorable impression in sticks and stones; but Mexican peasantry are dullier than sticks, and the prejudices of wild, rough miners, ever unbending mortifiers for "sentiment" to terrify criminals, are much more insensate than the hardest granite; so my friend was looked upon with increased dislike and suspicion.

It is hardly necessary to enlarge upon the numerous unnecessary and even ridiculous examinations carried on by Mr. Detective Farceur during the afternoon and evening; but they all went to prove to every one but myself that La Mort was a myth, and that Thorne was the guilty man. I confess that my faith in his innocence was for a moment staggered when, upon following the written instructions which had been found in his vest pocket, we dug for the treasure in the chaparral, and disclosed a casket; knew it to be Don's property, containing several thousand dollars in gold checks and coin, together with some papers which, however, could be of no value to any one but Gonzago himself. My confidence in my friend's innocence immediately returned upon serious reflection; for the house had been robbed of valuables to the less than the amount discovered in the casket; and it was extremely improbable that the robber would keep a memorandum of only the most insignificant portion of the plunder. But this argument met with no favor with Detective Farceur and the rest.

"You see, there may have been other memoranda that we missed," said the detective, cocking that little green eye of his. "Certainly there is one thing to be done, and one only. Your friend [emphasizing the word friend] must be consigned to the jail at Mariposa—that is, if we get him there."

There was something ominous in the tone in which the latter portion of the sentence ("if we get him there") was spoken, and did not by any means serve to diminish my anxiety. The next morning—we passed the night at the rancho, with Thorne under a strong guard—the building in which we were quartered was beset by a mob of nearly two hundred Mexicans—peons of the murdered man, and others, who had gathered from far and near—led by two of Thorne's fellow-men, prominent among whom was the Don Militin before referred to. They were greatly infuriated, and demanded the instant surrender of the prisoner to their vengeance. To my very great surprise Detective Farceur was rather lukewarm in his resistance of the mob. He displayed a great deal about summary justice, sniffed about the law being exceedingly lax, and looked with servile obsequiousness upon the ignorant rabble who were most conspicuous and clamorous. Luckily there were six of our party upon whom I could depend. They were stout, burly, honest fellows, made miners from the mountains, some of whom were under personal obligations to me, and I placed myself at their head with confidence.

The door was securely barred in a few seconds, and the first blow against it was struck by the ruffian Militin, armed with an axe. I ripped out the casement, revolver in hand, and resolved to act promptly.

"If you strike that door once more," said I, addressing Militin, "I will put a bullet through your heart!"

"Two can play at that game!" exclaimed the villain, and, swerving back, he dropped his axe and clutched a revolver.

I instantly discharged my pistol, and, with an oath and a cry of pain, his right arm dropped nerveless at his side, broken and splintered at the elbow. The crowd at his back commenced to advance with waving knives and pistols, and I saw that no time was to be lost. Calling upon my six men to prepare for fight, I shattered the door, sprang out, and went out, still retaining my pistol in my hand, ready for further use.

"What do you want?" I asked, and they knew by my tone of voice that I was not to be trifled with.

"We want to hang that bloody-minded friend of yours!" cried Phil Massey, another desperado from the coast. His reply was hailed with fierce shouts and yells from the motley crew around him.

"You must prove him guilty before you hang him," I said, coolly. "He will be imprisoned and regularly tried at Mariposa, and, if found guilty, he will be hung—not before. You hang him, you dirty, contemptible cut-throats. Would you hang him the way you strung up poor Rollin, for he could be never committed, last spring? Would you hang him as you did that wretched Jew peddler, only a month ago, when his innocence was proved, and the real criminal arrested, before his body was cold? Look at your leaders now, you infernal fools! Don Militin there owes his neck to the noose for the murder of two Indians on the Kern River, less than a year ago; Phil Massey there, beat a Mexican woman to death at the Los Angeles fandangoes; and the dirty thief next to him has twice escaped the penalty for horse-stealing! You hang him! There are six true men behind me, armed to the teeth; and for my character, you know it well enough. The first man who advances a step for the purpose of violence is a dead man! Come on, if you want fight!"

This address had even a better effect than I had anticipated. My whole party filed out of the building, with revolvers cocked and ready for use, and the demonstration of the mob ceased almost on the instant, the Mexicans proposing it sheathing their weapons, and slinking away to their huts, and all the Americans—who were in no especial sympathy cemented in my little speech, coming toward us, and looking considerably ashamed of themselves. I cared nothing for the defection of Militin and his brother ruffians; and, after giving Mr. Detective Farceur a brief lecture, which probably did not materially increase his self-esteem, the six guards were soon mounted, and riding homeward, with the prisoner in our midst. In about three hours and a half he was safely lodged, under strong guard, in the old stone-building which answered for the Mariposa jail.

III.

There was not much "red tape" in the proces of a California criminal trial in those days. The Judge was on hand early, the prosecuting attorney "rushed" his case with earnest promptness, and witnesses for either side were rattled off without an excess of circumlocution. Through my influence—which was considerable, the trial of Thorne lasted more than one day—an unusual thing at that time.

I confess that I was downcast at the conclusion of the first day. Detective Farceur was the principal witness, and he talked to the jury for about fifteen hours on end. Seeing the strong leaning bias of his mind, in whose innocence I never ceased to firmly believe. The Judge, Mr. Y——, who was very much my friend, also confessed that there was little hope. The first day had been entirely occupied with the prosecution, and the night found me quite alone in my room, a circumstance some kind of substantial defense to be forthcoming on the morrow, when a strange chance threw the means of materially vindicating my friend's honor directly across my path.

It had rained during the day, but the night was calm and lovely, with a full moon—which, when I walked restlessly toward the banks of the little river, in a vain endeavor to obtain some mental repose. All four near the rancho which grew thickly on the margin of the stream I caught the sound of voices engaged in low but angry altercation. A strange feeling, which I had never experienced before, impelled me to approach and listen. Using great care, I got very near to the speakers without being discovered, and there listened to a conversation carried on in French which riveted me to the spot with the most breathless excitement and delight. Two horrible criminals were discussing villainies of the past and planning new ones for the future—the first of which two of them was clearly recognizable. I only listened for a very few minutes, and then returned swiftly and silently to my office, with a mountain of anxiety removed from my breast.

On the following morning the rude court-room was even more crowded than upon the first day preceding day. The Judge was on the bench, the jury in their places, and every thing ready for work when I entered the room. My friend Thorne was considerably depressed on the preceding day, quickly caught the reflex of my beaming countenance and brightened up amazingly. While the jurymen yawned, as though they would have gladly pronounced a verdict of "guilty" at once, without waiting for a long-winded argument, I arose and said:

"Are you ready with your defense, Mr. Y——?" inquired the Judge.

"I will be in a moment, Sir, as soon as some friends of mine arrive," I replied. "And here they are."

At that moment the room was invaded by twelve men, armed to the teeth, who, as previously arranged, posted themselves in different portions of the room so as to effectually guard all means of exit. Even the two windows, though placed high above the floor, were not neglected. One prosecuting attorney made a great splutter about this "high-handed proceeding," as he was pleased to denominate it, and even the Judge requested an explanation in a rather abrupt manner. But I assured his Honor, and every one present, that, before I finished my defense, the wisdom of the "high handed proceeding" would be made manifest to all.

I then took up the case and gave the learned Judge the benefit of my opinions, which I purposely spun out to ridiculous length, and in which I viewed all of the phases of the evidence for the prosecution in a humorous light, and weighed them with the finesse of a miser counting his hoard. The prosecuting attorney at first gaped, then yawned, and then fretted and fumed; and, at last, even the Judge lost patience and said, rather petulantly:

"This is entirely unnecessary, Mr. U——; your remarks produce no effect upon the jury. If you have any witnesses produce them."

"I have but one, your Honor."

"Who is it?"

"Mr. Detective Farceur, of San Francisco."

Every one appeared to be considerably astonished at this, but none more so than the detective himself. He was still disguised by the hideous black patch, but his one sharp, little grey eye twinkled nervously as he once more mounted the witness-stand, which was only an arm's-length from my own position. The reader must remember that the scene and conversation which I am about to describe occurred in California in the year 185-, and not in a very formal way of proceeding.

Q. "Mr. Farceur, how long have you been a detective policeman?"

A. "About twenty years, off and on."

Q. "Where were you on the night of the murder which Mr. Thorne is accused of having committed?"

A. "On my way to this place from the West. I arrived at your office on that night."

Q. "Are you sure you did not come from the northeast instead of the west?"

A. "Very sure I did not."

Q. "Mr. Farceur, do you speak French?"

A. "Imperfectly."

Q. "You spoke it very fluently in your conversation with a fellow-villain among the scrub-oaks on the river-bank last night."

The detective started as if he had received a load of buck-shot. His little green eye shrank so far back in his head that it looked like a shining glassbead, and he gave other indications of being decidedly ill at ease. My remaining queries were short and sweet.

Q. "Mr. Detective, did you never go by any other name than 'Farceur?'"

A. "No, Sir."

Q. "I think you have. Suppose you let the Judge and jury see your face. I will assist you."

With that I reached my hand out very quickly, and with two motions deprived the witness of his eye-patch, of his false whiskers, and of two curving wigs, which made a great alteration in his personal appearance. He now stood forth a clean-shaven, black-haired villain, with crime stamped legibly upon every lineament.

"Now, Mr. Detective Farceur," I resumed, "are you sure there is not another name by which you are best known, and to which you are accustomed to answer?"

"No," he replied doggedly, "I know of none."

"Bah! I know your name perfectly," I persisted, "and I want these people to know it. It is La Mort!"

The effect of these words, spoken in a loud voice, was magical. As one man every person in the court-room sprang to his feet. The counterfeit detective looked about wildly, and then, drawing a knife from his bosom, cleared the inclosure at a bound, and rushed to the door. But in an instant he was knocked down and dragged back to the stand.

It is scarcely worth while for me to dwell upon the summary manner in which I proved him, out of his own mouth, to be the murderer of the Gonzago family, and to be none other than the dreaded La Mort. He was hung the next morning in the open plaza, in the presence of several thousand people. I never discovered exactly whom his motives for the plot by which he so nearly succeeded in procuring the execution of an innocent man; but, of course, the golden casket had something to do with the affair. It. Lynch law was not so popular in Mariposa county for a number of years thereafter.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THERE is a man in Pennsylvania who is so forgetful of a misfortune that he is upheld in it when he comes to the end of her sons in order that he may distinguish her from other ladies. Even then he occasionally makes a mistake.

CABLE-ENDS.

Why is a happy husband like the Atlantic Cable?—Because he is upheld by his wife's ends.

"He said the present success of the Ocean Telegraph was in the field of the Atlantic Cable never lost sight of the 'grand end' of their undertaking from the start.

The inventor of "wire-puller" of modern times—Cyrus W. Field.

On the arrival of the Great Eastern at Newfoundland the sailors unanimously declared that the whole thing was a "humbug," and during the passage they held an indignation meeting, at which loud shouts of "Down with the Cable!" were heard.

Shall we call Mr. Field an aristocrat because he is so very proud of his "connections?"

"Dear me, Mr. Editor, Mr. Greenly," and so they have put telegraph poles all the way 'cross the ocean! I shouldn't wonder if they put a cotton bridge next."

When is a lawyer like a horse?—When he lives by Gray's Inn Fields.

Archbishop Whately once puzzled a number of clever men in whose company he was by asking them this question: "How is it that we always eat more than black?" Some were not aware of the curious fact; others set to work and tried to get into learned and long reasons; but all were anxious to have the real cause—After keeping them waiting for a while, he said:—"The reason is, because there are more of them."

SIGNS.

It is a good sign to see a man do an act of charity. It is a bad sign to hear him boasting of it.

It is a good sign to see an honest man wearing his old clothes. It is a bad sign to see them filling the holes in the windows.

It is a good sign to see a man wiping the perspiration from his brow. It is a bad sign to see him wipe his dogs as he comes out of the cellar.

It is a good sign to see a woman dressing with taste and neatness. It is a bad sign to see her husband send for her dressy.

It is a good sign to see a man advertise in the papers. It is a bad sign to see the sheriff advertise for him.

It is a good sign to see a man sending his children to school. It is a bad sign to see them educated at the evening school in the street.

A merchant examining a hogshead of hardware, on comparing it with the invoice found all right except one hammer. "Oh, don't be troubled, my boy," said his brother, "Sure the nager took it out to open the hogshead with."

A poor man who had been ill, on being waited by a gentleman whether he had taken a warm bath replied, "No, I ain't taken any myself, but I have taken lots of physic."

A CABLE-TASTIC LAY.

They've gone and done it!—spite of crack,
The cable's laid at last;
Victoria and our Jonathan
Are now made doubly "fast!"

A golden wedding may it prove,
Without or flaw or cracks;
Sea-monsters by fear thrilling lines,
Where once they'd only "smacks!"

A tie that Time shall never break,
Since Time itself fly the course—
Lick'st out by Lightning and the clique
Of that remorseless horse.

A New-found-land the twain have found
Near this new continent;
Had ever "Starke" a fairer Field,
Nor to their "Heart's-Content?"

August adieu! to augurs well,
Tide tic of sheet to shore;
Tis Bruno's tocsin, wire-drawn—
And not so much a bore.

Great Eastern, and ye battle-ships,
Ye know not what ye do!
That tiny thread of inkling wire
Shall whisper "Peace!" to you—

To Earth—to Man! Old Sol himself
May go and rest his team;
A thousand miles an hour's too "slow"
To chase a telegram!

Your cobweb aristocracy—
Grand-Bank-ers, not to dine—
E-cod, they're taken all aback
By such a shocking "line."

Your "Bulls" and "Bears" may pitch and toss,
But win no more the gamey;
Bear-baron keeps the Bulls at Bay,
By bearing all their claims.

Then here's a cheer for Samuel Morse,
His sirlets and abettors!
He hatch'd the little strand-bird—
But Hughes taught him his letters.

"More servents wait on Man"—still more—
Above—below—around;
Winds, water, vapor, fire!—what next?
Look up! The answer's found.

The age of wonders still is ours;
To be is but to force!
Soon, soon shall Man, with wizard power,
Triumphant Rule the Air!

The saying of a White Mountain stage-driver to a New Hampshire man who, "I'yeh! I'll warrant you, I should guv'k around as you folks do up here!" is not bad.

A man in Hartford advertised recently that, on receipt of a certain sum, he would by return mail send a very applicant how to make a fortune. His directions were: "Peddle cigars, half Havana and half home-made, as I did, and always be ready to pick up a stray chicken."

The Cairo Democrat thus pottizes the latest agony of hoops:

"These hoops are like the poet Gray;
This you at once can see;
For they, as Gray did, share the world
A handsome L-E-G-S."

Why ought a greedy man to wear a plaid waistcoat?—To keep a check on his appetite.

When has a man four hands?—When he doubles his fist.

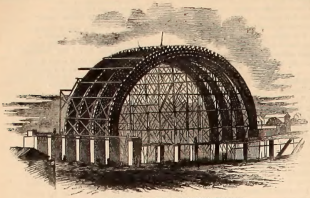
Funny-sounding drums—Conundrums. A good one is very hard to beat.

"Party Tete."—White Chokers.

"How fast wicked men can go on in their sins!" exclaimed a good but unsophisticated old lady; "it only takes two seconds to fight a duel!"

A man out West says that he moved so often during one year that whenever a covered wagon stopped at his gate his chickens would fall on their backs and hold up their feet, in order to be tied and thrown in.

Josh Billings says he has got a good recollection, but not a good memory. He recollects having ten dollars the other night, but don't remember where he lost it.



RATHER MORE THAN A BETTER HALF.

Mr. Meek. "I MAY BE A LITTLE LATE TO-NIGHT, DEAR. DON'T SIT UP FOR ME."

Wife of his Bosom. "I WON'T! I SHALL COME FOR YOU!"

[Mr. M. is home by 10.30.

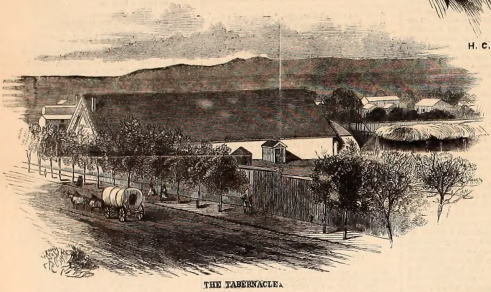
ARCHES OF THE MORMON TEMPLE.



H. C. KIMBALL.

E. SNOW.

A. LYMAN.

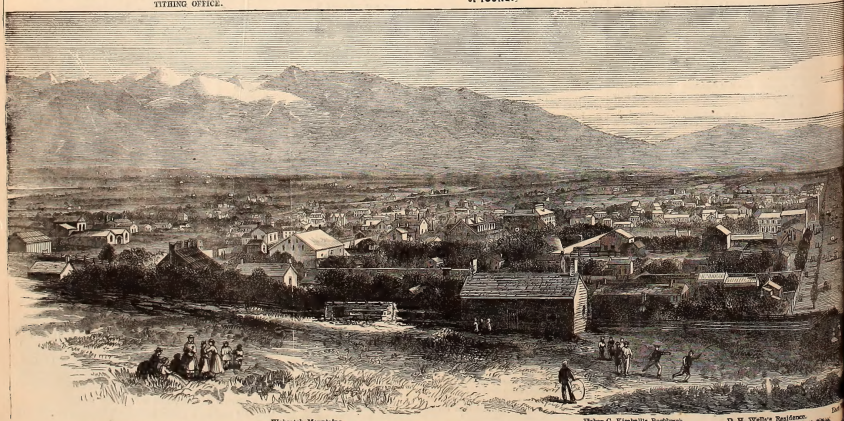
THE TABERNACLE.

G. Q. CANNON.

BRIGH

E. T. BENSON.

O. PRATT.



TITHING OFFICE.

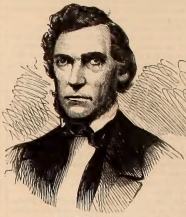
J. YOUNG.

BRIGHAM YOUNG AND THE TWELV

Wahsatch Mountains.

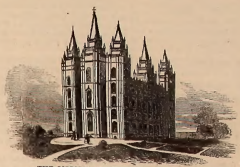
Brigham Young's Stables, Blacksmith's Shop, School-house, Bee-hive House, Printing-office, and Lion House.

Heber C. Kimball's Residence.



D. H. Wells's Residence. Deseret News' Office.

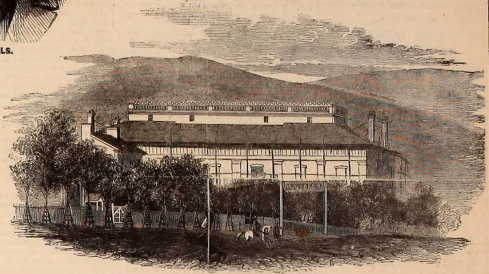
THE CITY AND VALLEY OF THE GREAT SALT LAKE, UTAH.



L. SNOW.

D. WELLS.

THE MORMON TEMPLE WHEN COMPLETED.



J. TAYLOR.

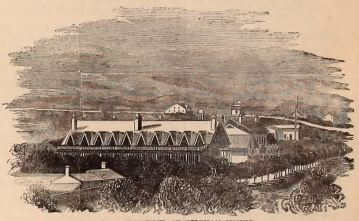
M YOUNG.

F. D. RICHARDS.

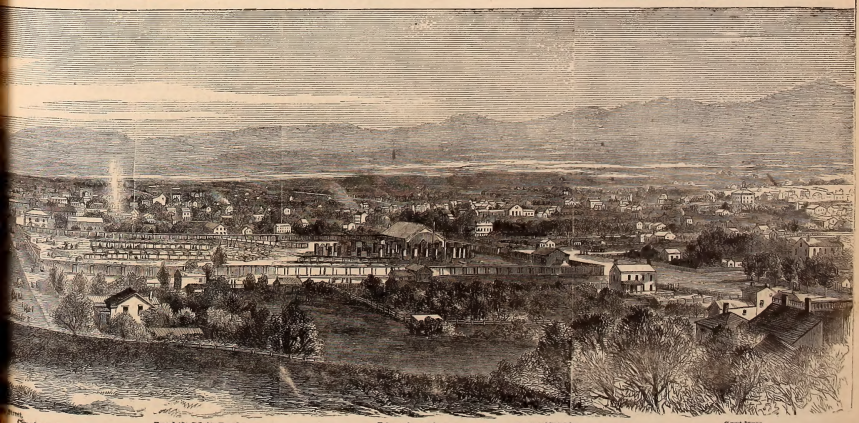
THE NEW THEATRE.

C. C. RICH.

HUFF.



G. A. SMITH.



HUNTER.

APOSTLES OF THE MORMON CHURCH.

RESIDENCE OF BRIGHAM YOUNG.

Council-house. Foundation of the Temple. Tabernacle now in use. Oquirrh Mountains. Endowment House. Court-house.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY SAVAGE & OTTINGER, SALT LAKE CITY.—[SEE PAGE 518.]

SWEETS OF WOMAN'S LIFE.

A babe at rest on mother's breast,
Too young to smile or weep,
Conscious of naught but mother's love—
So sweet is infant's sleep.

A child at play in meadows green,
Plucking the fragrant flowers,
Chasing the bright-wing'd butterflies—
So sweet are childhood's hours.

A maiden fair as early dawn,
Radiant with every grace,
Gladd'ning the eye that looks on her—
So sweet is beauty's face.

A softly blushing, downcast look,
Murmur of startled dove,
Answering another's tender words—
So sweet is maiden's love.

A white-robed virgin kneeling low,
Before God's altar bows,
Forever join'd two hearts and hands—
So sweet are marriage vows.

A youthful mother bending o'er
Her first-born beauteous boy,
Forever here till death shall part—
So sweet a mother's joy.

A matron in life's autumn-time,
With young life clustered o'er,
Her children's children clasp her knees—
So rich is autumn's store.

An aged form, whose dimming eyes
Foretell departing breath,
Are closed by grateful, loving hands—
So sweet is peaceful death.

Six feet of grass-grown flow'ry sod
On earth's kind shelt'ring breast,
Forever from grief and pain—
So sweet eternal rest.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the Southern District of New York.]

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XIII.

It was the prettiest work possible to sow those seeds. First of all, Sam went over the lists carefully, shelling Vick's Catalogue, and laying aside all those seeds which were perfectly hardy, and therefore might be sowed in the open ground. A few of the half-hardy kind must also wait, because they would not bear transplanting; while two or three hardy ones must be sowed in pots, because, unless transplanted, they would not come to their full double perfection.

The next thing was to choose out flower-pots—to find how many would go in each little green-house box—or rather, how many must go, to hold the different kinds of seeds, and then to pick them out of such a size as the box would hold. Then in the bottom of each, over the little round hole, Sam laid a bit of a broken flower-pot, and over that several more bits. That was for "drainage," he told the children; the first bit to keep the earth from running off through the hole, and the rest to prevent its ever getting sodden and clogged beneath the plants. Then the pots must all be filled with the prepared earth—not quite full, but within an inch or so of the top; and here the new trowels came in play. It was charming work to take up a trowelful of the earth and pour it carefully into a flower-pot! and Sam showed the children how to shake it down, and pick off all the lumps from the surface, to leave a smooth, soft, even place for the seeds. But to put them in, and cover them, and press down the earth again, was really a work of art. Each kind of seeds were of such different sizes! Here were Clover's hyacinth beans, large, stout things, that looked quite able to take care of themselves; and Sam put the petunia seed, so small and fine that it seemed as if a puff of wind might blow it all away. Lily's canna seeds, too, must be soaked in hot water; and every thing must have a label; so, altogether, it was quite a complicated affair.

"Mr. Vick says," remarked Sam, "that about as good a rule as can be given for planting seeds is to cover them twice the depth of their own diameter."

"But what's their diameter?" said Prim.

"The distance straight through the seed, from one side to the other."

"Dear me! but we can't measure," said Lily.

"No, you must look well at the seed and guess—measure by eye."

"I could measure these," said Clover, handling her hyacinth beans; "but some of the seeds are so very little, Sam!"

"Well, those smallest of all you don't cover at all," said her brother; "or, at least, only in this way: See! you make the earth just as smooth and soft and even as you can all over the top, and then you sprinkle the seeds very thinly on it—so."

"Why don't you sprinkle them thick?" said Lily.

"Because if the plants come up too thick they will be crowded and weak," said Sam; "and then you would have to thin them out, and so throw away a great many plants. And that is troublesome and disagreeable. There, Lily, scatter just a few of your petunia seeds on the earth. Now if they were larger we would scatter or sift some earth over them; but as they are so very small you can take your hand, or the bottom of this other flower-pot, and press the earth and seeds gently down together. There!—that will cover them sufficiently."

"Where shall I stick my label?—in the middle?" said Lily.

"Why no! you would poke down ever so many seeds with it. Stick it in close at the edge of the pot, and next time put it in before you sow the seeds. But stay, have you written on it?"

"Yes. Oh, I guess it will do," said Lily, leveling the label with an unwilling hand. Sam looked at it and shook his head. Lily had written first a very large P, which took up so much of the little slip of wood that the following letters were quite matter of conjecture, and, indeed, she could get no further than the second syllable.

"How are you going to know that from pinks?" said Sam, whittling the letters off with his knife. "Don't you write too small a little label like this. If I were you I would put only numbers—write No. 1 on this label, and then No. 1 on the bag of petunia seed."

"What an excellent plan!" said Clover. "But wouldn't ink be better?"

"Ink will run on this soft wood. No, the pencil-marks will last long enough, if they're made on a smooth surface; but if you wanted them sure to wear out, then the way is to brush over the label with a little white lead, such as painters use, and write on it while it is wet with the same pencil; and then you have an indelible label."

So the planting went on with great zeal and success; and the little paper bags, and the boxes, and the green-house boxes grew full of pots; and the children were brimming with a delight that could hardly even talk in its rapt excitement.

"Why should I sow only part of my pinks here?" inquired Lily, in answer to some counsel of Sam's.

"Because, if these should not do well, you would have seed left to try again," replied Sam.

"Then I'd better save some of all the kinds," said Lily. "What a pity! I've got every one of my canna seeds in the hot water! Will it do to take some of them out?"

"Not after they have once been in," said Sam. "But cannas are worth nothing—will make no show—unless they are planted early, so it was best to sow them all at once."

"How many things there are to think of in gardening!" said Clover, covering her zinnia seeds with a light hand. "Sam, I'm afraid our boxes won't be very warm out here."

"No, indeed. Perhaps mamma will admit them to the low room."

"I'll run in this minute and ask her!" cried Prim. Which she did; and of course mamma said yes.

So when all the seeds were sown—that was to be to planted then—Sam carried the boxes into the house and set them on a kitchen table that was already placed in the window, and with very pretty they looked, with the little red pots full of brown earth, and the neat labels, and the clean bright panes of glass shining above every all. Sam darted in to look at them, and the three children stood bending over them in a half-bewitched state.

"Must we keep these panes of glass tight shut all the time?" said Clover.

"Yes, in order to-day. Sometimes at mid-day, if it gets very warm, you can raise one of them a little, or slip it aside, just to let in air."

Lily lifted one of the panes and thrust in her finger.

"Oh, Sam, it's real warm in there now," she said.

"So it ought to be. It will hardly be too warm before the seeds come up."

"Will they come up to-morrow, Sam?" said little Primrose.

"To-morrow! Have you any idea of the work that must be done down in that brown earth before your seeds come up?"

"Oh, Sam, that is just what I want to know," cried Clover. "I think there never was any thing quite so beautiful as our boxes and seeds. I'd like to study them all day."

"Well, you can study them from a new point of view now," said Sam, laughing, "for there comes Maria Jarvis. She'll give you lessons!" And Sam marched off at the sound of the bell, and threw open the door to welcome her friend, and Clover and Primrose followed more slowly. If the truth must be told, they would rather have watched their boxes just then.

"How do you do?" said Maria Jarvis, making great efforts to arrange her short hoop to her satisfaction. "Mamma had business to do in the village, and so I thought I'd come and see what you were about. I suppose you haven't done much to it yet."

"Sam has dug up part of my garden," said Lily, innocently.

"Oh, is Sam your gardener?" said Maria. "Our gardener is named William. He's a head gardener, you know; and then there's Patrick and Michael besides. William's the best gardener in the country, I suppose. A great many people call him Mr. Stubbs."

"Lily was talking of our gardens, not of pap's," said Clover; a little shocked at her sister's words. "And no words ready. "And in our gardens my brother Sam is head gardener, and we're to be Patrick and Michael ourselves. Don't you have a garden for yourself too?"

"Oh yes, but William takes care of it," said Maria. "I couldn't, you know, do such work. My! I don't know how many frocks I should want if I did any thing but walk in the garden. I've just had ten new ones made for the summer, and mamma said it was such a plague to arrange to have 'em all different, the trimmings and all—I guess she couldn't wait to get over to Miss Simmons (that's our dress-maker in town), she's really a very clever young person, mamma says; and when mamma was quite worn out with the trimmings, and didn't know what to do with my pink foulard, Miss Simmons went about and about all over town till she found some rose-bugs. Just the thing for a pink dress, you know; and she put rose-bugs here—and here—and here—all over it. Mamma was delighted. I'll show it to you the next time you come. What's your best dress?"

"White muslin," said Clover.

"White muslin's very nice if it's trimmed all round the bottom with colored ribbon," said Maria. "I've got two made so, a pink and a green; and I've got another embroidered all over with blue spots."

"What flowers are you going to have in your garden, Maria?" said Clover, trying to get upon some subject where Lily and she would feel at home.

"Oh, I don't know; just what William puts there," said Maria. "He always has something new every spring, papa says."

"I shall have pinks in mine," said Lily.

"Pinks are very old-fashioned," answered Maria. "So William says. I suppose you'll have fuchsias, of course."

"No, I guess not," said Clover; "we shall not. I don't know what papa may do."

"Oh yes, you must have fuchsias," said Maria. "And then in the green-house you must have geraniums and myrtle-bushes—things that won't grow in every village window, as papa says."

"But we have a green-house," said Clover.

"Oh, but of course you'll build one," said Maria. "Sarah had the most beautiful present the other day!—from papa, you know, she's engaged to, the same one that gave her the bracelet. It's a butterfly for her hair."

"I should like a butterfly on my hair," said Primrose, decidedly.

"Now a real one, you little goose," said Maria. "It's all gold and enamel, and ruby eyes, and diamond spots. And it claps into her hair, so—just like a brooch. It's the sweetest thing! So suitable for summer, don't you think?"

"Well, won't you come and see what we have for a green-house?" said Clover, leading the way to the house; and Sam and Prim were there before. self, and we've just been planting our seeds. And mamma is going to tell us how they grow."

"How they grow!" said Maria. "Well, you are the strangest girl! It must be a great deal of trouble to take care of such little boxes, I should think. And papa says it's no use unless it's worth much. Quantity, quantity—and what other people don't have—that's what papa likes. But I hope you'll bring them to me. Good-by. I've had a delightful time, and I'll show you all my flowers when you come, and Sarah's butterfly. Good-by!"

And away walked the visitor, after which Clover and Lily stood gazing with bewildered eyes.

QUITE UNEXPECTED.

I.—A "SUSPICIOUS CHARACTER."

Aros Wynne was simply a tenant farmer, cultivating a few acres preferable of some five hundred acres which his father had farmed before him, and his grandfather before his father. If it were known that Aros Wynne would hardly have required three generations of diggers and delvers to work at it without gaining enough to leave it and go to something better than tenant farming.

Aros had grown up steady and industrious; had married a good wife, though a poor one; after his father's death he had managed the farm prudently; and, being a man of considerable natural shrewdness, had actually saved money and was looking forward to educating his children in life a little more advantageously than he and his brothers had had to start. But unhappily he was one of those who had not the least idea of economy's old-fashioned virtues. Intoxicated with the prospect of doubling in a year or two the savings of twenty years, his head had been turned by the many many a wiser head. He had let the glozing tongue of a neighbor persuade him to buy railway shares at a great premium, he had given them up at a greater premium, and he had waited for a greater still. Then when the crash came he had been one of those who were caught and had lost actually all his savings. Just now, too, a new misfortune had befallen him which he would have thought little of a year ago, but which was making him in his present reduced circumstances. The murrain had been among his cattle and taken six of the finest beasts. As he walked in his rickyard, thinking sorrowfully for the twentieth time the probable, possible, and I doubt also impossible proceeds of the sale of those ricks, and thought of the price of the bullocks that would be left him after payment of his rent.

Winding down from the hill-fields behind the house, he saw approaching the one on whom he at once put down as belonging to the class of "suspicious characters." He was on the foot-path, it is true, and so could be ordered off. A short, strongly-built man of some sixty or thereabouts, he had the true vagabond air and carriage, with the indefinitely cautious look and activity which are so often denied to people who are not of the vagabond family. He was clean though, and seemed to take some care of his plentiful gray beard and whiskers, which contrasted well with his darkly-bronzed face—a skin that had got its coloring plainly under foreign suns.

He came up to the farmer and addressed him, speaking with the accent and with the understanding his staff to such an extent that Aros involuntarily raised his hands to protect his ears. He had a practised impediment in his speech, spoke with a strong foreign accent, and was evidently quite ignorant of his locality. Conversation, therefore, was by no means easy. Aros gathered at last that he wanted to be directed on his way to Rudyard and to be told the distance. The way was straight enough, the distance was six miles, and Aros was already growing dark and not over good road, he recommended him to lose as little time as possible. He took more unfortunately and stumbled, only a hundred yards or so back, and sprained his ankle; so before going on he sat down at the foot of one of the ricks, pulled off his boot and stocking to look at and rub the sprain; and having done so, found all his efforts to get on his boot and walk again less. Certainly Amos Wynne had to confess that he tried his best to walk and go about his business, spite of the evident torture it was to him. It was plain, indeed, that he was as unwilling to ask a night's lodging as Amos was to offer it. The request was not made at last, however, and could be no less than granted. Leading the way into his house, the stranger followed him. The refinements of drawing-room and dining-room were unknown in Amos Wynne's simple homestead. There was a large kitchen, well hung with bacon, where the family ate and lived at their every meal. And there was a parlor or "house-room," where the rest of the family spent their leisure hours. "Come in and sit down," said Amos, leading him into the kitchen at the back-door, and at once going forward himself to tell his wife in the other room of the unexpected guest. The stranger followed close upon his heels, entered this other room with him, carrying the inexpressible boot in one hand, and limping painfully. It was evident he had not understood his invitation to be to sit with the servants, and though a little taken aback, as Amos was, there was something in the man's graceful bow, and in the quiet self-possession with which he saluted all in the room, that hinted at the possibility of a servants' kitchen not being perhaps his proper place, at his having perhaps looked on better days, and even to his having been a welcome guest and friend of guest.

"Would you, madam, give me a slipper?" he asked, seating himself on one of the vacant chairs by the fire, and taking a foot on his knee as if he had known the family all his life.

Tea was brought in, and he drew up to table and evidently enjoyed his meal, and continued to be so attentive to the two daughters as to win the good opinion of those young ladies, and make their brother-in-law, Aros, his fa-vorled lover of one of them, a little sensible of their own remissness. Then, as the evening wore on, Amos naturally wished his guest to be asked his name, and to him. Whereupon out came from the stranger's pocket the blackest and best of meerschaums and a pouch of tobacco, which Amos were forced to confess was the finest of any thing he had ever smoked in his life. And as smoking by the fire is of itself dry work, in the shape of a little bottle of whisky was produced, and two modest tumblers were mixed, and Amos actually found that he was admitting this stranger, whom he had at first not seen, into a great deal of his confidence. It hardly occurred to him that he was being questioned at all; but little by little he found that he was telling him all—how old Sir Evelyn Rudyard had died a month ago, and the new hair was a cousin who had lived abroad all his life and never even saw the vast estates which had now fallen to him by the death of a childless old man; how desolate the old Hall at Rudyard had been this Christmas-time; and how the poor had missed their annual coals and good cheer. Then, encouraged by the quiet rend-ing, Amos told tenderly to old Sir Evelyn, and ask him for a reduction of his rent; and how, now the old landlord was gone, he did not like to trouble the new one; how there was a farm vacant, and he would have to struggle on. To all of which the stranger listened carefully, putting words of comfort now and then, as one who had himself known trouble.

But the younger people were inclined to merrier ways of passing the evening. Amos Wynne had brought his violin, and was in great perplexity about it. He was the only one who could play upon it, and it was clear he could not dance too; so Bertha had to dance with her brother, to the satisfaction of nobody.

"Let me try it," said the strange guest; and then, shade of Paganini! how he did fiddle! The twinkle of his elbow and the flash of his fiddle-stick were nothing short of marvelous. Amos was no dance, new or old, but he knew the measure of it; and you could see by the involuntary motion of his knee that it not been for the sprained ankle, his sixty years would not have kept him from standing up with the youngest.

At last came the hour for retiring—and that, too, no late hour, for the servants had to be up betimes. In they came, man-servants and maid-servants, and took their departure from the room with the rest of the family. The big family Bible was opened; and Amos, all seriousness and gravity, laying aside the evening's merriment, read out his usual message. It happened that he had come that evening to the parable of the wise and foolish virgins, and to that usual judgment upon the great Day, when those who have fed the hungry, clothed the naked, and rocved the stranger, inasmuch as by so doing they have done it unto Him.

II.—"RAGGED AND TOUGH."

A snowy rest did the sprained ankle a world of good. Early in the morning the stranger was up and prepared to leave. But as the Wynnes were early risers too, and already about to sit down to breakfast, and as he had made himself quite popular the night before, he was urged to stay, and, with slight urging, staid. After breakfast, too, instead of going on his way at once to Rudyard, he, like a man accustomed to have no one to please but himself from boyhood, set out once on the bold resolve to walk off the stiffness of his ankle by no less an undertaking than the ascent of the Wrekin. It is hardly to be called by even the name of a hill to whose eyes—and feet too, indeed—had often rested on the peaks of Switzerland, it looked a modest hillock enough. And what were its two or three patches of snow compared with the eternal glaciers? Till now he had never seen this much-lauded "Wrekin" at all. It was all to him whether he reached Rudyard at night or earlier. No one expected him, he said, rather wearily, or would give him as kind a welcome as he had found last night: he would be as well wandering up and down the Wrekin as any where else; so up the Wrekin he would go, lame or not lame.

Then two of the young men—Gregory Wynne and Harry Dennis—somewhat ashamed, it may be, of having spoken of the ascent of the Shropshire hill with contempt, arming as an immense undertaking to an old man who made so light of it, said that they too would go; and off the three started on their walk. Near as it had seemed, it was close upon two hours—the paths being slippery—before they reached the top and sat down upon the little mound that marks the summit to enjoy the reward of their labors.

On that day there was a meagre prospect. Indeed, for a while the three pedestrians thought themselves alone on the hill. Not another human being was there to be seen. For surely that dirty little heap of unwashed rags, that moved from time to time in and out of sight among the bushes and behind the rocks, could hardly be a human being. Nor did they quite satisfy themselves that it was one till Gregory Wynne, following it up, brought it out from its hiding-place, and revealed it as a boy.

He was a little imp of barely three feet high. Upon his head he wore the remains of what had once been a cap, but now more nearly resembled a coronet, there being but little of it left save the rim. His hair stood up through the middle of it, not unlike a bunch of shabby plumes. The actual garments, which did what they could toward covering the upper half of his body, had once been in two pieces—coat and waistcoat, that is, at some advanced period of its history, been made into one. But how many pieces it would have been in new, if luxuriantly taken off, it would have been hard to say. There was a greater proportion of leg visible than would have been reckoned decorous even by a Highlander. Indeed, had it not been for two or three pieces of string judiciously tied tight round each leg, above and below the knee, the trowsers and jacket wearer must have altogether parted company. His boots showed a novel principle of construction—or, at any rate, of adaptation —which might commend them to the notice of that father of a family of growing boys. The soles and upper leathers having long parted company, the way of getting them appeared to be, first, to place the foot firmly on the sole, then put the upper leather (which was open at the side) over it, and tie the two together with a stout piece of string. The more obvious objections to this fashion, for winter wear, naturally suggest themselves in the exposure of the toes at one end of the structure and the heel at the other. At any rate, by a copious use of string, evidently a primary article in his toilet, the small creature did entitle himself to be considered a clothed human being.

"What's your name?" asked the elder stranger.

"Jack Bolton—Jem's but at the blacksmith's shop they call me 'Ragged and Tough.' What's yours?" replied the boy.

"Mine," said the old man, "is Peter. How old are you?"

"Eight last Michaelmas. What else besides Peter? and how old are you?"

"Peter Lameley; sixty-two," said the old man. Harry Dennis was smoking—he was almost ashamed to confess it, so early in the morning, but it was an exceptional case with him. Said the youngster, "I'll give you a penny for your cigar."

Harry explained that it had cost him threepence, so he could not part with it at that rate. Moreover, he had not got another.

"I'll give you threepence for it," said the child, producing the money. But it appearing that business could not be transacted at that or any other rate, he had to be content with a promise of the reversion of the end of the cigar when done with—had to be content, or at least to seem so.

By-and-by Mr. Lameley, encouraged by the younger man's example, was seduced into lighting his pipe, and he also done so, laid his tobacco-pouch for a moment on the rock beside him. In an instant, and with a scream of exultation, it was pounced upon by Ragged and Tough, and he was bounding with it down the rocks, where no one with any regard to the soundness of his limbs could follow except at the slowest rate. They were sitting on the edge of a deep ravine, the opposite wall of which was distant only a few yards.

In less time than it takes to read these two or three lines, the lad had descended the gorge, had climbed the opposite side, had mounted a tree in front, and was grinned at from across the chasm, while he deliberately produced a short black pipe, filled it, lit it, and immediately shewed, by the methodical way in which he smoked it, that he was no new hand at a pipe.

He was still within easy speaking distance; and as it was impossible to use threatening him or scaring him away, negotiations were opened with him across the chasm.

"Now, my boy, bring it back," said the old man.

"Ca—cu—come and fe—fe—fetch it," he replied, mimicking his stammer; "will you thrash me if I bring it?"

"No."

"Will you give me another pipe?"

"Yes."

Then he deliberately helped himself to another pipe, good measure, wrapped it in a bit of his jacket that he tore off for the purpose, pocketed it, came back, gave up the pouch, and sat down by its owner, trusting fearlessly to the promise that he was not to be thrashed.

Every body has heard of the Irish lad who boasted that he watched himself once a week or twice if needed in order. Our poor little Jack, it was clear, knew nothing of such sanitary regulations, and confessed, without any hesitation, that he never washed himself at all; which, indeed, no one could have suspected him of doing. Being questioned as to his earnings, he said that in fine weather he sometimes got as much as a shilling a day, in bad weather hardly a sixpence—sometimes nothing. He produced eighteen pence in copper, threpence of yesterday's money, and threpence gained this morning. At night, he said, he generally bought a penn'orth of bread, a penn'orth of pudding, and a penn'orth of meat for his supper, two penn'orth of ale to drink after it, and a penn'orth of tobacco to smoke. His breakfast cost him threpence when he had any. Sometimes he gave his sister a penny or two when he saw her walking about in the cold; and sometimes she gave him a penny or two when she had any.

"Did he never take his money home to his mother?" Harry Dennis asked.

"No; she would drink it all."

"Nor to his father?"

"No; he would drink it faster than she would, and I would sooner drink it myself."

"What, do you drink too?"

"Yes, when I have the money to spare. Eh! I was drunk on Saturday night."

When he had not drunk all his money he hid it under a stone in the quarry, to his mother, and took it up again in the morning, if he happened to be there first; but his mother often found out where he put it.

Then turning the conversation to the subject of clothing, young Wynne tried to impress upon him the advantages of spending his spare money on the clothes instead of drink. "If you put away twopence a day for a week that will be a shilling, and you can buy a new cap," a proposition which was readily admitted and approved. "Then, if you put away twopence a day for another week, you can buy a pair of second-hand boots."

"Where?" interrupted he, jumping quickly to his feet.

"Well, at any rate you could in a fortnight," said Gregory, puzzled to answer.

"Ah, yes, but you see it's a week," he retorted, being evidently much better informed as to the price of second-hand boots than his instructor.

He had once been to a fair with a pair to sell, but because Swidby Dick kicked him on the shins. It was a Sunday-school, but he didn't remember that there taught him any thing. The next year this hill was called the Wrekin, and he knew that was Wellington. He didn't know where England was, or what a queen was. He didn't know who made the sun, but suspected it was not Harry Dennis.

They had sat longer than the old man meant to sit, and as he had engaged to meet them at the farm, he resolved that he would go straight from the Wrekin top to Rodyard. By doing so he perceived that he would have to walk about a dozen mile, which he would have had to traverse had he gone by way of the farm. But he remembered suddenly that he had a conveyance in his bedroom—a pocket-knife and some keys, I think—which he could not well dispense with. From where they sat they could see the farm in view, and beyond it a mile or so could be seen the point of junction of its by-road with the road along which the stranger would have to travel in the direct way. He pointed out these places to the urchin, Ragged and Tough, and asked him if he would run round by the farm-house, get his things, and meet him with them at the corner for the reward of threepence, a commission which the urchin undertook on gaining assurance that Gregory to produce as his credentials, and asking them also to give him something to eat.

"But can I trust you to bring me them when you have got them?" said Harry Dennis.

The lad seemed to understand at once that it was his honesty that was in question. "A man gave me half a crown once to carry a parcel, and I took it him back. Keep my money till I bring them," he said, and, tossing his coppers at their feet, started off at a run, and was soon lost to sight on the other side of the hill. They saw him here and there in the fields as he drew away from the base beneath them, and watched him in one place where he stopped for a while to stile, till at the last, with the help of a glass which one of the young men carried, they saw him, in mere specks, make the gate which led to the farm and disappear. Then they rose and went down hill leisurely on the direct road to Rodyard, the young men going with their companion's pace to the top.

Coming in due time to a cross-road which led to the Arkull Farm, the young men shook hands with their friend, who, after a brief leave-taking, turned, and he, with many kind words of thanks for the hospitality he had received, pursued his journey alone. He had not gone far when the farm-buildings he had expected to find his young messenger waiting. In this, however, he had been too sanguine, and after he had sat and waited among them hour, casting meanwhile very impatient glances toward the farm, he had, after all, to make up his mind to walk on to the farm-house for them. It was full in sight, but separated from him by a valley which, after the walk up the Wrekin, he would have rather not have seen, especially as the lamest foot began to remind him that it was as yet hardly sound again.

As he walked on with a rather visible limp, and still more visible ill-temper, he was suddenly brought to a stand by the appearance of the rain-cloud that the fire had begun, and it was too clear that but little could be done to stay the progress of the flames. The ricks stood in a group of four each, and the fire had begun in the second one of the inner row. Happily there was not much wind, but the little there was, while it bore the flames away from the house and the farm-buildings, bore them on to the other ricks, and already three of the eight were blazing furiously. The house, or any portion of them, was clearly hopeless. Amos Wynne and his family, and the men who had hurried in from the neighboring fields, were doing their best, but working without concert, or any common object. Indeed, on Amos himself the catastrophe had seemed to come so crushingly, that he was more inclined to stand by in silent despair than to struggle against it. "Robbery, and murrain, and fire," he murmured to himself; "O God! who sendest me the plagues of Job, send me his patience, too, and his happy deliverance." They had broken a hole through the back-room pane, and were running to and fro with all the buckets that could be got together, pouring their dribblets of water wherever they thought they could.

The stranger's coat and hat were flung aside in an instant. "Now, my man, to work here!" he shouted, in a voice that was clearly used to command. Loose straw was lying between all the ricks, and the flames leaped by its aid from one to the other with fearful rapidity. He saw at a glance which of the stacks were certainly lost, and which it might be possible to save. To clear away this loose straw was the first task. He did not merely order what was to be done, but he did more of the work than any two other men. Then he divided his forces—one half he set to work to pull down and carry out two of the ricks that were sure to take fire next if nothing were done to save them. But as he knew it would be impossible to get more than half of them down, he put the rest of the men to another task. Long ladders were in large hand for cutting stable manure. He had it brought as rapidly as possible and piled between the stacks on fire and the stacks in danger, more especially as Arkull lay as they could against the sides of those in danger. Then, as he saw the flames gaining on them, three cases of gin were drawn the stacks—having got them perhaps half down—and began to spread this manure thickly over the top of the parts of the stacks left standing. The shut of hard labor they managed to get these two stacks well covered, and by this time help having come from neighboring farms, they succeeded also to get the unpiled here in front of the burning stacks well drenched with water. In the midst of all it began to snow heavily, and this helped a little, forming a thin covering on the manure. Happily when the flames reached them, as they soon did, they found that their movements were being watched all better for them, but were stopped by their barricade. When the parish engine arrived and began to play upon the nearest of the burning ricks, it was seen that the worst was over.

But, indeed, the worst was bad enough for poor Amos Wynne. His fire insurance policy had expired three weeks before, and he, intending to renew it, had unfortunately not renewed it at all. Such a loss to him, coming at such a time, was little short of ruin, and he thought more wearily than ever of his poor wheat. While the burning of what was lost, however, he was not quite oblivious of what was saved, or of him to whom he owned that he was indebted. "I owe you much," he said to the old man; "pray come in and let me thank you, and thank the good Providence that sent you to me at such a time."

As they went in they overtook two of the men who had come with the fire-engine. They were carrying between them the body of a child. A poor rags that hung about him were drenched with water and littered with manure. The poor little face was blackened with smoke and ashes. The poor little limbs lay motionless. It was the body of poor "Ragged and Tough."

III.—THE NEW LANDLORD.

Turn, then, was how the old year was to end for Amos Wynne. But the new had day, and to-morrow came in the new one. What a mockery it would seem to wish him a Happy New Year! When he got into his room he sat down, covered his face with his hands, and bowed his head to his knees in silent despair.

The stranger had followed the two firemen into the kitchen, and they had deposited their senseless burden on the table. Another man immediately produced a flask, and the short black pipe which he had picked up close to where they had found the child. Gregory Wynne was standing by the old farm-house door, looking again at once, and remarked to each other that the origin of the fire was explained.

"It is so clear," said the stranger, "that your father has any thing to thank me for. If I had not sent the lad here this would never have happened."

It proved that the child was dead, though at first they had thought him so. He was indeed fearfully burned, and there could be little hope of his recovery. Presently he breathed, opened his eyes, and, the sense of pain returning with the sense of life, moaned feebly. Then he became conscious, and those from which there was most danger, were those where the fire had deadened all feeling in the poor child's body, and he felt no pain at all. The smaller and more painful burns were dressed with soothing oils and lint. Mrs. Wynne had been dressing the wounds of the mischief the boy had wrought them, seeing only his poor scorched body and his helplessness, worked with tender fingers and eyes full of tears. A little while restored him so far that he could tell his story. It was a very plain, straightforward one, and the sum of it was this:

He had got the trifles he had been sent to fetch.

"They are in my pocket," he said to the old man, not expecting to find his pocket and trowsers had been burned off his legs.

They had given him a good dinner in the kitchen and had sent the farm-servants, delighted with his precocious prattle, had also given him, unknown to any one else, some ale. Then he had left to go on his errand, but at the gate his quick eye had seen the three whom he had left coming down the hill after all, and, having time to spare, the possession of tobacco had proved too great a temptation for him. He had stolen into the rick-yard, sat down behind the second rick, and smoked part of his pipe. Then, hearing some one coming, he had run off to finish it behind a more distant stack, and there he had fallen asleep. This much he could tell of himself, the rest was easily put together. At the first of his smoking-places the fire had broken out after he had removed. His second hiding-place had only been reached by the fire in its expiring efforts, and there he had been hurled unperceived, partly with straw, partly with manure. He confessed that this burying of him awaked him, but at first he durst not come out for fear of being whipped, and he lay still, not knowing what was wrong. Then afterward, when he had tried to get out he could not; and he remembered no more.

They told him of the fire and of the damage he had done.

"You won't thrash me?" he asked, pitifully. (The attention of a thrashing seemed to be the only attention he had ever received from any one, and he could hardly believe that he was to escape without one now.) "You can give them my money, to pay for the stacks, Mr. Lameley," he added, suddenly remembering the eighteen pence which he had left in pledge for his own honesty. Poor Ragged and Tough appeared to be less conversant with the value of corn-stacks than with the value of second-hand boots. But having thus made that pecuniary amends he could, he seemed easier and more hopeful of good treatment.

Appeals reminded by the child's last words, the old man left him and went in to Amos Wynne.

"And what do you think will be the extent of your loss?" he said.

"Four hundred pounds, not less, I am sure," was the answer; "and how to replace it I know no more than you child."

"Don't despair," said the stranger; "your friends will help you, and perhaps the new landlord may be your truest friend after what you have done for him you have been pressed. At any rate I can be of no more use here, and strangers are only in the way at such a time. I will leave you a cash and a crust of bread and cheese, and then I will go."

"I shall be sorry if we never see you or hear of you again," said Amos.

"Oh, but perhaps you will! What are you going to do with the child?"

"Keep him if he is better, or till all is over with him. The doctor says he will probably linger a few days at any rate."

"Then I will be generous as well as of national calamity every one has his own special point of view from which he looks on the misfortune that has befallen him. Mine is common with that of him. As the old man passed the bay-window in which Harry Dennis and Bertha were standing, he heard Harry say, "I hope we shall have to see him off again?"

"I suppose we must," said Bertha; "but I hope it will not be for long."

They were speaking quite openly, so the stranger asked, "What is the matter which has to be seen off?"

"Only our marriage," said Bertha, very frankly, with a smile which was a good deal belied by her eyes. "He was to have come and fetched me in a month."

"Ah, well, you are young; it is only waiting and trusting, and all will come right."

And then in a little while the old man shook hands with them all, and went his way once more, comforting himself with some show of mutual kindness than before.

It was some two hours later. The melancholy dinner, of which no one seemed to have partaken, had been cleared away. Amos Wynne remembered that there was some bitter ale in the cellar which he must needs write for that night's post, and the inkstand and pen could be found. There is seldom wanting in the little bottle of ink in a country farm-house, and it is well if its contents are not either as thick as mud or watered out of all their blackness. The ale was to be found in the bedroom that had been used by the old man. Beside it lay a closely-sealed letter addressed "Mr. Amos Wynne," in a hand unknown to all of them.

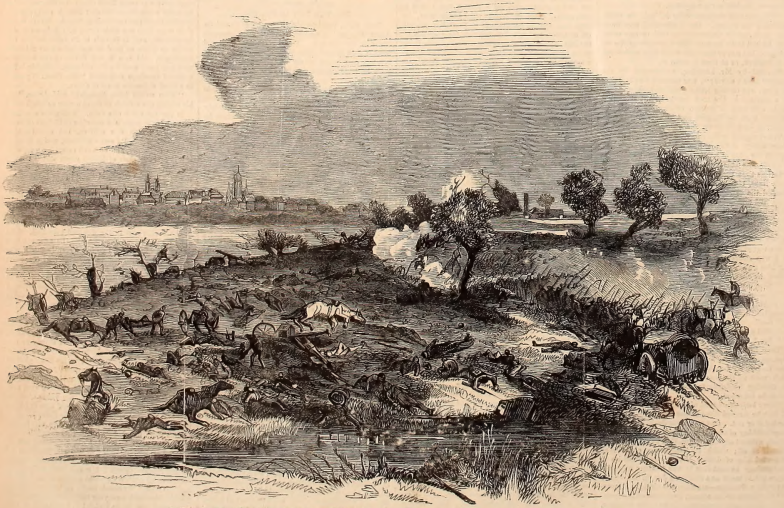
"Who would have thought," said Amos, "of his taking the trouble to leave a note to thank us?"

It was not much of a note. When the envelope was opened it contained merely a half-sheet of notepaper, which was written on one side only. It simply the words, "I was a stranger, and ye took me in"—so signature, and no word more. Along with it was a sheet of folded paper which Amos first out and fluttered to the floor. When unfolded it proved to be a check on the local bank in the neighboring town of Wem for a sum of Seven Hundred and Four hundred pounds. This check was signed P. Rudyard. Mr. Lameley was none other than the new landlord.

That night at Arkull Farm was not so dull a one as the earlier part of the day had promised. The ale was found to be its cask, and the whole of it was welcomed to the world with all seemly mirth not unmixed with solemn thankfulness. Poor little Ragged and Tough was brought in for half an hour, and propped so that his big, bright eyes could look on from out of the bed-clothes upon the strange, wonderful sight of a well-lighted room and happy faces. Then he was taken away, patient and happy as before, to sleep.

Mr. Lameley's augury that Amos Wynne might get his rent reduced proved remarkably exact. Ragged and Tough did not die after all, but lived on, and in due time came to be as tough as ever, though never again so ragged; for Sir Peter clothed him first and last. Indeed, when "Swidby Dick" could no longer reach his shins, and had him taught where England is, and who did make the sun, and gave him more schooling than his elders and betters stacks, and even at the last promoted him to be his own boy in buttons. It was also Sir Peter himself who gave away the bride when Bertha and Harry Dennis were married—without that dreadful postponement—and who stood up at the wedding-breakfast and said, stammering as fast as ever, that he hoped (as we may surely hope for all our kindly, patient readers) that if in the unknown future, any year seemed closing on them as darkly as the last had threatened, its clouds might be chased away as quickly—that each year would be ever found to end as brightly, and be as fruitful in happiness as this one bid fair to be.

BATTLES IN GERMANY—THE STORMING OF GITSCHIN, JUNE 28, 1866.



THE BATTLES IN GERMANY.

We give on this page two illustrations relating to the battles in Bohemia, by which the Prussians gaining a series of victories which were consummated on July 3, in the disastrous defeat of the Austrians at Sadowa, overcame every obstacle to their rapid and successful march against Vienna. The latest news by the cable left the Prussian army in front of Vienna, and at this stage of the hostilities an armistice had been entered upon with a view to peace-negotiations.

But notwithstanding this recent intelligence it will be interesting to our readers to turn back to those terrible contests, the results of which, in the reconstruction of Germany, are still to be made known. For this purpose we have published two engravings, one illustrating the storming of Gitschin, the other giving a view of the battle-field of Königgrätz, the evening after the contest.

THE STORMING OF GITSCHIN.

On the 27th and 28th of June had been fought the battles of Nachod and Trautenau, each of which had resulted in a victory for the Prussians. A third and equally bloody engagement occurred on the 28th, near Muenchengratz, fifty miles west of the battle-fields just mentioned. The Prussian troops employed on this occasion belong to the first army, under the command of Prince FREDERICK CHARLES, and had penetrated into Bohemia from Saxony by way of Reichenberg. The day previously Turnau, at the junction of the North Bohemian railways, had been occupied by them. Moving thence in a south-western direction, they found themselves confronted, it is reported, by 50,000 or 60,000 Austrians and 20,000 Saxons. The enemy had taken up a strong position on the top of a hill, contesting the possession of it with great obstinacy. The loss on both sides was about equal, but success remained with the Prussians, who immediately advanced in a southeastern direction to Gitschin, a place well known in history as one of Wallenstein's possessions. The great General lies buried here in the Convent of the Carthusians. The town lies some fourteen or fifteen English miles southeast of Muenchengratz and of Turnau, with which two places it forms a triangle. It is situated on the Cydlina, one of the confluents of the Elbe. From the positions occupied, according to the latest reports, by the second army under the command of the Crown Prince, Gitschin is distant about twenty-three to twenty-six English miles. It constitutes very nearly the central point of the road leading from Jung-Bunzlau over Sobotka, Gitschin, and Horzitz to Josephstadt, respectively, to Königgrätz, and which constitutes, as it were, the string of the bow formed by the railways between Jung-Bunslau, Turnau, Eisenbrod, and Josephstadt. On the 29th ult. the third and fifth divisions carried Gitschin by storm, inflicting a loss of 1,000 men on the Austrians, and making nigh upon 2,000 prisoners. The 24th and 64th regiments, well known as having distinguished themselves in the assault on Chappel, shone again conspicuous in their feats of arms. In storming the Castle of Gitschin, which was built by Wallenstein in 1610, they are reported to have climbed up the walls like cats, despite the fierce fire with which they were received. The Prussian losses in the storming of the town and castle are reported at very heavy, the position being naturally strong and the resistance of the Austrians most determined.

BATTLES IN GERMANY—THE BATTLE-FIELD OF KÖNIGGRATZ AT 9 O'CLOCK P.M., JULY 3, 1866.

A correspondent writes: "The Prussians, advancing from the direction of Turnau on Gitschin, had a fight at the villages of Podultz and Diletz, which were held by Austrian and Saxon troops, supported by artillery and three of Austria's finest cavalry regiments. According to the report of the prisoners, the King of Saxony himself took part in the fight. After a severe struggle both villages were carried, and the Prussians made for the Lochow Road in order to cut off the retreat of the Austrians, who were retiring from Lochow on Gitschin. The Austrian cavalry charged the advancing Prussians, but the latter received them without forming square, and the horsemen recoiled, broken by their steady fire. The Austrian troops in Brada and the Saxons and Austrians in Diletz were quite separated by the capture of the village of Podultz, and the former were almost entirely taken; the latter were cut off from retreat in large numbers. The loss of the Saxons between Diletz and Gitschin was tremendous; they fell thickly, and the ground was covered with corpses. The Prussians suffered much, but they fought most bravely, and, with only four regiments and half as many guns as their opponents, carried a very strong position held by a much superior force; for the Prussians had in the field but 16,000 men, and the allied strength is estimated at 40,000. At Diletz the Prussians lie more thickly than at Lochow, for the more numerous artillery of the defenders plowed with terrible effect through the dense columns of the assailants as they advanced to the attack. But between Diletz and Gitschin the ground is covered with broken arms, knapsacks, shakos, and fallen men, who are mostly either Saxons or Austrians, for here the needle-gun was more used than artillery. The Prussians took about 7000 prisoners in the two combats, and the Austrian loss in killed and wounded was estimated at 2000. On the 29th the Prussian head-quarters were moved to Sobotka, and the army took up a position in front of Gitschin, prepared for battle. In the afternoon the strategic object of the movements of the two Prussian armies was achieved, and communications were opened in Bohemia between Prince Frederick Charles and the Crown Prince."

On the 24 of July the King of Prussia arrived at Pischin, where he was received by Prince Frederick Charles. The streets every where showed the traces of the obstinate engagement which had been continued within the town. The enemy had fled in disorder under cover of the night. By the victory of Gitschin the junction of the two armies under Prince Charles and Frederic William, the Crown Prince, was made possible.

ERASTUS W. SMITH, A.P.D.—(Photographed by Gurney & Son, New York.)

Benedek in the mean while, after the defeat of the Saxons, had found it necessary to fall back to Königgrätz.

THE BATTLE OF KONIGGRATZ, OR SADOWA.

We have on a previous occasion given the details of this battle. Our illustration represents the battle-field as it appeared at nine o'clock P.M. after the conflict. The battle was fought July 3, and lasted twelve hours. Early in the morning the Prussian army, commanded by the King in person, met the Austrian army under Marshal Benedek, between Horitz and Königgrätz. For six hours the Austrians obstinately defended a strong position to the south of Bistritz, which was not taken by storm until two P.M., after which the enemy was quickly driven out of his other positions. By seven P.M. the rout of the Austrians were in full retreat, and their defeat was complete. In this battle the Prussians took 116 guns and upward of 20,000 prisoners.

THE LOST FOUND.

The scene presented in our engraving on this page is one of no rare occurrence at our Police stations. It is a scene of happy reunion both to the bewildered little children, who, having strayed beyond the limits of their neighborhood, and being unable, in their alarm or by reason of their infantile years, to give the friendly policeman any information as to their homes, have been made for the night as comfortable as circumstances permitted; and also to the anxious parents, who, after a night of agonized apprehension, have at last found the unhappy wanderers.

ERASTUS W. SMITH, A.P.D.

On the 18th of May last the New York University conferred upon Mr. Erastus W. Smith, the subject of this sketch, the honorary degree of "Doctor Philosophiæ Artium" (Doctor in Physical Arts). In a letter, accompanying the one from Chancellor Ferris making the announcement, Professor John W. Draper designates this as the first degree of the kind ever conferred in this country, and the highest the University can give. It places the University, as he says, in connection with mechanical engineering, one of the most important and growing professional interests of our city and country.

It may be profitable for those who are toiling in the same arduous department to know how the enviable prominence, which justifies so high a recognition, has been attained.

Mr. Smith is a native of the State of Connecticut. His parents having moved to Ohio when he was at an early age, he was there employed with his father as carpenter and mill-wright. He afterward was occupied for a short time in a steam-engine manufactory in the same State, but soon becoming convinced that a better opportunity for advancement would be found in a first-class establishment, he came to New York, and apprenticed himself to the late James P. Allaire, proprietor of the well-known Allaire Works, for some years the most noted in the country. After four years of service, perceiving that a knowledge of the physical sciences was necessary to the attainment of any thing like distinction in the profession he had chosen, Mr. Surrr relinquished his place, and pursued those studies at the New York University, graduating in the class of 1844. He then returned to the Allaire Works, and toiled faithfully for six years longer, during which period he was, in the words of his respected employer and friend, Mr. Allaire, in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, "employed in every department, from the lowest to the highest. He has been the principal in the construction of some of the best vessels that sail on our waters, sea, and lakes; for capacity and ability I am sure he has no superior (in the compass of my knowledge of men) in his profession."

THE LOST FOUND—A SCENE AT THE POLICE HEAD-QUARTERS, MULBERRY STREET, NEW YORK.

After this long and diversified experience in construction and designing, Mr. Surrr determined to rely upon his talents as Consulting Engineer in preference to making permanent engagement with any one establishment. From this point his advancement has been rapid and complete. The Ocean Steam Navigation Co., the Collin's Line of steamers, the New York and Havre Steamship Co., the New York, New Orleans, and Havana line of steamers, the Merchants' Steamship Co., the Dervish and New York Transportation Co., and the North American Steamship Co., have all, at different times, been under his direction, either in the capacity of Engineer-in-Chief, Constructing Engineer, or Superintendent of Machinery. Many of the largest and finest engines ever built in our country are of his designs and drawings. Among these may be specified the steamboat Metropolis, of the Fall River line; the Mississippi, St. Lawrence, Empire State, and Keystone State, on the Westchester line; the Independence, Favorita, and Oregonian, for the Pacific Ocean.

Passing next into the domain of Civil Engineering, Mr. Surrr is at present Chief Engineer of the new iron bridge at Harlem, and also the sailing Engineer to the Board of Public Works in Chicago, in reference to the tunnel now being constructed under Lake Michigan. Seven important appointments as Consulting and Constructing Engineer are this day held by him, giving evidence of the great confidence reposed in his professional ability, prominent among which should be mentioned his position as Constructing Engineer for Mr. W. H. Webb, in connection with the United States Government for the iron-clad ram Dunderberg.

A consideration of the effect of mechanical engineering upon the results of the last war will convince any one that the recognition of its professors among the foremost has educated is not misplaced. It has well been styled the "Iron War." Mechanical genius gave to our military heroes the power to consummate their triumphs. Invincible ships, resistless weapons, rapid transportation, these were the means which had, at least, much to do with the glorious end.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

THE FRENCH MARKET, NEW ORLEANS.

The French Market, when I visited it, had been in full blast since sunrise, presenting the same appearance as the Fulton or Washington Markets on a Saturday afternoon. Here all the negroes speak French, and many of them wear aubots, those clumsy feet-coverings for sale at several places in the Market. Will it be put down to blind prejudice if the writer states that neither the meat, fish, vegetables, nor fruit are so fine as can be found at the above-named markets? Even in the matter of oranges and bananas they are behindhand, probably owing to the last very few licenses any given for the traffic, and it becomes a monopoly in the hands of a few Italians, who buy in the cheapest market, and sell at exorbitant prices. So well are these estimable foreigners organized that a man coming into port with a cargo of fruit has to take the first offer made him, or run extreme risk of selling at all. Whites, creoles, and negroes elbow about, unpleasantness is abound, and the sun pours over all a blistering heat.

Just in the hottest spot of the whole market the most picturesque object is found, namely, the Indian dealers in herbs and baskets. Grouped around, in stolid indifference to the heat, with heavy folded wraps resting on their heads for protection against the sun, they patiently await customers for their wares, and other herbs and roots. Years ago a large number of these aborigines ornamented the city, but as they grow tame they disappear from the city at fast as from their ancient hunting grounds.

In connection with the excitement consequent upon the New Orleans riot I have made a sketch, giving a street view in that city. The scene is laid on St. Charles Street, and represents the march of Phil Sheridan's troops through the city. The building in the distance is the St. Charles Hotel.

A. R. W.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Leaving our own bustling metropolis en route for Eastern sections, one can not but remark the more staid and quiet demeanor of the citizens of the New England States. Even if you chance to reach New Haven on a Commencement day, it is evident that nobody is greatly excited. The College yard undoubtedly conceal some anxious faces and restless feet, but little of this appears without. All is very proper, of course, and there is no unseemly crowd even on the College Green. Class meetings and Commencement exercises chiefly interest these unemotional and reserved strangers. To the inhabitants of New Haven these things are an "old story." So a majority of them seem to think, hence, cordially extending hospitality to the many friends who take this time to visit them! To be sure a goodly number of the young ladies show their bright faces in the galleries, or on either side of the stage, some time during Commencement exercise. But then, in general, each one has a "friend" who takes a part, or she has a friend who has a "friend" who takes a part; and, by keeping your eyes open, you can almost "guess" who is the special "friend," by watching the ingress and egress of fair, flushed faces and dainty little hats. Even the class-honored "Professor's Lady" awakens little interest among these who for years have heard the same invitation extended to "classes and strangers." So that, although New Haven is proud of Old Yale, she is not much moved from the even tenor of her way by the annual recurrence of its Commencements.

In Boston, also, there is a marked difference in the manner of the people. The universal rush and hurry and "bubbub" which is so characteristic of New York is quite wanting at the "Hub." Business men walk with a certain grave deliberation which indicates a sense of their stability. They do not seem to fancy that five minutes more or less can either make or mar their fortunes. Even in Washington Street, which is slowly wending its way at the corner of the street, without much danger of being knocked down by some madly-driven vehicle, though indeed the narrow sidewalks would afford some excuse for close contact.

In promenading the streets of Boston one is struck by the great abundance of fresh fruit temptingly displayed. Peaches, pears, and small cherries are common for twenty cents. The bill of fare indicates a similar difference in many articles. We wonder if the disgruntled outlines of "as we go East" and query if "as we go West" when we pay to be quartered a while among the forests of the Aroostook?

It is certainly not a bad injunction to practice upon which Dr. Hall gives in reference to the cholera: "Don't in mind always to be looking for a premature death!" will be the result of personal and domiciliary cleanliness, of a plain and regular mode of living, and of a composed, confident, and cheerful state of the mind. A special caution not to continue any labor or occupation until exhaustion follows. "The best way to avoid fear is when the feeling of tiredness first begins to force itself upon the notice."

"There are comparatively few persons who, in times of sudden alarm, whether it be of fire or water, sickness or accident, possess entire presence of mind. It is in such a natural gift, but may be cultivated to a certain degree." says A lady, living in the interior of New York State, whose handsome residence was burned to the ground last winter, told us the following story of herself and maid, who threw a looking-glass out of the window, and then carefully carry a mattress down stairs, "with the best hotel of such things, but had never been an eye-witness before. The Portland Transcript says that one gentleman left his office for his home during the alarm of fire with a pair of cowlpegs in his hand, when a valuable article by wife, in much wider fit of excitement, was left behind. One lady went into the street with a new tin pail in her hand, when her silver-ware, which was in the burning house, was quickly accessible. In the excitement of the moment we honestly confess that all are liable to sudden alarms, and to decide mentally what to do in certain cases.

The following is said to be a reliable matrimonial statistics in regard to the recent graduating class in Yale College. The information will be interesting to young ladies generally:

Engaged	18
Now stands in favor of promise	6
Will not marry till the governor is willing	19
Will not marry till they can get a wife	1
Will not marry till their wife can support them	92
Like children, should be seen and not heard from	9
Wedded to their pipes and slippers	25

A lady who was graduated from one of the institution has been obtained respecting five of the class—perhaps they are already married! Of these 2 days have decided to enter the legal profession, 20 the ministry, and 11 will study medicine.

Not long since a London journal commended with the name of the Atlantic Telegraph Company included Cyrus W. Field more than to any other individual man, or to any body of men. It acknowledged that he was the man who no less than thirty-eight voyages across the ocean in connection with the business of this great enterprise, was in Stockholm, Copenhagen, Berlin, and Paris. As a child he was remarkable for his promptness and energy, and could always be relied upon to accomplish what he undertook, if the result was attainable. He came to New York when about fifteen years old, and entered the store of A. T. Stewart as a clerk. When about twenty-one he commenced business for himself, opening a paper warehouse. He was then in the Wall Street business. Whatever he did he did with all his might; and this trait has been characteristic of him through life. The laurels he has won through perseverance may never be taken from him.

Unripe and stale fruit should be strictly avoided at this season. If the law can not prevent such unhealthy rubbish from being offered for sale, every honest conscience whatever common-sense they may possess. "I should judge," said a gentleman of this city, who had witnessed the burning of his eye a cart filled with little, hairy, green apples and pears, "there were about ten cents of chohera in that cart." We suggest that such "cases of cholera" be reported to the Board of Health.

The following method of making employment must have the effect of reducing the number of the beggars who make us so much: [illegible]

Two Spanish officers recently met to fight a duel outside the gates of Bilbao, after the seconds had failed to reconcile the belligerents. At the moment a portfolio approached the seconds, and in it lamentable tones cried:

"Gentlemen, I am a poor artisan with a large family, and I have small—"

"My good man, don't trouble us now," cried one of the officers. "Can't you see my friends are going to fight? We are not in a charitable humor."

"But, gentlemen I ask for," said the man; "I am a poor carpenter, with eight children, and my wife is sick; and I have applied to the gentleman on my left for alms, but the other, I thought of asking you to let me make the coffins."

The great instance of jealousy recorded in a Western paper. A young girl belonging to one of the first families of Indianapolis, being jealous at an elder sister, who received a present of a watch, and declined to let her sister's wash pitcher. The result is that the latter has been confined to bed, and callers are told she is ill of a contagious disease. She will grow white again in time.

At the Paris Prefecture of Police a regular account is kept of all lost articles which have been deposited there by the finders. During the last twelve months 83,000 articles of various kinds have been deposited, amounting in value to 825,000 francs, or £33,400. In addition to this, within a single month the following articles were deposited with the police: A gold bracelet with diamonds, deposited by a working house-painter; 700 francs in bank-notes, by a female servant; port-monnaie, containing shares and bonds, found in a mean; a gold watch, found in a street; a gold watch, by a poor widow; a debenture for 500 francs, payable to bearer, by a boy fifteen years old; 3000 francs, in bank-notes; 1700 francs, by a cab-driver; 2500 francs, by a cabman; and a bracelet to gold and diamonds, valued at 15,000 francs, by a cabman. These acts tell greatly in favor of the honesty of the humbler class of Parisians.

If the following, which we clip from an exchange, is really true, the knowledge will be invaluable to florists and farmers. It is certainly worth a trial:

"A decoction of the leaves of common chamomile will destroy every species of insect, and nothing contributes so much to the health of a garden as a number of chamomile plants distributed over it. The grass-hopper or lob-house should ever be without it, in a green or dried state; either will be found equally sure a cure. It is a singular fact, that if a plant is drooping and apparently dying, in nine cases out of ten a few leaves of it will give plant immediate relief."

Among the many incidents which have been told of Gettysburg—some true, and perhaps some false—here is one which, although connected with a serious subject, is extremely amusing.

Among the wounded in the battle were several Germans from a neighboring county, and one of them having died, it was proposed that the German chaplain should perform the funeral. Accordingly a grave was dug; and the body, attended by many comrades, was borne to the place of interment. When there, the German chaplain began:

"Mine Frau, die ish do first time die man has died." Observing a titter among his audience, he began again in a tone of Christian unction:

"Mine frau, I say die ish do first time die man has died." The coffin-lid was closed over no more, and the boys shouted. Indignant at the disrespect shown him as minister, the chaplain left the ground, pelted to the open grave, and simply saying "Stick him in," marched away.

An English paper makes the following statement regarding sanguinary matters:

"The highest salary paid to any man in New England is received by the agent of a woolen-mill in Massachusetts —$25,000. The highest salary said to be that of a Methodist preacher, who stated at a late convention in Boston that he had his salary raised last year to $4000, and had a basket of apples."

The cholera troubles in Egypt, arising from the swarm of locusts with which that country was afflicted, seem to have been somewhat mitigated by a discovery in the art of cooking. Some genius has found a novelty that the most fastidious gourmet must acknowledge. The recipe for preparing this dish is given in a Cairo journal, and we quote it for the benefit of those who are meditating a tour on the borders of the Nile:

"Pick the locust delicately between the finger and thumb of the left hand; cut it in two with a knife, and pour into the saucepan the quantity of good sour: let them stand two days, and then cover with a fritter paste, and fry in boiling oil. Season with pepper, salt, and the fat of small quantity of Burgundy. This dish, which is called 'Cigale à la Bourguignonne,' is said to be delicious."

The following is the last form of a French sensation advertisement:

A Parisian lady of rank died lately in Paris, and her husband sent for a barber to arrange her hair as is usually done with the deceased. The barber took his young son with him, and, to punish the lad for some indiscretion during the journey, the barber compelled him to read aloud "Mon Voisin Raymond" while the hair of the corpse was being dressed. The boy was terribly frightened at the task imposed upon him, and returned home almost delirious. In a short time the barber's wife was to come, and on the following night, and for many nights afterwards, did the apparition appear to the terrified boy by his bedside reading aloud to him improper novels. At last the poor barber's hair turned white under the well-deserved infliction he was undergoing; but soon after the Civil Tribunal had cognizance of the case, the barber's pupil was set free, and the barber was condemned to pay a fine of 500 francs, to apply to Mons. — Rue —, No. —."

THE FLAG IN THE SOUTH.

Ed. Harper's Weekly:

On Tuesday, 16th May, 1865, it being definitively known that Jefferson Davis, the arch traitor, and that we were all once more in Union lines, the Union citizens of Washington Parish, Louisiana, and Pike County, Mississippi, assembled at Mount Hermon Church, in Washington Parish, to celebrate the to them joyful event.

It was determined that a lady had brought with her an old Union flag, which she had hidden for four years, like Jochebed bid Moses, the crowd became impatient for the flag to be being improvised into a flag-staff the old dear flag was brought out, and amidst the shouts and huzzas of the Unionists the free old banner flung to the first time given to the lovely breezes that fanned our sunny land.

As it went up the following original ode, written for the occasion by a lady present, was sung with the most rapturous enthusiasm:

Ay! bring it from its hiding-place
Into the light of day,
And let its starry folds once more
Its bonhere breezes play.
Last shouts of treason rend the air,
While angels smile to see
A nation, freed from tyrant chains,
Restored to Liberty.

Long have we been denied the sight,
And through our hearts the throbbing
To see our country's flag again
Float proudly in the wind.
We've cherished it in our hearts
A depth of love untold,
And hid it from the wrath of man
As misers hide their gold.

Lone has is been a banished thing,
Derided and traduced,
And those who dared to own its cause
Insulted and abused.
Drove by persecution from their homes,
And oft, when forced to flee,
Pursued with bloodhounds through those woods
Where once they wandered free.

We've groaned beneath oppression's power
And all the ills of war,
And dying on the walls of woe
Have burdened Southern air.
A pall of darkness o'er us hung
Like that which shrouds the tomb,
And Hope's faint star was almost lost
Amid the despaired gloom.

Now, God be praised, the dawn has come,
The night of terror o'er,
The golden Sun of Liberty
Shall gild our Southern shore.
Flag that we banned to the breeze,
Let all its friends rejoice,
And songs of praise to God ascend
From every heart and voice!

Gens, Mississippi, July, 1866.

"We heartily recommend them to all our readers."—Burnett's Florimel, the most delicate and exquisite Perfume in the world, and Cocoaine for the Hair.—Leslie's Family Magazine (New York).

Moth and Freckles.—Ladies afflicted with discolorations on the face, called moth-patches or freckles, should use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. It is infallible. Prepared and sold by Dr. B. C. Perry, Manchester, N. H. Sold at Depot, 49 Bond street, New York. Sold by all druggists.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

IMPORTANT TO SOLDIERS.

A bill has passed giving additional bounty to soldiers who served their term of enlistment, or were discharged for wounds. Also, pension for invalids and widows having claims. Apply immediately to law agent. L. BROWN & Co., 1 Park Place, New York.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE.

Superior advantages to English, Classics, Sciences, Commercial, French, Flute Manly and Military. Located with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for some months been thought that a preparation, having for its basis the inulin bark of white pine, might be a remedy for the above affection in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in diseases alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the Medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, accompanied by a sudden cold, and had relaxed mucous stoked with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1865, I first advertised it under the name of WISTAR'S PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for Kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

Dr. Wistar's Pine Compound Remedy for Colds and Coughs is daily being proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, that it is the best remedy known for all throat diseases. It cures sore throat, coughs, shortness, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for disorders resulting from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and worms it will be found invaluable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

GEO. C. GOODWIN, M.D., Proprietor,
Boston, Mass.

BURNHAMS & VAN SCHAAK, Chemists, and
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio,
General Agents for the West.

Allcock's Porous PLASTERS.

BEST STRENGTHENING PLASTER IN THE WORLD.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS resolve and assuage pain by uniting forth the acrid humors from parts internal to the skin, and thereby effecting a copious relief, in many cases, positively evaporating the disease.

JAMES LULL, M.D.

There is nothing equal, in the way of a plaster, to the Porous Plasters of ALLCOCK. Everybody is pleased about them. They are the plaster of the day, and a fit type of our present advancement in science and art. In Asthma, Cough, Kidney Affections, Cold, Rheumatism, and local, deep-seated pain, they afford speedy positive relief.

J. F. JOHNSON, M.D., on "Topical Remedies."

From a personal knowledge of these plasters, we can state that they are decidedly preferable to any other in use. Whenever relief is to be obtained by the use of a plaster, we should recommend them.

A. INGRAHAM, M.D., Editor New York Monitor.

Agency, Benson House, New York.

Sold by all Druggists.

MERWIN & BRAY,

202 BROADWAY,

MANUFACTURERS OF THE CELEBRATED BALLARD BREECH-LOADING RIFLE, MILITARY AND SPORTING STYLES.

These Rifles carry a conical ball weighing from one half ounce each to 120 to the pound. Material and workmanship of the best quality. They are warranted in every respect.

SOLE AGENTS

for the well-known Eagle Arms Co.'s Cartridge Revolvers. Ball and Shell Cartridges. These Pistols require but four motions to load and discharge, a degree of perfection never before obtained. Are sure fire, and carry a much larger ball than any other revolver of the same weight and size. Also Agents for the Vulcanic Arms Co.'s Colt's model Revolvers, and the New York Metallic Ammunition Co.'s Copper Cartridges for every style and size.

Dealers in Arms and Ammunition of all kinds. Illustrated Circulars forwarded when desired.

202 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have Just Published

FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL.

A NOVEL

BY GEORGE ELIOT.

8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send "Felix Holt" by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 75 cents.

NEW EDITIONS OF

GEORGE ELIOT'S WORKS

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, N. Y.

Adam Bede	12mo, Muslin $1 50
The Mill on the Floss	12mo " 1 50
"	8vo, Paper 1 00
Silas Marner	12mo, Muslin 1 00
Scenes of Clerical Life	12mo " 1 50
Romola. Illustrations	8vo, Cloth 2 00

HARPER & BROTHERS.

A Charming Summer Book.

HARPER & BROTHERS have now ready, complete in One Volume, 8vo, price $4 50, Cloth, Beveled Edges; or, price $6 75, half bound in Morocco:

Homes Without Hands.

HOMES WITHOUT HANDS: Being a Description of the Habitations of Animals, classed according to their Principle of Construction. By J. G. WOOD, M.A., F.L.S., Author of "Illustrated Natural History." With about 140 Illustrations engraved on Wood by G. PEARSON, from Original Designs made by F. W. KEYL and E. A. SMITH, under the Author's Superintendence.

To overpraise "Homes Without Hands" would be difficult, and nearly every page in the volume offers a tempting extract. It is a treat-book of the most delightful kind, in which the charm that attaches to zoological observation and discovery is evoked with irresistible effect. —London Review.

"Homes Without Hands" is more interesting than a fairy tale, and shows how highly endowed are the inferior races, which from the very first produced in perfection works to which the nobler intellect of man could attain only after the discipline and experience of centuries. It is a work calculated to bring pleasures of the most rational and elevating kind into many a school-room and many a family circle: and certainly it would be impossible to recommend a more suitable book for a present to a young person.—Daily News.

This work will do much to diffuse and increase an intelligent observation of animal life. It is written with an evident sympathetic feeling for the subject in hand, and is thoroughly entertaining throughout.—Victoria Magazine.

Curious, interesting, and valuable. The illustrations, which are very numerous, are all from new and original designs.—Builder.

We do not know where to find its equal as a gift for boys, as a book to make them observe instead of destroy-ing, and learn in place of merely wondering. But it is a volume for the library also, full of rich facts and interesting parallels, grouped with the same command of all subjects which characterizes all Mr. Wood's kindly and sympathetic works.—Daily Telegraph.

"Homes Without Hands" is likely to become the book of reference on the dwellings of animals.—Popular Science Review.

It possesses quite a peculiar interest and fascination.—Spectator.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by Mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

$10. Gold and Silver Watches. $10.

We are retailing watches at wholesale rates. Every one can obtain a valuable and correct timekeeper, at about half the usual cost. Gold and coin silver hunting-cases, by sending us $15 00. Send stamp for list. HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman Street, New York.

NEW AND GOOD SHEET MUSIC.

Kiss me while I'm Dreaming, by Winnemore, 35. I'll say Good-Night, Winnemore, 35. Be Kind to Darling Sister Nell, Danks, 30. I love the little Rippling Stream, Crosby, 30. The Colored from Constantinople, a comic song sung by the Florences, 40. Wearing of the Green, transcribed by Bannbach, 40. Fairy Wedding Waltz, by Turner, 30. These new and popular pieces will be sent postpaid on receipt of price. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

£150,000,000 STERLING,

In Money and Estates, remain unclaimed in Great Britain and Ireland, in many cases as far back as 1690. Fee in search for same, $5 00 to U. S. Funds. All letters sent to prompt. GUN & CO., Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, 9 Princes of Wales Road, London, England.

Important to European Travellers.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST.

BY W. P. FETRIDGE.

A New and Revised Edition (the Fifth Year) of this Valuable Book will be ready in a few days.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THE NEW AMERICAN NOVEL.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Publish this Day:

INSIDE:

A Chronicle of Secession.

BY GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED BY THOMAS NAST.

8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.

The author of this novel is a native of the South, and has never resided in a Free State. His direct contact with the Rebellion during the entire period through which it lasted gives to the work the most intense interest and an indisputable authority. The tale, though taking the form of a novel, assumes only the slightest guise of fiction: as a historical picture of the South during our civil war it is strictly true in every important particular—so remarkably true, indeed, in its general application to Southern society during the war, that the Publishers have received letters, coming from residents of the States lately in rebellion, professing to identify the most important characters of the story with real personages known to the various correspondents. As a dramatic work of great original power, and as at the same time a faithful picture of the most exciting period of American history, it has never been equaled by any American novel. Its characterization is more remarkable and more varied than that of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and it is also more truthful, being drawn from a larger experience. The illustrations, by MR. THOMAS NAST, rank among the first productions of this celebrated Artist. Speaking of this work of MR. HARRINGTON, the New York Evening Post justly remarks that "for tragic and life-like interest, and for real merit of other kinds, it has not been equaled in half a dozen years in any English magazine."

The New Novels of the Season

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," "Scenes of Clerical Life," "Romola," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE HIDDEN SIN. A Novel. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 00.

LAND AT LAST. A Novel in Three Books. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Kissing the Rod," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

PHŒNIX KELLER. A Novel. By F. G. TRAFFORD, Author of "Maxwell Drewitt," "The Race for Wealth," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HAND AND GLOVE. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "Half a Million of Money," "The Ladder of Life," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ARMADALE. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "No Name," "The Woman in White," &c. With Numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $2 00.

SANS MERCI; or, Kestrels and Falcons. A Novel. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," "Sword and Gown," "Maurice Dering," &c. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

A NOBLE LIFE. By MISS MULOCK (MRS. CRAIK), Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Christian's Mistake," "A Life for a Life," "Olive," "The Ogilvies," "The Head of the Family," &c. 8vo, Paper, Cloth, $1 75.

GILBERT RUGGE. A Novel. By the Author of "A First Friendship." 8vo, Paper, $1 00.

AGNES. A Novel. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "The Laird of Norlaw," "Chronicles of Carlingford," "The Perpetual Curate," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

MISS MARJORIBANKS. A Novel. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," "The Perpetual Curate," "Agnes," "Life of Edward Irving," "The Days of my Life," "The Laird of Norlaw," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

WALTER GORING. A Story. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Denis Donne," "On Guard," "The Leigh," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE BELTON ESTATE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Can You Forgive Her?" "Doctor Thorne," "Framley Parsonage," "The Small House at Allington," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above Works by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Price.

POPULAR SUBSCRIPTION IN AID OF THE MEMORIAL CHURCH OF WASHINGTON IRVING, TARRYTOWN, N.Y.

This Edifice—the only Memorial to WASHINGTON IRVING ever begun in the village, now celebrated as the place of his residence and his burial—is located in the midst of scenes immortalized by his pen. Ever since it was commenced it has been the desire of its projectors to finish it without having a portion of debt to encumber it. That they may accomplish this end, as well as make it a Memorial which all the admirers of "Geoffrey Crayon" shall have had an object in the sum ($10,000) which it will need to render the building free of immediate encumbrance. In return, as a memento of the offering, they will send by mail any one of the following Photographic Views, as may be indicated by the contributor:

1. WASHINGTON IRVING (the only exact likeness ever taken).
2. SUNNY SIDE (the Home of Washington Irving).
3. THE OLD DUTCH CHURCH (built A.D. 1699); where Ichabod let the Choir.
4. BRIDGE OVER THE POCANTICO (alongside of which the Schoolhouse disappeared).
5. THE OLD MILL (built in 1683; a picturesque relic of the Elder Time).
6. IRVING'S GRAVE (in the Sleepy Hollow Cemetery).

For a contribution of $5 00 the complete set of Six Pictures will be sent in return.

Direct MEMORIAL CHURCH OF WASHINGTON IRVING, care of either of the following Addressees: Rev. E. DELLBERT, Rector, Tarrytown; A. D. F. RANDOLPH, 771 Broadway; D. APPLETON & CO., 483 Broadway; HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

Have selected the following kinds from their Stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

PRICE LIST.

YOUNG HYSON, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 ₱ lb.
GREEN TEAS, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 ₱ lb.
MIXED, 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 ₱ lb.
JAPAN, $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 ₱ lb.
OOLONG, 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 ₱ lb.
IMPERIAL and GUNPOWDER, best, $1 25 ₱ lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best $1 25 ₱ lb.

All towns, villages, or manufactories where a large number of men are employed, by CLUBBING together, can reduce the price of their Teas and Coffee about one third by sending directly to the

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

(Post-Office Box 5643.) 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church, New York.

For further particulars, getting up Clubs, &c., see Harper's Weekly, June 23, 1866.

$5 SEWING $5 MACHINE.

FIRST PREMIUM and IMPROVED, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented May 15, 1860; Improved and patented June 19, 1865. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with all recent attachments, is now made in operation, sews with DOUBLE or SINGLE THREAD of ALL SIZES with extraordinary rapidity, making SEWING SECURE to each seam, even if the Wheel. Will GATHER, HEM, SHUFFLE, EDGE, TUCK, SEW UP BRAIDING, &c., &c. Strongest machine manufactured. Warranted not to get out of order in 5 years. It has received the highest premium at the principal Fairs, and by those who have used it.

"With double lock stitch thread, it silently put very rapidly does the stitching exactly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

Single machines, ALL COMPLETE, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Safe delivery warranted. Agents wanted every where. Address all orders,

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY,
Office 102 Nassau Street, New York.

Strength for the Exhausted.

Thousands die, as it were, inch by inch, of bodily weakness; for debility will kill as certainly, though not so quickly, as a raging fever. Is it asked how the weak shall be made strong, the debilitated sustained and restored, the exhausted refilled with vital energy? We aver that all these desirable preparations given by science to man, from the institution of the art of healing to the present hour, not one has wrought such wonders in the way of restoration as HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS. This is indeed the tonic of tonics. As a revitalizing, strength-supporting, life-prolonging agent, the like of it is not to be found in the catalogue of medicines. Among the various articles used to arouse the dormant powers of nature, it stands alone—the great regulator of the paralyzed physique. It not only awakens the physical power from a state of collapse and inanition, but it imparts permanent vigor to the muscular and nervous systems—refashioning, as it were, both the strong body and the sensitive nerve of delicacy. The dyspeptic, the dyspeptic, the nervous, the broken-down of both sexes are recommended to try it. They will assuredly find in a present help in time of trouble.

KEROSENE and GAS STOVES.

All the Cooking for a family may be done with Kerosene Oil, or Gas, with less trouble and at less expense, than by any other fuel.

Send for Circular.

Liberal Discount to the Trade.

Kerosene Lamp Heater Co., 206 Pearl St., N. Y.

BARTLETT & DEMOREST'S SEWING MACHINE will stitch, hem, gather, make the Elastic Knot Stitch, and is in every particular the no plus ultra Family Sewing Machine; $25. 473 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted.

AGENTS WANTED.

$2000 a Year and Expenses to Male and Female Agents, to introduce a new and useful invention, absolutely needed in every household. Agents preferring to work on commission can make $100 to $200 per day. For particulars address W. G. WILSON, Cleveland, Ohio.

GOLD PENS.

If you want a GOLD PEN, send to E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 64 Nassau St., N. Y., and by return mail receive circular describing pens and prices, inquiring none as 50c. as

NEW PHYSIOGNOMY; or, "SIGNS OF CHARACTER," manifested through temperament and external forms, and in "The Human Face Divine," with more than 1000 illustrations. Price, postpaid, $5. Address FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

INTERESTING to School Teachers and Writers. Contributions designed to interest children in the arts and sciences for Demorest's Young America, a monthly magazine for boys and girls. Liberal articles to be liberally paid for. Address W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, PARLOR KNIVES, &c., &c.,

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and explanations, also terms to Agents, which we want in every town and county. H. WINSLOW & CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED for the Dexterium Holder for fastening neckties, looping up dress skirts, &c., &c. Sample and circular, mailed for 25 cents. Circular sent on receipt of stamp. Bell & Co., Springfield, Mass.

LADIES of intelligence wanted to canvass; very liberal commissions offered. Call or address Miss Demorest's Emporium of Fashions, 473 Broadway, N.Y.

DEMOREST'S Magic Photographs. Full packages of interesting subjects, with directions, only 15 cents. Mailed post free on receipt of the price. W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

WHISKERS!

DR. LAMONTE'S COROLLA will force Whiskers or Mustaches on the smoothest face or chin. Never known to fail. Sample for trial sent free. Address

REEVES & CO., 78 Nassau Street, New York.

6000 AGENTS wanted to sell six new inventions, of great value to families; all pay great profits. Send 10 cts. and get 80 pages, or 25 cts. and get 80 pages and a sample goods. Agassiz Brown, Lowell, Mass.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 10 cts. ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 30 Ann Street, New York, and 13 Lincoln Street, Boston.

"How 'tis Done." Whiskers in 6 wks. Gambling exposed. Fortune-telling. Ventriloquism, &c. 100 great secrets. Free for 25c. Adams Publishing House & Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

AGENTS—"GUIDE TO BUSINESS SUCCESS" and "A KEY TO HONEST WEALTH." 160 pp., just out. Sample copy, postpaid, $1. L. N. WHITE & CO., Publishers, 61 Park Row, New York.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR AUGUST, 1866.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $4 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of FIVE Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $8 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements at the end of the Magazine, at the following low rates:

One Page	$250 00
Half Page	135 00
Quarter Page	70 00

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $4 00
One Copy for Three Months 1 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.

THE BOUND VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Cloth Binding . . . . . $7 00 per Volume.
Half Morocco 10 00

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

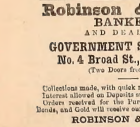
TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for inside, and Two Dollars per line for outside Advertisements, each insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS IN THE DOG DAYS.

MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. "We shall have to prosecute you, Madam, if you continue to clothe that unhappy Brute during the warm weather."

INDIGNANT OLD MAID. "Prosecute me, indeed! I would like to know, if some Brutes are permitted to carry Umbrellas and wear Clothing, why my Dog should be denied the same privilege?"



Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN
GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our PERSONAL attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

Snow-White Steel Shirt Collar,
81 Cents; 2½ Inches. 28. "Self-adjusting." Patented Sept., 1865. "Sent by mail." HILLIS & FOGAN, Inventors, Patentees, and Manufacturers, Nassau St., N.Y.

POLLAK & SON Meerschaum Manufacturers, 697 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes $6 to $30 each.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS.
Rifle Canes, Revolving Rifles,
Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.
In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.
Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Ilion, N. Y.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Revolver excels all others for compactness, effectiveness, durability, power, and infinity to carrying. In light calibre, small (only 7 in.), with larger metallic cartridges (9–100 ball) than any Revolver made of same weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. HICKOCK, 73 Reckman Street, New York.

Economy is Wealth.
If you want the best-fitting, strongest, and most serviceable Paper Collar ever offered to the Public, don't fail to purchase the
PATENT REVERSIBLE PAPER COLLAR
MARCH BROS., PIERCE & CO.,
AGENTS,
WINTHROP SQUARE, BOSTON.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT TO SOLDIERS.
WILLIAM S. MORSE AND CO.,
Attorneys and Solicitors of Claims,
WASHINGTON, D. C.
We will forward all necessary papers for the collection of bounty on application.

From the Washington Daily Chronicle.
Major Wm. S. Morse was the author of the bill for the equalization of bounties, as originally introduced by the Hon. Geo. W. Julian, M.C. of Indiana, and passed by the House of Representatives on the 25th of July last.

The soldiers owe more to his efforts than to any other person for the passage of the present law.

Send your discharge to our address, and we will prepare and forward all necessary papers by return mail. Correspondents liberally dealt with. Address
WM. S. MORSE AND CO., Washington, D. C.
REFERENCES: Major-Gen. Rob. C. Schenk, Chairman House Military Committee; Major-Gen. John C. Ketchum, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. Geo. W. Julian, M.C., Indiana; Hon. Hamilton Ward, M.C., N. Y., and Senators and Members of Congress generally.

PEABODY'S BREECH-LOADING
MUSKETS, CARBINES, AND SPORTING RIFLES,
FOR METALLIC CARTRIDGES,
MANUFACTURED BY THE
PROVIDENCE TOOL CO. ARMORY,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
These arms are made in the most perfect manner, are interchangeable in all their parts, and are unsurpassed for symmetrical appearance, simplicity, accuracy of fire, and strength. They have been received with remarkable favor in our own and several other countries, and can now be supplied in large numbers. Send for descriptive pamphlet and illustrated price-list, printed in English, French, German, or Spanish.

Mosquito Nets
WITH PATENT PORTABLE FRAMES.
G. L. & J. B. KELTY, 447 Broadway.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING
B. T. BABBITT'S STAR YEAST POWDER. Light Biscuit or any kind of Cake may be made with this "Yeast Powder" in 15 minutes. No shortening is required when sweet milk is used. Nos. 64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL POMADE
The best hair restorer and dressing. Sold by druggists.
MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 66 Broadway.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.
CAPITAL PRIZE 30,000 DOLLARS
THE NORTH AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT
Will positively be given at
WABASH AVENUE RINK, CHICAGO, ILL., August 22, 1866.
THE FIRST PRIZE CONCERT TO BE GIVEN IN THE UNITED STATES.
NO POSTPONEMENT.
250,000 Valuable Prizes, valued at $500,000, will be presented to Ticket-Holders, including $100,000 in Greenbacks.
The time rapidly approaches, and only a few days remain before the Drawing takes place. All wanting Tickets should send in their orders at once, as only a few remain unsold. Such an opportunity occurs only once in a person's lifetime.
With the help of our numerous agents, located all over the United States, we have reason to believe that every ticket will be sold before the day designated.
Number of Tickets Issued, 500,000. Price, One Dollar.
This is the greatest inducement ever offered to the people of the United States.

EVERY OTHER TICKET DRAWS A PRIZE.
1 Gift in Greenbacks	$30,000
1 do. do.	10,000
1 do. do.	5,000
1 do. do.	4,000
1 do. do.	3,000
1 do. do.	2,000
20 Gifts in Greenbacks, $1000 each	20,000
50 do. do. $50 each	10,000
50 do. do. 100 each	5,000
50 do. do. 50 each	1,000
800 do. do. 10 each	8,000
1,000 do. do. 5 each	5,000
1 Gift, Residence in Chicago	2,000
10 Gifts, City Lots in Chicago, $500 each	5,000
60 do. Bonds, $500 each	30,000
70 do. Melodeons, $150 each	10,500
100 do. Ribbon, $10 each	1,000
200 do. Gold Watches, $150 each	30,000
500 do. do. 100 each	50,000
200 do. Silver Watches, 65 each	13,000
200 do. do. 60 each	12,000
1,000 Sets of Plated Teaspoons, $3 each	3,000
1,000 Call Bells, $3 each	3,000
1,000 Plated Fruit Knives, $3 each	3,000
2,000 Gold Pens in Holders, $3 each	6,000
2,000 Photograph Albums, 5 each	10,000
7,000 Gold Pen Holders, $5 each	10,000
238,043 Gifts	Worth $238,043

EVERY OTHER TICKET DRAWS A PRIZE.
The drawing will take place after the concert, where 20,000 persons can witness it. A committee will be appointed by the audience to superintend the same. All applicants will be supplied with a full and correct list of the drawing as soon as published. Tickets are for sale at the principal News Agencies, Hotels, and Book Stores, and at our office, 109 Randolph St., Chicago. Tickets, $1 each, or eleven tickets for $10, sent by return mail or express. Great inducements are offered to AGENTS, who are wanted every where. Write for our terms at once. Send reference with application.
SPECIAL TERMS, or CLUB RATES.—5 tickets to one address for $4 50; 10 tickets, $8 00; 20 tickets, $17 50; 50 tickets, $39 25; 85 tickets, $75 00; 100 tickets, $87 50. In every case send the name of each ticket and their Post-Office address. Money by draft, Post-Office order, express, or in registered letters, may be sent at our risk.

Every Other Ticket Draws a Prize.
REFERENCES: Gen. Benj. F. Butler, Lowell, Mass.; Tappan, McKillop, & Co., Commercial Agency, Chicago; Ill; Lot C. Whitford, Wholesale Paper Dealer, Chicago; J. B. Lippincott & Co., Publishers, Philadelphia, Pa.; M. B. Quimby & Co., Wholesale Jewelers, Boston; Peter & Co., Publishers, Philadelphia; Hon. James L. Hamilton, Importer, New York; Van Valkenburgh & Co., Importers, New York; S. B. Cobb, Chicago; Ira Holmes, Cashier Third National Bank, Chicago; Crosby & Ainsworth, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

READ WHAT THE CHICAGO PRESS SAY.
NORTH AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT.—Among the first Gift Enterprises ever commenced in Chicago was that of Messrs. A. A. Kelley & Co., which has been perpetual for more than three years past, and has given universal satisfaction, if we are to judge by the extensive patronage accorded it. They are the proprietors of the "North American Prize Concert," now so extensively advertised in the various other papers, and indorsed by some of the best business firms in this country. From what we know of Mr. Kelley, we are positive that he will, "in the future as in the past," deal fairly and honorably with all who take stock in his enterprise. His prizes are large and liberal, and will, without doubt, be scrupulously awarded to holders of lucky tickets. Every alternate ticket will draw a prize. Call at the office, 109 Randolph St., Chicago, Ill., or address A. A. KELLEY & CO., 105 Bandolph Street.—Evening Times.

KELLEY & CO.'S GIFT ENTERPRISE.—The first to embark in the Gift Enterprise business in Chicago was the firm of A. A. Kelley & Co., located at 108 Randolph St. Those who have seen or read their gift circulars, spread for the last three years ago, where many purchased books and other articles, and were so lucky as to find with their purchases tickets which entitled them to valuable gifts of every description, from the smallest article to a costly piano-forte, and those have the best of evidences that Messrs. Kelley & Co. always perform all they promise; that they are honorable men, and do business honorably and on the square. Their Gift Concert which has now commenced, the drawing of which is to take place on the 22d of August, promises to be one of the most successful of the series of Gift Concerts that have taken place in Chicago. Every ticket will be given to distributing agents, and all that they are required to do is to sell them. The prizes will positively be distributed to those holding the lucky tickets after the drawing. 3. There is such a very large number of prizes that every one's chances are decidedly in favor of drawing something. 4. The citizens of Chicago, who know A. A. Kelley & Co., have confidence in their honor and integrity, and are largely investing in their enterprise. These are some of the reasons why we feel safe in commending Kelley & Co.'s Gift Concert to the public. Let the people come up and buy the tickets still remaining unsold. The drawing will positively take place on the day advertised. Money may be sent by mail for tickets, and will be promptly forwarded.—Chicago Journal.

All communications should be addressed to A. A. KELLEY & CO., 105 Bandolph St., Chicago (P. O. Drawer 1624).

GRAND NATIONAL CONCERT,
For the Benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home Fund, at Grover's Theatre, Washington, D. C., on Thursday Evening, August 2, 1866,
POSTPONED UNTIL THURSDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 11, AT WHICH TIME IT WILL POSITIVELY OCCUR.
300,000 Tickets, at $1 each. 75,000 Presents, valued at $250,000, consisting of Fine Residences, Lots, Pianos, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silverware, &c., &c.
TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE, WASHINGTON, June 27, 1866.
Whereas H. A. Hall and others, as "managing directors" of "Grand National Concert" to be held in Washington, D. C., on the 2d of August next, have made due application to L. Clephane, Collector of Internal Revenue for the collection district of the District of Columbia, for permission to hold a lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise, and pay the special tax imposed by law thereon, and the proceeds of said lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise are to be devoted to charitable uses, permission is hereby granted to such "managing directors" to hold such lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise and pay said tax, they complying with the law of October 1, 1862, and the regulations thereof.
E. A. ROLLINS, Commissioner of Internal Revenue.
CARD.—A large number of tickets remaining unsold, it will be necessary to postpone the Grand National Concert until the 11th of October, 1866, at which time it will positively occur.
The many evidences that have been given the public during the past few months somewhat delayed our sales, until we were able to satisfy the people throughout the country that the enterprise was genuine, and assure the charitable public that the Directors are confident that on the 11th of October, 1866, we have sufficient tickets sold to guarantee the sales without any further postponement.
Major H. A. HALL, President Soldiers' and Sailors' Union.
All orders must be addressed, with stamps enclosed, to WILLIAM S MORSE, Secretary,
Lock Box 37. Washington, D.C.

WE REFER, BY PERMISSION, TO
Major-Gen. Winfield S. Hancock, U.S.A.; Gen. Robert C. Schenck, M.C., Ohio; Gen. Hulbert E. Paine, M.C., Wis.; Gen. John H. Ketchum, M.C., N. Y.; Gen. James G. Blunt, Kansas; Gen. J. N. Hedrick, Iowa; Gen. D. C. McCallum, D.C.; Gen. O. W. Devereux, N. Y.; Hon. Jere. Boughton, N. Y.; Hon. Geo. W. Julian, M.C., Ind.; Hon. George Ashmun, M.C., Mass.; Hon. D. C.; Major J. E. Doughty, N. Y.; Hon. Richard Wallach, Mayor Washington, D.C.; Hon. Thos. D. Lincoln, Mayor, Boston, Mass.; Hon. Geo. W. Thompson, M.C., Ohio; Hon. Samuel J. Randall, M.C., Penn.; Hon. Henry C. Deming, M.C., Conn.; Hon. Thos. M. Key, M.C., Md.; Hon. Samuel J. Randall, M.C., Penn.; Hon. B. F. Wade, U.S.S., Ohio; Hon. D. Gooding, M.C., N.Y.; Hon. Henry Wilson, U.S.S., Mass.; Hon. Ira Harris, U.S.S., Hon. B. F. Wade, U.S.S., Ohio; Hon. D. Gooding, M.C., N.Y.; Hon. Henry Wilson, U.S.S., Mass.; Hon. Ira Harris, U.S.S., Hon. B. F. Wade, U.S.S., Ohio; Hon. Edgar Cowan, U.S.S., Penn.; Hon. Wm. P. Fessenden, U.S.S., Me.; Hon. Reverdy Johnson, U.S.S., Md.; Hon. Kellan V. Whaley, M.C., Va.; Hon. William A. Newell, M.C., N. J.; Hon. George W. Julian, M.C., Ind.; Hon. Leonard Myers, M.C., Penn.; Hon. Joseph Baily, M.C., Penn.; Hon. Leonard H. Rose, M.C., Penn.; Hon. J. M. Arrington, M.C., Penn.; Major-Gen. Geo. Cadwalader, Penn.; Hon. J. K. Moorhead, M.C., Penn.; Major-Gen. Robert C. Schenck, M.C., Ohio; Hon. Thos. Williams, M.C., Penn.; Hon. Geo. W. Julian, M.C., Ind.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—No. 504.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE RIOT IN NEW ORLEANS—MURDER OF THE REV. MR. HORTON IN THE VESTIBULE OF THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.—SKETCHED BY DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 535.]

A CRY FROM THE VINEYARD.

God sends his servants to bed when they have done their work!—THOMAS FULLER.

"O, Father, I'm weary—how long must I stay
In this Vineyard wood-tangled, with work for all day?
The sun is so scorching, the winds are so ill,
That I faint at the travail—or shiver and chill;
My feet ache and are wounded, my garments are torn,
And the labor grows harder than labor at morn.
For the grapes they are bitter, and quench not my thirst,
And wine is no more I know not the worst!

"Oh, child," spoke the Father, "just patience be thine,
Till the grapes thou find'st bitter formost into wine.
A robe there in weaving which can not be torn,
A robe there for wedding-guests only is worn;
A crown there is promised with jewels more bright
Than a monarch's proud diadem reflect in light!
And the tenth of the flowers which fade not nor die,
Shall heal every wound, and shall hush every sigh!

"Oh, child, well-beloved, when the evening shall come
Be sure then shalt slumber and rest in thy home;
And be preparing more soft than the cloud
Which floats in the ether one bright star to shroud,
When the white moon is shining to silver it over
As the exiles of princes were burnished of yore!
And He who once trampled the wine-press alone
Will bring thee to rest when thy labor is done!"

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1866.

THE PRESIDENT JUDGED BY HIMSELF.

NO event since the end of the war has so profoundly moved the country as the massacre at New Orleans, and none of the circumstances connected with it have been regarded with more painful surprise than the action of the President. Ever since the meeting of Congress last December he has strenuously insisted that the late rebel States, by conforming to certain terms which he had named, without consultation with Congress, were fully restored to their equal relations in the Union with the loyal States. He has publicly denounced Senators and Representatives as traitors and disunionists because they did not agree with him. He has vetoed the most important bills passed by Congress, assigning among his reasons for every instance that legislation during the exclusion from representation of the States in question was of doubtful constitutionality. He has undertaken to dictate those States as no longer in an exceptional situation, insisting that war was over, that all its methods were at an end, and that nothing remained to complete the normal condition of the Union but the admission of representatives duly qualified.

Louisiana is one of these States. The President told the country it was upon exactly the same footing in the Union as New York, and was to be treated by the national authorities exactly as New York is treated. He had recognized its local State Government as no less valid and independent within its constitutional sphere than that of New York, and however opinions as to the constitutionality or good policy or common sense of his views may have differed, no one, we suppose, doubted that they were sincerely held and would honestly control his action.

But the President has suddenly shown that, while he denounces the Legislative branch of the Government as disorganizing or treasonable for not submitting to his theory, he does not mean to be bound by it himself. While he and his supporters are vociferously accusing Congress of revolutionary intentions because it does not immediately recognize what he calls the lawful representatives of Louisiana, he himself calls to account and peremptorily disregards the Governor of Louisiana, whom he has recognized as a lawful Governor as much as Governor FENTON of New York. He does in that State what he knows would not be for a moment tolerated in this.

On the 21st of July the President issues the following extraordinary order to the Governor of Louisiana, but, let it be remembered, of all asserts is the peer of the Governor of Pennsylvania, of Massachusetts, of Illinois, or of any other State. "I have been advised that you have issued a proclamation convening the Convention elected in 1864. Please inform me under and by what authority this has been done, and by what authority this Convention can assume to represent the loyal people of the State of Louisiana." This is the order of a superior to a subordinate agent. This is a message which the commander-in-chief may properly send to a provisional lieutenant. But it is a message which the President of the United States has no more rightful authority to send to the Governor of New York than the Queen of England has. And when such a missive is forwarded by a President who has been for months tediously reiterating that the rights of the States are in imminent danger of being destroyed by despotic centralization it is both ludicrous and alarming; ludicrous, because the executive act is such a ridiculous contradiction of the executive assertion; and alarming, because it shows either the President's incapacity to comprehend the limits of the executive power, or his determination to disregard them at his pleasure.

The President's "policy" thus proves to be the President's pleasure. When it is convenient for him to treat a State as fully in the Union the President's "policy" requires us to assent. When it is convenient to consider it as under absolute military supervision the President's "policy" requires us to say Amen. If the President blows hot, we must agree that it is warm. If he blows cold, we must declare it is exceeding chilly. If he denounces Congress as revolutionary for not recognizing the representatives of Louisiana, we must beg him to sweep it out of the Capitol. And if, when his head refuses to recognize the Governor of Louisiana, we must vow that he is the saviour of the Constitution.

The whole memorable history justifies Congress. It has steadily refused to act upon a visionary theory, "a pernicious abstraction." Familiar with the causes of the war, realizing standing the wrecks of violence that always attend so fierce a struggle, and knowing that statesmanship deals with facts, it has not foolishly supposed that every thing was settled because insurgents had laid down their arms, nor assumed that States still quivering with hatred and hostility could be admitted to a share in the Government without patient inquiry and deliberation. It has asked only that the facts be ascertained, not assumed. Without hostile emotion, without vindictiveness, it has required that no State deliberately withdrawing its representatives, in order to destroy the Government, shall claim to have them readmitted except upon terms of reasonable guarantee, and that rebellion shall not be rewarded by increased political power. Whether Congress, in its prudent care, is for unnecessarily delaying what is just and reasonable than the President in his immoderate haste—whether its calm and consistent policy is not as respectful of just State rights as the capricious, scolding, and utterly illogical and inconsistent conduct of the President—whether, in settling a civil war, it is more revolutionary to deprive a State of its national representation until it submits to reasonable terms, than to deprive it of its local government at the executive pleasure—are questions upon which we believe there is very little difference among the loyal people of the United States.

THE TORY BLUNDER IN ENGLAND.

THE Tory Ministry begins its term in England by a collision with the people. The Reform League called a public meeting in Hyde Park. The Chief of Police declared that it would not be allowed. To an inquiry in Parliament the Government replied by taking the responsibility. The Reform League continued its arrangements peacefully in order to dispense procession to the gate of the Park, demanded entrance, and being forcibly repulsed by the police, moved on to another spot and held its meeting. Meanwhile the railings around the Park were broken in several places by the great pressure of the crowd, and as the people poured in they were clubbed by the policemen, and for a little time it looked as if the soldiers who were present might have to interfere to preserve order.

The Government was sharply attacked in Parliament, and made a very poor defense. MR. MILL, in a few grave and pointed remarks, said that the Government had come to the name of the sovereign of the occasion, or of the very serious consequences that might follow the step it had taken. To the objection that the meeting would cause serious obstruction of the riders and pedestrians in the Park, MR. MILL replied by asking whether such a meeting would cause a thousandth part of the interruption that an ordinary day's race upon the volunteers does, and whether a meeting in a street or in a square disturbs the city less than one in a park? Besides, since the Parks are the property of the people, and the people have an incontestable right of meeting, upon what ground could they be excluded from Hyde Park that would not justify the suppression of all public meetings in public places? The Star plainly said that it was the thought of Reform which the Government feared. "Who holds the people to meet in the streets and squares, lest they impede traffic, or in the Parks, lest they interfere with the pleasure of loungers; and then, if they do not meet, denounces them in turn with apathy and declares them unfit for the responsibility of free citizens. It is not surprising that the Times could talk speech by saying that the Government might be congratulated on an act the consequences of which the wisdom of wiser men than they could not in many years remove.

MR. DISRAELI, for the Government, had nothing to say but that he indignantly repudiated any sinister intention, and that the Parks were unfit places for public meetings; for however honest the intention of the callers, they gave opportunity to "the scum of the metropolis" to misconduct themselves. Yet he declared himself no more opposed to public meetings than MR. MILL or any of his friends. Nothing could be more important than such an excuse, except that offered for the massacre at New Orleans. The original difficulty, in both cases, is the total incapacity of Toryism to understand the spirit and conditions of a free, constitutional government. It always strikes at free speech under pretense of preserving public order. It interprets a logical statement as a threat, and resents the drawing of conclusions as if they were swords. If the stupidity of Toryism were ever surprising—if it were not an essential and invariable part of it, we might wonder that, with the tremendous experience of 1832, the British Ministry should undertake to interfere with public meetings, as a means of thwarting the Reform spirit of the day. That spirit is the salvation of the country, and could its expression be wholly repressed, it would merely be hermetically sealed down into the boiler. Undoubtedly the Tory Ministry, by interfering with the Hyde Park meeting, has secured the passage of the Reform bill. And although it has agreed to refer the question of the right of meeting in the Parks to judicial decision, it has plainly betrayed its own inclination upon the subject.

OUR NATIONAL DISGRACE.

IT is now safe to say that the wheat crop of the United States in the current year, 1866, will be the largest ever harvested. Of the corn and pork crops it is yet too soon to speak with certainty. Thus far, both promise excellently; but early frosts may blight too confident expectations, and the most that can safely be said is that the prospect is good. The petroleum crop has been bountiful; our foreign export is over four times that of last year. Finally, of our greatest staple, cotton, the prospect is fair. Estimates vary somewhat in this section. There are those who look for a crop of 3,000,000 bales; and there are others, apparently equally well informed, who carefully based by precedent, and regarding with the unprecedentedness of free negro labor, who declare that a crop of 1,500,000 bales will astonish them. A middle party expects 2,300,000 bales; and if no accident or early frost occurs, the chances are fair that this estimate will not exceed, though it may fall short of the actual product. With a crop of 2,300,000 bales, prices might be maintained until the crop of 1867 approached harvest season, and it would thus yield to the planter as much money, even in gold, as the greatest crop ever hitherto gathered.

Our first thought, in contemplating these agreeable facts, must be a reverent gratitude to Almighty God for having so greatly blessed us, at the issue of an exhaustive war. This supreme duty performed, the second reverts to the industrial and financial nature. And the query suggests itself at the outset, how comes it, with the boundless resources of this land country, and with harvests far surpassing those of past years, that our public and private finances are still in a position of disgrace; that United States money is classed by foreigners with Austrian paper, and that every where a New York dollar is only worth two-thirds of a London or Paris dollar; that clothing and food, the necessaries and the luxuries of life, are all dearer here than elsewhere in the civilized world; and above all, that the people of the United States, who produce so largely, and among whom, in consequence—social, political, and financial independence—are so abundant and so easy to obtain, should be the most heavily taxed people on the face of the earth?

It is not easy to solve the problem. A number of semi-solutions or palliative suggestions may be made. Enormous sums were recruited on our war with a lavish hand, spent more money than was necessary, and require time to recover ourselves after our national debauch. And it may be added, having started on a false path, we are necessarily bound to retrace our steps leisurely, for fear of ruining interests which were built upon the past errors. And it may further be said that, so far as our internal commerce is concerned, our paper currency answers every purpose, while its depreciation serves to check our foreign importations. These and other arguments of the same class were effectively used in Congress by Senator JOHN SHERMAN, MR. THADDEUS STEVENS, and others, against the dominant party, in opposition to more conservative men, who desired to initiate a policy leading, within a given time, to a restoration of specie payments.

Still, to a common-sense observer, contemplating, on the one hand, the resources and the annual product of the country, and, on the other, the aggregate amount of the national debt and the annual interest charge, it seems monstrous that our country should continue in a position of disgrace. We owe but little more than half the national debt of England, and our revenue is two-thirds greater than that of England; yet British sovereigns and notes of the Bank of England command a premium of 5o per cent. in our own market in our own currency. It would seem much more reasonable that British Bank notes should sell at a discount for American money.

It may be said that MR. MCCULLOCH is not to blame for this state of things; that he frankly told the result in plain language; that he begged Congress to give him the power to contract the currency, and that the extremity was denied. There is some truth in this. MR. SHERMAN of Ohio, and THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, acting in the interest of established industries, effectually put a stop to the Secretary's scheme for the reduction of the volume of paper-money afloat. They believed, or pretended to believe, in the language of MR. STEVENS, that there is not half enough currency afloat, and that it would be better to swell the present volume from $900,000,000 to $1,500,000,000, with little regard to the consequences in the Gold Room. And they actually succeeded in securing the passage of a bill which prohibits the Secretary from canceling more than about 2½ of the currency afloat in the course of the year.

The Secretary of the Treasury, adopting the fashion of a party which, according to his friends, is controlled by his financial opponents, has been, in his friends' opinions, relieved from responsibility by the action of the majority in Congress. In reply to hostile criticism he has simply to say:

"I foretold the fatal consequences of continued currency expansion. I foresaw a coming crisis. I urged a swift and sharp contraction —to the extent of thirty per cent. per annum of the volume of currency afloat. Congress would not listen to me. Instead of granting me the powers I asked, Congress actually passed a law forbidding me to use the small power I enjoyed to contract the currency."

On the other hand, members of Congress, when summoned by their constituents to explain the high price of dry goods and other necessaries of life, will say:

"We left the matter with the Secretary of the Treasury. He had power to contract loans at will, and so absorb surplus currency. His authority, in regard to the funding of the public debt, was the largest ever confided to any Finance Minister in the world. He has power to sell bonds when and as he pleases, and to keep or disburse the currency proceeds. He may sell gold when and as he pleases, and lock up, if it seems best, the currency received in exchange. He has the national credit independent, and prices are correspondingly high, the public must call him—not us—to account."

This is how the case stands at present. All admit that, in view of the enormous debt, the national income, and the general prosperity of the country, the premium on gold is unjustified. But while some blame the "inflation majority" for prohibiting by statute currency contraction, others hold the Secretary responsible for allowing the power he enjoys of funding the debt to be dormant. It is hardly possible, while examining the rival claims. Congress has adjourned, and its responsibility is no longer a question. If the Secretary fails to judicially determined to rest with Congress, the country had best carry the claim to "profit and loss," without further debate. At best we can only vote down the manufacturer men at the next election. But the Secretary is still there. He can still sell new Five-Twenty Bonds at a premium to any extent required. If the currency accumulated in the Treasury to an extent which provokes speculation, and he has no loan on the market, he would fairly seem responsible for the accumulation and for its consequences. Millions upon millions of new Five-Twenties can now be sold here and abroad at a premium. If the Secretary does not choose to supply them, he is responsible for the subsequent condition of the money and stock markets. If he does supply them, he is bound to keep in hand currency enough to represent them when Congress asks him for an account.

In the present condition of the currency a new loan would bring gold down to half the present premium, and would make money worth 6 @ 7 per cent. per annum.

POLITICIANS ADRIFT.

IT is a curious inquiry with whom in the late rebel States the managers of the RANDALL Philadelphia Convention proposed to coalesce. The motive of the call was declared to be a desire to promote harmony and reconciliation between those who had lately been divided by war. Obviously to the success of such an assembly a representation of all interests and views was not only valuable but essential. It was essential, of necessity, "By-gones are by-gones." But apparently those who issued the call were so blinded by hatred to the great body of the Union party, and by anxiety to create a new Presidential party, that their first step was a mistake, and every succeeding step has confirmed it.

The call virtually denounced the action of Congress; but as that action is sustained by the mass of the distinctive Union men in every part of the country, and nowhere more zealously than by the sturdy and tried Unionists of the late insurgent States, they were excluded from the Convention. There remained then the reactionary Unionists of 1864 and the Democrats in one part of the country, and the late rebels in the other, from which to construct a new party. But the managers, totally misapprehending the facts, immediately began to discriminate invidiously among these classes. They would have only what they called War Democrats and reactionary Republicans from the North, and those who had not been conspicuous rebels from the South. This was an impossible distinction at the North; for the last party platform of the Democracy was that made at Chicago, which was the work of VALLANDIGHAM, and was equally supported by the Peace Democrats and the War Democrats.

HENRY C. MURPHY supported it cheek by jowl with FERNANDO WOOD, and VALLANDIGHAM voted for it with JOHN T. HOFFMAN. The line which divided them as Peace and War Democrats was invisible when compared with that which united them simply as Democrats. Moreover, as a matter of fact, the Democratic party was the party of opposition to the war. It acted as a unit in the national election of 1864 during the war, and at the State elections of 1865 after the war was over. It, therefore, could not submit to be divided in 1866 by any external authority. And as the Philadelphia managers must depend upon that party as the chief element in their new combination, they would of course strengthen themselves by incorporating it as a unit instead of a divided body.

The distinction which the same gentlemen attempted at the South was equally unreal. They began by counting out the original and constant Unionists there, and insisted, with Senator DIXON at New Haven, that all the intellect and information and worth of the Union had been conspicuous in the rebellion. It was with these last, therefore, that the managers proposed conciliation. But by no representatives of this class, if not men like ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, Governor BROWN, and Governor ORR; and if they were excluded, who were to speak for them? Before the Convention met it appeared that certain persons, insignificant from their numbers, who had been unable to control the Union party, proposed to exclude both that party and the bulk of the Democrats at the North, with the Unionists and late rebels at the South, and with the remainder—that is, by themselves—to construct a party of their own to sweep the country.

The result was plain enough from the beginning. If the new movement was to succeed it could only be by the support of the Democratic party. But would that party enter into an alliance of which the terms were to be dictated by a few bolters from their legislatory opponents? If those bolters were of that opinion they were no more sagacious than usual. The RANDALL Philadelphia Convention can not change the real aspect of the situation. It may be a convenient gate for discontented Unionists to enter the Democratic fold; but the great contest will still be fought out by the Union and Democratic parties. There will not in this State, for instance, be three differing parties at the autumn elections; and even should there be apparently three, two of them will be merely allies against the other.

THE FIGHT AT LISSA.

THE extraordinary war in Europe, in which the most radical results have been attained in the briefest and most brilliant campaign, is not without its episodes of romantic heroism. The chief of these was the conduct of the Italians in the naval battle of Lissa. The Italian fleet in the Adriatic had inexplicably delayed operations. It was very large, superbly equipped, supposed to be ably commanded, maintained at vast expense, and the Italians chafed with indignation at its inactivity in the very moment when, as was believed, it might have materially assisted the movements of the army. At last, on the 16th of July, the fleet sailed from Ancona, and on the 18th attacked the fortified island of Lissa upon the coast of Dalmatia with such fury that the Italians intended on the 20th to land troops and occupy the island.

On that day, however, the Austrian squadron appeared, and the Italian Admiral PERSANO instantly bore down to the attack. A heavy gale was blowing, which perplexed the operations, but both Austrians and Italians evidently relied upon the iron sheaths and beaks with which the vessels were armed, and the conflict was tremendous. The Re d' Italia, built in New York for the Italian Government, but plated in Italy, according to the accounts, was the flag-ship of PERSANO, but for some reason he left it at the beginning of the action. The Austrian Admiral upon the Kaiser, unaware of PERSANO's movement, directed his overpowering assault against the Re d' Italia. Three or more of the Austrian iron-clads, belching fire and iron, came crushing on to the Italian ship, struck her furiously on the quarter, the stern, and amidships, and stove her to pieces. The huge ship rapidly sank; but as she went down half a battalion of soldiers climbed into the tops, and, while bobbing on by the ropes, shouldered their rifles deliberately, as if on parade, and fired a terrible volley upon the deck of the nearest Austrian ship, killing twenty and wounding sixty. It was their fierce farewell. The next moment the roaring gulf closed over the Re d' Italia and four hundred of her gallant company. A private letter is quoted by the correspondent of the New York Times, which says that Captain ENRICO BRUNO, the commander of the ship, when he saw that there was no hope, put a pistol to his head and went down with her.

At about the same time the Italian gun-boat Palestro was so overpowering attacked that her capture seemed inevitable. The Captain, CAPPELLINI, called a hasty council of his officers and crew, and they resolved to blow up the vessel rather than surrender. Then gayly hanging the ship with the flag of Italy, and cheering for King and country, the fuse was lighted, and in a moment nothing remained but floating fragments of the ship and her company of two hundred. A letter to the Turin paper says that when the fate of the Re d' Italia was evident Admiral PERSANO in the Affondatore drove with steam against the Austrian flag-ship, the Kaiser, and sank her among his own foes.

It is not easy to determine which fleet had the final advantage. Both withdrew to refit. But Tegetthoff claimed itself for a victory, and we do not observe that any Italian town rejoiced. But that is not surprising, for under the circumstances a drawn battle was a defeat for the Italians. Indeed, all fortune has followed them through the war. The heroic but disastrous day at Custozza and the romantic valor of the sea-fight at Lissa are still long in Italian song and story. But every Italian will remember with impatience that Venetia was conquered for Italy by Prussia, and that it was not Italian arms which achieved Italian unity.

THE APOLOGY FOR THE LATE MASSACRE.

THE defense made for the massacre in New Orleans is utterly impotent and contemptible. It consists in calling the assembly of the Constitution illegal; and in slandering the Radical leaders, and in declaring that they meant to inaugurate civil war, and to do all kinds of horrible deeds. No other justification of a fierce and wanton slaughter of innocent men is attempted.

Now, as we showed last week, no meeting whatever, for the purpose of secession or deliberation, assembled under any call whatever, is illegal in this country. The right of the people peaceably to assemble to consider public affairs is unalienable. If the circumstances of the case excite apprehension of probable disturbance, the authorities are to take measures to keep the peace at the meeting. But to denounce a deliberative meeting in advance as itself threatening to the public peace, and to declare an intention of dissolving it by arrest of its members before they have done any indeed done, is a proceeding which invites the riot it affects to quell.

JOHN T. MONROE, a bitter rebel, whom the President pardoned that he might be Mayor of New Orleans, undertakes to declare in advance that a meeting of citizens to discuss public questions is criminal. He is Mayor of a public peace, is therefore unlawful, and that he shall disperse it and arrest the participants. Thus no meeting of citizens of the United States in New Orleans, for any purpose whatever, which JOHN T. MONROE may consider calculated to disturb the peace, is to be permitted. His will becomes the law legally in that city, and disregard of it was the "illegality" of the Convention, whose members were therefore justifiably and properly massacred! This is the Conservative defense of that tragedy, and it needs no reply.

MR. JOHN T. MONROE, if he were once a slaveholder, may have made fast and free upon his slave plantations, but he and his Conservative apologists will learn, as border ruffians learned in KANSAS, that a city of the United States is not his slave plantation.

"THE PEOPLE."

IT is sometimes asked with an air of triumph whether the Union party is afraid of the people of this country; and whether, if its policy can not be sustained by the people, it ought to prevail? We have no wish to differ with our friends of the Evening Post—but it occasionally asks this question as if it supposed it to have some meaning.

No true American citizen is afraid of the judgment of the people; but he denies the right of those in any State who have been in rebellion against the Government to assume to be "the people" to the exclusion of those in the same State who have supported it. We, for instance, deny that the "clay-eater" and "sandhiller" who can not read or write, and who are but a little more intelligent than the animals they tend, are to be taken as equals among "the people," if all the clever men of mixed or unmixed blood in their States, the blacks, the mulattoes, the quadroons, octaroons, and others are to be excluded.

Therefore, if by "people" be understood the whole male adult population of every State, we doubt if the Post has a livelier faith in them than its neighbors. But if it means by "people" a certain class of the male adult population arbitrarily selected, and so selected as to exclude in our lately troubled States exactly those that as a class were faithful to the Government, then it seems to us distrust of them would prove a very proper want of faith in class prejudice.

If a just majority of the people of the United States, by which we mean the male adult population, or such part of them as shall be chosen by tests equally applicable to all, are opposed to the Union and Government, of course there is no help for it. But no class created by unequal tests can be fairly called the people. We, with the Post, "are not afraid of the American people." But we hold honest Saxon blood to be as much one of those people as RAPHAEL SEMMES.

SIX AND HALF A DOZEN.

A PAPER which persistently denounces Congress says: "The whole Radical party declare that the South shall not be readmitted to Congress until it conforms to certain conditions to be by themselves dictated."

What is the case upon the other side? Simply that the President insists that the South shall be readmitted to Congress because it has ostensibly conformed to conditions which he has himself dictated.

Judge RUFFIN, of North Carolina, says that the President is revolutionary because he prescribed conditions. The President says that Congress is revolutionary because it prescribes conditions. Undoubtedly if Congress is guilty so is the President. And if conditions are to be dictated, as both the Executive and Legislative branches have decided, why is it such a crime to require that they shall be effectual?

HUMILIATION AND DEGRADATION.

SENATOR DIXON said, in his speech at the Connecticut Convention, to elect delegates to the RANDALL Philadelphia Assembly: "The plan proposed by Congress is before you. It proceeds upon the ground of compelling the States lately in rebellion to submit to humiliating and degrading terms."

What are those terms? First, that they shall not have gained political power in the Government by the rebellion. Second, that those who were false to the oaths to the Constitution shall not be eligible to office until Congress removes the disability.

Those are the conditions which MR. DIXON calls humiliating and degrading. We ask any honest and manly ex-rebel if he thinks so? We ask him if he would not consider the Government insulted, after it had failed in its effort to destroy it, it should invite him to increased power in it; or if he would think himself degraded after he had violated his oath—however the violation may have justified him—if those whom that violation had brought to untold suffering and loss should hold him ineligible to office until they saw that all danger had passed?

MR. DIXON merely follows the lead of the Copperhead chiefs in telling the late insurgents that Congress seeks to humiliate and degrade them; assuring them that there is a party at the North which will support that view, and urging them to hold back, and refuse to enter Congress unless they can come with more power than those who have not rebelled. And this incitement to the late insurgents to remain loaded by the representatives of the loyal people MR. DIXON calls "an effort to restore peace and good-will to a distracted country." Does MR. DIXON think that calling vulgar honey makes it honey?

HOPE AND MEMORY.

Two Sisters are there—ever year by year
Companions true and dear
To meek and thoughtful hearts. Fair Hope is one,
With voice of merry tone,
With fleeting light, and eye of sparkling glance.
The other is perchance
E'en somewhat lovelier, but less full of glee.
Her name is Memory.

She wanders near me, chanting plaintive lays
Of by-gone scenes and days:
And when I turn, and meet her thoughtful eye,
She tells me mournfully
Of soft low gurgling brooks, and glistening flowers,
And other happy hours:
And then with tears and melancholy tone
She tells me they are gone.

Hope gently chides her—bids me not to cast
My eyes upon the past—
Cheering me thus, she leads me by the hand
To view her own fair land:
And soon I see where many pleasures meet,
Some close before my feet;
And some, even distant through the distant haze,
Grow brighter as I gaze.

Oh! both refresh me,—Yet not only so:
They teach—wherever I go.
One tells of fellow past, and one is given
To talk to me of Heaven.
And thus I'll cling to both. Soft Memory,
All pensive though she be,
Shall bide a comrade, cheerful to the end:
But Hope shall be my friend.

COMMANDER BRAINE.

IT was some time in October, 1861, that we spoke of the services of Lieutenant D. L. BRAINE, U.S.N., as a foreshadowing of the skill and power of the Government in dealing with the rebellion, and we are glad to know that our confidence was not misplaced. Our readers will hear with pleasure that Lieutenant BRAINE has been advanced to the grade of Commander in the navy by selection for eminent services during the war. "It is a simple illustice of justice," says a friend, "to a man who deserves much more."

S. F. B. MORSE, LL.D.

SAMUEL FINLEY BREESE MORSE was the eldest son of JEDIDIAH MORSE, D.D., who was influential as a clergyman, and celebrated as the father of American geography. He was born at Charlestown, Massachusetts, April 27, 1791. After a liberal education at Yale College, where he graduated in 1810, he went to England with WASHINGTON ALLSTON, to study painting, for which he had developed decided talent, under the joint tuition of ALLSTON and BENJAMIN WEST. Not content with pursuing one branch of art, he added to the study of painting that of sculpture, and in 1813 received the gold medal of the Adelphi Society of Arts for an original model of a "Dying Hercules."

After a thorough and successful course as an artstudent abroad MR. MORSE returned to the United States in 1815, and practiced his profession in New York. There was no national association of artists in this country at that time, and it was not until the year 1824 that, in connection with some other artists of New York, he organized a drawing association, which, after a variety of obstacles and struggles, finally resulted in the establishment in the city, in the year 1826, of the present honored and useful "National Academy of Design." MR. MORSE was chosen President of the institution, and was reelected to that office for sixteen years. In 1829 he returned to Europe to prosecute his studies in art more extensively, and resided for more than three years in the principal cities of the Continent. During his absence MORSE was elected to the professorship of the literature of the arts of design in the University of New York; and in the year 1835 he delivered a course of lectures before that institution upon art. But, though devoted to the fine arts, he was also deeply interested in various departments of science, and especially in chemistry. While yet a student in Yale College he had pursued the study of chemistry and natural philosophy with enthusiasm, under DANIEL D. TOMLINSON, BENJAMIN SILLIMAN and Professor DAY, and his love for scientific research and experiment continued to increase after he left college, until it became his favorite pursuit. As early as 1826 he was a colleague lecturer with Professor DANA, at the Athenæum, in New York city. He delivered lectures upon the fine arts, while Professor DANA lectured upon electro-magnetism. They became intimate friends, and MORSE learned the subject of electro-magnetism by conversation and study with his friend. The first electromagnet ever constructed in the United States is now in the possession of Professor DANA, and the spiral coil used by Professor DANA suggested the electromagnet which MORSE now used in every Morse-telegraph throughout the world.

It was in the autumn of 1832, when MR. MORSE was returning to America on board the packet-ship Sully, that, in a casual conversation with some of the passengers on the then recent discovery in France of the existence of obstacles to the easy spark from the magnet, showing the identity of electricity and magnetism, he conceived not merely the idea of the electric telegraph but of the electro-magnetic and chemical recording telegraph, substantially and essentially as it now exists. There is no question as to the originality of the present telegraph. MR. MORSE's testimony to his acts and drawings made on board of the ship has been confirmed before the courts by the testimony of all the passengers but one, who were with him upon the vessel, and the evidence was conclusive to conclusive by the judges.

Though the idea was conceived, and the pattern of the drawings and apparatus constructed in 1832, it was not until 1837 that he exhibited the operation of his system at the University of New York. The feasibility and usefulness of the invention having been thus demonstrated, MR. MORSE applied to Congress in 1838 for aid to construct an experimental line from Washington to Baltimore to demonstrate publicly the utility of the telegraph. Like all great inventions it was received coldly, with skepticism, and even with ridicule; and the session of 1837–38 closed without any encouragement, except the favorable report of the Congressional Committee.

By no means discouraged, MORSE proceeded to Europe to endeavor to awaken the interest of European Governments in his invention, and secure a patent for it. He was refused letters patent in England, in France he only secured a useless forest, and obtained no exclusive privilege in any other country. Thus repulsed and baffled he returned to America, to struggle again for years more with sleader succeeded frequent discouragements, but still possessed of a determination to interest his countrymen in his invention. Throughout the session of 1842–43 MORSE was indefatigable in pressing his invention upon the attention of Congress, and through the last day of the session had waited, and he had retired disheartened and weary, his object was secured by an appropriation of thirty thousand dollars, granted in the expiring hour of the midnight session. He was startled by the news on the morning of March 3, 1843, that Congress had voted this amount for the construction of a telegraph between

SAMUEL F. B. MORSE, LL.D.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

Washington and Baltimore; and he immediately commenced the work, which was completed in 1844, and satisfactorily demonstrated to the world the utility and value of the Morse system of electro-magnetic telegraphs.

In the twenty-two years since its first establishment its lines have gone out through all the earth. They extend upon this continent, in various directions, more than fifty thousand miles. They climb the Rocky Mountains, and stretch across the lonely plains to the Golden Gate of the Pacific. The system is adapted in every country of the eastern continent, from the extreme north of Russia, where the wires are almost ready to be linked within the Arctic circle to those that are sweeping up the Pacific coast to Behring's Straits, down to the Italian and Spanish peninsulas: they dive beneath the seas to Egypt, and find their way over deserts and under oceans to the far East. No part of the civilized world is without the electric girdle, and even across the Atlantic the great cable, now in successful operation, has established telegraphic communication between the eastern and western worlds. And if this should fail, in a very short time the Overland Telegraph will establish a continuous line of communication by land between New York and London via St. Petersburg.

The immense value of Morse's invention to the world may be estimated from the fact that, while the old system of Semaphore telegraphs cost the French Government annually more than a million of francs, the Morse telegraph added to the revenue, in three years, more than six millions. Professor Morse's claim upon the gratitude of civilized nations has been recognized as that of no other inventor who ever lived. Besides reaping at length the substantial rewards of his invention, honors have been showered upon him by national academies and universities, by scientific associations and sovereign potentates. Yale College conferred upon him the complimentary degree of LL.D. in 1848, and in the same year the Sultan of Turkey decorated him with the diamond badge of Nishan Iftichar. Gold medals of scientific merit were awarded him by the kings of Prussia and Wurtemberg and the Emperor of Austria. In 1856 the Emperor of the French presented him with the cross of Chevalier of the Legion of Honor; in the following year Denmark made him Knight of the Dannebrog; and in 1858 the Queen of Spain conferred the cross of Knight Commander of the order of Isabella the Catholic. From the King of Portugal he received the badge of knighthood of the order of the Tower and Sword; and from the King of Italy the decoration of Knight of the order of S.S. Maurice and Lazarus. He has been elected member of all the prominent European scientific and art academies; but the most distinguished and unusual honor was the collective testimonial of France, Russia, Sweden, Belgium, Holland, Austria, Sardinia, Tuscany, Turkey, and the Roman Pontiff, amounting to four hundred thousand francs, presented as a personal reward to Mr. Morse for his useful labors.

Americans, English, and French have united in giving him banquets and ovations, and his services have been fully recognized wherever civilization has made mankind acquainted with his invention. He still lives in the enjoyment of a happy and illustrious lot, esteemed by all his countrymen, and in a green old age derives merited pleasure from the contemplation of the benefi cent results of his genius, his struggles, and his persevering industry.

"AUTUMN TOURISTS."

AUTUMN TOURISTS.

THEY were rowing over a summer lake,
A lake deep blue and without a curl,
Save just the ripple the oars would make,
And the shoreward streak of pearl.

High over the water the mountains rise,
Deep under the water the mountains fall;
You may fathom the depths and mete the skies,
But the heart is deeper than all.

Some one said, "We shall miss you so,
Robin, when you are away so far!"
And he said, with a smile, "It is hard to go,
But things must be as they are."

"He can smile, so will I," she thought,
With her rosy fingers over the brink;
"But oh! some lessons are hard to be taught;
Some cups are bitter to drink.

"The time that is past, like yonder shore,
Grows fainter and fainter under our sight;
God!" she prayed, "if I see him no more,
Help me to bear it aright!"

She groaned to herself, "I must look in his eyes,
And thrill and bear the touch of his hand,
Then go on alone 'neath the pitiless skies,
When the boat has touched the strand."

"Be a man, and care as little as she!"
Thought he, as they neared the farther shore;
"Love is not made for fellows like me,
So farewell for evermore."

"A pleasant time it has been," he said;
"I wish we could have it over again."
"Ay," all bitterly murmured her heart,
"For pleasure is kin to pain!"

"We see people better in foreign lands,
Perhaps the fogs are too thick in our own,"
She said, frankly giving him both her hands,
Not a touch of pain in her tone.

Then as the shore grated under the keel,
She said, as she lightly stepped from the boat,
"How real and solid the pebbles feel
After all one's visions afloat."

The white towns glistened and gloved in the light,
And the children gathered to gaze,
And the sun poured down with a pitiless might,
As they went their several ways.

Straining of eyes and waving of hands,
And the trifles that make or mar—
These must happen in all the lands,
And things must be as they are.

A COUNTRY STORY.

FEW things in this world are pleasanter than a far-away ramble into the country on a fair summer day, when the skies have just clouds enough to shape themselves into pictures as they float idly over the heavens. For it would not suit our quiet English scenery to have a cloudless canopy of dazzling blue raised over it. We want a sky that harmonizes with our landscape, with our feelings; that makes for itself a voice, and tells us not to forget the clouds amidst the sunshine; that gives us a sense of life whose beauty is not stillness, not a life whose sensuous beauty is so potent that it weighs us down, and we can do more than lift our heads from a delicious, enervating lethargy, and just breathe out the words, "How beautiful!" Something more than this monotone of beauty is needful to us, and without our being conscious of it our June skies tell us this, and stir up in our hearts the feeling that drew forth those golden verses of the poet:

> I slept and dreamed that life was beauty,
> I woke and found that life was duty—
> Was then thy dream a shadowy lie?
> Toil on and heart courageously,
> And thou shalt find thy life to be
> A noontide light and truth to thee.

EVENING.

QUEEN EMMA OF HAWAII.—[SEE PAGE 541.]

But where am I wandering? Far away from shady lanes and hedges fragrant with wild honey-suckle, where the cool elder flowers display their tufts of tiny blossom, that make me think of Hans Christian and sunsach-trees, and tea-pots, and all kinds of things that are not a bit like them. And while I have gone into a reverie I am suddenly startled by a blaze of color, and a tank covered with lilac mallow and scarlet poppies, surmounted by a perfect wall of wild roses, meets my eye. The wild dogwood and young ivy-leaves tone it down a little, so does the wheat-field, waving like a sea of green billows, that the five-barred gate opens upon, and making me ponder what a wise provision it is that the hunting-season is over before the summer comes. And on and on I go, my eye roaming over rich pasture-lands and fields, now alive with busy hay-makers, while the last notes of the cuckoo are sounding through the land, telling us, if we will only heed its cry, "I waked up the woods to summer, and cheered it with my song; it will miss me when I am gone, and will not linger long after me." I pause to rest by the river-side, where the blue forget-me-nots enamel the mossy banks, and strive for pre-eminence with the yellow water-flags, while the white water-lilies near carry away my thoughts to "Sabrina fair" knitting lily flowers into her flowing tresses.

And through the shadowy woods I half expect to see Oberon and Titania flitting with all their fairy train—and how do I know but that Puck may not be perched on the tall bulrush opposite to me?

And then I fall to musing upon myths and mythic personages in general. How myths suit themselves to different countries! What would the classic gods of Greece do amidst English scenery? Minerva moving majestically across the plain would have no charms for an English poet, and I question much if he would even recognize Venus as his type of beauty. The Muses, too, have not met with much personal adoration since the days of Queen Anne. Old Pan alone holds his ground here as in Greece, and Fauns and Satyrs, Dryads and Hamadryads do not seem altogether out of place amidst our tangled forests.

Yet the mythic lore of England deals rather in giants, fairies, and enchantments. Instead of the labors of Hercules we have the feats of the Seven Champions of Christendom; and our want of birds with brazen feet, Hydras, and other monstrosities is supplied by the Dun Cow, and the Dragon of Wantley. A half-way station we hold between the wild rude myth-heroes of the north, and the more refined gods and goddesses of the south, and our giants are a grade between rough, unkempt Skrymner, with his uncouth brothers, and the classic Titans.

But what has this to do with the story I am going to tell you?

Just this—the foundation-stone of all my mythic superstructure was the one sentence, "It all came from a hatful of beans."

And then I sailed backward up the stream of Time, and landed at a fair haven where were three tiny urchins poring over picture-books, and the title of one of the books was "Jack and the Bean-Stalk." A curly-headed little rascal with wonderful eyes and unsmooth hair was diving into its pages, and every now and then he made his comments aloud.

"I wish I had a hatful of beans like Jack's; wouldn't I make my fortune?"

And then, returning from my mental excursion, I asked my friend,

"What came of a hatful of beans?"

"This," said he, pointing to a jolly black-timbered farm-house, of such pretension that it earned for its owner the title of Squire Bligh; though, to tell the truth, he had no more right to it than any of his neighbors.

But there was such a wealth of treasure in that house that it guaranteed respectability; and no one ever entered the doors without feeling, as Miss Matilda Tomkin, a lady who read all the periodicals of the day, observed, that you had caught a glimpse of the luxuries and appliances of Oriental life.

This might be stretching the point a little, inasmuch as the luxurious items contained in the apartments were decidedly owing to English upholstery; nevertheless, there was no lack of ivory carving, curious screens, inlaid cabinets and ebony cushions, rich stripped fabrics, tiger skins, shells, and no one knew what; but the general impression was that it would take a fabulous time to make an inventory of the whole, were practiced an appraiser might be employed.

"Who is Squire Bligh?" I asked.

"Who not Squire Bligh, you mean," returned my friend. "Sit down, and I will tell you the story."

So I sat down, and he told me as follows: and I have been thinking of it ever since, and weaving it into my thoughts with the memory of those tiny children in rent upon their marvelous picture-books.

"Nigh forty years ago there was a widow living in this place who had an only son named Jack."

"Yes," I interrupted; "and he was an idle, good-for-nothing lad, always in mischief, and an anxiety to his mother."

"Who told you so?" asked my friend.

"No one," said I; "go on with the story."

"He went on doing little or nothing until he was a great fellow of seventeen or eighteen, his chief work being to take the horses down to water for the Squire's wood: this he did not object to, as he could ride down to the river and ride up again. One fine evening in the spring he was returning with the horses as usual, when, as he passed a certain stile, he heard some one call to him:

"'Jack!'

"Here I be,' said Jack, stopping the horses and looking in the direction from whence the voice came. 'Hoy! he ejaculated, in a tone expressive of confusion and gratification, as his eye fell upon the neat little figure of the girl who had been taken to help in the dairy.

"'What is you doing here, Nelly?'

"'Waiting to see you, Jack.'

"'That's kind, at any rate, and it's not many would do it; but I'm a ne'er-do-well, and no one need trouble about me,' said he, somewhat bitterly.

"'That's just what I came to tell you,' returned the little maiden.

"'Then you don't care about me?' said he, with a little vexation in his tone.

"'Can I why should I, for a lazy fellow like you? I should think not.'

"'But you might, Nelly.'

"'Might, indeed! I mightn't do any thing of the sort. At any rate, I don't.

"'Then what did you come here for?'

"'To tell you you ought to be ashamed of yourself.'

"'There's plenty to do that,' returned the lad.

"'Yes; but you don't heed them, and you might heed me, Jack. Won't you begin to work a bit?'

"'I don't know what to begin at.'

"'Your mother's a nice bit of garden, Jack.'

"'I've nothing to put in it,' answered Jack, correspondingly.

"'Nonsense!' said Nelly; 'what a faint heart you have! I'll give you a lot of beans to begin with. You put up the horses, and I'll be back in a minute.'

"So Jack put up the horses and waited for Nelly. Presently she came tripping along, with her apron f— of something.

"'Here,' said she, 'hold your hat.' She poured the beans into it, and he went home.

"Next day Jack took a spade and worked away diligently for two hours.

"'What's come to thee, lad?' said the widow, as he came in, all flushed and hungry, to his dinner.

"'Nelly Giles is a good lass,' quoth Jack; 'and if ever I get rich I'll marry her.'

"'Thee get rich!' said the Widow Bligh; and she held up her hands in great surprise.

"Strange things happen sometimes,' returned Jack; and he resumed his digging with renewed energy. All that afternoon he dug away as though his life depended on it.

"The next day he planted his beans. He had evidently turned over a new leaf, and the widow and her neighbors thought the lad was bewitched, as perhaps he might have been. At any rate, he had set to work in earnest, and he continued steadily to do, the farmers being nothing loth to give employment to one who, despite his idleness, was a general favorite.

"Nelly alone held aloof. Jack was getting beyond her patronage; he had suddenly become more manly, and seemed as if he had grown a head and taller all at once; and Nelly turned shy, and it was all he could do to get a stray word from her now and then.

"It was clear that she would have nothing to say to him, which Jack thought rather hard after all the trouble he had taken to please her; and the more he pondered over it the less he could understand it. Nelly used to be so friendly. Perhaps if I were a rich man she might give a thought to me,' said Jack; and so he determined to go elsewhere to seek his fortune, and return and make Nelly his wife.

"When he went to say 'Good-by' to her he did it in quite a blundering way.

"Maybe I shall find you married when I come home again, Nelly,' said the poor lad, looking wistfully at her.

"'Maybe you will,' retorted Nelly, 'if I find any one I like while you are away.'

"And so they parted, and both repented their speeches when it was too late to recall them.

"Well, what is to be is to be,' soliloquized Jack, endeavoring to find consolation therein; 'but Nelly's the only woman that shall ever be my wife.'

"When Jack was gone Nelly went very often to see the New Hall, and was a great comfort to her; and their conversation always turned upon Jack.

"A year passed away and no tidings came of him. Then another, and the two women did not talk so much now, but they sat quietly at their work when Nelly could spare time from the dairy, and it was a consolation to them to be together.

"At the beginning of the next year Nelly was summoned to her home in a distant county. Her mother was dying, and as she did not come back the Widow Bligh was left to bear her trouble alone; and through the spring and into the summer she watched and watched, and every morning, as she opened her shutters and let in the daylight, she looked wistfully down the road to bring her son home, and every evening as the daylight faded away she said, 'He may come to-morrow.'

"And at length the 'to-morrow' came, and a handsome sailor walked up the village street into his mother's cottage — and the news spread abroad that Jack Bligh had come home with bags of golden guineas.

"But that was not, of course, true. The first person that Jack asked after was Nelly Giles; but he could hear nothing of her.

"In August last year the old lady, said the widow, who was quite content, now that she had her son, and indeed did not care much for a rival, 'she's not worth thinking of.'

"But Jack was not of his mother's opinion, and he was scarcely sorry to go away again, for the old place seemed very dreary without Nelly.

"This time he was able to write to his mother occasionally, for he had brushed up his writing; and was at a great deal of pains to get the old schoolmaster came in to read her son's letters.

"A second time Jack Bligh came home; and this time a liberal check was sent to the bean and packages, stopped at the widow's door, for Jack was prospering.

"But nothing had been heard of Nelly, and Jack could not bear the sight of the fine things he had brought, for he had intended the most of them for her.

"'It's all through those beans,' thought poor Jack, 'that I came to go away.'

"Yet would he have been any nearer had he staid at home in idleness?

"Fifteen years had passed away, and Jack had prospered so well that he decided upon giving up his sea-life and settling in his native village. So he took the jolly old farm and lived with his fine ships overseas, and the Widow Bligh presided over it in great state."

"And did Jack marry?" I asked.

"Don't interrupt me," said my friend. "For a long time he did not, although his mother pointed out more than one girl in the neighborhood who would make him a good wife—at last he did."

"Oh!" said I, with a kind of sigh.

"Well," continued my friend.

"One morning a pale, thin woman entered the village, and when she was opposite the old blacksmithed home, she asked the first person who was passing whether the Widow Bligh was still living?

"'Ay,' replied the man, 'she be.'

"'And has Jack come home?'

"'Jack, indeed!' said the man. 'Squire Bligh's come home, and he lives in the fine house there.'

"The poor woman looked up at the substantial dwelling of the lad to whom she had given the bat-ed beans, and her heart died within her.

"'He'll not care for the like of me,' said she to herself, as she turned to go away again.

"But the stout lad had not forgotten her for toil and travel worn frame, and she had not taken many steps before she sank down on the ground.

"The wagoner saw her assistance. He raised her head, pushed back her bonnet, and shouted to the astonished Squire, who happened to be returning from his morning's stroll:

"'Measter, measter! if here Iean't Nelly Giles!'

"This was on a Saturday, and how it all came to be arranged I never could find out, for when I asked Nelly, I don't know; but the next Sunday at church the bans were put up, and in less than three weeks the Squire and Nelly were married. And they live at the old farm-house to this day, and Squire changed its name to the 'Bean Farm,' and as it has been called ever since. And they've one daughter, as bright a lass as need be. She does not wear little white linen caps and aprons, like her mother used to do; but, for all that, the Squire says she's the very image of what Nelly Giles was when she gave him the handful of beans."

And this was the story my friend told me, and somehow it was itself into my mind in connection with the fairy tales, and with the little ones in the fair haven were poring over, and I mingled fiction and fact until I brought myself almost to believe that I had seen the fairy and the enchantress.

"Up for away in the north with her father. He was a poor, weak body, and she couldn't leave him till he died, and then she traveled down to see if Jack had come home yet, and when she knew that Jack liked her, and would never marry any one else. Only, you see, she never expected him to prosper as he had done."

* * *

And this was the story my friend told me, and somehow it was itself into my mind in connection with the fairy tales,

The people divided into two principal parties, the National Democracy and the National Conservative Union. The first of these ignored the Constitution of 1864, and formed a new convention to frame a Constitution expressing the will of the entire State; declared that the Government was one of the white people and not to be perpetuated for the exclusive benefit of the white race;" and "that people of African descent can not be considered as citizens of the United States, and that there can in no event, nor under any circumstances, be an equality between the white and other races;" and claimed the right of compensation for emancipated slaves. The National Conservative Union party opposed the extension of suffrage to the negroes, and recognized the validity of the Constitution of 1864. There was also a large body of the people in favor of universal suffrage. These were known as the Radical Republican party. The rest of the blacks and the friends of the late rebel Governor ALLEN, who they nominated to succeed Governor WELLS, and the latter was nominated by both the National Democratic and the National Conservative Union conventions. In accepting he said he considered both platforms in unison, and doubtless they were in one particular, namely, his nomination. Governor WELLS received 22,312 votes, and Ex-Governor ALLEN 5497. In every parish but one the Democratic ticket for members of the Legislature was successful.

On November 13 the Radical Republicans held a mass meeting in New Orleans, at which resolutions were passed claiming the election of H. C. WARMOUTH as their delegate to Congress from "the Territory of Louisiana," in part by the votes of colored persons, amounting to 19,000. They resolved also that the State could only be restored "in the constitutional way" by petitioning Congress for admission whenever a majority of the whole people deem it expedient so to petition; and that the support of the two voters, nine-tenths of whom were disloyal, made such a petition inexpedient at the present time.

November 23, 1865, the Legislature assembled at New Orleans, in an extra session called by the Governor. At the beginning of the year Messrs. SHARKEY and R. KING CUTLER had been elected United States Senators. The Governor now repudiated their election, and called for a new one. Messrs. HOWARD, HENT and HENRY BOYCE were elected in their place. The Lower House opened the question of a Convention for drafting a State Constitution, and a majority of the Committee to whom the question was referred reported in favor of a new Convention. It was taken for granted, in the consideration of this question, that the Convention of 1864 had no longer any thing more to do with the matter. The report of the Committee was, however, never acted upon.

GOVERNOR WELLS'S RESOLUTION.

In the mean time Governor WELLS seems to have found that the confidence which he reposed in the people of his State had been abused. Lot him speak for himself:

"When Louisiana was restored to the lawful authority of the United States, what was my conduct toward the white population of eighteen parishes reclaimed? Although I had been appointed and driven from home by the rebel authorities, I expressed all feeling of rancor so natural to the human heart under such circumstances, and in the belief that a majority had been reduced from their allegiance to the flag by wiles of artful demagogues, I brought on the rebellion. I determined to try the effect of kindness and confidence in winning them back to their first love. I addressed them a proclamation, congratulating them on their restoration to the privileges of the government of law and order, and that, as far as I was concerned, I was willing to forget the past. I appealed to them to submit cheerfully and unreservedly to the new order of things, and assured them that although the Federal Government had been organized, yet I was anxious that a general election in all the parishes should be held, in which the whole State should participate. I fulfilled every word of my promises. I appointed the most conservative men to offices in several parishes; I signed their applications to the President of the United States for special pardons; I persisted in my course of reconciliation, notwithstanding the warning and remonstrance of Louisiana men whose loyalty could be depended on in accomplishing the purpose intended, and who predicted that at the very first election that took place in every Parish where the rebel powers would prescribe every man from office who had not been the rebel servant. These predictions have been realized to the letter at every subsequent election which the exercise of my power has called. And I do not blame, for it was publicly avowed, that I was put at the head of their ticket simply because I was thought I could be relied on in securing a representation of the State in Congress.

"It is further well known that the platform adopted by the Committee appointed for that purpose to the Democratic Convention held in this city, was a reiteration of the doctrines of the right of secession; and it was only through the earnestness of a few of the more moderate members of the party that this platform was made to assume the form which was finally read. At the same Convention, it was known and live Democrats were publicly censured by resolution, because, in a speech delivered before the body, I had said that secession was more than a crime, it was a blunder. Notwithstanding my nomination by the Democratic Party, another candidate was put into the field in opposition to me, who had offended as Governor the rebel authorities, and who, had he been in the country and signified his assent, I have no doubt would have been overwhelmingly elected. When the members of the Legislature met in extra session, in the month of November, 1865, they waived by me for the purpose of raising money to restore the broken levees, and to take measures to relieve the credit of the State. I found them more intent on calling a Convention to change the Constitution of 1864, than to promote the general interests of the people. Their chief objection to that instrument was the character of the men who framed it and the abolition of slavery. Having failed at the extra session to pass a bill to call a Convention, the attempt was renewed at the regular session, held in the month of January. More than half the time of that body was spent in discussing that question. Finally, a committee was sent to Washington to consult with the President, and the Legislature only abandoned the measure through his advice. I considered it unconstitutional, impolitic, and for that reason opposed it. I had learned enough of the real sentiments of the people to be convinced that if a new Constitution was made it would be less in harmony with the views of the President and more adverse than the Constitution of 1864; the result of which would be to leave the State for the admission of any representatives."

THE CONVENTION OF 1864 REVIVED.

Now let us see what are Governor WELLS's views as to the revived Convention of 1864:

"Impressed with the truth of those views, foreseeing the necessity for the future security of the Union men in the South, that the amendment to the Constitution, adopted by Congress, and submitted to the several States for ratification should prevail, and fully realizing the fact that the Legislature would never be ratified by the present Legislature, I own I was in favor of the reassembling of the Convention of 1864, as the only means of securing the ratification required, and thereby to insure the admission of our Representatives in Congress. The legal right of the Convention to continue its functions is a question, I suppose, properly pertaining to the courts to decide. Senators and Representatives in Congress of great learning, and men of high legal attainments in New Orleans, have expressed the opinion that under the provisions of enforcement the Convention could lawfully assemble. A distinguished Democratic Senator in Congress took the same view. For myself, if I had any doubt on the subject, I have deferred to the opinion of abler men. The total number of delegates composing the Convention was one hundred and fifty. The number of votes requisite was sixty. The quorum was fixed at seventy-six, this number being a majority of the whole body. The seventy-seven gentlemen unrepresented in the Convention that were entitled to be there delegates, were those who had been in session to be filled would make sixty-one delegates to be elected. Before the assembling of the Convention, those who, disapproving of the emancipation clause, refused to sign the Constitution, and those who had been elected as extreme Conservatives. Counting the sixty-one delegates to be elected to fill the same class as the members of the Convention Radical, it will be seen that parties would have been nearly equally divided. I had no hesitation in my details to show the falsity of the charges that have been made against the Convention of 1864, and have exonerated the whole State, and that it was intended to be packed. Every parish would have been represented, and every half having elected their delegates in 1864, and the other half in 1866, making a just equilibrium. Those who opposed and those who sustained the cause of the Confederacy. The same disfranchising clause in the Constitution of 1864, but the much-abused members of that Convention had it in their power to have made a Constitution as much against those engaged in the rebellion as Tennessee and Missouri have adopted, and have presented an opposite course, and trusted that these men would be actuated by a spirit of liberality and forbearance in return for so liberally shown toward them.

"This conviction as to indirectly of the party which elected him Governor WELLS to seek relief from the evils which he thought due to his too liberal policy of reconciliation. Returning to the Radicals, who were determined to revive the Convention of 1864. He therefore gave his official sanction to the revival of the Convention by the mode of petition to Congress for admission of the whole people deem it expedient so to petition; and that the support of the two voters, nine-tenths of whom were disloyal, made such a petition inexpedient at the present time.

November 23, 1865, the Legislature assembled at New Orleans, in an extra session called by the Governor. At the beginning of the year Messrs. SHARKEY and R. KING CUTLER had been elected United States Senators. The Governor now repudiated their election, and called for a new one. Messrs. HOWARD, HENT and HENRY BOYCE were elected in their place. The Lower House opened the question of a Convention for drafting a State Constitution, and a majority of the Committee to whom the question was referred reported in favor of a new Convention. It was taken for granted, in the consideration of this question, that the Convention of 1864 had no longer any thing more to do with the matter. The report of the Committee was, however, never acted upon.

GOVERNOR WELLS'S RESOLUTION.

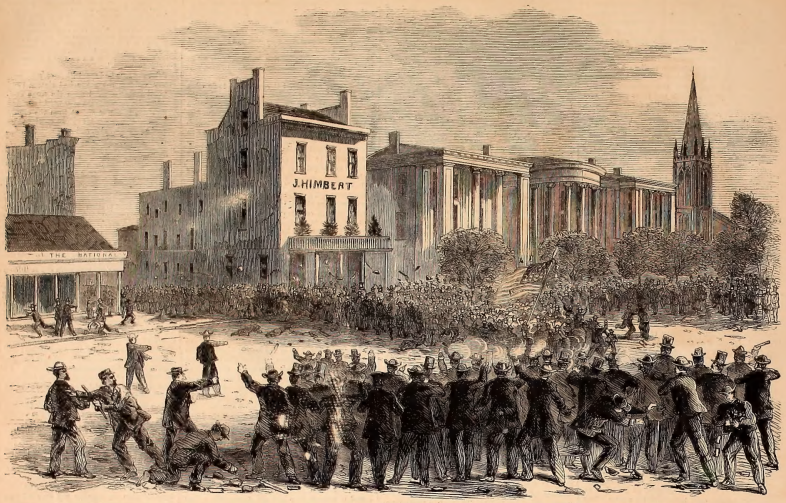
In the mean time Governor WELLS seems to have found that the confidence which he reposed in the people of his State had been abused. Let him speak for himself:

"When Louisiana was restored to the lawful authority of the United States, what was my conduct toward the white population of eighteen parishes reclaimed? Although I had been appointed and driven from home by the rebel authorities, I expressed all feeling of rancor so natural to the human heart under such circumstances, and in the belief that a majority had been reduced from their allegiance to the flag by wiles of artful demagogues, I brought on the rebellion. I determined to try the effect of kindness and confidence in winning them back to their first love. I addressed them a proclamation, congratulating them on their restoration to the privileges of the government of law and order, and that, as far as I was concerned, I was willing to forget the past. I appealed to them to submit cheerfully and unreservedly to the new order of things, and assured them that although the Federal Government had been organized, yet I was anxious that a general election in all the parishes should be held, in which the whole State should participate. I fulfilled every word of my promises. I appointed the most conservative men to offices in several parishes; I signed their applications to the President of the United States for special pardons; I persisted in my course of reconciliation, notwithstanding the warning and remonstrance of Louisiana men whose loyalty could be depended on in accomplishing the purpose intended, and who predicted that at the very first election that took place in every Parish where the rebel powers would prescribe every man from office who had not been the rebel servant. These predictions have been realized to the letter at every subsequent election which the exercise of my power has called. And I do not blame, for it was publicly avowed, that I was put at the head of their ticket simply because I was thought I could be relied on in securing a representation of the State in Congress.

"It is further well known that the platform adopted by the Committee appointed for that purpose to the Democratic Convention held in this city, was a reiteration of the doctrines of the right of secession; and it was only through the earnestness of a few of the more moderate members of the party that this platform was made to assume the form which was finally read. At the same Convention, it was known and live Democrats were publicly censured by resolution, because, in a speech delivered before the body, I had said that secession was more than a crime, it was a blunder. Notwithstanding my nomination by the Democratic Party, another candidate was put into the field in opposition to me, who had offended as Governor the rebel authorities, and who, had he been in the country and signified his assent, I have no doubt would have been overwhelmingly elected. When the members of the Legislature met in extra session, in the month of November, 1865, they waived by me for the purpose of raising money to restore the broken levees, and to take measures to relieve the credit of the State. I found them more intent on calling a Convention to change the Constitution of 1864, than to promote the general interests of the people. Their chief objection to that instrument was the character of the men who framed it and the abolition of slavery. Having failed at the extra session to pass a bill to call a Convention, the attempt was renewed at the regular session, held in the month of January. More than half the time of that body was spent in discussing that question. Finally, a committee was sent to Washington to consult with the President, and the Legislature only abandoned the measure through his advice. I considered it unconstitutional, impolitic, and for that reason opposed it. I had learned enough of the real sentiments of the people to be convinced that if a new Constitution was made it would be less in harmony with the views of the President and more adverse than the Constitution of 1864; the result of which would be to leave the State for the admission of any representatives."

THE CONVENTION OF 1864 REVIVED.

Now let us see what are Governor WELLS's views as to the revived Convention of 1864:



"Impressed with the truth of those views, foreseeing the necessity for the future security of the Union men in the South, that the amendment to the Constitution, adopted by Congress, and submitted to the several States for ratification should prevail, and fully realizing the fact that the Legislature would never be ratified by the present Legislature, I own I was in favor of the reassembling of the Convention of 1864, as the only means of securing the ratification required, and thereby to insure the admission of our Representatives in Congress. The legal right of the Convention to continue its functions is a question, I suppose, properly pertaining to the courts to decide. Senators and Representatives in Congress of great learning, and men of high legal attainments in New Orleans, have expressed the opinion that under the provisions of enforcement the Convention could lawfully assemble. A distinguished Democratic Senator in Congress took the same view. For myself, if I had any doubt on the subject, I have deferred to the opinion of abler men. The total number of delegates composing the Convention was one hundred and fifty. The number of votes requisite was sixty. The quorum was fixed at seventy-six, this number being a majority of the whole body. The seventy-seven gentlemen unrepresented in the Convention that were entitled to be there delegates, were those who had been in session to be filled would make sixty-one delegates to be elected. Before the assembling of the Convention, those who, disapproving of the emancipation clause, refused to sign the Constitution, and those who had been elected as extreme Conservatives. Counting the sixty-one delegates to be elected to fill the same class as the members of the Convention Radical, it will be seen that parties would have been nearly equally divided. I had no hesitation in my details to show the falsity of the charges that have been made against the Convention of 1864, and have exonerated the whole State, and that it was intended to be packed. Every parish would have been represented, and every half having elected their delegates in 1864, and the other half in 1866, making a just equilibrium. Those who opposed and those who sustained the cause of the Confederacy. The same disfranchising clause in the Constitution of 1864, but the much-abused members of that Convention had it in their power to have made a Constitution as much against those engaged in the rebellion as Tennessee and Missouri have adopted, and have presented an opposite course, and trusted that these men would be actuated by a spirit of liberality and forbearance in return for so liberally shown toward them.

"This conviction as to indirectly of the party which elected him Governor WELLS to seek relief from the evils which he thought due to his too liberal policy of reconciliation. Returning to the Radicals, who were determined to revive the Convention of 1864. He therefore gave his official sanction to the revival of the Convention by the mode of petition to Congress for admission by issuing writs for the election of delegates in parishes unrepresented in 1864, and to fill the places of those whose constituents refused to be represented in opposition to the action of the Convention. President JOHNSON had advised against the Constitutional Convention, which, after much deliberation, he had proposed, and had succeeded in preventing its election. He now opposed the revival of the Convention of 1864 on the ground that it was the creature of authority, since it did not fairly represent the State.

On the evening of July 27, in the Hall of the House of Representatives at New Orleans, there was an enormous mass meeting held. There was a large audience both in the hall and outside, the majority of which were freedmen. Speeches were made in which it was represented that Congress was not satisfied with the Constitution and this because it did not give them the right to vote; Governor HAHN told them they ought to hold office as well as the white men; the JUDGE RENDELL of the hall told them they were better educated in politics than the white men and better informed as to what the Louisiana had now no Constitution, and that they were "in their primitive capacity;" Judge HEUSTAIN told them that A. P. DOSTIE, a prominent member of the Convention, who appealed to the freedmen to induce the actions of the Convention, and to come out in favor for its protection.

THE RIOT.

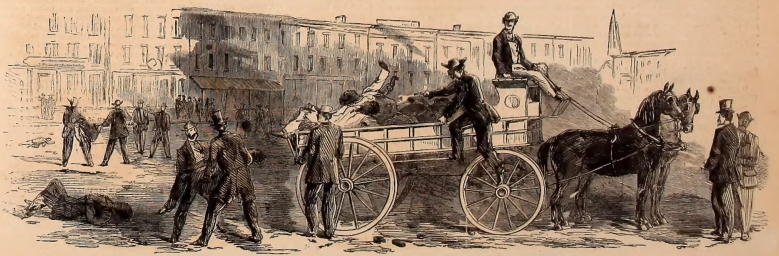
The Convention met on Monday, July 30, at noon. Only one-sixth of the body was present. Whatever its designs may have been, it certainly had as no committed no overt act. Nevertheless, it was ultimately the tempter of the preliminary meeting on the 27th had stimulated the resistance to the Convention among the freedmen. The municipal authorities had, upon consultation with General BAIRD, determined not to interfere with the Convention unless disturbances should ensue. A disturbance was feared, and the authorities were partially prepared for it. Mr. ATTORNEY-GENERAL HAHN gave the advice of President JOHNSON in regard to the military, and the President had replied that it must be left to them to, and that they must act with the civil authorities. Every body knew that under the circumstances, and especially if the negroes should come out armed, all the elements for a bloody collision was inevitable. General BAIRD knew it, and it was his duty to have his force ready in hand for the emergency. All the members of the police and the courts right in ordering the arrest of the Convention in case their meeting occasioned a disturbance, and declared the President, the Attorney-General, the Governor, and the Chief-of-Police, to be in insurrection. Under the circumstances, especially if the negroes should come out armed, all the members of the police and militia

THE RIOT IN NEW ORLEANS—THE FREEDMEN'S PROCESSION MARCHING TO THE INSTITUTE—THE STRUGGLE FOR THE FLAG.

[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE RIOT IN NEW ORLEANS—SIEGE AND ASSAULT OF THE CONVENTION BY THE POLICE AND CITIZENS.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.

[SEE PAGE 535.]



THE RIOT IN NEW ORLEANS—MURDERING NEGROES IN THE REAR OF MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.
[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE RIOT IN NEW ORLEANS—PLATFORM IN MECHANICS' INSTITUTE AFTER THE RIOT.
[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE RIOT IN NEW ORLEANS—INTERIOR OF MECHANICS' INSTITUTE DURING THE RIOT.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE RIOT IN NEW ORLEANS—CARRYING OFF THE DEAD AND WOUNDED—INHUMAN CONDUCT OF THE POLICE.

[SEE PAGE 535.]

ARLINGTON HEIGHTS.

The summer blue its little drifts of round—
Tangled with wet bud-shadows and the light
Small breath of scattered morning buds—around
The yellow path through which our footsteps wound.
Below, the Capitol rose glittering white.

There stretch'd a sleeping army. One by one,
They took their pieces small thousands neat;
No leader's word had'rd on before, and none
Loud'n on his sword or staggerd with his gun.
I wonder if their feet have rested yet.

They saw the dust, they join'd the moving mass,
They entered the fierce muscle cry for blood,
Then struggled there and lay down in the grass
Were flowers for such, where whence their senile did pass;
Sing tenderly, O river's haunted flood!

They had been sick, and worn, and weary, when
They stayed to take rain lull beneath the trees;
Yet, if in some red-clouded dawn again
The country should be calling to her men,
Shall the rivulets not remember these?

Beside them underneath the mild-day skies
The dreadful phantoms of the living walk,
And lay in moans and darkness, with their cries—
The mothers, sisters, wives with faded eye.
That call still names among their broken talk.

And there is one who comes alone and stands
At the low frozen hearth—childless and opprest
By Something he has summon'd to his hands,
While the wild pallor of its many hands

Points at the rusted gourd in his own breast!
WASHINGTON, D. C.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XIV.

But the minute the carriage was fairly out of sight and the last roll of the wheels had died away in the distance, Clover caught Lily round the waist and went dancing with her all through the hall, and into the offices, room, and around that. And Lily could neither stop nor object at first; for Clover was a sturdy little piece, with strong arms, and Lily herself was quite out of breath with astonishment and exercise.

"What are you about?" she cried at last. "Do let me alone! What can you be thinking of, Clover? Let me go! I want to read."

Clover let her go and danced on by herself.

"—yes, I think," she said, demurely, and panting a little too. "I want to get—my ideas in order. Just now—I don't know whether—rose-bugs are white animals, or—pink foxhats are flower-pots." And Clover went off with another whirl and a full burst of Yankee Doodle, much to Lily's indignation.

"How you do act!" she said. "White muslins great pink foxhats—if that's what you want to know. Clover, be quiet, Clover? You do make such a noise!"

Clover stopped instantly.

"What do you want to do, Lily? Shall we go back at our seeds again?"

"No," said Lily, shortly. "I want to read. You can't see the seeds if you look." And Lily turned her back upon the bow-window, boxes, flower-pots, and all, and sat down in a corner of the sofa with her book.

Softly, and without even speaking to make a noise, Clover took little Prim's hand in hers and went toward the window; for even the outside of those panes of glass in her little box had a great charm for Clover.

"Will there really be so very few flowers?" said Primrose, looking anxiously up in her face.

"No indeed," said Clover. "I don't think so at all. I'm only afraid I sha'n't have room for them all. Why, Prim, I counted the seeds that I sowed in just one of my pots, and there were ten; and Mr. Vick says that kind must be set a foot apart when it's transplanted; and so that one little pot will want ten feet of my garden. I don't know what I'm to do, for I can't throw one of 'em away," said Clover, bending lovingly over the little box. "Oh! I wish I knew what my seeds are doing down in the earth!"

"They are growing larger every minute," said Mrs. May, for she had come in while the children talked. "That is the first thing a seed does after it is covered with the earth and begins to get warm and moist. By-and-by you will see that it swells, earth in your pots cracking open here and there, and all packed up in little heaps, because the hidden seeds are swelling and taking more room."

"Will it? will they?" said Clover, the pink tinge flashing over her cheeks. "Oh, Lily! do you hear?"

"Yes—no, I am reading," said Lily.

"But, mamma, what makes them swell?" said Clover. "I can't see, why do they? what is it?"

"Do you remember when Prim was a baby, covered up in her cradle and fast asleep, how still she lay, and how smooth and undisturbed was her little silk quilt?"

"Yes indeed," said Clover. "I used to watch and listen sometimes to see if she was really breathing."

"Well, these seeds that you have just covered with soft earth are asleep. Hid away in each one of them is a tiny morsel of a plant, all crumpled up and folded in, as still and motionless as if it had no like. Even in a large seed like a bean it is very small, just a little stem and one or two leaves; and there it lies, fast bound in the hard outer-shell of the seed, waiting its time."

"Mamma, can you see this little plant?" said Clover.

"Yes, sometimes. If you split open a bean very carefully, you will see the tiny plant folded away between the two halves of the bean; but in very small seeds you would need a magnifying-glass, or even a microscope. Well, when the seed is put in the ground the hard outer shell grows moist, from the moist earth, and begins to crack open; and the warm rays of the sun send their heat quite down through earth and seed and all, to the little plant that lies so fast asleep. And the plant awakes, and begins to stir and stretch itself out—or to grow, as we say. The wee bit of a stem lengthens, and pushes its way through the outer-wall of seed down into the earth, and the leaves shoot up into the sunshine, and unfold, shaking off by degrees the seed which held them fast before."

"Mamma, it's like a fairy tale"! said Clover.

"Yes, it's the princess in the wood"! cried Primrose. "She's asleep, and she is the prince that comes and kisses her till she wakes up."

"Something like that," said Mrs. May, smiling. "But oh how many princesses there are in every wood, in every foot of ground, on the rocks, and even in the streams! Oh, my children, what wonderful work of the world which is going on all the time —part of what the sun was meant to do when God made two great lights, and set them in the firmament of heaven to give light upon the earth. And now the little stem which shot forth down into the ground begins to branch a little, throwing out tiny fibres, and becomes the root; taking in from the dark soil a part of the food on which the young plant lives, while at the same time the leaves expand at the upper end of the stem, and other leaves come out, and they take in the rest of its food from air and sunshine and drops of dew. So your plant begins its growth—the smallest flower and the tallest tree."

"It is almost too wonderful!" said Clover, drawing a long breath. "I shall have to think about it a great deal."

"Mamma," said Primrose, "the princess slept a hundred years; would the seed sleep so long and then wake up after all?"

"Not every kind of seed; they are as different as possible in this respect. Some will not grow if they are more than one year old, and lose their life after are five or six; while others keep good at sixty years old, and others must be sowed just as soon as they are ripe."

"Mamma, I don't understand yet how the seed does all this," said Clover; "how the leaves unfold and the roots stretch out."

"I think no mortal understands it," said her mother; "it is one of the secrets of the Lord's power."

"Then blessed is the springtime!" wrote King David of the earth's rich carpet of grass and corn; and I think the utmost learning can say no more."

"Oh, Lily! oh, Lily! how much you have lost!" said Clover, looking toward the sofa, where Lily was curled up as if half asleep. "And all for that stupid book!"

The book's not stupid," said Lily, slowly uncurling herself and getting—"it's very hard to find hearing about seeds, it's nothing but seeds, seeds, from morning to night!" And Lily stretched her arms about as if tired of the whole matter.

"Did you have a pleasant visit from Maria, Lily?" inquired her mother.

"Mamma—it was very long."

"Mamma," said Primrose, "she says she's had ten new frocks made just for summer!—ten all for herself, mamma."

"Poor child!" said Mrs. May.

"Oh, mamma!" exclaimed Lily, coming up to the window, "what makes you say that?"

"She is very young to be a prisoner," said Mrs. May.

"A prisoner!" said Lily. "I don't see how having plenty of frocks could make her that, I'm sure. I should think it would be just the other way. I thought home and mother and your people at home. What can you mean, mamma?"

"Not that people who are kept at home are prisoners," said Mrs. May, "but makes you say it."

"Ah! it's one of mamma's stories, I know," cried Primrose, as keen for a story as a pointer for game. "Mamma, dear, won't you tell it to us right away? What is it called, mamma?"

"It might be called 'A Legend of Grundy Castle,'" said Mrs. May, "if you like that name."

"What an odd name for a castle!" said Lily.

"Never mind," said Prim. "Do sit down and be quiet, Lily. Now, mamma—I'm all ready. Come, Clover."

"Is it a fairy-tale, mamma?" said Clover, bringing her thoughts back with a great reluctance from the little flower-pots that held such real wonders.

"You shall judge. Grundy Castle stood on a hill of land that was chiefly covered with buildings. In like manner many nations disputed possession of its mistress, Mrs Grundy. And in fact she was quite a citizen of the world, and had received an education (such as it was) in so many places that she was entirely at home in all. It was hard to travel in any country without encountering her, or at least without hearing what she had said the last time she came that way."

"Her castle could n't have been much, then," said Lily, "or she wouldn't have gone wandering round so."

"Perhaps she had your ideas about home," said Mrs. May. "But, however that was, she certainly did seem to prefer other people's houses to her own, and was never still a minute."

"Mamma, what sort of a person was she?" said Clover. "You said 'half-education, such as it was'?"

"She was not what I call well-educated," said Mrs. May; "for of some of the most important things she was entirely ignorant. For instance, she had never 'studied to be quiet;' she knew nothing of 'the law of kindness;' her thoughts had never been trained to think well, nor her hands to bear other people's burdens."

"What funny studies!" said Primrose.

"All that she had ever learned was to talk pretty well in all languages; to handle a spy-glass; enough geography to make her think she knew exactly where any body was at a moment's warning, and just as much arithmetic as to put two and two together, though she made grievous mistakes sometimes even in doing that small sum."

"Mamma, what a strange person!" said Lily. "I can't make her out at all. Was she handsome?"

"No," said Mrs. May, "she used her spy-glass too much for that. In fact, she never looked at any thing straight with both eyes, and that, of course, gave a disagreeable expression to her face."

"I think she was horrid!" said Primrose. "Just like the Misses in my 'Arabian Nights.' She never would have got into my house, I can tell her."

"Other people let her come," said Mrs. May. "She had a great deal of power, and went every where. Even when they were afraid of her they let her come, for I think they were more afraid to keep her away."

"But, mamma," said Lily, "I don't see how you're going to get round to where you started from. You left Maria Lily in a prisoner, and then you go off and tell all about Mrs. Grundy, who lived a thousand years ago, or never lived at all. I don't see how you're going on with Maria's ten frocks."

"What could she have to do with them?" said Mrs. May, smiling. "But you must wait for an answer, Lily, for there comes papa, and we must have tea."

BABY ON THE PORCH.

Out on the porch, by the open door,
Sweet with a breeze that's full with shade,
Baby is creeping over the floor—
Dear little winsome blue-eyed maid!

All about her the shadows dance,
All above her the roses swing,
Sunbeams in the lattice glance,
Robins up in the branches sing.

Up at the blossoms her fingers reach,
Lisping her pleading in broken words,
Cooing away in her tender speech
Songs like the twitter of nesting birds.

Creeping, creeping over the door,
Soon my birdie will find her wings,
Fluttering out at the open door
Into the wonderful world of things.

Bloom of roses and balm of dew,
Brooks that bubble and winds that call,
All things living and glad and sweet,
And the Father watching us over it all.

AFTER THE CAPTAIN.

I.

On one of those warm days in April when every whiff of the spring wind brought suggestions of summer, a little party were sitting in an artist's studio about the summer campaign—where they would go, and what they would do, until the melancholy days again. One was bound for Newport, and declared, with perhaps not exaggerated emphasis, that "Newport was bliss!" Another was eloquent of the mountains—Starr King's "White Hills." And another raved of the Catskill—of the Fawn's Leap, the view from Sunset Rock, and the Kauterskill Falls—all of which you will see if you will turn to the Weekly for July 21, and look at Mr. Nast's picture.

While one of this party talked of their plans the sixth remained silent, with a curious smile on her mouth and a dreamy look out of her eyes. Presently this silence was observed:

"And where are you going, Miss Vincent?" asked a gentleman. "You don't tell us."

"No," answered Miss Vincent, in a lazily-affirmative tone, to this assertion of the gentleman's.

"Oh, I see! you are going to Sylvia's quiet!" broke in Cad Glynn, with conclusive emphasis of knowledge.

"Oh, can you? Do then," said Syl—otherwise Sylvia—Vincent, in an amused voice, and raising her brows archly.

"Shall you go to Newport, or somewhere in that vicinity. Syl's crazy on Newport! Always paints Newport into her pictures—a bit of the Cliffs, or the Forty Steps, or Bellevue, or a glimpse of the Old South Beach! You know you do, Syl; and you know that you're going to Newport—don't you now?"

"No, I didn't know it, Cad; perhaps, though, as I am lunatic on the subject, I shall find myself there unawares."

"You remember what guests are entertained unawares, Miss Vincent?" said that bright cousin of Cad's, Arkley Glynn, with a little gallantry.

"Yes, I remember, Mr. Glynn," laughed Syl, as gayly.

"But you haven't told us where you are going," began again the first speaker.

"No, I haven't"—and once more Syl Vincent's eyes sparkled dreamily. By this time the curiosity and interest of the party were thoroughly aroused. Where was Miss Vincent going?"

"Going to the mountains, perhaps!" cried Arkley Glynn, smiling out of his wilderness of silky beard.

"Going to the moon, maybe."

"To sweep the cobwebs from the sky!" laughed Syl, at this last. "That turns the angel into an old woman, and instead of wings I have a broomstick!" she went on merrily.

So they kept it up a while longer, playing and parrying with the flowers of wit and humor, and still Miss Vincent did not tell them where she was going. At length, when speculation was at its height through idleness, pay jests, and every one of them thought Syl Vincent was to outdo them all in her announcement, perhaps, she quietly said: "I'll tell you where I'm going; I am going to Northwood."

"To Northwood! Where upon earth is Northwood?" they cried, in a breath.

"Oh, a little nest up among the New Hampshire hills."

"One of those thousand-and-one towns about the White Mountains. Why didn't you say the Mountains at once?" cried Cad, exasperated.

"Because it isn't about the White Mountains. It isn't a summer resort at all for strangers. It's just a quiet little nook for one to rest in."

"Syl, what—in—the—world possesses you now? This is a new notion. Thought you couldn't abide inland towns; the sea for you—always the sea, and plenty of society."

Syl shrugged her shoulders, and laughed lazily again.

"Cad, I'm tired of one thing. "Too much of a good thing is nothing, you know," you know. The sea is my love; but we leave our love sometimes to come back afresh. Society is a fine thing; but we can't always live with it, with its too much of it, and then it wears us out. That's the worst of it; so I am going to run away from it for a while—to run away from it, you know, to come back—seasoned."

"Syl, you're a little Sybarite; I always said so," remarked Cad Glynn, sententiously.

"Maybe. I call it philosophy, however."

"And what will you do up there in your nest, as you call it?"

"I'll paint my pictures and drink new milk."

"Bah! Idyllic you call that, I suppose? I'll tell you how it will be. For three weeks you'll think it's very pretty; in that time you'll talk the portraits of two or three old trees and a brook or a pond; then you'll begin to pine for some of the familiar faces, to remember how Prout used to feel, and how the band played on the piazza down at Newport."

They all laughed at this last sally of Cad's, and they all looked as if they thought it quite probable she was right. But Syl knew better. She knew what she wanted, and what she needed. Just this; Rest, and country air, and new milk; not a renewal of town-life at every moment, or every usual haunt. The living the winter excitement over in the same talk, the same associations socially, with only a change in localities. Some refinements can stand this from season to season, perhaps, but not such a temperament as Syl Vincent's—one of the high-pressure temperaments," as some one very aptly termed them.

Cad Glynn didn't understand this. She herself was one of those girls of strong nerves and tissues, bilious and lymphatic, who can rush through months and years of social dissipation and excitement without loss in any way. Cad was in the midst of it in the process, if they have natural kindliness of nature, as Cad Glynn certainly had; they learn at last what they would not get at by talking—deep certain toleration and acceptance, which acts in a softening manner upon the whole character.

But, as I say, Cad Glynn didn't understand this temperament of Sylvia Vincent's, and so she laid this summer plan to a freak, a whim of Syl's, and shook her head and flung her joke at the matter in her usual style.

"Why, Syl dear, I'll give you a specimen of what to expect. You'll never go to Northwood, you with a letter but what the village gossips will say that you're bent writing to your lover, and you will never receive a letter but what you'll be met with one supposition. Fancy now when Arkley here writes you, or Mr. Harcastre yonder indites you a line from his beloved White Hills—Lily, the commotion."

They all laughed here, and Syl colored at the absurdity in a foolish way she had of hanging out such red flags of distress sometimes.

"And that is the worst of it," went on this teasing, merry Cad. "If there's a single man in the place any where within a marriageable age you'll accuse you of matrimonial designs upon him at once. And they'll poke, and goad, and coax, and worry you on the subject the whole season through. You have all those little reminiscences—I've been there,' to be a little slangy. And I've thought ever since that I should like to turn into their midst a young party of eminent idlers, and see their consternation. Last summer, at Newport, Lill Evan rode nearly every evening with Will Hess—don't you remember?—and when she left she was the talk walking with him, and when she didn't walk she was singing with him. And as for you, Syl, you and Arkley have used to me to have evenings after bath hours with your tête-à-tête conversations on the piazza or in the parlor. Metaphysics—that what I—you were always at it. Emerson, and Mill, and Hamilton. Suppose you had been at one of these little places, where they are not accustomed to the easy, idle ways summer visitors kill time, what do you think they would have said?"

Syl shrugged her shoulders and flushed again in that foolish way she had at times, which made her mind kindly and reassuringly at her through that wilderness of silky beard. Arkley was proof against his cousin's sarcasm, and was used to Cad's moods and ways

Cad read this portion of the letter to her cousin Arkley. He smiled thoughtfully, and sung:

"Chanters not the brooding bee
Sweeter tones than calumny."

There was a long gap between this letter and the next, which Cad filled in with two of her own—generous girl that she was. Two bright, breezy missives, full of the chit-chat and gossip of Newport, where, after all, she and her party had drifted.

"I don't see why Syl doesn't write," she said, as the mail was brought in one day, still leaving Sylvia's handwriting. Arkley, to whom she addressed this, was too absorbed in a letter he was perusing to heed. She waited until he had begun to fold it away, and then asked him, rather vexatiously, "Say, Arkley, isn't it queer I don't get a letter from Syl?"

"Well, I don't know;" he answered, absently, getting up and walking away, with a half-smile about his lips.

Cad gave utterance to a very decided ejaculation of impatience at this, as she started after her cousin.

"Arkley's either in love, or his oil-shares have turned up trumps for him!" laughed Tom Thurston.

"Arkley in love! I should like to see him; and I should like to know how you make it out from present appearances, Mr. Thurston?" asked Cad, with wide, dancing eyes.

"Eh—how?" Thurston laughed another little low laugh, lustered his roll, and then answered by a question, Yankee-wise:

"Did you ever know Arkley to be absent-minded?"

"Well, no; it isn't his way," allowed Cad, "exactly; and is he in the habit of receiving letters twice a week that have a scent of heliotrope about them? It may be oil, however—I don't insist; but I thought that through the fumes of my coffee I had detected this week a very remarkable suspicion of heliotrope, as Arkley turned his pages."

Cad looked stunned with surprise a moment, then her black eyes had searching, even as quick. Heliotrope, who was it used heliotrope? She was sure she had a remembrance somewhere to help her. All at once it flashed over her.

"Bless my soul, Mr. Thurston, it's Mary Ware! Why didn't you know it?" She could have stung anyone in her very breath. Gloves, handkerchief, note paper—it was all one odor. You could trace her wherever she went, till we got into the habit of calling her Heliotrope at last. She's been dancing with Arkley all this blessed winter, but I never thought that old Ark would waste so much as a pose of himself as to get in love with this little dancing doll."

"She does dance well, doesn't she?"

"Dance! she just floats to the music;" Cad confessed, generously. But then—Mr. Thurston;" she said, regretfully,

"You are jumping at conclusions," returned Mr. Thurston.

Cad wished she was, but knew she wasn't. After her vehement manner, and walking her "constitutional" on the piazza a little later, she turned the letter pell and pell over in her mind, and thought, but didn't say, because this great, breezy, plain-spoken Cad was loyal and generous to her own sex—"And there's Syl, too!"

What did this mean?

Can't you guess? Can't you guess that Caroline Glynn had a tender spot in her heart for this Syl? That she loved and honored her, and was true to her, opposites though they were, as men friends are to each other, and women seldom. And this, her loving and honoring her, she had thought sometimes that this handsome cousin of hers, this dear old Ark, might bring Syl nearer her.

And there goes all last summer's metaphysics for nothing, and not the upshot of it is, that Molly Ware, the little wax-faced noodle, dances into his heart, or into his brain. What geese men are! with which last conclusion exasperated Cad returned to her own room, and indites a furious letter to Sylvia.

"And I was in hopes of something so much better, Syl;" she wrote. "I was in hopes those long metaphysical tête-a-têtes that everlasting lamenting at Dorcas, and Mill, and Hamilton, would bring you two round into another kind of metaphysics; and here you are poles asunder, and the dearest wish of my heart lost sweet, and that dancing Molly Ware, with her heliotrope odor—always hated heliotrope—in possession of the camp. Oh, Syl!"

Straightway back to this doleful ditty of Cad's came the gayest little letter from Sylvia. It literally ran over with fun and laughter.

"How bright it was of you, dear Cad," she went on "to make Molly Ware out of that heliotrope. I never should have thought of it. And I never should have thought it of Arkley either. And so for the metaphysics. Thank you dear, for your country letters, but you see Molly Ware and her heliotrope outdid Emerson, Hamilton, and Mill, and think of it! But here is a parable for you to think of. I've got a tale to tell. Cad, you are a prophet as well as an interpreter of the wagging their tongues. For three weeks I was in blissful ignorance, and went my way so unconscious of a child, then the hum of the hive reached me. Oh what a busy hive it has been! You see, dear, the 'little nonsense' of her, the very element of gossip, was here in their midst before me. At once there arose a query in my mind whether all small communities had its one beehive or its one whisper to form the staple of conversation. And I say for three weeks I went on my way in blissful ignorance of the epic which I was weaving. The village was the hive, we were rented to me—a Captain Hollister, who is playing fine lady generals—and the whisper was the buzz of the world. Well, I talked with this Captain, I walked with this Captain, and I rode with him, never alluding myself upon so pleasant a companion. Worst of all, perhaps, of my offences, I actually paid visits to this Captain's sisters, 'for the purpose of getting out to the Captain.' Think of that, my Cad! Think of Syl's guests being accused of paying court to any body. Ark Arkley who, by-the-by—I shall ask him if he thought I was paying court to Tom Thurston last summer, when I used to go every afternoon and read to Tom's sister, and Tom used to say by to listen? But the best of it is, Cad, that this Captain and I are good friends—and only by this matter vesterday. We were out on gala, and, as we walk our beats together and talk of the good deeds, she is a woman after my own heart—I discovered, with a second, that we had a long talk with the Captain—nice metaphysical talks of Emerson, Mill, and Hamilton sometimes. But what do you tell him, too, that our talks took one element of discussion that the Newport hive shunned in. He will understand; and as for you, my dear Cad, I take it you will not be interested to know we have disappointed your expectations so much, or rather Arkley has, in allowing himself to be overcome by Molly Ware's stylish footgear and the mysterious heliotrope, instead of my metaphysics. No thing in the metaphysics order can now be endured to be lying after the Captain. Ah, you two will have me for woman to use, Cad! How your dark eyes flre as you read this. But you will remember, my dear, that this portion of it is doesn't know your Syl as well as you do. Let us at the end of our year meet and see ourselves. For I know you are dying to rail at what I have written to Arkley; but as a good girl you must go to stay at once. I am instead of coming to you. Perhaps I am all you say, dear; but I am, nevertheless, always your faithful

"SYL VINCENT."

"A goose! of course she is a goose!" cried out Cad on her reading, just as Syl had told her she would, to her cousin Arkley. And then she read aloud that little story of the goosings." After the Captain!" "Did you ever hear any thing so absurd and abominable, Arkley?"

Arkley laughed three queer little quaint laugh of his, behind that great beard; but into his eyes came that soft, grave look which those who know Arkley Glynn always like to see.

"Absurd? oh yes, and abominable too, I grant. But, Cad, don't you know one sad truth about your sex? It is the exaggeration of everything. It is the generality of ordinary women under ordinary circumstances. They hunt each other down, to use rather a sportsman's phrase, as men would be ashamed to do."

"Now, Arkley, that's your Thackeray vein."

"Well, never mind, it is a vein of truth. Don't you see now in this case: two of the opposite sex meet and become good friends, and at once your feminine code raises that a step—cry. It's the old cry of 'Stop thief!' you know. Women who do that, who raise that cry, are after a plunderer—a poacher on their domains. Now, I don't understand but one relation between the sexes—that's the relation that conjugates the verb amour in intent and purpose from the outset. Friendship, good fellowship, which begins at the top of the head, they don't recognize."

"Heigh-ho!" ejaculated Cad; "that's the metaphysical kind, I suppose."

"Exactly, Cad!" laughed Arkley, with a heavy sigh.

"Top of the head!" pursued Cad; "some people don't have any 'top of the head.'"

"Then again, Cad," said Arkley laughed at his cousin's gay, grim humor.

III.

And the next morning there sat this "great sensible goose of a man," as Cad called him, absorbed in one of those indifferent newspapers which Tom Thurston had for any thing else. Cad groaned in spirit, while she rattled her coffee-cup and looked across at Tom Thurston for sympathy. Tom read a gay grimace and hummed a bar of the German, and immediately Cad saw Molly Ware's flying feet and floating movements. This did not tend to soothe her ruffled temper by any means, nor was it improved when Arkley, presently folding his letter with a sigh of satisfaction, asked, lightly:

"Heard from Syl, Cad, this morning?"

"Heard from Syl!" Cad just shrugged her shoulders by way of reply. She sometimes felt as if her name were taken in vain after that heliotrope nonsense of Molly Ware's. "Of course it isn't a decided engagement, or Ark would have mentioned it," she commented to Tom Thurston afterward.

"No, perhaps not, but you may depend that Arkley is in for it," Tom Thurston had replied, slyly.

"Oh, do you, Mr. Thurston?" Cad retorted, rather spitefully. In the mean time, while Cad studied over her coffee-cup, Arkley turned it, and deplored Syl's absence, Sylvia herself was going on in her usual fashion, a serene summer fashion, half play half work. A few pleasant visits and then, and a great deal of reading and talking. Captain Hollister and his sister were not only her nearest neighbors, but of her kind. They were also given to much reading and talking, and so in Mrs. Greyborn's cottage many a swift morning sped away over Browning's poems, Tennyson's Idyls, or a brisk metaphysical discussion. And all the time there could be but one interpretation. She was "after the Captain."

"Mrs. Greyborn needn't flatter herself that Miss Vincent goes to see her," said Mrs. Black to Mrs. White, with wise emphasis.

"No indeed," returned Mrs. White, "that she needn't. It's Miss Sylvia and the Captain that call her morning to see Mrs. Greyborn! No, no! she's after the Captain, mark my word;" and Mrs. White shook her head with a very significant air.

Something of this reached the ears of Syl and the Captain. They take it very merrily, for, looking into each other's eyes, one day, a merry gleam sparkles in Syl's eyes, and then they both break into a little burst of laughter. And then they both look out there in the sunshine, and laugh again, just think of it, and laughing fall to talking, not of metaphysics surely, for there grows into Syl's cheek a color which makes the Captain listen with his ear not speaking with an arch smile which no philosophies ever called out. It certainly looks very suspicious. What if Mrs. Black and Mrs. White could look in now? What if—after all—well—don't let us jump at conclusions as Cad Glynn has, or as Cad will jump at them when she receives this letter. That will certainly tell us what we want to know.

Cad Glynn received it. Then soon enough—a soft, still August day; and Cad Glynn sat sparring it as usual with Tom Thurston across the breakfast-table when the waiter dropped beside her plate a little long white letter, seal upward—a great V in dead gold and monogram.

"Oh, Syl!" and Cad's face lighted. Tom occupied himself with his breakfast, and lazily waited to hear "what news from Syl." Arkley, too, with no beguiling expectation, went on with him this morning, waited likewise. At length Tom glances up surprised at the silence.

"Well, Miss Glynn, how is it with Miss Vincent?"

Cad's face was a study. Arkley regarded, with a look of intense amusement, the amazement and disgust apparent there, for Arkley had the key to some things.

"How is it with Miss Vincent?" she burst out, with the expression of disgust and amazement very evident in her voice as well as face. "Miss Vincent has left her way to Newport—and—and this Captain Hollis, or Hollister, whatever his name is. The lies that's to-night. They'll be here in the evening boat, Tom!" And Cad, giving utterance to this little quiclatory disappointment and ire, went off in a huff to her room. Here she was again jumping at conclusions.

At eight or thereabouts the evening boat arrives at the Newport wharf. Cad, her mood of the morning long since passed, but perhaps a little increased in its irritation by Arkley's persistent gayety and sly innuendoes at Syl and the Captain, waits for the arrivals with her usual impatience. Eight—quarter past—where can that boat be? Ah! there goes the whistle! Now, then curiosity and impatience will both be relieved of their watch and guard. A few minutes more and they will be here.

A few minutes more! Cad walks up and down the empty parlor, setting her teeth against "this Captain," and snapping her little watch every two seconds to see how the time goes. Then comes the roll of carriage-wheels; a well-known voice sounds in a light laugh mixed with two other voices that sound as familiar. "Mr. Tom Thurston to dine with us, boy to meet them? Tom Thurston! Cad stops a moment, and then comes swiftly forward as Syl and Arkley enter, followed by a gentleman in a light traveling-suit, with a wide sombrero straw-hat in his hand.

"Captain Hollister, Cad; Miss Glynn, Captain Hollister," says Syl, as she grasps Cad's hand for greeting. And oh what a volley of mirth and mischief there was in her eyes and in Syl's eyes!

For a moment Cad stands wide-eyed in amazement, then she finds voice:

"Captain Hollister, indeed! How long is it since you went farther down the alphabet to spell your name, Captain?" and here Cad laughs, and stops to take breath from all this surprise, and Syl finds chance to say:

"I'm glad you haven't forgotten old friends, Cad."

"Forgotten old friends! Syl, what a little farce you are! to turn this old friend into a new one just to make a romantic story of it! Base and excise my curiosity. And there was Arkley—she turned about and caught Arkley's smile. "Why, I do believe—yes, I am sure—you have all the time known that this Captain Hollister was our friend Captain H——," and Cad drops the I's and goes farther into the alphabet for the Captain's name—this mysterious Captain, who was indeed no stranger at all, but an acquaintance, nay, a friend, dating two or three years back at Washington, and with a name which mischievous Syl, incited by Cad's prophecy of the inevitable bachelor, had very nearly turned into heliotrope. Here was one who recognizes this Captain H——— can testify how easy is the turning. They all fell to laughing over this change of Syl's, and Cad thought, of course, but one thing in reference to it. It was Syl's mischief, to be sure, but a mischief that had a deeper meaning. "So," she went on with her thought, "if I had not lost her through Arkley's folly, I suppose I should to our friendship have had the climax to it that now lights upon something which flashes a new radiance in upon her brain. It was "something" she had seen somewhere in a slender land! Cad was brunette and piquante, but she had a tender kind of courtesy, which would have held her silent here but for the fact that Syl happened to pass with a certain free-masonry between the three before her.

"Syl," she suddenly cried out, "what does it all mean?"

"It means," took up Captain Hollister, "that you ought to congratulate these two—this one and friend of my own—and then I think you might congratulate yourself, Miss Glynn."

"Syl—Arkley! you don't mean to say that you two have actually found each other after all!"

"After all, dear Cad," said Arkley, with that sweet, grave look of his.

"Suddenly like Romeo, hasty Cad looked confused. "And Molly Ware!" she exclaimed.

"And those heliotrope-scented letters, Cad!" cried Arkley, laughing. "Oh, Cad, Cad! how wrong you were all through in jumping at conclusions! The heliotrope letters were your humble servant's, who chanced to spill a box of heliotrope-powder into my paper drawer, and it drenched that thin 'French note' paper with its odor."

"How you didn't write to me on that thin 'French note,' Syl."

Sylvia at first it was simple accident. Then came your wild supposition of Molly Ware; and the temptation to play this little farce, as you call it, Cad, for the benefit for one of the principal actors, was too strong for me to resist. Dear Cad, can you forgive us?"

Syl's pleading tones, Syl's pleading eyes, but more than all the happy denouement itself, won Cad's forgiveness.

"And to think, Arkley, that you should lend yourself to this nonsense!" said Cad, in mock wrath, as later they discussed it.

"To think that you and the Captain here should be under correspondence all the time to carry out this foolish programme!"

"But you made out the programme, Cad, in the beginning," Sylvia said, soon. The prophesied my country fate, you know."

"Yes; but I didn't prophesy the end."

"But, Cad"—and Syl's eyes glowed—"you thought I was after the Captain, too."

Cad glanced laughingly across at Captain Hollister, and, in a stage aside, made answer:

"No, Syl, I thought the Captain was after you."

So Cad has the last word, and so the summer story ends with all the gossips in confusion.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AS IT SHOULD BE.—What a satisfaction it must be to the Empress of the French that the Emperor has given up the idea of paying a visit to Nancy!

Among the advertisements a week or two ago, in a daily journal, appeared the following: "Two sisters want washing." Said a despairing, particularly fond of children, widow for two or three, having none of her own, nor any other employment.

A SECRET TO MARY ANNE.—The needle-gun is not threaded with gun-cotton.

An Irishman, on being told to grease the wagon replied: "Faith, and what's the use? It's the wheels are every part of the wagon but them sticks the wheels hang on!

HORSE OF THE TABLE.—The hippophagistic carry their fondness for horse-flesh to an extreme. Accordingly perhaps they will soon have their nurse served up with horseradish, not to mention horse-radish, which of course it would require much more than beef. The dessert which follows the favorite repast of the horse-eaters will certainly consist of preserved horse-chestnuts.

"Madam, your boy can't pass for half fare; he is too large," said the conductor of a railway train, which had been detained on the road by snow. "He may be too large for his age, sir," replied the lady, "but he was small for what he was started." The conductor gave in, and the boy passed half fare.

Why are persons born blind unfit to be carpenters?—Because they never saw.

"Two friends being in conversation together, one asked the other how he was, and received for answer, "Why, I was well, "Let me die the death of the righteous." "My boy," replied somber two, "that you'll never do as long as you live."

"Did the minister put a stamp on you when you was married, Mary?"

"Stamp, Charlie! What for, pray?"

"Why, matches sh'd legal without a stamp, you know!"

One of the ass writes, rather spitely, "that though a few quadrupeds may differ from the species, they very rare work themselves into early graves—giving the men an opportunity to try two or three in the course of their own vigorous lives."

"Is a Man and his Wife one?" asked the wife of a man in a fit of stupefaction, as she was holding his aching head in both hands. "Yes, I suppose so," was the reply. "Then," said she, "I must have been pretty drunk last night, and I ought to be ashamed of myself."

A DIFFER.—One asked his friend why he married so little a wife?—"Why," said he, "I thought you had known that I always had a wish choose the less of two evils."

Why is a tender-hearted philanthropist like a horse?—Because his steps are arrested by the cry of woe.

Judy Brigden, having been requested to open some oysters, after knocking off the tops of some time, exclaimed: "Upon my conscience, but they are mighty hard to open!"

As long as a miser lives his money-chest is very sure to be heir-tight.

ANYTHE TO ANSWER.—Draw say thing but a bill.

WOMAN.

DISSECTED BY A MAN.

A woman is like—but stay—
What a woman is like, I can not say!
There's no living with or without one!
Love her like a fool,
Now an ass, now an ape,
Run—but always follow about one!

When she is tender and kind,
She is like to my mind,
And fully may I be trusted;
She's like to—oh, dear!
She's not quite, dear,
As a ripe melting peach in September!

If she laugh, and she chat,
Play, jest, and be free,
And with smiles and good-humor she meets me,
She's like a fool!
Of vexation and dole,
Then come fits like Bible, "I'll me!"

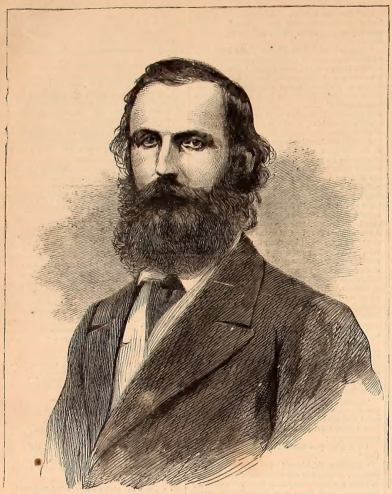
But she'll plague you and vex you,
Distract and perplex you:
False-hearted and ranging,
Unsettled and changing,
What, then, do you think she is like?
Like a sand, like a rock!
Like a fox, like a clock!
Ay, like a clock that is always at strike!

Her head is like the island folks tell on,
Which nothing but ocean can hold:
Her heart's like an orange so nice,
She carves for each lover in turn!
In truth she's to me,
Like—like—like—I know not,
Whose raging will bearken to no man.

Like a mill, like a pill;
Like a sail, like a whale;
Like an ass, like a glass;
Whose image is certain to no man.
Like a flower, like a shower;
Like a fly, like a spy;
Like a fox, like a box;
Like a bird, like—the bird,
She's like nothing on earth—but a woman!

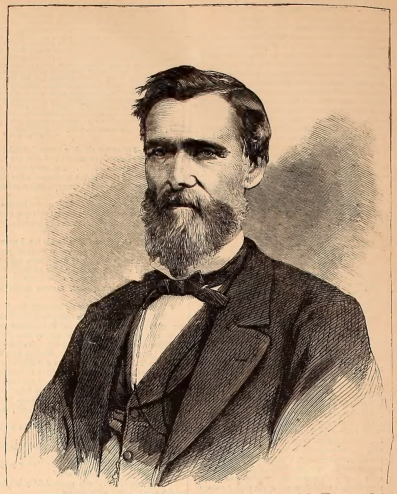
What's the difference between a Hindoo widow and a Christian widow? The only legal way to be rid is to be burned.

Dolly Dale, one day, an Englishman sat
With a sweet native lass at the window—
Quoth he, "Pretty dear, from thence I pray tell me that,"
Said the pretty, inquisitive Hindoo.
"Why, that," Dolly cried, "that's the gentleman said,
"With a flame not easy to smother;
Our widows, dear creature, the husband is dead,
Immediately burn—for another."



PROVERBIAL FOOLOSOPHY.

Castles in the air have no foundation; but in some delusive scheme you will find substance.



The way to make a hole in your income is to pay a large rent.

The largest tin-tacks must be the freeman-tax, for that's a regular nuisance.

Resignation is a virtue that is often made a necessity of in the political world.

A. P. DOSTIE.

JOHN T. MONROE, MAYOR OF NEW ORLEANS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY & CO., WASHINGTON, D. C.]

WILLIAM BLAIKIE.

R. S. PEABODY.

E. N. PENNO.

E. T. WILKINSON.

C. M'BURNEY.

A. P. LORING.

THE COLLEGE REGATTA AT WORCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS—PORTRAITS OF THE HARVARD CREW.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY WARREN.—[SEE PAGE 542.]

GARIBALDI IN THE ITALIAN TYROL.

THE force of Italian volunteers and bersaglieri, under the command of General GARIBALDI, has been engaged in the difficult task of forcing its way through the mountain passes on the western shore of the Lake of Garda, with a view to getting round the head of that lake, at Riva, and thence proceeding to occupy the high-road which leads from Verona to the Tyrol, and which is now the only communication left open between the fortresses of the Quadrilateral and the Austrian empire.

The head-quarters of GARIBALDI for some days, while preparing for this movement, were fixed alternately at the town of Salo on the very shore of the Lake of Garda, and at the fortress and village of Rocca d'Anfo, twenty-five miles northwest of that place, overlooking a smaller piece of water called the Lake of Idro, surrounded by lofty and precipitous hills, which display some of the most romantic features of North Italian scenery.

GARIBALDI'S HEAD-QUARTERS ON LAKE GARDA.

"CAPSIZED."

THIS bright and pleasantly-treated little picture, representing a characteristic incident of child-life, is from a painting by Mr. THOMAS, a celebrated English artist. We are all "children of a larger growth," and is not that man sincerely to be pitied who forgets or has lost all sympathy with the sports and the joys and sorrows of childhood? It is true that some querulous old curmudgeon has somewhere said that whenever you meet a boy you ought always to thrash him, because, if not actually then in mischief, he is sure to be going directly to get into it. Nay, more, if even the mother of these urchins came suddenly upon them, as here represented, it is quite possible she might scold them soundly, not only for dabbling their clothes, but for incurring a cool danger of drowning, if, indeed, she did not proceed to administer bodily correction. Many of our readers, however, who can take neither a cynical nor a maternal interest in this incident, may yet share Thackeray's genial feeling toward young folk when he declares that he could never see a boy without wanting to tip him with half a sovereign. Surely the temptation is great to alleviate in some way the anxiety of these little lads respecting the safety of their shipwrecked boat! And we need hardly point out how naturally that boy-like anxiety is rendered in the picture, or how nicely it is discriminated according to age—the elder one braving the terrors of the knee-deep ocean to rescue the helpless capsized craft; the younger with his shoes heedfully slung round his neck, having ventured as far as he dares, clinging for safety to the rock, as he watches in fear and hope the heroic exertions of his brother. Of course, the fanciful may also find in the subject of the picture suggestions of the early age at which familiarity with the sea and ships begins among the population of our coasts, and which afterward developed gives us our best sailors.

QUEEN EMMA IN AMERICA.

HER Majesty, the Dowager Queen EMMA, of the Sandwich Islands, widow of the late King KAMEHAMEHA IV., arrived here on the 6th from England by the Cunard steamship Java. The Collector of the Port, HENRY A. SMYTHE, Esq., had received instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury to meet the royal lady down the bay, or to have her met there by representatives of the Government on board one of the revenue steamers. The Active, detailed for this purpose, arrived alongside the Java at 10.30 A.M., saluting with a royal salute, having on board the Russian Consul-General and Chargé d'Affaires, S. U. F. Odell, Esq.; Abraham Wakeman, Esq., Surveyor of the Port; James Kelly, Esq., Postmaster; Brigadier-General J. F. B. Marshall, of the staff of Governor Bullock, of Massachusetts, and J. G. Denby, Esq., United States Dispatch Agent. After the formalities of introduction had been gone through Her Majesty was received on board the Jamaica, which steamed down the river to carriages in waiting, which conveyed the lady and her attendants to the Brevoort House.

"CAPSIZED."—[FROM A PAINTING BY G. H. THOMAS.]

At one o'clock her Majesty received a number of visitors, among them R. S. Chilton, Esq., who had arrived the evening before from Washington, the bearer of a letter of welcome from the Government in the handwriting of the Secretary of State. Mr. Chilton, accompanied by J. C. Denby, Esq., was presented by Mr. Odell, Queen Emma expressed her acknowledgment of the courtesy of the Government and its Secretary, saying that she would communicate to her lord on the day during the day, having as yet formed none. She expressed herself as much pleased with her European tour.

Queen Emma is daughter of John Young, an English sailor, and the Princess Kaia, who died in 1838. She was educated by the American Mission. Her marriage with the late King was blessed with a son, who died while yet an infant, and thus the crown has passed to Kamehameha V., brother of the deceased King.

About a week ago, at the invitation of the British Government, Queen Emma went to visit England. Her design in making this visit was twofold—to see the country, and to collect funds for the erection in her native country of a memorial Cathedral. She was over a year the guest of the English people, and it is said that her visit was more successful as an ovation to herself than in its missionary purposes, having received for her Cathedral only £5000. At Washington the Government will dispense courtesies, after which the Royal lady will proceed to Boston to receive the hospitalities of that city.

On the afternoon of her arrival in this city Queen Emma visited the Central Park. Her appearance has been described in the following terms:

The Queen is of medium height, thick eyes, dark straight hair, pleasant under-chin dimple, with well-shaped instep, and of rather handsome figure, with the quiet and unobtrusive look of a lady in her face. The face is quite dark, and is nearly akin in shade to that of a Southern mulatto, and the complexion hangs down slightly. The entire face is Malay in its cast, and the features are not European in tone. She dresses in mourning.

THE REGATTA AT WORCESTER.

The College Regatta between the Yale and Harvard crews came off on July 28, on Lake Quinsigamond, near Worcester, Massachusetts. Last year we gave the portraits of the Yale crew, which was then victorious. This week we give on page 548 the portraits of the Harvard crew, who were this year the winners of the race.

In the Yale crew there were but two men who rowed in last year's regatta, while in that of Harvard there were only two who did not—Mr. E. T. Wilkinson and A. P. Loring. The two crews were composed of the following persons:

YALE CREW.

	Weight.
Frank Trowbridge (bow)	149 lbs.
W. A. Hall	150 "
A. D. Bissell	151 "
W. S. Bissell	160 "
Edmund Collin	150 "
Edward B. Bassett (stroke)	163 "

HARVARD CREW.

	Weight.
Charles M'Burney (bow)	138 lbs.
Edward T. Wilkinson	154 "
Edward P. Bowditch	155 "
Robert S. Peabody	159 "
Alden T. Loring	146 "
William Blaikie (stroke)	153 "

The race is thus described by the New York Tribune correspondent:

The Yale crew was the first to come forward, and took the inside. They were not kept long in waiting, for soon the Harvard crew were seen approaching under the bridge, where they were greeted by some in contact with one of many skiffs already stationed to which floated about on the lake. This caused but a slight delay, however, and in a short while the Harvard boat took its position, amidst hideous cheering from above, alongside that of Yale. The appearance of both crews was extremely fine; twelve more muscular and superbly developed men is were hard to find; but as to the superiority, to a close observer there was on the side of Harvard. Once more there was delay, while either bank resounded with the clapping of hands and the cheering that burst forth from the friends of the colleges. The crews at the start appeared to be equally matched, but when about half-way up Harvard took the lead, and as they got up on the lake announced her success soon afterward at the stake, which she reached in 8.30, and on the return led by upward of four lengths. Anxiously and impatiently the crowds upon the bank awaited the return of the boats. The rain was still falling heavily. At last a cry arose that they were coming. "Yale is ahead!" was shouted; "Yale is ahead!" and deafening cheers arose from both sides of the water. But Yale was not ahead. The cheers died away. It was the Yale contingent that had rowed up the lake, and which is returning in advance. "Harvard is ahead!" Then another cheer arose as loud, if not louder, than the first, and soon the ominous handkerchief was visible. There could be no mistake now. Yale was far behind now. Her glory was dimmed, she was beaten, beaten by a long way. Take on the blue ribbon, fold it carefully, and put it in your pocket; it may do for next year, perhaps, but not still nothing now.

"Harvard's time was, 15.43½; Yale's, 19.10. Last year's time was for Yale, 15.45½; Harvard's, 19.9."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

A PLAIN STATEMENT.

On the evening of August 13 Governor Orr, of South Carolina, in the course of a speech at Philadelphia, made the following statement of his position: He said that he would not now refer to the last four years of the war, but knew he intended to call up one or two points connected with it, of which he wished to speak. He and his audience had been brought up in which the South was schooled. He had been taught that the States were supreme; they that the General Government was supreme. His section had demanded its supposed privileges; the North had denied them. The South claimed the right of secession; the North denied the existence of any such right. The South seceded, and was whipped into submission, and finally both sections threw down the gauntlet to settle their dispute upon the field of battle. The South had exercised a secret and bloody, but it ended in the defeat of the South. The South had fought with courage and faith and higher chivalry resort—and the decision had been against them—a decision, he would say, not to be questioned, but by those by which could come from the highest judicial tribunal. The question of secession was forever settled in the most completely and forever, and the results of the war had decided that the General Government was supreme. In this decision the southern people, and he among them, bowed in submission, and were ready to abide by it and to use the opportunity to say it to a Northern audience, to declare that the people represented by the delegation which accepted in good faith its allegiance to the General Government, and were claimed by some men to enjoy under the Government; and as such so sincerely wished for the peace of the country, the prosperity of the whole, of all the States, its reputation abroad, and its prosperity at home, as the people of the North. That was his meaning, said Mr. Orr, when he spoke of the acquiescence and loyalty of the southern people, and it was in that I renounce the right of secession, the right of an agitist to arise, and to overthrow the supremacy over all the Government of this Union.

NEWS ITEMS.

The New York State Union Convention met at Saratoga August 9. The following delegates were appointed: A. Dix, Henry J. Raymond, G. Wilkeson, S. Hand, H. L. Comstock, Samuel J. Tilden, William Kelly, Hiram Denio, Samuel E. Church. The National Union Convention will meet on Tuesday next in Faneuil Hall, Boston, August 8. The following delegates to the Convention were appointed: Reverdy Johnson, Judge Abbott, of Boston; Isaac Davis, of Worcester; Governor Andrew, Judge Thomas, of Plymouth; Judge Hoar, John Quincy Adams, of Quincy; George Ashmun, of Springfield, and S. Bailey, of Lynn.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 946, the same number as the week before. Of these, seven were cholera, and 195 of the cholera deaths occurred in the public institutions.

Dispatches from St. Joseph state that the Indian depredations in the vicinity of Fort Kearney and on Powder River were assuming a most determined and warlike character. The Government agent at the fort had been run off, and on Powder River three forts had been burned by the Indians, and thirty-five men killed. There had also been serious flight and destruction of trains near Fort Kearney and Laramie.

One hundred and eighty-three thousand bushels of corn were burned during the recent riots at Augusta in Georgia. About 40,000 persons were the recipients.

FOREIGN NEWS.

BY TELEGRAPH.

August 5:

The River Rhine is reopened.

The Italian navy is to be reorganized.

The reconstruction of Austria's cabinet, which previously commanded the Italian fleet, is progressing.

The Austrian army is increasing in England.

August 6:

The first meeting of the Chambers was held to-day at Berlin.

The King of Prussia has returned to Berlin. The Municipality presented to him a congratulatory address. In his reply he expressed his satisfaction at the manner in that Prussia had drawn the sword, not only for her independence, but for the independence of Germany. Before the first, said the King, has been assured. The second may, by the help of God, also be obtained. The King promises a happy future for Prussia, as an honorable and lasting peace is guaranteed. The Speech from the Prussian Chambers yesterday. In the course of its address he said: "I trust that no recent events will lead you to suppose I affect an indi pensable understanding that an indemnity for our losses is carried on by the Government without a law regulating the budget, application for which will be made to the Assembly anew, will involve a breach with my Government, and hitherto existing conflict be thereby finally and for more serious one. This is a conclusion. As it may be expected that the political position of the Parliament will admit of an extension of the powers of the State and the establishment of a united Federal army under the leadership of Prussia. Prussia will be borne to equal proportions by all the members of the Confederation. The duties required by the treaty for the execution of a popular representative Federal State will be laid before you without delay."

Prussia has positively declined the proposals of Russia for a Congress of the Powers to meet at Paris or at Vienna.

It is expected that a definite treaty of peace will soon be signed by the Austrian and Prussian Plenipotentiaries at Prague.

The Italian and Austrian Generals met at Cormons, in Austria, to-night. France takes no part in the pending armistice.

August 9:

Advices received to-day announce that the truce between Italy and Austria has been extended ten days.

The Austrian Government has declared that the truce were ten hundred and fifty-three, and from diarrhœa three hundred and sixty-four.

At nine o'clock this morning the last cell of the cable 1865 was landed on the shore of Trinity Bay. Great Eastern amidst general rejoicing. Preparations were immediately made for her departure from Heart's Content—docks cleared, machinery put in order, anchor hauled in, and at 10 A.M. she left for Valentia Bay, Ireland, accompanied by the Medway, together with the Terrible and Albert, both awaiting her arrival in the harbor.

The French Cabinet has addressed a note to the Prussian Government, declaring that the French Government in the political organization of Germany render it necessary that the French frontier should be extended by the annexation of territory to France, so that the frontier should be the same as in 1814.

August 10:

The question of Parliament has closed.

August 11:

The Emperor of Mexico has arrived in Paris. She seeks aid from the French Government to the cause of Maximilian.

August 12:

Prussia has informed Austria that she (Prussia) will maintain the right to fortify Mainz.

The semi-official organ, the Zeitung, says that Napoleon will be obliged to withdraw his troops from Mexico if it is impossible for Germany to fulfill. The ideas of the revolutionists have taken the form of the usual course of policy of France. The changes which have taken place in Germany are of a national German, not an international, character, and convey no menace or danger to France.

News received from Vienna says that great excitement exists there. Four hundred and eighty-two men are to be tried on a charge of high treason. Crowds of people in the streets have hailed the Emperor Francis Joseph with cheers of "Hallelujah" for peace.

An armistice between Austria and Italy of four weeks' duration has been signed. It will remain in force from the expiration of that time unless notice of its cessation is duly given by either Power to the other.

MEXICO.

Recent advices from Mexico give important information regarding a movement in favor of Maximilian's abdication, in which many prominent men, active supporters of Santa Anna, were concerned. Fifty-two of them have been arrested, including Senor Lucinius, Minister of State, three other members of the Cabinet, and other police officials. The conspirators were combining, it is asserted, to overthrow the Government of the Empire, and to reinstate Santa Anna as President or Dictator.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

So much has already been written respecting the great fire at Portland, that it may seem a mere repetition to say one thing more. But the most striking and sensational of that desolate "burnt district" has left such an impression on our mind that we can scarcely refrain from making an allusion to it. And a solemn duty current idea of the time, and may well receive more than a passing notice.

We handled our fire with considerable skill at the first, before visiting them—thought we could picture to ourself the blackened walls, the isolated chimneys, the masses of brick and mortar, the twisted iron-work—but an actual investigation showed at once what an inadequate conception we had formed. Many streets were entirely or partially destroyed—eight miles of streets—three hundred and twenty acres of ruins in the heart of a populous city present a singular and appalling spectacle, which no pencil can do justice to. The scene is exactly as it appeared when the fire was scarcely conceive. A great change has doubtless been wrought in the "burnt district" during the weeks which have elapsed since that terrible conflagration. Fragments of high walls have been pulled down, and buildings whose walls in part remain have been roofed. Hundreds of men are clearing away the rubbish and laying new foundations. A large number of temporary wooden buildings are already erected.

What struck us the most forcibly in passing through the ruins was the utter destruction which the devouring element had made. Here and there, amidst the general wreck, some unscathed building towered like monuments. The fire seems to have chosen, in its wayward course, on one side of the street and sometimes on the other, and in this has been spared to stand almost alone. As we go up toward Munjoy Hill, a cemetery is the terminus at one point, only one side of the fence, and a few blackened headstones mark the spot. On the other side, rubbish. On opposite side of the street every thing is destroyed.

I suppose you have already heard that Mr. Fox has some robust iquestions driver, as he descended from his perch while we stopped the carriage to look at the defaced and blackened walls of the once beautiful City Hall. Wonderful if our aspect was particularly gloomy, we assured him we were not from Boston, but from New York. Endeavoring to give information to strangers, he continued, pointing to the City Hall: "They might have saved dat part on dat is an' I wonder why we could not have kept that from burning quite to have been ashamed of themselves. Ah, I say, you should have seen it Thursday night."

Passing near the site of Fox's Sugar House, the smell of the still burning sugar w s very perceptible. One thousand hogsheads of sugar were burned, and it was impossible to save any of it. The tent-dwellers are mostly Irish, and seem comfortable. Cooking stoves are outdoors here and there in front of the tents. Furniture stands generally or altogether outside the canvas. This is all very well for summer, but will not be so agreeable in cold weather.

It was a relief to the eye to turn from these ruins to other portions of the city. We could but wonder that the citizens of Portland were so cheerful and hopeful, with such a mass of destruction before their sides. "I said a merchant to us, who himself had fortunately escaped severe loss, "there was a time, when the flames were raging, that we felt as though we could lie down and say thing—it seemed as if so much had gone, that what was left would be worth nothing." We were pleased to meet in the early hours a lady whose husband had lost largely by the fire, though his dwelling-house was saved. "I have never had such a large family as I have now," said she, "since. My house has been full;" adding, earnestly, "and it seems almost wicked to come away now, when there are so many who have no home, and to think of living in luxury for me an almost worn-out, and next rest." This is the spirit which usually prevails. Many kind offers from New Yorkers and strangers have cordially sent aid; and by degrees Portland is rising from her ashes.

A recent writer in Paris says much truth: "The first consideration in modes of living is what you eat, drink, and smell. What you take in enters into the blood, the life of the man. Almost every disease which has occurred on earth have begun, continued, and ended in the corruption of the blood. You will find half a million of people in New York living on salt pork, salt beef, stringy beef, and half-cooked vegetables, in houses reeking with typhoid fever, cholera, and foul sewer and cesspool gases, which a hyena wouldn't touch. Nothing is better than a fresh dish of peace; but how many thousands eat peas as cold as a dish of Arctic regions and the first semi-cooked, and most unfortunately the devil's cooks are sent very largely to the poor."

Not long since some investigations were made in regard to the air in an ordinary city court-room. The moisture from the windows was collected and several ounces obtained. It was found to be overpowering and deadening. A permanente of potassia, and experiment proved it to be the same deleterious matter that is exhaled proceeds from deep mines and similar places. Legal gentlemen would find it for the interest of their clients to introduce a little oxygen into court. The brain can not work vigorously in vitiated air.

A Boston daily recently loaned a series of "Atlantic Cable Messages," and printed a very large paper in the country." We think they are so much in advance that we will quote a couple of lines for the amusement of our readers. The first is from P. T. Barnum:

Message to be delivered in heaven.

"Mermaid and fishes well. Am observing this message gave are informed the undersigned is open to overtures for engagement at the Heavenly Museum, and will be pleased to state, he would state that the establishment is conducted on cold water principles, and is actuated by no sel-fish motive in making the proposition."

The second is dated Paris, August 2, 1866:

"Artemas Ward.

"To Mr. Artemas Ward, Showman of Heaven:

"This world is on a fuss'n sho. Among the principal Shows here is a Congress of Peace at present. The principle curiosity in her Sho being the needle-gun. Have just knuckled an arrangement with Lewis Napoleon for a side Sho of Wooden warks and snails, near the entrance to the grate exhibition—horse private between me and Lewis. Admission 1 frank French money, or fifteen cents American currency. On kloshe the kontract the M. P. remarked, 'You and me has dun a good day's work, Artemas Ward.'"

An interesting and amusing article on "Human Hair" recently appeared in the New York Times. Undoubtedly our lady readers are well posted in all matters pertaining to the adorning of the head; still, this being a subject of paramount importance at the present day, we look in a certain sense, responsible to give them all the information and all possible, in regard to the modish dictates that hang upon them as members of fashionable society. Therefore we are happy to inform them that although "fruits," or any connivance to cover baldness require, to be made with great closely, and are more frequently worn in Paris, our America can do as well as France in the manufacture of waterfalls, "rats," "mice," and the like. Any lady can make these accommodations—when they know how! And this is the way:

"They are made of hair (well rolled around a wad of cotton, to make the 'web'), you set two long wire prongs, sticks on a table—then you stretch three black threads from one to the other—then you take a long lock of the hair and rap it under one thread, over another, then under the third, and so on, back and forth, till the web is made all four; then you take another little lock and do however and under business same as before, and leaving it till you get about six inches of it, and that's 'curls' all done, and ready to put on. The whole thing is called a fashionable—fill it with hair that can't be used any where else, then with the web outside of it, making the hair into the bag; then you cover the whole thing with a small bit of net, and there you are. Any lady can manufacture that's a waterfall. Any body can make them—rats and mice are made the same way, only a little different. Especially, however, these animals consist of a cotton wad, which you cover with the hair, and then hair when they're put it out. When their hair is very thin they have to get the wad covered with some sort of hair. Curls and coils are also made of web, wrapped around cotton wads."

We regret that want of space compels us to omit especial notice of Bonnets, which would enable every gentleman to make his own wig!

A gentleman who has traveled extensively in the East states that in Egypt, where sun-strokes is of frequent occurrence, a most simple remedy is to pour into the ear-cavities some water in which salt has been dissolved. To say the least this strikes us as a very reasonable idea.

A Peruvian plant, the Erythroxylon Coca, has been found by experiment to possess the property of quelling the sensation of hunger and thirst for a number of hours. The plant appears to neutralize the nerves of the stomach and suspend the digestive functions, without affecting any sensations. It is also a powerful stimulant.

A critical observer of fashionable life at Newport laweighs against those be-silked and be-jeweled dames who demonstrate a disposition to "dress" their children. A saintly forgetful of their children, leave them to "dirt and rags" while they themselves are "dressed within an inch of their lives," and gives it as his decided, but unfashionable opinion, that they, the mothers, "ought to be pilloried as of old, on the public square." Possibly, however, it is that fathers and mothers in various parts of the country are becoming—perhaps they have always been somewhere in the country—that they have in their purposes whipped his infant on to death because he would not say his prayers. Near the Second Baptist church, in Cincinnati, New York, turned his daughter out of doors, and whipped a little too sooty to death, because they would not work on Sunday. When the authorities interfered he had already his conduct on the ground that he believed Satan up to the Sabbath, and that it was his duty to whip his children to "walk in the right way," and work on Sunday. Again we hear of a woman at Indianapolis, Indiana, who recently tortured her little daughter, of four years old, terribly, by tickling her, that the girl was completely exhausted by the torture, and died soon after. A jury of the vessel, which ensued her death. Such fiendish conduct is almost beyond belief.

A new lecturer, Madame Ristori, will probably visit this country in September next and make her début in New York. She was born near Venice, in 1822, and has been famous on the stage since the age of four years. Her real name and title is the Marchesa del Grillo, acquired by a stolen marriage with the son and heir of the Marquis de Capranica. She was for some time after her marriage to please her friends. Before Ristori was her love for the stage overcame her scruples, and she met the solicitations of the public, that she again returned to it. She said to possess great powers of gesture and facial expression, and is also described by his biographer as bold and benevolent, and worthy of the admiration which has been bestowed upon her in her native country.

A pretty good story is told of Sir Richard Jolib, who, on being called to see a patient who fancied himself very ill, and his fears were groundless, made no scruple to scatter with and declined prescribing for him. But the patient, resolved to have some advice, said: "Now you are here, I shall be absent of you, Sir Richard, and I will not let him I must live; what I may eat, and what I may not." "Why Sir-ious to that point," replied Sir Richard, "will be for me simple enough. You must not eat veal, lamb, or tongs, for they are kind of digestion, nor the bellows, because they are hard of digestion, and you must not drink wine."

Among the wedding presents given to the Princess Helena there were no less than nine brooches. She must have a good memory for pins.

"When a woman is gifted with good taste," remarks a Parisian writer on fashions, "she can always find means to make up a pretty toilet out of the very simplest materials." This is undoubtedly true, and the true American woman would make it a practical truth. But we scarcely think that the following recipe for a pretty toilet is a recipe of simplicity in the art of dress her yet been attained. Nevertheless we are always happy to give our readers one of the latest styles that have found favor in the eyes of taste in regard to adopting them.

Very large skirts are now made of cashmere of all shades—celue, poppy red, mauve, violet, and sky blue, and these are all studded over with silver jet or with crystal beads. The bodice, with its deep basque, and which are composed of a basque only, are added to tunics set in the form of aprons. The sleeves and cashmere pipings are worn with white bodices. Dresses without plastes at the waist are very ungraceful on any but good figures; they destroy the shapely basque round the hips, are usually becoming additions when the wearer is not stout, for the secret of good dressing is to have disarrangement in the selection of a toilet, and to choose among the various fashions the cuts and colors which are most suitable to the wearer's particular style and complexion.

For the sea-side, where a frequent change of toilet is almost a necessity, and where nobody likes to be encumbered with packages, dress-makers have prepared dresses which can be worn with or without overskirts. These are frequently two bodices and two paletots. For example: with a striped light blue and white Chambery gauze skirt, ornamented with bands of blue silk and blonde insertion, may be worn a plain high bodice, trimmed down the front and on the sleeves with blue silk and white blonde, and an Empire sash fastened at the side with a large rosette, and a basque and paletot of the same gauze at the back. This basque is added to the plain high bodice by means of a waistband. For evening wear a low square bodice is made, with a small bertha of white silk gauze puffings, every puffing being separated from the next with a flat band of blue silk. Another change can be made with a small patch-case, worked round the sage and lined with blue silk. Thus several toilets can be formed with the one skirt.

During this warm weather more than ordinary attention has been paid to that indispensable garment called in France a peignoir. Such a thing is rarely worn when traveling or at the sea-side, because from early morning one is surrounded by strangers, but in country-house it is extremely popular. In fact, it has become the custom among the higher circles in France, during their residence at their country-seats, for the ladies not to dress themselves elaborately for breakfast, but to meet at the table in peignoirs. Although the dress is simple, it is always a pretable that the hair should be well-arranged, and if a cap is worn it must be made either of white lace or guipure. The mixture of muslin and Valenciennes is the best taste when enlivened with ribbons of some gay hue. The summer peignoir is frequently made of washing material, and, in a light color, white is considered more elegant than any thing else. It can be made in a very simple manner, but should look fresh and clean. At present moment the linen peignoirs are the most popular kind. Linon is a sort of batiste, made of flax, and looks glazed and brilliant; it is very slightly starched, to give it substance. Linon requires but little trimming, the peignoir being usually fastened down the front with bows of ribbon, which are varied occasionally with straps of ribbon and mother-of-pearl buckles.

"Are fully established as goods of high order."—Whitcomb's Asthma Remedy, and all of Brenner's Manufacture.—Chicago Tribune.

JOSEPH BURNETT & Co., Boston, Proprietors of Burnett's Standard Preparations for the Toilet, &c.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FROM A LADY.

WEST MILTON, Saratoga Co., N. Y.,
July 6, 1861.

DR HOOFTYTER.—SIR: I have long delayed writing to you to express my thanks for the good you have done my daughter. I can truly say that nothing but the kind hand of Providence and your BITTERS have saved her from an early grave. For three years I have been doctoring her with syrups and all kinds of bitters that have been recommended to me, besides having two very eminent physicians; but all seemed to do her no good, while I was searching the almanac and all the newspapers that I could get hold of, in hopes of finding something that would suit her case. Accidentally there came part of a newspaper around some goods that I bought at the Spa. In looking it over I saw at a glance that your BITTERS was just what she needed. I sent the next day to Hunter's Spa and got a bottle of your BITTERS. She commenced taking them, and such a change in one week with her appetite, and the distress that vitiosis occasioned, and that burning in the Stomach, I never saw in my life, as there was in her. She has taken three bottles, and is now able to work all the time. I think there is a little stronger treatment of the Liver. These send me three bottles more, which I think will cure her entirely. We and others thought she had a disease of the heart, but that burning and fluttering that would almost stop her from breathing at times, is all gone.

Yours, with respect,

MRS. AMANDA M'PHERSON.

IMPORTANT TO SOLDIERS.

A Bill has passed giving additional bounty to soldiers who served six months of volunteering, or were discharged for wounds, or to their heirs. Also, pension for invalids and widows having children. Circular with law sent. L. BROWN & CO., 1 Park Place, New York.

WANTED.—AGENTS. $150 to $250 per Month for Males and Females, every where, to introduce the Common Sense Family Sewing Machine, enlarged, improved, and perfected. It will hem, fell, stitch, tuck, braid, and embroider beautifully, and is fully warranted for five years. Price only $30. We pay the above wages, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Call on or address H. H. REGISTER & CO., 68 Broadway, room No. 3. All letters answered promptly, with circulars and terms.

$101,004.

BY SPECIAL PERMISSION OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

$10,000 in Greenbacks for 50 Cents.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF

Several Great Public Charities.

WILL COMMENCE AT CINCINNATI ON MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1866,

AND CONTINUE ONE WEEK.

$10,000 in Greenbacks	For 50 cents.
$5,000 in Greenbacks	For 50 cents.
$2,500 House and Lot	For 50 cents.
$2,000 Grand Gold Watch	For 50 cents.
$1,500 Pair Matched Horses	For 50 cents.
$1,200 Elegant Carriage	For 50 cents.
$1,000 Steinway Piano	For 50 cents.
$750 Set Brilliant Diamonds	For 50 cents.
$750 Set Brilliant Furniture	For 50 cents.
$700 White Lace Shawl	For 50 cents.
$600 Diamond Ring	For 50 cents.
$500 Sable Boa	For 50 cents.
$350 Turkish Carpet	For 50 cents.
$300 Sideboard	For 50 cents.
$200 Lady's Gold Watch and Chain	For 50 cents.
$150 Gent's Gold Watch and Chain	For 50 cents.
$100 Lady's Gold Watch and Chain	For 50 cents.
$100 Carriage Harness	For 50 cents.
$100 Tea Set	For 50 cents.
$125 Diamond Pin	For 50 cents.
$100 Silk Dress Pattern	For 50 cents.
$100 Buggy Harness	For 50 cents.
$90 Set Chairs	For 50 cents.
$80 Dining Table	For 50 cents.
$85 Dining-Tables	For 50 cents.
$50 Sewing-Machine	For 50 cents.
$75 Silk Dress Pattern	For 50 cents.
$75 Centre Table	For 50 cents.
$75 Hogarth	For 50 cents.
$75 Whatnot	For 50 cents.
$60 Bibles	For 50 cents.
$60 Opera Glass	For 50 cents.
$50 Centre Table	For 50 cents.
$50 Card Table	For 50 cents.
$50 Music Box	For 50 cents.
$50 Dining Table	For 50 cents.
$50 Photograph Album	For 50 cents.
$50 Writing-Desk	For 50 cents.

Together with 400 ADDITIONAL PRESENTS, ranging in value from $50 down to 50 cents each, and comprising one hundred different articles of use and ornament, fully enumerated in our general catalogue, which is issued at the beginning of the drawing, and will be sent to any address on receipt of stamp to pay postage.

As all these articles will be distributed on or before the date indicated—probably before, as the plan is so popular the sales may cause us to exhaust the tickets in less time than originally supposed—but there will be no postponement. The drawing will positively take place as advertised, and will be honestly and fairly distributed among the ticketholders.

Order tickets without delay, which will be forwarded at once by return EAGLE, and many for return postage. They will be forwarded at the following liberal club rates:

25	tickets to one address	$10 00
50	" "	23 00
100	" "	45 00
200	" "	87 50

Any person in the world can afford to take the risk of buying $10,000 in greenbacks, or any other premium we offer, for 50 cents each fifty cents.

Write full name and post-office address distinctly, as every ticket has a number. Remember for single tickets may be in cash, and for larger quantities by post-office order, or in registered letters, at our risk.

GOOD AND RELIABLE AGENTS WANTED in every town and city in the United States, to whom liberal inducements will be offered. Address J. R. HAWLEY & CO., Managers and General Agents, 104 Vine Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

 For reference the managers take pleasure in offering all the prominent business men of Cincinnati.

Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Bronchitis, Scrofula at every pharmacy, heart, kidney, and other chronic diseases, nervous debility, gout, rheumatism, piles, biliousness, constipation, fistula, ulceration, dropsy, catalepsy, leucorrhœa, worms, live skin diseases, female Maladies, Mercurial and other affection from impurity of the blood. These can be positively cured by NATURE'S REMEDIES extracted from plants. Advice gratis. Circulatory circular one stamp. WM. R. PRICE, Flushing, N. Y.

GOLD PENS.

If you want a GOLD PEN, send to E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau St., N. Y., and by return mail you will receive something very much to your advantage. Inquiring done at 50c. ea.

WHISKERS!

DR. LAMONTE'S COMBOLIA will force Whiskers or Mustaches on the smoothest face or chin. Never known to fail. Sample for trial sent free. Address

REEVES & CO., 78 Nassau Street, New York.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

Have selected the following kinds from their Stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at wholesale, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show. All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

PRICE LIST.

YOUNG HYSON, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 $ lb.
GREEN TEAS, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 $ lb.
MIXED, 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 $ lb.
JAPAN, $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 $ lb.
OOLONG, 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 $ lb.
IMPERIAL and GUNPOWDER, best, $1 25 $ lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 80c., $1, best $1 10 $ lb.

All teas, villages, or manufactories where a large number of men are engaged, by CLUBBING together, can reduce the price of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to the

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

(Post-Office Box 5643.) 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church, New York.

For further particulars, getting up Clubs, &c., see Harper's Weekly, June 23, 1866.

POPULAR SUBSCRIPTION IN AID OF THE MEMORIAL CHURCH OF WASHINGTON IRVING, TARRYTOWN, N. Y.

This Edifice—the only Memorial to WASHINGTON IRVING ever begun in the village, now celebrated as the place of his residence and his burial—is located in the midst of scenes immortalized by his pen. Ever since it was commenced it has been the desire of its projectors to finish it without a debt to encumber it. That they may accomplish this end, as well as make it a Memorial which all the admirers of "Geoffrey Crayon" shall have had an opportunity to contribute something, they have determined to solicit contributions, in order that they may specify which the sum ($10,000) they still need to render the building fit for immediate occupancy. In return, as a memento of the offering, they will send by mail any one of the following Photographs that may be indicated by the contributor:

1. WASHINGTON IRVING (the only exact likeness ever taken).
2. SUNNY SIDE (the Home of Washington Irving).
3. THE OLD DUTCH CHURCH (built A.D. 1699; where Ichabod led the Choir).
4. BRIDGE OVER THE PocANTICO (alongside of which the Schoolmaster disappeared).
5. THE OLD MILL (built in 1686; a picturesque relic of the Elder Time).
6. IRVING'S GRAVE (in the Sleepy Hollow Cemetery).

For a contribution of $5 00 the couplet set of 12 Photographs will be sent in return.

Direct MEMORIAL CHURCH OF WASHINGTON IRVING, care of either of the following Addresses: Rev. B. GOLDSMITH, Rector, Tarrytown; A. D. F. RANDOLPH, 683 Broadway; D. W. BARTLETT & CO., 652 Broadway; D. APPLETON & CO., 483 Broadway; HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. By ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN. Part I. now ready. Beginning of the Conspiracy to the Close of the Peninsular Campaign of 1862. With more than Five Hundred Illustrations. 1 Thick volume consists of nearly 800 pages in large folio, and is republished to sell at one dollar per volume. The contents as much matter as five ordinary octavo volumes. Price $3 00, in Cloth, Gilt, with Beveled Edges.

☞ Part II. now in Active Preparation.

INSIDE: A Chronicle of Secession. A Novel. By GEORGE H. HEADLEY. With Illustrations by THOMAS NAST. 12mo, Cloth, Gilt, Paper, $1 75.

ENGLISH TRAVELERS AND ITALIAN BRIGANDS. A Narrative of Capture and Captivity. By W. J. C. MORGAN. With a Map and several Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. Fifth Revised Edition. Map corrected up to July, 1865, and a Map embracing Colored Routes of Travel in the above Countries. By W. PEMBERTON FETRIDGE. Fifth Year. Large 18mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $2 50.

FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," "Scenes of Clerical Life," "Romola," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

HOMER'S VITHOUT HANDS: Being a Description of the Habitations of Animals, classed according to their Principle of Construction. By J. G. WOOD, M.A., F.L.S., Author of "Illustrated Natural History." With about 140 Illustrations engraved on Wood by G. PEARSON, from Original Designs made by F. W. KEYL and E. A. SMITH, under the Author's Superintendence. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 50; Half Morocco, $6 75.

LAND AT LAST. A Novel in Three Books. By EDWARD YERRY, Author of "Hiring the Rod," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ANDERSONVILLE PRISON. A Narrative of Andersonville, drawn from the Evidence elicited on the Trial of Henry Wirz, the Jailer of the Prison, before the Argument of Col. N. P. Chipman, Judge-Advocate. By AMBROSE SPENCER. 12mo, Cloth, Bevelled Edges, $1 75.

PHŒBE CARLEE. A Novel. By F. G. TRAFFORD, Author of "Maxwell Drewitt," "The Race for Wealth," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NAPOLEON'S CÆSAR. The History of Julius Cæsar. By His Imperial Majesty NAPOLEON III. Vol. II. Superb Edition, 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

An ATLAS containing the Maps to Vol. II. is now ready. Price $2 50.

HAND AND GLOVE. A Novel. By AURELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "Half a Million of Money," "The Ladder of Life," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FOUR YEARS IN THE SADDLE. By Colonel HARRY GILMOR. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

ARMADALE. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "No Name," "The Woman in White," &c. With Illustrations engraved on Wood by G. PEARSON. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

GEN. MARCY'S ARMY LIFE ON THE BORDER. Thirty Years of Army Life on the Border: Comprising Descriptions of the Indian Nomads of the Plains; Incidents of New Territory; a Trip across the Rocky Mountains in the Winter; Descriptions of the Habits of different Aboriginal Tribes of the West, and the Methods of Hunting them: with Incidents in the Life of different Frontier Men, &c. By Brevet Brigadier-General R. B. MARCY, U.S.A., Author of "The Prairie Traveller." With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

THE TOILERS OF THE SEA. A Novel. By VICTOR HUGO, Author of "Les Miserables." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

GOLDWIN SMITH'S LECTURES. Lectures on the Study of History, delivered in Oxford, 1859-61. By GOLDWIN SMITH, M.A., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford. To which is added a Lecture delivered before the New York Historical Society in December, 1864, on the UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

SANS MERCI; or, Kestrels and Falcons. A Novel. By the Author of "Guy Livingston," "Sword and Gown," "Maurice Dering," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

GILBERT RUGGE. A Novel. By the Author of "A First Friendship." 8vo, Paper, $1 00.

AGENTS—"Guide to Business Success" and "A KEY TO HONEST WEALTH." 150 pp., best book! Send for sample copy, postpaid, price $1. L. N. WHITE & CO., Publishers, 37 Park Row, New York.

5000 AGENTS WANTED.

Best chance in the world. Steady employment and Income from. S. W. CLARK, 145 Nassau St., New York.

BABY JUMPERS.—A new invention. Price $8. Received silver medal at New York State Fair. Send for circular to LEWIS P. TIBBALS, 479 Broadway, near Broome Street, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $10, $16, $25, and $30. Price of an office, with Press, $35, $36, $40, $48, and $70. Send for a circular to the LOVE PRESS COMPANY, 25 Water Street, Boston.

$150,000,000 STERLING,

In Money and Estates, remain unclaimed in Great Britain and Ireland, in many cases as far back as 1600. Fee to search for any name, $2 00 in U. S. Funds. All letters must be prepaid. GUN & CO., Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

Large Profits

Can be made in the STENCIL BUSINESS. Tools and Stencils sent by mail. J. MCDONALD & SON, 101 Union Street, Boston, Mass. Send for price-list.

$5 SEWING MACHINE. $5

FIRST PREMIUM and IMPROVED, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented May 15, 1863; Improvements patented June 5, 1865. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with AUTOMATIC ATTACHMENT, IS NOW SENT OUT COMPLETE WITH DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD OF ALL KINDS WITH EXTRAORDINARY RAPIDITY, MAKING EVERY STITCH EQUAL to each revolution of the Wheel. Will GATHER, HEM, RUFFLE, BRAID, TUCK, SEW BACKWARDS, &c., &c. Stronger and more durable manufactured. Warranted not to get out of order in 5 years. It has received the approval of all the principal journals, and of those who have used it.

It is capable of doing double thread, it silently as it runs—only does the stitching exactly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

Single machines, ALL COMPLETE, sent to any part of the United States, securely packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Sixty delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted every where. Address all orders to

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY,
Nassau Street, New York.

Contagious Diseases.

Water must be adopted to the nature of the fish, or there will be no increase; the soil must be adapted to the seed, or there will be small returns; and the human body must have healthy impurities, or there will be no sickness. The man whose bowels and blood have been cleansed by a few may walk through infected districts without fear. "The life of the flesh is in the blood." To secure health we must USE BRANDRETH'S PILLS, because we thus rid the sick but from unhealthy accumulations in the bowels or the blood, which Brandreth's Pills remove. The method is following which the world is safe, and has ever been true or TIME. See B. Brandreth in white letters on the Government stamp. Sold by all Druggists.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS

Principal agency Brandreth House, New York.

REMOVAL.

American Lead Pencil Company,

NEW YORK,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 34 John Street, New York.

Factory Hudson City, N. J.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE.

Superior advantages in English, Classics, Sciences, Commercial Course, German, Music, Drawing, and Painting. Lewis's Gymnastics for Ladies, and Military Drill for Gentlemen. Eighteen Instructors. Term opens Sept. 10th.

Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., PRINCIPAL.
Claverack, Columbia Co., N. Y.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print their own Cards, Circulars, &c., expeditiously, cheaply, and neatly. Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 10 cts. ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 98 Nassau Street, New York, and 13 Hanover St., Boston.

"How 'tis Done." whispers the kitchen fire to the cook. Gambling exposed. Fortune-telling. Ventriloquism &c. 100 great secrets. Free for 20c. Address Illustrated Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GUDLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, HARPS, GUNS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you will receive for $1, and you may then use your own discretion in sending the dollar or not. Address our Circular containing full list and particulars, also many testimonials, which will convince the most incredulous. Single Certificates sent to any one address.

"The Wanmaker's Informer" given away to every body. Sent free. Address, WANMAKER & CROWELL, Retail Emporium, Philadelphia. Circulation, 15 cents. Large Dry Goods Establishment.

AGENTS WANTED for the Best and Cheapest Family Bible published. 1,000 Engravings. 1,200 pages. Prices reduced 33 per cent. Address J. C. McCURDY & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

AGENTS WANTED to sell six new inventions. Great profits. Address, SHAW & CLARK, 823 Broadway, New York.

6000 AGENTS wanted to sell six new inventions. 6000 of great value to families; all pay great profit. Sent free. Address, SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me. (or) 21 Park Row, New York.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR AUGUST, 1866.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $4 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or Six Copies for $20 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $8 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements for the Magazine, at the following low rates:

One Page	$250 00
Half Page	125 00
Quarter Page	70 00

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $4 00
One Copy for Three Months 1 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.

THE BOUND VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sold to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Cloth Binding . . . . . $7 00 per Volume.
Half Morocco . . . . . 10 00 "

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for inside, and Two Dollars per line for outside Advertisements, after the usual rates.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

DEVOTION TO THE SEX.

A most beautiful instance of untiring Devotion to the Sex, as witnessed by Our Correspondent at a Fashionable Shoe Store, where he was detained half an hour before any one could find time to wait on him. He hopes it will go far to dispel the impression, now so prevalent among Car-riding Ladies and others, that his sex are becoming boorish and ungallant.

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN
GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our PERSONAL attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

Snow-White Steel Shirt Collar,
$1; Cuffs, $2; Bosom, $5. "Self-adjusting." Patented Sept., 1865. "Sent by mail." HILLON & FOGGAN, Inventors, Patentees, and Manufacturers, Nassau St., N.Y.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Canes, Revolving Rifles,
Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.

In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.
Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Ilion, N. Y.

PEABODY'S BREECH-LOADING
MUSKETS, CARBINES, AND
SPORTING RIFLES,
FOR METALLIC CARTRIDGES,
MANUFACTURED BY THE
PROVIDENCE TOOL CO. ARMORY,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

These arms are made in the most perfect manner, are interchangeable in all their parts, and are unequaled for symmetrical appearance, simplicity, accuracy of fire, and strength. They have been received with remarkable favor by our own and several other countries, and can now be supplied in large numbers. Send for descriptive pamphlets and illustrated price-lists, printed in English, French, German, or Spanish.

50 MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP PER-CENT. SAVED BY
USING B. T. BABBITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH, or READY SOAP-MAKER. Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of 3 pound, 5 pounds, 8 pounds, 6 pounds, and 12 pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making hard and soft Soap. One pound will make 15 gallons of Soft Soap. No limit is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.
B. T. BABBITT, 64, 66, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 65 Broadway.

Great Western GIFT CONCERT,
ESTABLISHED MAY, 24, 1866.
TO BE GIVEN AT THE SKATING RINK,
IN THE
City of Chicago,
TUESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 28th, 1866.
200,000 Tickets at $1 Each.
EVERY TICKET will draw a PRIZE.
$43,500 Cash Prizes.
Largest Gift, $10,000 in Greenbacks.
Second largest Gift, $5000 in Greenbacks.
Two Gifts, valuable Residences in the City of Chicago.
One Gift, a splendid Turnout, complete—Horses, Harness, and Carriage—valued at $1000. And Numerous other Prizes, consisting of Pianos, Melodeons, Sewing Machines, Gold and Silver Watches, Diamond Rings, Silk Dress Patterns, &c., &c. Address
HAMILTON REILEY & CO.,
Room 16, Masonic Temple, No. 85 Dearborn Street,
Chicago, Illinois.
P. O. Drawer 5969.

THE BROWN MICROSCOPE.
Magnifying small objects 500 times. MAILED FREE ANYWHERE for 50 CENTS, OR THREE FOR $1.00.
Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 226, Boston, Mass.

TRADE MARK
OF THE
MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,
To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods, of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and infringements on the patents of the Magic Ruffle Company. The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction to consumers. Office of the Company No. 69 Chambers Street, New York.

"KA-FOOZLE-UM."
"The Daughter of the Rajah," comic song. 25c. Balfe's beautiful serenade, "She Stood Breast High as Star," for guitar, 25c.; piano, 25c. "Nellie's gone Forever;" violin, 10c.; piano, 25c. Cuckoo notes with "Cuckoo" call; violin, 10c.; piano, 25c. The Organ Grinder Polka; violin, 10c.; piano, 30. Mailed. FREDERICK BLUME, 596 Broadway, New York, Publisher.

HELP OTHERS WHILE YOU HELP YOURSELF.
New York Charitable Gift Concert,
FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE
PORTLAND SUFFERERS.
Seventy-five Thousand Dollars in Presents. Thirty Thousand in Greenbacks.
COOPER INSTITUTE, NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 24, 1866.
TICKETS, ONE DOLLAR EACH. EACH PURCHASER GETS A PRESENT.
Agents wanted in every city and town. Orders filled by return mail. Address
HITCHCOCK, WALKER & CO., 76 Nassau Street, New York.

The Crosby Opera-House Art Association.

THE OPERA-HOUSE
AND
Three Hundred Splendid Oil Paintings
FOR PREMIUMS.

THE FIRST PREMIUM,
THE CROSBY OPERA-HOUSE IN CHICAGO.
ACTUAL COST AND VALUE, $600,000.
ANNUAL RENTAL OF STORES, OFFICES, AND STUDIOS IN FRONT, $30,000.

SECOND PREMIUM: BIERSTADT'S Great Painting, "THE YO SEMITE VALLEY." Value $50,000.
THIRD PREMIUM: CROPSEY'S Splendid work, "AN AMERICAN AUTUMN." Value $6000.
FOURTH PREMIUM: SCHUSSELE'S National Painting, "IRVING AND HIS FRIENDS." Value $3000.
FIFTH PREMIUM: HART'S Charming Painting, "WOODS IN AUTUMN." Value $5000.
SIXTH PREMIUM: CONSTANT MEYER'S celebrated Painting, "RECOGNITION." Value $2500.
SEVENTH PREMIUM: BEARD'S great Western Landscape, "DEER ON THE PRAIRIE." Value $4000.
EIGHTH PREMIUM: GILMORE'S magnificent Landscape, "ALPINE SCENERY." Value $3000.

As well as works by all the leading Artists of the country, and the ENTIRE PRIVATE COLLECTION OF MR. CROSBY, with the original life-size BUST OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN, executed from life by L. W. VOLK, value $2500. To enable the Public to judge for themselves, this entire Collection, the largest and

MOST VALUABLE EVER OFFERED BY ANY ART UNION,

Will be on Exhibition, a part alternately in the OPERA-HOUSE, CHICAGO, and the ART INSTITUTE, 625 BROADWAY, the holders of Certificates of Membership being entitled to admission free of charge.

Tickets of Membership:

For $5, One Share or Certificate, with one of the following beautiful Steel Engravings: "THE LITTLE WANDERER," by THOS. FAED; or "GATHERING APPLES," by JEROME THOMPSON. For $10, Two Shares or Certificates, with the superb Steel Engraving of "WASHINGTON IRVING AND HIS FRIENDS." For $15, Three Shares or Certificates, with the fine allegorical Engraving on Steel, "MERCY'S DREAM," by D. HUNTINGTON. For $20, Four Shares or Certificates, with the splendid Chromo-Engraving (issued exclusively by the Crosby Art Association), "AN AMERICAN AUTUMN," by J. F. CROSBY. While for $50, Ten Shares or Certificates are issued, with a CHOICE ARTIST PROOF, of either "Irving and His Friends," "Mercy's Dream," or the "American Autumn."
N.B.—Each Artist's Proof having been retouched and signed by the Artist, is both rare and desirable.

THE PLAN AND DETAILS OF THE DRAWING.

The Subscription Books will be closed on the 22d of SEPTEMBER, and placed in the hands of the following gentlemen, who have kindly consented to act as the Chicago members of the Committee to conduct the award of Premiums on the 1st of OCTOBER following:

WM. F. COOLBAUGH, Pres't Union National Bank.	CLINTON BRIGGS, Ewing, Briggs, & Co.	FRANCIS A. HOFFMAN, Ex-Lieut-Governor.
AMOSE HALL, Treas C. B. & Q. R. R.	J. O. DORE, President of the Board of Trade.	I. Y. MUNN, Munn & Scott Elevator.
E. G. HALL, Hall, Kimball, & Co.		J. A. ELLIS, President Second National Bank.
JAS. H. BOWEN, Pres. 2d Nat. Bank.	JAS. C. FARGO, Sup't Amer. Express.

These gentlemen, together with each others from different parts of the country as they may add to their number for the purpose of fairly representing the shareholders at large, will have the

SOLE MANAGEMENT OF THE AWARD IN ALL ITS DETAILS.

The plan of the award will be as follows: Two hundred and ten thousand numbers, representing the certificates issued, will be placed in one wheel, and three hundred and two tickets, inscribed with the names of the premiums (to wit, the Opera-House, three hundred paintings, and the list of Artists), will be placed in another. From these wheels a number and a premium will be drawn simultaneously, the number drawn, in each instance, taking the premium drawn with it. The Premium will be ready for Delivery immediately upon the result of the award being known; and the person by whom the First Premium is drawn will receive immediately a Conveyance in fee of an Unincumbered Site to the Crosby Opera-House. Information relative to the title and legal arrangements will be furnished on application at the real estate office of Messrs. Rees & Ayres, Chicago.

CERTIFICATES, FIVE DOLLARS.

NOTICE.—In ordering certificates please name engraving desired. If the engraving is to be forwarded, to insure its safety inclose twelve cents in stamps for tubing. Send drafts, post-office money orders, or greenbacks, with address of town, county, and State carefully written, as correspondence is fully registered.
All orders for certificates and communications should be addressed to U. H. CROSBY, Actuary, A. A.,
And directed either to 625 Broadway, New York, or to 58 Crosby's Opera House, Chicago, Illinois.
☞ FOR FURTHER PARTICULARS, SEE PUBLISHED PROSPECTUS.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL POMADE
The best hair restorer and dressing. Sold by druggists.

SENSIBLE! CAUTIOUS!!
I had my medicine put up in one of Stoddell's Patent Graduated Vials, and now have a cheap and reliable graduate measure at home. A word to the wise, etc. HAGERTY BROTHERS, Agents, New York.

MERWIN & BRAY,
263 BROADWAY,
MANUFACTURERS OF THE CELEBRATED BALLARD BREECH-LOADING RIFLES, MILITARY AND SPORTING STYLES.

These Rifles carry a ball varying from one half ounce and upwards to 1/20 to the pound. Material and workmanship of the best quality. They are warranted in every respect.
SOLE AGENTS
for the well-known Eagle Arms Co.'s Cartridge Revolvers, Rifled Pocket Pistols. These Pistols require but four motions to load and discharge, a degree of perfection never before obtained. Are sure fire, and carry a much larger ball than any other revolver of the same weight and size. Also Agents for the Celebrated Arms Co.'s Colt's model Revolvers, and the New York Metallic Ammunition Co.'s Copper Cased Cartridges of every style and size.
Dealers in Arms and Ammunition of all kinds. Illustrated Circulars furnished when desired.
263 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING
B. T. BABBITT'S BEST MEDICINAL SALERATUS, made from pure Cream Tartar. Prized more with this Saleratus cookies, when baked, nothing but common salt, water, and flour. Nos. 64, 66, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72 and 74 Washington Street, New York.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST.
BY W. P. FETRIDGE.
A New and Revised Edition (the Fifth Year) of this Valuable Book now ready.
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THE GREAT REBELLION.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. By ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN. Part I.: From the Beginning of the Conspiracy to the Close of the Peninsular Campaign of 1862. With more than Five Hundred Illustrations. [It is volume consists of nearly 400 pages in large folio, each equivalent to 6 octavo pages. The volume thus contains as much matter as five ordinary octavo volumes.] Price $6 00, in Cloth, Gilt, with Beveled Edges.

☞ LIBERAL TERMS TO AGENTS.

A careful, comprehensive, minute, and graphic record of the origin and progress of the war; and of the stirring incidents and romantic adventures of the men and officers who have fought in its defence. It is a work of permanent value, and will be found a complete and exhaustive history of the great struggle. The writer judiciously combines the spirit of philosophical reflection with a vivid and picturesque delineation of facts. His style is at once lively and polished, and every page gives evidence of careful study and preparation. As a specimen of the skill in character-drawing, we extract the spirited portrait of Jefferson Davis.—New York Tribune.

The work will always be valuable for the original documents embraced within it, and attractive for its illustrations.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

A careful, comprehensive, graphic, and minute record of the origin and progress of the war; and of the stirring incidents and romantic adventures of the men and officers who have fought in its defence. It is a work of permanent value, and will be found a complete and exhaustive history of the great struggle. The writer judiciously combines the spirit of philosophical reflection with a vivid and picturesque delineation of facts. His style is at once lively and polished, and every page gives evidence of careful study and preparation. As a specimen of the skill in character-drawing, we extract the spirited portrait of Jefferson Davis.—New York Tribune.

The work will always be valuable for the original documents embraced within it, and attractive for its illustrations.—Boston Post.

We can confidently in praise of the manner in which the work is brought out. Of priceless value for preservation.—Christian Intelligencer.

The writer judiciously combines the spirit of philosophical reflection with a vivid and picturesque delineation of facts. His style is at once lively and polished, and every page gives evidence of careful study and preparation. As a specimen of the skill in character-drawing, we extract the spirited portrait of Jefferson Davis.—New York Tribune.

The work will always be valuable for the original documents embraced within it, and attractive for its illustrations.—Boston Post.

We can confidently in praise of the manner in which the work is brought out. Of priceless value for preservation.—Christian Intelligencer.

The writer judiciously combines the spirit of philosophical reflection with a vivid and picturesque delineation of facts. His style is at once lively and polished, and every page gives evidence of careful study and preparation. As a specimen of the skill in character-drawing, we extract the spirited portrait of Jefferson Davis.—New York Tribune.

The work will always be valuable for the original documents embraced within it, and attractive for its illustrations.—Philadelphia Christian Chronicle.

We can only desire to call the attention of our readers to this valuable Illustrated History of the Rebellion. The many fine engravings illustrating the text were made by the oldest artists of the country, and are faithful exhibits of actual occurrences and graphic views of the places portrayed. While as a history it is entitled to the best confidence and respect of the educated, it is by far the most desirable and attractive record of the war that can be placed in the hands of the youth of America.—Legal Intelligencer (Philadelphia).

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

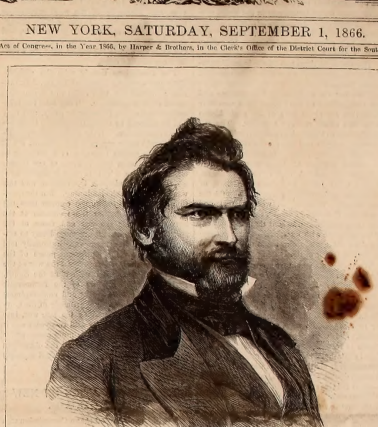
VOL. X.—No. 505.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.

THE Philadelphia "National Union" Convention met on August 14. An immense wigwam had been erected for the purpose, capable of holding fifteen thousand persons, having a front of 146 feet on Girard Avenue. It was two stories in height to provide for galleries.

The call for the Convention was issued June 26, and was signed by two members of the Cabinet—O. H. BROWNING, and W. A. RANDALL, by Senators DOOLITTLE, from Wisconsin, and COWAN, from Pennsylvania, and by Messrs. CHARLES KNAPP and SAMUEL FOWLER. It appealed to "all such electors in the thirty-six States and nine Territories of the United States, and in the District of Columbia, who in a spirit of patriotism and love for the Union can rise above personal and sectional considerations, and who desire to see a truly national Convention, which shall represent all the States and Territories of the Union, assemble as friends and brothers, under the National flag, to hold counsel together upon the state of the Union, and to take measures to avert possible danger from the same." Rappealed to all such to choose "at least two delegates from each Congressional District of all the States, two from each Territory, two from the District of Columbia, and four delegates at large from each State.



The following were the prominent delegates chosen: Lewis Parsons, Alabama; Senator M'Dougall, California; Senator DIXON, Connecticut; William Marvin, Florida; Alexander H. Stephens, Linton Stephens, and Herschell V. Johnson, Georgia; Secretary O. H. Browning, General A. M'Clernand, Charles Knapp, and Hon. J. H. M'Cull, Illinois; Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks, Indiana; General Thomas H. Benton, Jun., and Henry Clay Dean, Iowa; Hon. Hugh Ewin, Kansas; Senator Gotthrie, and Hon. Lazarus W. Powell, Kentucky; Judge E. Abel, Major-General F. J. Herron, Senator Fellows, and Judge C. Roselius, Louisiana; Rev. Leonard Woods, Maine; Senator Johnson, and Hon. Montgomery Blair, Maryland; Robert C. Winthrop, Major-General Couch, and John Quincy Adams, Jun., Massachusetts; Major-General A. S. Williams, and Major-General G. A. Custer, Michigan; Judge Yerger, Mississippi; T. T. Crittenden, Missouri; Major-General Heath, and Chief-Justice Kelleog, Nebraska; John P. Stockton, and Theodore Runyon, New Jersey; John A. DIX, Hon. H. J. Raymond, Sanford E. Church, James Brooks, and Fernando Wood, New York; Governor ORR, South Carolina; William C. Rives, Virginia; J. R. Doolittle, and A. W. Randall, Wisconsin.

Just before the meeting of the Convention Hon. Fernando Wood, Henry C. Dean, and C. L. Vallandigham withdrew from their delegations.

As the delegations entered the Hall, Governor Orr, from South Carolina, and General Couch, from Massachusetts, entered arm in arm. This event excited tremendous applause. The New York Tribune makes a very funny remark about this arrival. It says: "Had BARNUM and his happy family suddenly appeared they could not have created more astonishment. The Convention was on its feet in an instant, and the delegates, climbing the benches, looked in every direction to see South Carolina and Massachusetts arm in arm enter. Soon the burly form of JAMES L. ORR was seen moving up the left aisle, holding by the arm a frightful-looking specimen, who appeared more like his captive than his friend."

General JOHN A. DIX was chosen temporary President. Upon taking the chair he made an address to the Convention. In the course of his remarks he said:

"Each House of Congress may, on the judge of the qualification of its own members, reject individuals for just cause; but the two bodies, acting conjointly, can not exclude an entire delegation without an unwarrantable assumption of power. Congress has not only done this, it has gone further—it has incorporated new conditions with amendments to the Constitution, and submitted them for the ratification of the States. There is no probability that these amendments will be ratified by three-fourths of the States of this Union. To insist on the conditions they contain is to prolong indefinitely the exclusion of more than one-fourth of the States from their right to be represented in the legislative bodies. They had a right under the Constitution; they had a right under the resolutions passed in both Houses of Congress in 1861. Those resolutions were not concurrent, but they were substantially identical. Moreover, they were entitled to be re-

SENATOR J. R. DOOLITTLE, PRESIDENT OF THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY & CO., WASHINGTON, D. C.]

INTERIOR OF THE WIGWAM OF THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.—[SKETCHED BY C. H. WELLS.]

resented on other grounds of fairness and good faith. It is this wrong which we have come here to protest against, and, as fairness to us has, refused.

On the 10th Senator DOOLITTLE was chosen President of the Convention. He also made a short speech of the same tenor as General DIX. It is unnecessary to enter into the details of the proceedings. There was no discord, and no discussion. No speeches were made except those already alluded to. The object of the Convention seemed to be to get its Address before the people, and its Declaration of Principles. For these, see first page post. We print the Declaration in full in our news column.

The Address was read by Hon. HENRY J. RAYMOND. It was in the nature mainly, of an argument in support of the principles already indorsed by the Convention. Communities of a political character in regard to the conduct of the Convention are given in their proper place.

On the 11th a committee was appointed for that purpose, delivered to President JOHNSON a copy of the proceedings of the Convention—the Address, etc. Senator REVERDY JOHNSON made a speech on behalf of the Committee, which was replied to by the President, who cordially indorsed the acts of his supporters, and declared that he would never depart from the Constitutional principles by which he had stood thus far. General GRANT, during these proceedings, stood by the side of the President.

We give on the preceding page a portrait of Senator DOOLITTLE, President of the Convention. He is the most prominent of the Conservative members of the Senate, and has from the first been an ardent supporter of President JOHNSON's policy.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1866.

THE REACTION.

WHEN the war ended a reaction was inevitable. The only questions were, when it would begin, how far it would extend, and whether it would have any peculiar and unexpected impetus. Of the two great parties in the country the Democrats only could be the gainers in votes, while the tendency from the action would necessarily serve to moderate the action of the Union party. The hope of the Democrats was that, when the war was over, the recession of the solid vote of the Slave States, upon which they counted, together with their own regular party force and the disaffected Union men in the rest of the country, combined with a general acquiescence in the results achieved, would bring the Democratic party again into power. For this purpose a year ago, in the State of New York, where the party is most prudently managed because of its perpetual hope of absorbing what is facetiously called the "Conservative" element of the other party, a ticket was nominally prepared upon which the leading names were those of men who had acted with the Union party while the resolutions protested fidelity to the Union and the President. This was a skillful movement. It tempted the reaction to begin with vehemence. It would in any event certainly prove whether it were ready to begin. And the result did prove beyond dispute that it was not. The Union party carried the State in 1865 by barely six thousand majority. It carried it in 1866 by more than thirty thousand. And in every other State down to the latest election the Union line has been unbroken.

The reaction did not begin because the policy of reconstruction was not evident. Meanwhile, however, Congress has met. The President and Congress have differed. The latter appealed to the country, and the reaction is now apparent, with the unexpected impetus of the support of the Administration. The power of that support is undeniable. The State patronage, the extent of which we have more than once indicated as a grave national peril, is strained to the utmost to sustain the reaction. The President, indeed, in his Message favoring the Freedmen's Bureau bill expressed dislike of increasing the patronage. Perhaps it did not occur to him that while the bill itself might give him the control of a few thousand agents, the veto gave him the hearty support of the whole population whom he had allowed to vote. And however he may have deprecated an increase of patronage, that which he already possesses he has not hesitated to use in a manner which proves that the tone of its possible prostitution to personal ends was not one of his reasons for declining more of it. The present tenure of office is not fidelity to the party but otherwise to the person. "My Policy" we are quite sure would be found as effectual a muzzle among the great body of national office-holders to-day as Money was in the good old days of FRANCE and BUCHANAN.

The Philadelphia Convention was a fair measure of the character and extent of the reaction, as to judging the character of the delegates, with that of the State Conventions which sent them, we can estimate how serious the defection from the Union party is likely to be. For a New Yorker a key to the problem is the simple fact that the chairman of what calls itself a "Union" delegation from that State was Mr. SAMUEL J. TILDEN, one of the most conspicuous old Democrats who steadily opposed the war, and the secretary was Mr. E. O. FERRIS, to whom we do no injustice in saying that he is known merely as one of the most offensive old Whig-Know-Nothing-Copperheads. Both of these gentlemen, we believe—certainly Mr. TILDEN—were delegates to the Chicago Surrender Convention of 1864. Massachusetts, again, had a Convention of which Mr. SALTONSTALL, the Bell-Everett manager of 1860, and Mr. WENDELL MARSHALL, the Know-nothing Theatre manager at the present time, were the directors, and Mr. ISAAC H. WRIGHT, an old Democratic custom-house officer at the present old Custom-House, and of the custom-house was above of the Abolitionists, and Mr. JOHN L. SWIFT, a Republican stump-speaker of '56 and '60, but not a gentleman who can be fairly said to represent any thing or any body in Massachusetts, were the orators. This was the reactionary demonstration in Faneuil Hall. The meeting sent to Philadelphia three or four of the most noted Democrats in the State, several Democratic politicians, several Johnson office-holders, and a few who were to be appointed at an honorable name—Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The action in these two States is an illustration of the character and extent of the reaction. It has taken from the Union ranks some office-holders, but the preliminary Conventions and the composition of the delegations to Philadelphia show that the great bulk of the great Union party still clings steadily together. The list of delegates to Philadelphia comprised both the most respectable and the most conspicuous Copperheads in every State. It ranged from such names as ROBERT C. WINTHROP, REVERDY JOHNSON, and JOHN A. DIX, to VALLANDIGHAM, HENRY CLAY DEAN, and JOHN B. ROSE, of Arkansas, who nominates General LEE for the Presidency. Whether all who were elected as in the Convention on the first ballot remains that they and those who sent them instinctively sympathized with its spirit. But the same list does not contain one name of an original distinctive leader of the Union party.

The opponents whom we are to encounter in the autumn elections, therefore, are the old Democrats to whom General DIX and his colleagues as their fervent adhesion, Mr. CONKLING has said, in 1864, "huddled under the Lee to shield us from the storm," and to their return, and with them, probably, what are known in New York as "Weed men" and National office-holders. But of these, it must be remembered, all the Democratic portion—including, doubtless, General DIX and his friends —voted for General SLOCUM last year, and the "Weed men" have been sometimes suspected of irregularity, and even of actually "trading" votes and "selling" the ticket. But the Union party was never more united, never more in earnest. And the Philadelphia nave has revealed the condition of the South, and shown that to assume every thing to be as we would have it is to invite confusion and peril. The reaction, therefore, even with its unexpected alliance, is not appalling. It would be so if its charges against the Union party of vindictiveness, bloody-mindedness, proscription eral Act provides, in § 28, that "nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorize the execution of any bridge or any other obstructions across, in, or over any stream or lake navigated by steam or sail-boats at the place where any bridge or other obstructions may be proposed to be placed." The consent of the Corporation is clearly illegal in this view. The power to authorize a bridge over a navigated stream is retained wholly in the Legislature.

We can not suppose that a scheme so bald can go into effect, and we look for such steps in our legal tribunals—if it pass over the veto—as will stop this great outrage.

FALL PROSPECTS IN WALL STREET.

WE are already in the beginning of autumn. Southern buyers throng our markets, and every week or two Western and Northern buyers will follow them. Pleasure-seekers and business men are returning from their holiday at Saratoga or Long Branch, and are making ready for the serious work of the autumn. From all sides the report comes that the fall trade will be brisk. The South will be a large buyer. Her Northern men have learned that men whose skirts are free from the disgrace of having taken advantage of the rebellion to repudiate their debts; and in view of the promising prospects of the cotton crop, they are getting all the credit they want. The West will buy largely for cash, but the extraordinary yield of wheat and the good promise for corn and pork will secure a very fair extension of credit to all who need it. On the whole, the prospect is for a good fall trade.

Bankers and brokers in Wall Street are asking each other how this will affect business in stocks and gold. And the prevailing opinion is, that a period of renewed activity is about to commence. This opinion is based, first, upon the great ease of money, and the prospect that that ease will not be disturbed; secondly, upon the large earnings of the railways, which are all doing, and likely to continue to do, a brisk business; and, thirdly, upon the general profits of the mercantile community, which always lead to speculation in Wall Street.

Money is likely to be more abundant in Wall Street this coming September than it has ever been. The Government is at last paying off the temporary deposits, and is thus adding nearly $80,000,000 of currency to a market already overstocked. On the other hand, there appears to be no increase in the channels of employment for money. With the exception of the Pacific Railroad and a few lines across Iowa, we are building no new railroads. The new money-consuming enterprises are being started. The West requires some currency, as usual at this season, to move the crops; and the South wants some money to repair the damages of the war, to rebuild ruined towns, bridges, and railways, and to replace implements of agriculture and industry. But this demand proves much lighter than was expected. New York can supply all the money wanted at the South without feeling it. At the West the rate of interest is rarely maintained. There is absolutely no use for the vast volume of currency which is being added to our bank reserve by the repayment of the deposits; and when the Treasury concludes to lock up currency, either with a view to its cancellation, or simply to relieve redundant markets, there is no prospect of an advance in the rate of interest.

As to the railways, they have thus far this year, on the average, done very well. A few of them continue to be in trouble. The Erie has been compelled to suspend dividends, and will probably drift once more into insolvency; but the trouble with this corporation is, that its managers have been trying, with a capital of $50,000,000, to run an enterprise which requires a capital of $100,000,000. Lines, whose capital is adequate to the work to be done, are generally earning a fair income on their cost, and the circle of believers in railway property as a permanent investment is increasing. Such stocks as those of the Rock Island, Michigan Central, Illinois Central, Chicago and Alton, Fort Wayne, etc., will naturally find permanent resting-places in the course of a few more years; and as they disappear from the speculative list their places will be taken by the stocks of other lines whose value now seems uncertain. There is no reason why the Michigan Southern, Rock Island and Pittsburg, and Chicago and Northwestern should not, with good management, prove ere long as valuable properties as the stocks just mentioned.

The leading feature of Wall Street speculation this year has been the prevalence of clique operations. This has resulted from the vast increase of capital which has lately taken place in Wall Street, and which has been unaccompanied by any corresponding increase in the volume of the stocks dealt in. A few years ago a purchase of 1000 shares of a leading stock was a large operation; now there are half a dozen houses in Wall Street which will undertake, if required, to buy and carry the entire capital stock of a railroad. The late clique in Erie is supposed to have bought 120,000 shares of the stock, representing a capital of $12,000,000, and costing them over $8,000,000 in cash; yet they never seemed to want money. It is this vast increase of capacity on the part of the bankers which has rendered it so fatal this year to sell stocks short. There are parties now formed in Wall Street, with unlimited capital, who do nothing but watch for the creation of a large short interest in an active stock. When they discover such a condition of things they stand ready to buy, and if the Bears are particularly smart they are sure to be "cornered."

As to gold, opinions vary enough to insure transactions. On this one hand, there are many who see no reason why gold should be higher than it was in March last, when it was considered safe to sell it short at 126. If it was out up 35 per cent. by the Fenian movement and the German war, a restoration of confidence in London and peace in Germany ought to put it down. But, on the other hand, the scale of floating gold is so small that a combination of a few powerful houses can take the whole, or nearly the whole, and compel merchants to buy of them, at their prices, what they require for duties. Whether the Government sight or ought not to sell its gold, is another moot question. Some say that if Government ever intends to resume specie payments, it can only do so by keeping a large reserve, and therefore that it should not sell a dollar. Others, on the contrary, assert that if Government intends to sell gold received for customs it will be playing into the hands of the Gold Room clique, and enabling them to corner the merchants. What these divergent views resulting, we are likely to witness lively fluctuations in gold this fall.

DEMOCRATIC VIEWS OF SOUTHERN UNIONISTS.

THE Union men of the South who were not rebels will hold their Southern Union Convention on the 3d of September. The real restoration of the Union depends mainly upon the triumph of sound Union principles in the late rebel States. It is the public opinion of that part of the country which most needs reform, and that can be most radically effected by national organization and discussion. And we are very glad, therefore, that Governor FENTON has requested the Senators of New York to express in that Convention the opinions of the Union men of this State. The key-note of the Convention will doubtless be, the Constitutional rights of the citizen the paramount object of Government. And it will be a most large this view are of all men in the country empowered by the most fearful experience to bear their testimony. Their heroism and their sufferings literally have been unto blood, and God's work is found wanting. To these men during the war MR. LINCOLN was willing to trust the reorganization of their States. For them Mr. EVERETT spent his latest and noblest efforts, and with them every generous and loyal heart beat in fraternal sympathy. The voice and testimony of such men are invaluable. Unless the Convention to which MR. VALLANDIGHAM's right as a member was not disputed by his fellow State delegates who were admitted had no wish and could find no way to do it, will be but the cooperation of such men essential to a truly safe and intelligent reconstruction?

Their credentials to every patriotic man are found in the rehild abuse of such journals as the New York World, a Democratic paper which steadily sympathized with the rebellion that persecuted these men to the death, and the New York riots of 1863, and which, while ANDREW JOHNSON bravely withstood rebellion and was therefore hooted by his own party, poured out upon him a continuous torrent of filthy vituperation. The World informs us that these gentlemen are "sneaks and mean whites of the South," and adds, "The history proves that the rebellion was pushed to the meanness, cowardice, and treachery of the men who want the Convention on the 3d of September." Now, these men are the loyal citizens of the United States because in a fiery whirlpool of rebellion the Southern slanderers and slayers of Union men are noble and generous and heroic. In its opinion JEFFERSON DAVIS is a lofty-souled and unfortunate statesman, wickedly reprisoned by malicious enemies; ROBERT E. LEE is "a Christian soldier and gentleman," but the unnamed, poor man, who far in the silent interior of Texas or Mississippi or Louisiana defied DAVIS and LEE, and driven from his home and hunted by savage men, hid in swamps and woods, shot at night like a dog, or slowly dying by starvation and exposure, but never doubting, never asking to buy an hour of life by the betrayal of the cause for which his Northern brothers were dying at Shiloh, at Fredericksburg, at Chickamauga, in the Wilderness—he, says this fit organ of a "Democracy" which sneers at DOOTIE because he was a barber and a dentist, he is a cowardly, treacherous sneak and mean white.

If, as is right and necessary, those at the South who sustained the rebellion are to advise upon the question of restoration, how much more important is the counsel of those whose only hope of future security in their homes depends upon the guarantee of the Government that they shall not suffer because they did not betray it. As the Southern delegates to the late Convention in Philadelphia told us nothing, doubtless the 20 to the September Convention will be equally willing to say to which it will be well for the country to listen.

AN OPTICAL ILLUSION.

IF an impromptu touch of melodrama could at once reconcile radical differences, the business of human society would be much facilitated. Or if, when a country has been divided by a long and fierce civil war springing from hostile views of society and government, an enthusiastic vow of friendship and love among three cheers for Christian charity and sacred fraternity could change human nature, there would probably be one civil war the less. But, unluckily, sentimentality can not take the place of statesmanship, nor fine phrases secure a peace which can be established only upon intelligent principles. The gentle and generous, which sound terms of exulting joy when they beheld Massachusetts and South Carolina entering the Philadelphia Convention arm in arm, as though that they were peace and the millennium visibly descending, were sadly deceived. For they did not behold Massachusetts and South Carolina: they saw only South Carolina and General COUCH.

The incident was perfectly but involuntarily illustrative of the whole Philadelphia comedy. The object professedly sought by that assembly was union. But union to be permanent and effective must be real, not formal nor merely literal. We have had some experience of nominal unions, and they end in civil war. The work of reunion before us is a very difficult and earnest one; but the most evident point of it is, that it is to secure a union of other tendencies and another spirit than the union in which equal rights before the law were denied to citizens of the United States. There will be a great deal of talk about striking and shaking and protesting, but that is the union which is to be achieved; and as the South Carolina doctrine of secession and special privilege controlled the old union, so the Massachusetts doctrine of equal rights is to control the new. If, therefore, South Carolina and Massachusetts had been sincere in entering the Convention together, it would have been in the persons of those who represent the new and not the old spirit of the two States.

As it was, all that was visible was Governor ORR, who truly represents South Carolina, and General COUCH, who does not in the least represent Massachusetts. It was merely a repetition of the stale old spectacle of the clever Southern politician arm in arm with his Northern vassal. South Carolina denounces and repudiates equal rights as much as ever, and such Northern gentlemen as General COUCH acquiesce. Does any body suppose that union and peace can result from perpetual injustice? Postmaster-General RANDALL knew perfectly well that Massachusetts could enter his Convention only in the character of a man like JOHN C. ANDREW. If he said away Massachusetts was not there, Governor COUCH, or Judge ASHOTT, or Judge CURTIS, or Mr. ROBERT C. WINTHROP, or Mr. CHARLES DAVIS, are merely South Carolina in Massachusetts.

Slavery being abolished and forcible secession defeated, South Carolina wisely changes her tactics, but not her spirit or purpose. She is still anti-republican; she is still un-American, and although she is not therefore to be outlawed, yet, until the moral sanctity of her citizens to be questioned, she is still to be withstood as an influence, and her spirit by all fair and Constitutional means is to be removed from the Union. She is to be opposed in Massachusetts and Wisconsin as much as in her own limits, and as the Philadelphia Convention, under a variety of pleasant names, was simply an assembly to reorganize a party upon the South Carolina policy of unequal rights, which brought us into war, the people every part of the country who hold to the Massachusetts policy of equal rights did not attend. The Convention applauded and wept over an optical illusion. It was not Massachusetts and South Carolina that came in. There were two forms indeed, but it was only South Carolina in substance and in shadow.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION—DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES.

THE National Union Convention, now assembled in the city of Philadelphia, composed of delegates from every State and Territory in the Union, admonished by the solemn lessons which for the last five years it has pleased the Supreme Ruler of the Universe to give to the American people; profoundly grateful for the return of peace; desirous, as a large majority of their countrymen, in all sincerity, to forget and forgive the past; reviving the Constitution as it comes to us from our ancestors; regarding it, now, in its letter and its spirit, as the work of men who, looking with deep anxiety into the future as at instant and impending trial, hewed stone and prodaim the following declaration of principles and purposes upon which they move with perfect unanimity agreed:

First—We hail with gratitude to Almighty God the end of war and the return of peace to an afflicted and beloved land.

Second—The war just closed has maintained the authority of the Constitution, with all the powers which it confers and all the restrictions which it imposes upon the General Government, unabridged and unaltered, and it has preserved the Union with the equal rights, dignity, and authority of the States unimpaired and unbroken.

Third—Representation in the Congress of the United States and in the Electoral College is a right guaranteed by the Constitution as abiding in every State and as a duty resting upon the people, fundamental in the Republic and essential to the exercise of our Republican institutions; and therefore no power under the General Government has any authority or power to deny this right to any, or withhold the privilege, under the Constitution, from the people thereof.

Fourth—We call upon the people of the United States to elect to Congress as members thereof none but men who will take the fundamental right of representation, as it will receive to seats their loyal representatives from every State in which they have been by the rebellion, or by the constitutional right of each House to judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members.

Fifth—The Constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, are the supreme law of the land, any thing in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. All the powers not conferred by the Constitution upon the General Government are reminded by it to the States or to the people; and among the rights thus reserved to the States is that of prescribing the qualifications for the elective franchise therein, which right Congress can not interfere with. No State or combination of States has the right to withdraw from the Union, or to secede, except by the consent of the people of every other State or State from the Union. The union of these States is perpetual.

Sixth—Such amendments to the Constitution of the United States may be made by the people thereof as they may deem expedient, but only in the mode pointed out by its resolution, and proposing such amendments, whether originated or by a convention, and in either case ratified by all the States of the Union have an equal and an indefeasible right to a voice and vote therein.

Seventh—Slavery is abolished and forever prohibited, and there is neither power nor right in the part of the Southern States that it should ever be re-established upon any part or within the jurisdiction of the United States, and the enfranchised slaves in all the States of the Union should receive, in accordance with all their interests, the special protection in every right of person and property.

Eighth—All debts are to be repaid as nearly as may be and never to be assumed or made of binding force any obligation incurred or undertaken in making war against the United States, we hold the debt of the nation to be sacred and inviolable, and we protest against any partial payment of this, as in performing all other national obligations to maintain unimpaired and unimpeached the honor and the faith of the Republic.

Ninth—It is the duty of the National Government to encourage by all the power of its Executive orders and action to the earliest just closed, by meeting promptly and fully and in their just and equitable claims for loyal service have rendered the nation, and by extending to those of them who have survived, and to the widows and children of those who have fallen, the most generous and considerate care.

Tenth—In ANDREW JOHNSON, President of the United States, who in his great office has approved himself faithful to the Constitution, the laws, and interests of the country, unmoved by promises and unseduced by reproach, having faith immeasurable in the people and the principles of the Government, we recognize a Chief Magistrate worthy of the nation and equal to the great crisis upon which he is cast, and we pledge to him in the discharge of his high and responsible duties our profound respect, and assurance of our cordial and sincere support.

MAXIMILIAN'S BLOCKADE.

ON AUGUST 17 President JOHNSON issued a proclamation declaring that the ports instituted by MAXIMILIAN in Matamoros and other Mexican ports after 20 days' notice, and that they will be held by the United States to be "absolutely null and void."

THROCKMORTON'S INAUGURAL.

GOVERNOR THROCKMORTON of Texas delivered a very creditable inaugural on the 9th of August. The most proper comment on that part of the South he did not despair of receiving liberal and generous treatment from the North. The hearts of the Southern people had been deeply touched by the generosity of the North. He thought that it was by far distant when the blacks would recognize as their friends those who were those that spread in civilization. The duty of all now was to labor for the restoration of peace and harmony.

THE BUFFALO HORSE FAIR.

At the great horse-race in Buffalo, August 16, there were 20,000 persons present. On one occasion somebody that in No. 661 of the Weekly we gave an illustration of Dexter the fastest horse in the world. At the same time the year Dexter ran against George Patchen, the celebrated California stallion, and the Ethan Allen, both from the Kentucky horse. Dexter won the race in three straight heats: time, 2.19, 2.17, 2.17. Patchen was second. Last year Dexter made a mile in 2.17¾. On August 18, at Buffalo, Dexter made a mile in 2.16¾.

NEWS ITEMS.

Bernard Friery was executed at the Tombs in the city of August 17 for the murder, in January, 1865, of Henry Lozier.

Queen Emma was presented to President Johnson on the evening of August 14. His Excellency made a happy speech, which was received by the guests with gracious courtesy. She has since visited the tomb of Washington.

At Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis the cholera has become a formidable epidemic. In New York city it has almost disappeared.

By official proclamation, on the 20th of August, President Johnson declared the insurrection in Texas at an end.

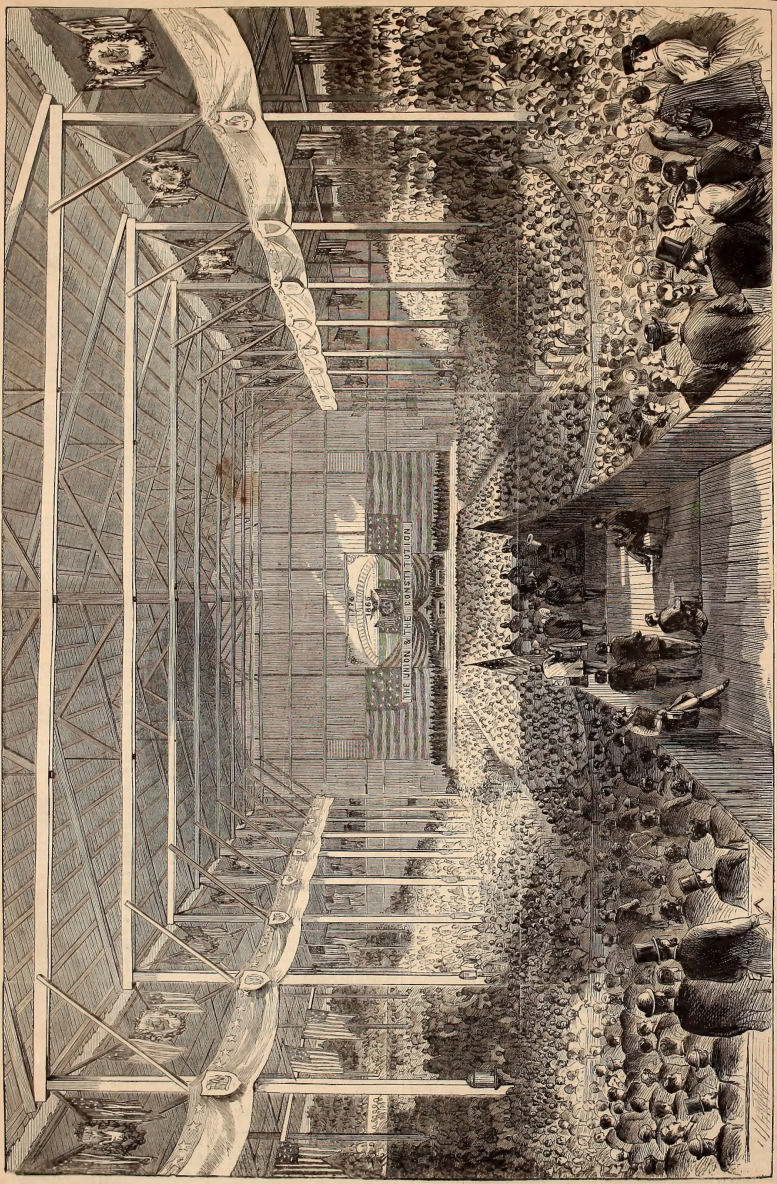
The number of deaths in this city last week was 748, of which 140 were from cholera. This is less than the previous week, and an increase of 131 on the annual returned in the corresponding week of last year.

FOREIGN NEWS

BY TELEGRAPH.

August 15:

It is announced to-day that the plans for the conference on the 20th of the time of which Austria have been definitely arranged by the Governments.



August 16:

It is officially stated to-day that the French Government has notified the Pope that it cannot make good its promise to continue of frontier to the Rhine.

The Nord, is also expressed by the official journal—the Monitor—that Prussia will not extend her projects of annexation to the German States south of the Maine.

August 18:

A bill is under discussion in the Prussian Chambers relative to the annexation to Prussia of Hanover, Hesse-Nassau, and the City of Frankfort. The Emperor Napoleon is expected to-day to bring celebrate the fêtes of assuming Belgian territory to France. The Emperor is in the month in Prague, and negotiations are making favorable progress.

MEETING OF THE NATIONAL UNION CONVENTION AT PHILADELPHIA, AUGUST 14, 1866.—SKETCHED BY C. H. WELLS.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE NAVAL BATTLE BETWEEN THE AUSTRIAN AND ITALIAN FLEETS OFF LISSA, IN THE ADRIATIC.—[See Page 550.]

THE NAVAL FIGHT AT LISSA.

As a description to accompany the graphic illustration which we give on page 549, we could do no better than to refer our readers to the editorial comments upon "The Fight at Lissa" in our last Number.

The Italians displayed a heroism almost superhuman. The attack upon the fortified island of Lissa was made on the 18th of July, and the Italians would have no doubt succeeded in capturing the position, but for the prompt appearance of the Austrian squadron and the naval defeat following. A heavy gale was blowing at the time of the engagement, and the vessels were used as rams on either side. The Re d' Italia, built by Ericsson for the Italian Government, but plated in Italy, according to the accounts, was the flag-ship of Persano, but for some reason he left it at the beginning of the action. The Austrian Admiral upon the Kaiser, unaware of Persano's movement, directed his overpowering assault against the Re d' Italia. Three or more of the Austrian iron-clads, belching fire and iron, came crushing on to the Italian ship, struck her furiously on the prow, on the stern, and amidships, and stove her to pieces. The huge ship rapidly sank; but as she went down half a battalion of soldiers climbed into the tops and, while boiling on by the ropes, shouldered their rifles deliberately, as if on parade, and fired a rifle volley upon the deck of the nearest Austrian ship, killing twenty and wounding sixty. It was their fierce farewell. The next moment the rending grill closed over the Re d' Italia and four hundred of her gallant company. A private letter is quoted by the correspondent of the New York Times, which says that Captain Fra di Bruno, the commander of the ship, when he saw that there was no hope, put a pistol to his head and went down with her.

At about the same time the Italian gun-boat Palestro was so overpoweringly attacked that she captains seemed inevitable. The Captain, Cappellini, called a hasty council of his officers and crew, and each bent forward to blow up the vessel rather than surrender. Then gayly hanging the ship with the flag of Italy, and cheering for King and Country, the four ran to the grill, and in a moment after, remained but floating fragments of the ship and her company of two hundred. A letter to a Florence paper says that when the fate of the Re d' Italia was evident Admiral Persano in the Affondatore drove full steam against the Austrian flag-ship, the Kaiser, and sank her to revenge his own loss.

It was the only naval conflict in the war; and although at Lissa on the sea, as at Custozza on the land, the reasons to have inclined to hope for victories, still the Italians will find in the remembrance of this naval conflict much occasion for national pride in the bravery of their compatriots.

TWO CHARACTERS.

Sir there! for this man, too, life's suit is over;
His work is done, all said on, his deeds are done:
For this man, too, there comes a rest, however
Unquiet and full of time beneath the sun.

You said what seemed you best: your life's poor fountain
Just bubbled, while his sacred or slumbered down;
You chid him as a tired boy chides a mountain
You frowned on him, and thought God too must frown.

His worst thought was so great, your best so little,
Your best and worst not yours, his all his own;
You the two sides safe way, he dared to thwart it:
You stood with thousands by you, he alone.

Wherefore, when God shall judge the world, I take it
He will not note this man by rule and line,
Who felt no common level heat of error baptized him;
Maybe struck hot-fire didn't move him low enough.

Enough—high words shake no lot or tittle
Of what is done and left undone, shall not be true:
Heaven's great ones must be slandered by Earth's little,
And God makes no rule.

TRIED AFFECTION.

"I have asked you, my dear Vokes (a very celebrated Irish magistrate thirty years ago) to call on me, in order to consult you on an affair of some importance—not, as far as my family circle is concerned," said L. D——to the chief magistrate, as that functionary entered his counting-house.

"Indeed! If I can be of any service, pray command me."

"You remember Mary Toovey, whom you recommended me as a trust-worthy girl to assist in the duties of my establishment, some six years ago?"

"I remember her well. Her father was an honest fellow at Ishare. His daughter was brought up at P——'s Sunday-school."

"Most true; and until within a very few days, I always looked upon her as one of the best-behaved young women I have ever met with."

"And you have had reason to change your opinion of her?"

"Unfortunately, I have. You must know"—and here L. D—— dropped his voice—"unfortunately, I say, I discovered that I had been systematically robbed of a series of small sums, and, watching closely afterward, I still perceived that these pilferings unhappily continued. It could only be some one under my roof that thus abstracted small sums; and as I have a stable-boy of somewhat loose habits, I at once suspected him, and accordingly I charged some private of silver, and placed them, with two or three one-pound notes, in my drawer, leaving my keys, as if by accident, on the table.

"Having thus laid my plans to entrap the thief, I went out to dinner, and returned too late to make any search that night.

"On the following morning I went to the place where I had deposited the cash, and here, to my great horror, I found that a bank-note and three half-crowns were missing.

"Without telling them why I summoned them, called up my servants, and, having locked the door, stated to them what had occurred, and called on the pilferer to confess the crime, and thus earn pardon. None, however, admitted the alleged guilt, and I now, with their cheerful permission, proceeded to search them.

"Imagine, my dear Vokes, my horror when, after vainly searching the servant-man and some of the females, I turned to my governess, and having requested her to display the contents of her pockets, I discovered two of the half-crowns which I had marked, and could never distinctly swear to. I called upon her to explain this strange circumstance. I eagerly demanded to know how she had become possessed of them. But, alas! all in vain. She was dreadfully agitated, and was only relieved from a fit of fainting by a copious flood of tears which came to her relief. She is now down stairs, in charge of a policeman. I wished, if possible, to avoid the pain of sending her, whom I have known for so many years, to prison; and therefore I wrote to ask you to call on me, and, if possible, assist me in discovering the particulars of this distressing affair."

"Has she had any followers—male or female?"

"None."

"Has she ever absented herself from the house?"

"Never."

"Do your family know what has passed?"

"No; they are all at Kilrush, with the exception of my eldest son, who assists me in business; and he went last evening to Limerick, and will not return till four o'clock. So, strange to say, not a soul is aware of the discovery I have made."

"Call in the girl—let us examine her together."

The poor culprit came in, more dead than alive. When she saw Vokes she covered her face with her hands and burst into a flood of tears. For several minutes she was convulsed that even the stern magistrate hesitated to address her. At length, after causing her to be supplied with a glass of water, she became calm, and presented a glass of water, she became calm, when he thus spoke:

"Mary Toovey, I am summoned here to interrogate you relative to a robbery, which has taken place in this house; and as part of the money, marked for the purpose of detection, was found in your pocket, it is my duty to request you will tell me the truth, and every reason to believe that you are guilty."

"I am indeed I am! I am a wretched girl, Sir," cried the prisoner, throwing herself on her knees before him.

"And yet, religiously and well brought up, I can scarcely believe that you could have acted so base, so ungrateful a part as thus to rob your employers. I would rather have suspected any one in the house than you."

"Oh, Sir! indeed, Sir, it was I. I am a wicked, bad girl, and I confess the truth."

"Are you sure that no one instigated you—no one advised you to commit this robbery?"

"No, Sir—no one. It was all my own doing."

"And still I think it is my duty to inquire further. I will, if possible, discover your accomplices."

"I have none—I have none. I alone am to blame."

The worthy merchant now chimed in: "Mary, I am told by Michael, the groom, that he saw you two nights ago talking to a strange man in the garden."

"It's false—it's false!"

"Have you mentioned this to any one?" asked Vokes of L. D——.

"To no one."

Vokes again turned to the girl. "Are you still determined to shield your guilt?"

She had now recovered her calmness, and answered, firmly, "I am!"

"Do you know the consequences? Do you know that, if found guilty, you will receive a fearful punishment?"

"I do."

"And still, to save yourself, you will not betray your accomplices?"

"I have none. I alone am guilty—I confess it."

"Take her away, sergeant. I must inquire further into this matter," and—strange to say—he seemingly relieved at having thus unburdened her conscience—the wretched girl was led away.

When she was gone the Major turned round and addressed his friend.

"If you do not insist on it, I will not commit this girl till to-morrow. In the mean time we may discover her accomplices. Strange—very!—but, by George! I can't believe Mary to be guilty."

"But her own admission—the money found on her?"

"All true; such proof should be convincing; but still I cannot feel convinced. Do me a favor. Come you, and your son, to dine with me to-day at six o'clock, and we'll talk it over; but mind, don't mention the circumstance to a soul in the world—not even to your own son. Don't write it to your family: and if any one asks you for Mary, say she has gone to Ishare to see her friends. Pray do this, and you will oblige me."

"Certainly you make a strange request; but I'll sacrifice myself to your wishes, and be at your house, with my son George, at six. Perhaps it will be better; for my wife and daughter, and even George, who is rather very distant and haughty, is very partial to this girl. I can assure you, Major, we have treated her rather as our child than our servant, which makes her conduct the more detestable."

"True for you; but now adieu! Remember—hints and silence." And off went the police functionary toward his office.

On arriving there, he called for Macdonald, a young policeman whom he often intrusted as a messenger.

"You took a note for me to young Mr. D—— some evenings ago, relative to handing him a banker?"

"Is it Mr. George you mean?"

"I do."

"Well, Sir, I delivered it to him, and he said there was no answer."

"I am aware of that. Where did you find Mr. George?"

"In the billiard-room beyond—in George Street."

"And what was he about?"

"Well, your worship, I can't rightly say; I didn't much observe. But I saw him drinking and smoking."

"Was he betting?"

"Ah, then, Major, I can't say surely; but I think he was, for one of the young officers from the barracks called out and said, 'You've lost, George;' and I'm sure I heard him say, 'I suppose he was, your worship.'"

"That will do," said Vokes, and then proceeded to try on the case of the unfortunate girl, which were brought before him for judgment. Presently he got up, and, putting on his hat, he strolled leisurely into George Street.

On arriving in front of Mr. S——'s shop—at once a place for refreshment, the supply of tobacco and punch, with a well-known attached—he turned in, and after partaking of a sandwich, he carelessly asked the female who was at that instant serving behind the counter, whether Mr. G. D—— had been in lately.

"Not since yesterday morning."

"What did he call for then?"

"He came to get some cigars, as he was about to go out of town; and he left a pound-note with me to hand to Captain D——, that he had lost on the races."

"Have you got that pound-note?"

"Yes, Sir," replied the girl, who seemed startled at the inquiry.

"Did he pay for the cigars?"

"He did."

"How did he pay you?"

"With a half-crown piece."

"Have you got the half-crown?"

"I believe it's still in the tobacco-till. I hope, Major, it's not a bad one; it may bring me into trouble." And the girl, being amused up with the transaction, she examined the till with anxious care, and at length triumphantly pulled out the piece of money in question. "Here it is, Sir; sure I didn't know it was bad, and I'm sure Mr. George didn't. Here it is." And she handed it to Vokes, who, after peering at it for some time, put it into his pocket, and then throwing down two shillings and a sixpence, carelessly said,

"Don't you ask me, when there's some bad money in Limerick, so I'll take away this piece. But don't tell a living soul what I've done, or faith I'll have you up for it."

This threat was quite sufficient to render the girl dumb. So Vokes, without further conversation, walked up to the billiard-room, where he was carrying out some improvements.

At six o'clock precisely, Mr. L. D—— and his son arrived in George Street, and shortly afterward partook of an excellent dinner, which I was lucky enough to share. No other guest was present, and the wine circulated in high good-humor, and drank their fair fill of claret before the punch apparatus was placed on the table. While dinner, Vokes desired the servant not again to disturb him till he rang the bell.

Well knowing the habits of the chief magistrate, I saw that something was coming.

"Mr. D——," said he, addressing his senior guest, "you have, I believe, a commission—nay, I may add, my request, to tell your son and my son-in-law here of the dreadful occurrence which has taken place in your family?"

The worthy merchant did so, in the fairest manner.

During the recital George D—— appeared more agitated than I should have expected. He evidently was dreadfully shocked, and seemed to bear a peculiar affectionate, almost romantic affection—for the poor girl; and as his father concluded, he violently exclaimed,

"I am sure she is not guilty—I'll stake my life she is not!"

"Can you, then, point to any other person as likely to have committed the robbery?"

"Me—me! certainly not! What should I know about it?"

"Oh, nothing, nothing; only you are wrong than to acquit Mary without proof."

"But I have proof. Her established good character, the reverence in which her father shall pay it expenses. But to convict poor Mary would forever stain the character of our family."

"I can't agree, George," chimed in his father.

"Nor I," said Vokes; "but let us change the subject. I hear you lost at the late races?"

"Unluckily, most unfortunately, by the running of some thing else, merely uttered, "Did I?"

The father appeared astounded; for he had ever considered himself as the most no rigid in his principles thus to have gambled on the turf.

"You did," went on Vokes. "Captain D——, by-the-by, gave the pound-note he left for Captain D——."

The detected sportsman was now all attention; his agitation was really frightful.

"Ah, you seem surprised at my knowledge. I'll tell you more. You bought some cigars at the same time, and paid for them with this half-crown—a half-crown strongly marked," added Vokes, as he partly produced it, but carefully shrouded it with his hand.

"What's that you say?" said L. D——.

"Nothing, nothing at all. But see, your son is not very well. He has probably over-excited himself. I'll take him into my dressing-room, administer some restorative essence, and he'll soon be well. Nay, you must not come—you will only do harm. So, he waves you off. Come, George, you'll be better presently; come along." And he led the poor sufferer off.

I need scarcely tell you that during the absence of his son and his friend L. D—— spoke but little. He adored his son, and thus to see him strangely attacked completely paralyzed the old man. Five minutes elapsed—ten minutes elapsed—and the anxious parent would fain have sought his child; but I gently detained him.

In about twenty minutes Vokes again appeared, followed by George, who, though still pale, seemed to have regained his strength, and, in answer to his near relative's inquiries, assured him that "it was nothing. It had now quite passed away."

For about five minutes a dreadful and painful silence—hung over us all. This was abruptly broken by Vokes.

"George and I have discovered the pilferer, Mr. D——, and I will be guarantee that you are never so robbed again."

"Was it Mary Toovey?"

"Decidedly not!"

"Who was it, then?"

"That you will never know. It is sufficient to say he has been punished, and you are safe for the future."

"But why, then, did the girl admit it?"

"She best knows."

"I shall closely cross-question her when I go home."

"Then, indeed, you will not; for she is now several miles on her way to Dublin, where, well knowing her innocence, I have sent her to live with a sister of mine. You will see her no more!"

"This is very mysterious!"

"And so let it remain; make any fuss about it, and the punishment of your garrulity will fall heavily on you. Let the matter rest; you never again to allude to it; make what excuse you like for Mary's absence, but never hint at your first unjust suspicion."

"Unjust!"

"By Heaven, they were Harry, pass the hot water. We'll never allude to this subject again."

If L. D—— did not read the case aright he was indeed a happy man.

L. D—— has been gathered to his fathers. His son George, who settled in Dublin, married twelve months after his death a certain Mary Toovey—a girl who, I believe, would willingly have given her life for him.

HOW I GOT MY VICTORIA CROSS.

"You want to hear how I managed to get the V. C., do you, old fellow? Well, soul over to the Buttery for another tankard of beer, and I'll tell you all about it; it's my work talking, and your Brasenose malt is perfection.

"Now for my story:

"It was the latter close of a glorious summer day in the plains of India, if you know what that means; the sun had just gone down behind the cocoa-nuts, the hot thermometer stood at 110 degrees in my tent, and not a breath of air was stirring. I had only just returned to camp after a pretty hard walk from daybreak till late in the afternoon, scouring the country for miles in advance of the column, and had wound up to-day's work by a visit to some mates with a troop of mutineer Sowars at my heels. Imagine my disgust at being roused up by a big black-bearded Irish devil, with, "Look here, Colonel sahib wishes to see you immediately in his tent.' I jumped up, roused my head in the big brass basin which we Europeans use to carry water in, pulled on my blue Meerut,* and rushed off to the General's tent, not in the best of humors. As soon as I entered, however, I saw there was something astir, as the matter, and I had not been routed out for nothing. The General was seated at his camp-table looking very grave, and with an open letter in his hand. By his side were Colonel A——, second in command to I——, his Adjutant-General. Sir George handed me the letter as I came in. 'Read this, Lumaine; it has just been brought in by a disguised Sepoy from Shahrapore.' It was from Major I——, who had long been besieged there, and ran as follows: 'Only twenty men fit for duty, provisions very short; we can not possibly hold out more than five days longer.' Few words and simple, but full of awful meaning.

"'The difficulty is this,' said the General, turning to Colonel A——, 'Shahrapore is, you know, only some thirty miles to the eastward, and we might reach it in time to save them, but we cannot afford to detach it itself for at least a week, and I don't know in what state they are there, or how long they can hold out; and moreover our numbers there is three times as great as at Shahrapore, and they have a large treasury and magazine in the fort. Lumaine has seen service at different times with letters to Bharaghur; the two first cause back with their ears and noses strung round their necks, and the others never came back at all. All our information goes to show that the enemy are in great force round the place. I dare not divide our small force; if we march to relieve Shahrapore, we risk losing Bharaghur, and as this letter shows, if we attempt to relieve Bharaghur, the garrison must fall into the enemy's hands, and there will be Cawspore over again. What do you advise, A——?"

* Loose tunic much worn by Indian officers on service.

"The Colonel's face worked strangely, and when at last he answered, it was in a thick, husky voice.

"'My wife and children are at Shahr apore, General, but the safety of Bharaghur must not be risked.'

"There was silence for some minutes, and as we looked at each other, our faces gathered blackness.

"'By God!' exclaimed Sir George, 'this is a fearful position to be in. I'd give a year's pay to know how things really are at Bharaghur.'

"By this time my mind was made up.

"'All right, General, write a check, and give me till noon to-morrow, and if I'm in luck you shall have the information as you require.'

"'What do you mean, Llantaine? You won't get any one to go to Bharaghur after the way your devils of spies were treated.'

"'I don't say any one to try, General; if this thing is to be done at all, I must do it myself. It's only twenty miles from here to Bharaghur as the crow flies, and I know every inch of the country, as I had charge of this district for two years before the row began.'

"'Nonsense, Llantaine, you'll get cut to pieces as sure as fate, and do no good either. We must think of some other plan.'

"'I don't see a bit fate too much, General—you know the rest. If the niggers are to have my scalp, they may as well take it now as a year hence. Any how, I'll risk it.'

"There was a little more discussion, but as no better plan could be hit on, I carried my point and left the rest, the drawing up arrangements, Colonel A—— followed me out.

"'God bless you, Llantaine, and bring you safe back,' said he, shaking my hand: and as I looked at him I saw the tears standing in his eyes. It took no rather aback, for the old fellow was no great friend of mine, and was a regular Tartar to boot.

"'All right, Colonel, never say die. I shall live to plague you for many a day.'

"I sent at once for my Risaldar,* and in five minutes he was in my tent.

"I am going for a ride to-night, Shere Singh, let your orn with Bulwunt Singh, Hurry Singh, and four other good men be ready in an hour, and look you, see that they are well mounted, and bear arms in good order.

"'They are always ready for work, sahib,' said the old Sikh, as he saluted and went out.

"I slept like a top for nearly an hour, and awoke feeling game for any thing. Tattoo was beating as I rode off from the main party, and the moon had not rise till nearly midnight, so we had good three hours of darkness before us. For the first ten miles we rode hard along the high-road which crosses a large barren plain, destitute alike of villages and trees, and that I knew we were not likely to come across any of the enemy, but after that the country became cultivated and thickly peopled, and we were obliged to leave the high-road and to walk, skirting villages, feeling our way through cornfields, in many of which we saw fires burning, and not a few horses picketed. It was evident enough that the rebels were strong in cavalry, and had scattered them well over the country between us and their camp.

"At last we arrived, without any adventures, within half a mile of Bharaghur. The enemy were apparently in very large force all round the Fort, and their watch-fires were blazing in every direction. It was manifestly unsafe for us to go on any further, so I left my men in a dense patch of jungle, with strict orders not to move on any account unless discovered and attacked, until my return, unless, if I were absent more than three hours, in which case they were to make the best of their way back to camp. I left my horse, of course, with them, and crept, keeping on only a waist-cloth, in which I stuck my revolver, and stole off, sabre in hand, toward the north face of the Fort opposite to which we were, as I knew that the only entrance was on that side. Favored by the darkness I crept along under cover of mounds and bushes, until I gained the northeast angle of the ditch, the entrance to the Fort was nearly at the other end of this face, but I could not get opposite to it, as the Sepoys had a strong picket there, and their sentries were pacing up and down to within a few yards of where I was. Here, then, it became necessary for me to take to the water. Crouching beneath a bush, I took off my sword and left it there, but kept my 'knife' on, as I knew from experience that it would stand any amount of wet. Now I was all ready, and had nothing to do but to get into the moat; but somehow I was rather backward in going forward; and the water looked horribly black and ugly, and by no means inviting. I knew that crocodiles were not thick as blue-bottles there, and it now occurred to me for the first time how extremely probable it was that one of them might take a fancy to me. Never before had I fully appreciated the deep wisdom of old Falstaff's reflections on honor—honor pricked me on, sure enough, but would it pull me through if one of the scaly gentlemen down below should lay hold of my leg? The idea was by no means pleasant, and I must admit that I funked horribly. But it was now too late to draw back, and the more I looked at the water the less I liked it: so at last, with something between a curse and a prayer, I dropped quietly in. Ugh! how fearfully cold it felt, though the night was warm enough. I am a tolerably good swimmer, and struck out manfully but I seemed to be crawling through the water. 'Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte' was by no means true in my case: I had some three hundred yards to swim, and by the time I had got half-way I was, if possible, in a greater funk than when I started. I swam with my beard over my shoulder, expecting every moment to tear the rush of some huge muggar,† or to see its horrid jaws rising above the water. Every ripple startled me, and I could hear my heart thumping against my ribs. At last I reached the other bank safe and sound, scrambled up it sharp, and being lucky enough to find the European sentry a little less ready than most of them with his rifle, succeeded in persuading him that I was not 'a nigger,' in time to escape lead or steel. In a couple of minutes I was surrounded by half the garrison, and had told my story. It was received with a wild hurrah, which startled the gentlemen on the opposite benches not a little, and brought down on as a shower of bullets, which luckily did no damage.

"'Tell Sir George,' said the old Brigadier, 'that we have lots of food and ammunition, and can hold out for a fortnight if necessary; but stop, I will give you a note to him.'

"After taking it, and a peg of rum, I was ready to start again. As I was saying 'Good-by' one of the rifles sang out—

"'By-the-by, Llantaine, if you should get knocked over going back, the General will be in big a fix as ever: you had better let one of us go with you—two fellows are better than one, and I am your man.'

"Just then a Sepoy stepped out of the crowd.

"'Let me go with the sahib—a black man may get through where a white one can not.'

"He was an Oude man, a 'Lundy,' and a Brahmin, but had stood by his officers like a man, and picked this one who might be trusted; so I accepted his offer at once, and he took a copy of the Brigadier's letter into his turban. A shake of the hand all round, a chorus of 'God bless you,' and 'Good-by, old fellow,' and we were both in the water, swimming like fishes. Strangely enough I did not mind it a bit going back: the first had seemed to me to be all over, and I was as jolly as possible. Just as we were nearing the other bank I heard a sudden exclamation from my companion—'Oh, sahib, dekhia'* and turning my head, caught sight of something black above the water. The next moment there was a shrill, sharp cry of agony ringing through the still night air. To my dying day I shall never forget the wild despairing face and outstretched arms which rose for a moment high above the water, and then slowly disappeared as my poor comrade was dragged down. I could do nothing to help him: the fish-shadows were upon me by this time, and in a moment a shower of bullets splashed in every direction around me. I pulled myself out of the ditch and lay still sick at heart, and unnerved by the luck, but by this time the mutineers were fully aroused, and lanches glared on every side. Suddenly the Fort batteries opened, and the shot and shell were answered by the guns on the opposite bank: rifle, musket, and matchlock joined in the chorus; drums beat to arms from every quarter, and all was one wild confusion. Hoping to escape unperceived in the row, I ran toward the trees where my horse was tied up, and I almost fell over the body of Shere Singh. My revolver was handy, and I fired into them right and left, but the next minute a bullet hit me in the leg, and I shot at the foe of the Black Mosquetaire, who, the legend tells us,

"Went down with a groan and a frown,
And a bob at the bottom of a town,

the only difference in my favor being that my smallclothes escaped damage, having parted company with me a few minutes before. I managed to stagger on to my legs, but only to be sent to grass again with a sabre cut over the head. Of what followed I have but a very vague idea. I remember as I went down a trampling of horses, and hearing the war-cry of my Sikhs, 'Ali gooroo Jee, Ah gooroo Gorind!' a flash of sabres, pistol-shots, and a rush of horses' hoofs all round me, and then the blackness of darkness.

* * * * * * *

"'When I came to myself we were riding along full speed over the open plain, and old Shere Singh was supporting me sitting on his saddle in front. At daybreak we halted for a few minutes on the banks of a tank while the horses got breathed a bit, and I and my wounded watched and bound up the leg. By time that was done I felt pretty well again, and looking about me, missed young Ranjeet Singh, and asked what had become of him.

"'He is with his fathers, sahib,' said the old Sikh, calmly; 'he died like a brave man, fighting for you and the great company whose salt he had eaten.'

"I was sorry for the youngster, for he was one of the best of all my troops, and old Shere Singh's only son. On we rode again, keeping our horses up to their speed, for we were being followed pretty closely by a troop of irregulars, and it was quite a toss up whether they ran us down or not. Just as the sun rose, and when we were only some three or four miles from camp, they all but overtook us, and two or three bullets came whizzing about our ears, the Sowars were gaining on us at every stride, and things looked very ugly, when suddenly a turn of the road brought us face to face with another strong party of cavalry. I thought for a moment that it was all over with us: the next instant a ringing cheer told me that we had met friends, and I found myself in the midst of a squadron of native horse. A hard behind us came the enemy, yelling like fiends, and as they turned the corner, pulled up, and crowded together, undecided whether to advance or turn back. Small time had they to make up their minds, our fellows charged down on them furiously, and the rebel men and horses had little chance of fresh ones, and the shock was irresistible. Being myself hors de combat I looked on quietly, and never in my life did I see men cut to pieces; our fellows rode through and through them, and had they been allowed to follow the fugitives, scarcely a man would have escaped. But I wanted to keep them in hand, so sounded the recall vigorously. Back they came; old Shere Singh growling savagely, his sabre covered with blood.

"'If the sahib had only let us go on, we would have followed the scoundrels to the very gates of Bharaghur, and cut up the Musalman dogs to hell.'

"In half an hour more we were safe in camp, and I went straight to the General's tent. He had evidently been up all night, and looked worn and haggard. Colonel A. and the Adjutant-General were with him. My story was soon told, and the Brigadier's nose delivered. The General was in ecstasies.

"'Not a bad night's work, Llantaine,' he said; 'but it's precious lucky the muggar did not swallow you instead of that poor devil of a pandy.'

"'No muggar in his senses would attempt to "take in" the Head of the Intelligence Department,' said Colonel A., with a spasmodic attempt at a joke, and I left the tent.

"'Your name shall go in for the V. C.,' sung out Sir George as I was leaving; 'and it shan't be my fault if you don't get it.'

"He was as good as his word, and in due time, ret tape permitting, I got my Cross.

"Within a week Shahrapore had been relieved, and the mutineers who were rash enough to show fight in front of Bharaghur got such a thrashing as they did not forget in a hurry. I was not engaged in either affair, as the cut on my head gave the doctors lots of trouble, and at last sent me home on sick certificate."

IN THE DARK.

ALL novelists stand the ancient order three
Along the dirtied sand-hills where they grow;
And from the dark Thirst comes a wandering breeze,
And waves them to and fro.

A murky darkness lies along the sand,
Where bright the sunbeams of the morning shone;
And the eye vainly seeks, by sea and land,
Some light to rest upon.

No large, pale star its glimmering vigil keeps
As holy men refer to in lofty lays;
And the dark river, like a serpent, creeps
To where its black piers rise.

Strange, salty odors through the darkness steal,
And through the dark the ocean thunders roll;
Thick darkness gathers, stifling, till I feel
Its weight upon my soul.

I stretch my hand out in the empty air
I strain my eyes to find the heavy night;
Blackness of darkness! Darker, hear my prayer,
Grant me to see the light!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE following lines, written on closing the churches in Philadelphia in August, 1866, during the prevalence of cholera, may be considered as an indication that the carelessness of the human heart is still rebellious against at least some of the institutions of the Church:

If you die in the winter you're buried with care;
The priest in his vestments is sure to be there:
If you die in the summer, with hardly a sermon:
If you're sick in the summer you may die not to-morrow.

An Irishwoman applying for relief in Portland the other day as one of the sufferers by the fire, was questioned as to her family by the lady to whom she applied:

"How many children have you?"

"Six."

"How old is your youngest?"

"He youngest is dead, and I've had another since?"

"Did you present your account to the defendant?" inquired a lawyer of a client. "I did, your Honor." "And what did he say?" "He told me to go to the devil." "And what did you do then?" "Why then I came to you."

SELECTIONS FROM THE CONSTITUTION OF THE NEW FREEDMEN'S REPUBLIC.

1. Every freedman shall have a horsen for himself, with a looking-glass on the top, if he wants it.
2. Every freedman shall have a secretary.
3. Every freedboy or freedgirl shall have a wardrobe.
4. Every freechild shall have whatever it cries for.
5. White people, whether free or not, must behave themselves.
6. All persons of every color, except red, must vote.

"Sammy, my son, don't stand there scratching your head; only scratching at your brains will make no progress in life." "Why, father, I've heard you say the only way to get along in this world was to scratch ahead."

* Native officer of Irregular Cavalry.
† Example of forest tense. ‡ A crocodile.

* "Look, Sir, look"

* SOMETHING RACY.—When the Horse-eating Society final together in Paris we wonder how many horsd'œuvres were consumed among the viands, and whether the horse-flesh was served up à la carte. A lunatic friend suggests that the toast of the evening should have been drunk in a chemi glass.

"Turn out! turn out!" cried a mystering teamster to some one he were meeting. "Turn out, or I'll serve you as I did the other man." The stranger in astonishment complied, but when John was nearly opposite called to him with, "Pray, Sir, how did you serve the other man?" "Why, Sir," said whip, tipping a wink, "I told him to turn out, and he wouldn't, so I turned out myself!"

SOMETHING OFF.—Why must the persons appointed to wind up joint-stock companies invariably be contractors?—Because they are bankli-ters.

How many sick ones wish they were healthy;
How many beggar-men wish they were wealthy;
How many ugly ones wish they were pretty;
How many stupid ones wish they were witty;
How many lame ones wish they were nimble;
How many Benedicts wish they had married;
Single or double, life's full of trouble.
Riches are stubble, pleasure's a bubble.

Why is a man's coat larger when he pulls it out of a carpet-bag?—Because he finds it in creases.

Neither false curls, false teeth, false calves, nor even false eyes are so bad as false friends.

SOMETHING LIKE A TELEGRAM.—By the Atlantic Cable a message is received in America five hours before it leave England.

"Won't that bo-constrictor bite me?" said a little boy to a showman. "Oh no, boy, he never bites, but swallows his victims whole."

"Can you return my love, dearest Julia?" "Certainly, certainly; I don't want it, I'm sure."

WHOLESALE INFANTICIDE.—"Those crying nuisances," said a cynical observer, "you like them well enough to be married." "Pooh," observed a horrid old single gentleman, "we shall have to kill all the babies."

HUMILIATING MEDITATION.

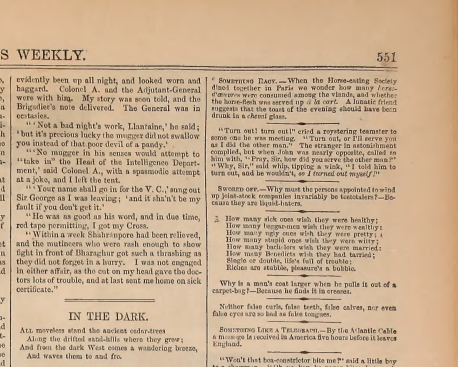
BY A SWEEPING BOY.

On any morning, if, when up and dressed ...
We're inclined, then our souls are soon depressed:
Full if no dirtiness, or ache, annoy us,
Nor indigestion, then our souls are joyous:
This should be problem enough to humanoy,
This puzzling sympathy 'twixt souls and stomachs.

NOVEL CURRENT EVENT.—An ingenious housekeeper that we have heard of, used to array her clothes for getting a rope down, which was fastened round the legs of a stool, and slung spelling the grow after it.

What is that which is neither flesh nor bone, and yet has four fingers and a thumb?—A glove.

"My dear Murphy," said an Irishman to his friend, "why did you betray the secret I told you?" "Is it to-day you're talking of, Sure, when I found it safer to keep it myself, didn't I do well to tell it to somebody that could?"



A confirmed toper was bothered how to honor his birthday. A brilliant idea struck him. He kept sober.

A SONG.

FROM "THE BATTLE OF THE BONNETS."

Bennet fortioned so divinely,
Whom I gaze at from afar,
Deckyl will Canny turn o'Rudy
Plate? or tantalizing star?
Fairies! I mark with chains of metal,
Furbelow'd with puffs of net,
Bless for one we were sorry,
How much smaller will you get?
Smaller very small I find him
Since I first came back to town;
And, to say flimsy, behind me
Felt a sudden dearth of crown;
At thy sight my gushing spirit
Streamed. I thought shed never cease,
Dear museum of sweetest bits,
For she gave us one spices.

Let us stick to fashion boldly,
Though the sun promise to blame,
We will take their rladding coldly,
Since 'tis most from Paris come.
All the bonnets, good or evil,
Will whatever rock rhocks at them.
Though they find their every level
In a covering for bonnet!

BEAUTIFUL SUBLIME
SOLEMN SOOTHING
SOOTHING
SOOTHING

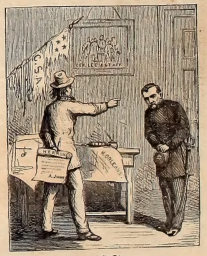
OTHELLO. DOST THOU MOCK ME?

IAGO. I MOCK YOU! NO, BY HEAVEN:
WOULD YOU WOULD BEAR YOUR FORTUNES LIKE A MAN.

SHAKSPEARE.

1862.



Iago. The Moor is of a free and open nature.
That thinks men honest that but seem to be so;
And will as tenderly be led by the nose,
As asses.....
Make the Moor thank me, love me, and reward me.
For making him egregiously an ass,
And practicing upon his peace and quiet
Even to madness. 'Tis here, but yet confus'd:
Knavery's plain face is never seen, till us'd.....
Though I do hate him as I do hell-pains,
Yet, for necessity of present life,
I must show out a flag and sign of love:
Which is indeed but sign.....
Then devils will their blackest sins put on,
They do suggest at first with heavenly shows,
As I do now.....
I humbly do beseech you of your pardon,
For too much loving you.
I hope, you will consider, what is spoke
Comes from my love.—But, I do see you are mov'd:—
I am to pray you, not to strain my speech
To grosser issues, nor to larger reach
Than to suspicion.....O grace! O heaven defend me!
Are you a man? have you a soul, or sense?—
God be wi' you; take mine office.—O wretched fool,
That liv'st to make thine honesty a vice!
O monstrous world! Take note, take note, O world!
To be direct and honest, is not safe.—
I thank you for this profit; and, from hence,
I'll love no friend, since love breeds such offence.....
Work on,
My medicine, work!

Othello.

HOW AND IT WORKS.

Th. Nast.

1866.

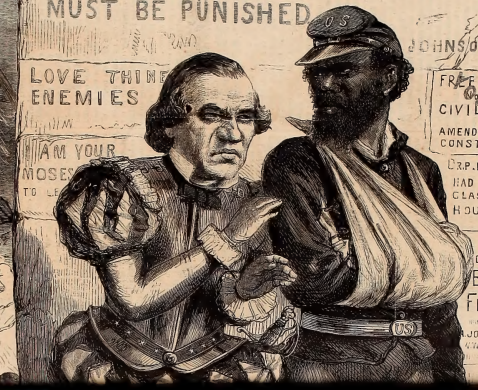
"I have been accused of being inimical to the true interests of the colored people; but this is not true. I am one of their best friends; and time, which tries and tests all, will demonstrate the fact..... I once said I would be the Moses of your people, and lead them on to liberty—liberty they now have..... I have been blamed for vetoing the Freedmen's Bureau Bill, and have been also represented to the colored people as having done it because I was their enemy. This is not true..... The ordinary course of judicial proceedings is no longer interrupted. The courts, both State and Federal, are in full, complete, and successful operation, and through them every person, regardless of race and color, is entitled to and can be heard. The protection granted to the white citizen is already conferred by law upon the freedman. ..... It can not be expected that men who have for four years been made familiar with the blood and carnage of war, who have suffered the loss of property, and in so many instances reduced from affluence to poverty, can at once assume the calm demeanor and action of those citizens of the country whose worldly possessions have not been destroyed, and whose political hopes have not been blasted, and the worst view of this subject affords no parallel in violence to similar outrages that have followed all civil commotions, always less in magnitude than ours. But I do not believe that this to-be-regretted state of things will last long."—ANDREW JOHNSON.

RADICAL (2) RIOTS

LINCOLN CHAPEL

SCHO

SOUTHERN RIGHTS



ANDREW JOHNSON'S RECONSTRUCTION.

MEMPHIS.

NEW-ORLEANS.

TREASON IS A CRIME AND MUST BE MADE ODIOUS, AND TRAITORS MUST BE PUNISHED.

PARDON TO REBELS

VETOES TO UNION MEN

KITTY CARY.

No marble tells where Kitty Cary sleep—
Only a simple slab of painted pine,
Time-stained and worn, her poor memorial keeps:
One brief and half-obliterated line—

So near the highway that the yellow sand
From passing wheels falls thickly on her grave;
In death, as in her life, proscribed and banned,
For Kitty Cary lived and died a slave.

Ay, lived and died before the Almighty's hand
Struck the strong fetters from the bondman's limbs,
And made the farthest borders of the land
Shake with her dark-browed kindred's freedom-hymns.

Alas! too early snapped the silver cord,
Or all too slowly came the tardy goal—
Life was to her but toil without reward,
And death the welcome end of servitude.

But death is freedom. Haply it may be
That Kitty Cary, from some fairer sphere,
Looks down to-day and pities lowly me
The bitter bondage of existence here—

Yet smiles to see her race with freedom crowned,
Subject no longer to a master's rule,
Her grave-demeaning their thoughtless children bound
Across her grave-mound on their way to school;

For nothing guards her humble place of rest,
The straying cattle browse above her head,
Untended goats pause in their hungry quest
To crop the toasty verdure from her bed.

Yet Nature's self has not forgotten her,
But decks her lowly grave with tender grass,
Lo! in the wind the blossomed sweet-briar stirs,
And scatter fragrance round her resting-place.

Remsen, N. Florence Percy.

THE TALE OF AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE.

In Six Weekly Portions.—First Portion.

CHAPTER I.

I suppose that, to be successful, one should set only one head of the object to be attained. At all events, I believe this to have been my sister Anna's case; and she succeeded, if to gain what one strives for be success. Now that I have written those words they scarcely seem to convey my meaning. Perhaps I should have expressed it better if I had written— But no, let it stand as it is.

The reverse of the medal has been my stumbling-block through life. I have always allowed my imagination to carry itself too much with what might be said against, as well as for, any plan, purpose, or speech of mine. I recently hope—all hope is brightened into the dawn of a heavenly day, I resolve to keep but one object in view, and to endeavor to attain it in all simplicity and single-mindedness. And this is my object, Lucy. I want you to know the true story of those who have gone before you, and who have nurtured your youth. The story of two women, who were once young, as you are now young; who lived, and loved, and suffered, as you must one day live, and love, and suffer. I have little hope that our warning beacon will avail to keep you from the rocks. The record of our common humanity date back ages and ages beyond the days of my youth, Lucy—though I dare say your twelve-year-old imagination can hardly conceive a time when Aunt Margaret was young!—and yet I never heard of a case in which one human being's heart-experience served to teach another's. Would it were! We are truly the "heirs of all the ages" in one sense. Science bequeaths its treasures of research and labor. Intellect stumbles, and rises, and sometimes falls, but progresses, still progresses. The pioneers of thought do good service; and noble hand after hand, succeeding each other, have been out paths for us, on which we travel contentedly, with scant gratitude for the thought of it, the brewers. But, in the science of Life, we must all begin for ourselves where the great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers began. Just as human will brings with it the same sequence of morning, noon, and night that dawned and flamed, and faded in Eden. Still, it will be well that you should one day learn the truth of a family story which you are as yet too young thoroughly to understand. It will be well if it make you think kindly and pitifully of the dead; if it help you to see that "struggle's bad, all's spent, if our desire be got without content;" and, above all, if it convince you that unless your desires be a unit one, its attainment can assuredly never, never bring content.

Your grandmother was my sister Anna; that sister of whom I have said that she succeeded in gaining what she strove for. You never saw her after you were an infant two years old, and I suppose not how I can make you picture to yourself my sister—the sister of pale, wrinkled, gray-haired Aunt Margaret—as a bright, handsome, laughing girl, full of life, and with a wonderfully high and haughty spirit. She had dark-brown eyes of my color, but larger and brighter—eyes that flashed and sparkled, and sometimes shone with tears of tender love when she was excited or angry. She was somewhat shorter than I, but bore herself so erectly as to seem the taller of the two. There was a family likeness between us; but I was never a beauty, while Anna always was. We were brought up together by a guardian; for our parents died when I was five, and Anna three years old. Our father and mother were taken away by the same infectious fever within a fortnight of each other. I have been told by my remembrance of that time is too vague for me to speak of my own knowledge that our mother died first in delirium, all unconscious of the bed and faithful hand which clasped her to the last; and that from that moment our father, who had kept up to tend and nurse her, drooped and sickened, and seemed to yield himself to death. What hurt him most was, that she should not have recognized him at the end, nor said one word of farewell; and I think the very last words he spoke were, "Phœbe will know me when I see her now!" They used to say I was like him. Well! Our guardian came and took us away from the dreadful house, and we soon forgot our brief sorrow and found a warm soft nest to dwell in, two little unfledged innocents that we were, from whom the sheltering motherwings had fallen, but not quite forever.

I have used the term "our guardian," for so he was truly and faithfully; but I do not mean that he was ever legally appointed so; nor, indeed, were we of importance enough to have a guardian. No, we were but two little treasures, and needed no dragon to guard it; but God sent us a friend who, though there was nothing due to take care of, took thought there was nothing due to take care of, took care of us for pure love and compassion. He was the husband of my mother's half-sister, a woman many years older than my mother, and he had known and loved both my parents. Childless themselves, he and his wife had often begged—half in jest, half in earnest—for one of the little cherubs to rear as their own. Anna was their favorite—as she was most people's—such a pretty plump thing as she was, with great eyes, and great curling masses of brown hair curling over her forehead! But they would have been glad to take either of us. They have often told me that they used to say, laughingly: "Wait till I die, Jim, and I'll leave you one of them in my will!" Poor father! Mother was passionately fond of us both, and, as I have said, believe, made a half-promise that, if ever a boy were born to her, one of his inferior creatures should be transferred to the Gable House. But I do not think that any number of brothers would have pushed us from our places in father's heart. It was hoped at the time that the baby would be a good provision for us when his affairs were finally wound up. No one expected that we could have much but his promise had been a large one, and he had lived simply, and had had no selfish expenses. However, beyond the small sum obtained by the sale of the furniture and books, we had literally nothing. A country surgeon, if he be one of those good Samaritans to whom the sight of helpless pain or bring is the most effectual appeal that can be made, and who will not only prescribe the healing oil and cordial wine, but bestow them, if he has to go down into his cellar for them, my father was still young and strong when the fever felled him. He looked not for death. How many of us do look not for death, even though the journey have been long and the road stretch far behind us! Uncle Gough carried us home to his house and put us in the spare bedroom, and Aunt Gough kissed us, and cried over us, and took us into her heart, and filled a mother's place to us in her home.

I remember that, from the first, Anna was the more masterful of us two. What she desired, she would have, and what she would not, she let us see in childish days, she pursued with so blind a vehemence of passion, that weaker wills unconsciously drew aside, and escaped collision with the obstacle in her course. It was bad for Anna, this yielding on the part of those around her, I have sometimes thought; but if our guardian and Aunt Anna and others might have been spared the bitter sorrows which afterward wrecked more than one life, And was the explanation of that which seems to me a reproach to the memory of the beloved guardians of our youth that I can not bear to say so. But the fault, if fault there were, lay in the excessive tenderness of Aunt and Uncle Gough. They had so resolved that the orphans should never miss the freshness of a mother's love, that they took it all, even for an instant, the child of orphanhood and strangeness in their new home—that they shrank from the smallest exercise of harshness, and wielded their authority with a gentleness which seemed almost feeble.

CHAPTER II.

The new home that received us was delightful in its outward aspect. It was a very old building, and the good fortune or good taste of its successive occupants had preserved it in almost its original condition. I have never, in England, seen so perfect and picturesque a specimen of an ancient dwelling-house, except in Aunt Gough's. The Gable House, in Uncle Gough's residence was, however, situated in a quite different quarter of England, in a smiling southern county, within a few miles distance of the sea. It was, I believe, the largest, and was most certainly the handsomest, house in the Bay, in the town of Willborough, and it stood in spacious grounds of its own. The lawn and gardens and orchards extended all round the house, while in front of the house was quite near enough to the main street of the town for its numerous gables to be well seen from the opposite side of the broad road which surrounded it; and the great old iron entrance-gate gave to view the half-door with its usually overhanging porch, and the cozy benches within it, on either side, whereon, in fine sunny weather, might often be seen a heap of children's books and toys, or the knitting of some matron, or a crumpled sash, the whole zealously guarded by the tiniest, fairest, unenmeshed-looking black-and-tan terrier that was ever born. For the grand porch was Anna's favorite playing-place, and Vixen was her favorite playmate. The porch was a constant resort for all—but Anna's—and Aunt Gough, for the dear soul would let the child have her way when she fancied her heart was set upon littering the stone benches and pursuing her pastimes in full view of all the passers-by in the High Street. But old Smith, uncle's factotum and absolute tyrant, strongly objected to what he called the unseemliness of poor Anna's selected haunt. He was a queer, grim-looking old fellow, whose real business was that of a gardener, but who seemed to fancy he had a sort of vested right in every inch of Uncle Gough's territory, from the garret to the back paneels of the hall-door. Beyond that, into the house itself, he never pushed his authority; but once set your foot on the broad slab of stone under the entrance-porch, and you entered the domains of King Stock—or, as we children used to call him when we came to the days of Æsop's Fables, King Stork. Certainly that long-legged monarch himself could not have been more absolute, or more superbly indifferent to the indignations of his subjects. Stock's highest word of praise was "seemly." I have heard him call the great mossy sea of apple-blossoms in the orchard, "pretty, a red sunset," "a seemly night." In the same way, if Stock pronounced any person, place, or thing to be "unseemly," we all knew that he intended to convey a very strong expression of condemnation. I have sometimes thought he fancied the word to be Scriptural, and to carry with it a weight of authority beyond any mere scandine or usual phrase. However that may have been, I know that he and Anna had many and many a battle about Stock's unseemliness. "Why, Miss Anna," he would say, with slow utterance and wooden, immovable face, "when you've got the lairs" (he called the hares—" and the gardens, and the srubbery, and the horchard, and the meadders for to play in, take what you likes and spile what you likes, and the housemaids you to come and litter and mess all over this here porch, with your picture-books and your tiles [toys]? And that little scrutting beast of a Vixen, that I'd rayther save till a dozen barn-door fowl on than all the grand-children mornin', and the number of her pairs all over three hundred acres! Than't seemly, I tell ye. Do what you likes in the house. There's more old rooms and passages in the top-story nor you'll get through in a week. But in this porch you shall not be; for 'tis a unseemly thing, and there an end."

But there was by no means an end. Anna would stamp her small scarlet-shod foot (children wore red morocco shoes in those days), and would hit her delicate little baby-eyebrows together, and frown half seriously on the bench before her brazen at the least hint of an attempt to order them; while I, next would laugh, and jump, and dart forward with short, spiteful leaps of defiance, and the two would be in a shrill and angry fray generally ended in the child and the dog being left panting, but victorious, in possession of the field. Once badly, old Smith had succeeded in banishing the heroine goes, in th se combats, but was outwardly in cool and unruffled as his small foe was flushed and disheveled. After the first intense moments of lifting up the refractory one, screaming with rage, in his arms, and carrying her deliberately to my self in the back parlor—punishment which while, small of body but great of spirit, hung on by her teeth to the calf of his leathern gaiter with all four legs off the ground—Lucy, I can see the scene was, our kind guardians were so frightened by Anna's violence, and so unwilling to deny her any gratification, that Uncle Gough, dear Uncle Gough! How tender he was, how pitiful, how patient, with the helpless, motherless children he had taken to his heart!

From that day forth Stock never sought to interfere with Anna's choice of a playing-place. I believe she was afraid of the fierce will, within the memory of men, had successfully fought Stock on his own territory; and it might have been expected that he would have made against his puppet conqueror. But it was not so. I believe he was afterward doubly stern in asserting his authority against all the rest of the world, and I have an indistinct remembrance of Uncle Gough's having been obliged to yield up certain select beds which Stock chose to dispose of with a peace-offering to his outraged dignity. But I do not think Stock was more harsh with Anna after her victory than before. Indeed, I think he regarded her triumph as a presumptuous little minion that I was! It happened in this wise: We had been racing and romping all through the garden, in the morning of one bright summer day, and toward noon were thoroughly heated and weary. Nurse had carried off Anna, for some childish sleepy, for a nap before our early dinner. I, being two years older and not so delicate and easily tired as my sister, was left to follow my own devices until it should be time to wash and brush me for dinner. Under these circumstances, and while still undecided how to bestow myself during the next hour, my eye caught the broad island of shadow cast by the porch on the dazzling space of yellow gravel that lay glaring in the sunlight before the house. A beautiful Virginia creeper hung lightly over the entrance, and the pale-green leaves and myriorious in the blackness of shade, that I thought of a certain cave in a wood that I had been told of in some fairy tale as of surpassing coolness, and the idea occurred to me how delightful it would be to play at being the enchanted maiden who was kept prisoner by the wicked fairy, condemned to remain spell-bound and motionless in the cave until the handsomest prince in all the world should come and touch her with a branch of the very creeper that was over my head, arise and marry the prince, and live happy ever after! There was a great golden-blossomed laburnum on the side of the porch, and that would do very well for the linden-tree, and would be much prettier. So off I ran in hot haste to the "wilderness"—our play-room was significantly christened—and returned flushed and happy to the porch, with my doll and a white woolly lamb on wheels, whereof the uninitiated could never, at first sight, distinguish the head from the tail, much to my chagrin. Dolly was not so beautiful a work of art as your wax ones, Lucy. She was large and clumsy, cut out of wood, with crimson-varnished cheeks, and flaxen curls, and a movable head, the skull by a bright tin tack in the middle of the pate-ing; but she was very dear to my childish heart for all that, and, for a power of Fiction versatility, and assumption of the most widely differing characters, I would match her against the choicest and costliest puppets of France or Germany. Well! I came back to the porch, carrying Dolly and Snowball. Snowball, the woolly lamb, was an innovation, there being no such character in the original story; but I constructed in my mind an episode showing how Snowball, in endeavoring to defend his beloved mistress, had incurred the hatred of the fairy, and had been condemned to share her captivity in his presence in the cave was satisfactorily accounted for. I covered Dolly's head and shoulders with a pink silk scarf from my own neck, and immediately she became as magnificent and malignant a fairy as could be desired. Then I lay down on the cool stone bench, with my arms round Snowball's neck, and waited for Prince Goldenheart with his branch of linden.

The shade and the silence, and my morning's romp, combined to make me drowsy. I was just beginning to lose the consciousness of Snowball's rough wool against my cheek, when a slow, heavy step on the gravel outside startled me into wakefulness, and I sat up very quietly and peered out under the hanging screen of Virginia creeper. Of course it was old Stock. I had known his step at once. He was going toward the porch, and carried a heavy spade over his shoulder. The porch was so dark, and the outer sunlight so dazzling, that I think he could have passed me without seeing me, had it not been for poor Dolly, who, true to her present character of the malignant fairy, was the means of getting me into trouble. I had stuck her up to keep guard over us at the entrance of the cave, and the glories of her pink scarf attracted Stock's attention. "Hullo!" said he, looking in with his one glittering brown hand shading his eyes; "why, it's you, is it, Miss Margit?" He spoke very strictly, and pronounced it to take up Dolly, too, so all you please not to touch her, Stock?" said I, pleadingly; "she is the fairy Malevola, and I am Rosabella, and nobody can come into the cave without a branch of the magic linden-tree, and——" "Oh!" growled Stock, interrupting my explanation, and ruthlessly lifting the fairy Malevola by her leg so that she dangled helplessly upside down, with her flaxen curls and crimson cheeks touching the stock of a head, except just where the tin tack is it there on—" Oho! you are equal to set me at defiance now, are you, Miss Margit? If nobody comes into the cave, somebody shall come out on it! Ain't you ashamed to be flyin in the faces of them as Providence has been pleased to call into duty and place of life? Come along out this minute, you bad-behaved child!" It is irritating me to see him slowly twisting Dolly backward and forward as he spoke, so that her poor head kept unconsciously exposed to view, and her black curls sweeping the gravel, that I was goaded into rashness. "Stock!" I said, "I will!" cried, half astonished at my own audacity. She was no longer the fairy Malevola; there was no enchanted cave, no magic linden, no Prince Goldenheart. Ah, no! All that had vanished like a broken bubble. Stock had spoiled it all! But I stepped boldly and lightly under cover, and held out the other for Dolly with an imperious gesture, "I will have her!" "Who says shall and will?" retorted Stock, with exasperating deliberation of my demand. "You says shall and will now, do you? Them ain't words for little child'en." Dolly in the mean time, "says," said I, struggling between my tears, and clutching Snowball; "she is mine, my very own; and you have no right to keep her from me." "No right?" repeated Stock, with a grin of demonstration—"no right! If I was to come down so far as to reason with a babe and suckling, I'd ask you to see what right you've got to be a playin', and—and a strayin'—in a place where you've been forbid for to play." Here he made a full stop, and walked, slowly and heavily, and with his usual deliberation, "—or for to stray." The logic of this retort struck me more forcibly than any mere scolding could have done. I was true I had been forbidden to bring my toys into the porch; but next minutes there came into my mind the remembrance of Anna's victory, and I felt Stock's argument to be unsound. "Anna," said I, eagerly, "Anna was let to come here yesterday, and she was playing with her skipping-rope; and if she has a right to be here, so have I." Stock turned his deliberate black eyes upon me, and looked at me pensively for a second. "Miss Margrit," said he, at last, "don't you argue any. Argument and me don't never agree. Stock's more babes and sucklings. No good didn't never come of that precept. You've got to do in, just to mind what's said to them, and do it. Now you've had the prophets. You come out of that porch this minute, or I'll spile this here wooden image for good an' all." Poor Dolly! I had plucked off shade as though he would have cut Dolly in two with it. I do not believe now that he would really have done so, for, though he was a rude and coarse old man, he was not brutal. But my childish heart leaped with terror when I saw the murderous weapon suspended over the unfortunate accessory, and I cried, with a scream, I darted forth, caught the doll in my arms, and rushed away across the lawn at the back of the house, never pausing until I had plunged into the thickest part of the shrubbery, where I flung myself sobbing on the grass, and hugged my rescued treasure.

More than sixty years have passed since that day when I so unsuccessfully emulated Anna—for I can not have been much over three years old—and yet every incident of it is far more vividly present to my mind than when I was five-and-twenty. I can recall the bitter, pungent taste of a bit-sweet my from the old cedar-tree under which I lay; and the half-unconscious way in which I put it between my teeth, and pricked my lips with its sharp point. Ah, Lucy! Since that day I have dreamed daydreams in other enchanted caves, and been surrounded by stronger spells than the fairy Malevola's, and I have waited for Prince Goldenheart as you will wait for him some day; and I have seen all the handsomest youth in all the world, with a fragrant green bough in his hand, there has hobbled up old Stock with his spade to crumble the whole beautiful vision into dust! But then you, Lucy, I have never had the warmth of love and pity, and sympathy with suffering, quenched out of my heart, and, after all, I ought to be a happy old woman. And so I am, my dear. So I am.

We were happy in those days, if ever children were happy. As time went on, and we ceased to be mere babies, we were not allowed to run wild about the grounds from morning to night. We had such tasks as were set us had no terrors, and few difficulties. I fear that you of the rising generation will have but a mean opinion of Aunt Gough's educational powers when I confess that I was turned eight years old before I could read with ease. But I had already worked several samplers, and could even stitch a shirt very creditably by that time. Anna's education began somewhat earlier, as was natural; for the two years' difference between our ages enabled me to help her at first in deciphering the mysteries of Great A and little b. Aunt Gough was a stanch church-woman. Every Sunday morning we were taken to the great family pew and were perched up side by side on two crimson hassocks placed on the seat, and thus elevated, the brim of my hat just reached to the top of the pew. Anna, being smaller, was altogether invisible to the outside world, except when she stood up on her cushion during the psalms. There are scarcely any pews nowadays. Every lady sits on a hard bench in full view of his or her neighbors. As it is certainly a much more uncomfortable state of things than the old fashion, let us hope it has some compensating spiritual advantages.

Anna and I liked going to church. It was not quite terrible to our young imaginations, nor were we taught to think of religion as of a stern Method, whose contemplation turns the gazer into stone. As to giving any portion of the Scriptures to learn by way of punishment, Aunt Gough would have been shocked at the notion of such a thing. She did, indeed, consider it her duty to make us learn the Church Catechism — which we didn't understand; and she told us stories from the New Testament — which we did understand, and, moreover, delighted in. One great source of Sunday pleasure was the music. Our church possessed a very fine old organ; and though our organist would not be considered very scientific in these days, he contrived to elicit from it its mellowest tones and richest harmonies. He loved the great old instrument, and thought more of his organ than of himself: which feeling — the self-forgetfulness of a true artist — communicated itself irresistibly to his hearers. Even we children were conscious of a beauty in the psalms and voluntaries beyond the mere sound. And I remember once saying to our guardian, "I do like to listen to Mr. Dixon, he plays so kindly."

As we grew older, and were thought to have got beyond the range of dear Aunt Gough's simple teaching, we were sent to a day-school in the town. Our schoolmistress, Miss Wokenham, was one of the tiniest women I ever saw. There was more than one child of eleven or twelve years old in the school who could look down on her from a superior height; and our plump rosy cheeks and round arms would seem quite coarse and clumsy — vulgar as her phrase was then, for every thing redolent of health and vigor, as well as for what was in itself coarse and unpolished — beside Miss Wokenham's fragile, elfish form. She was not old as I now reckon age — perhaps forty-five — but her antiquity was very venerable in my eyes then. Her hair was snowy white, but soft and shining, and wavy with natural curls; she had bright dark eyes, and an immensely wide mouth, filled, however, with a faultless set of teeth. Perhaps Miss Wokenham's attainments were really nothing very marvelous, but we all thought her a prodigy of learning. And, indeed, making all due allowance for the march of intellect in these days, I am inclined to believe that Miss Wokenham was mistress of some solid acquirements that one might seek for vainly among more showily-accomplished governesses. She had a competent knowledge of history and geography, and a turn for arithmetic that was quite surprising; she had even, it was whispered, dabbled a little in the mathematics; and our parish clergyman, who had graduated at Cambridge, was wont to declare that, if Miss Wokenham had been a man, she would have made the wranglers of her year look to their laurels. But perhaps this was a figure of speech. At all events, Miss Wokenham herself used to declare it was; and she was a most absolutely and uncompromisingly truthful human being. If, as sometimes happened, in a scholar thirsting for knowledge pashed her beyond her depth, she never hesitated for an instant to confess her ignorance. "I don't know, my dear," she would say, fixing her brave black eyes earnestly on the interrogator. "I don't know, but if it is to be known well find it out." And then she would reach down the lexicon, or the atlas, or whatever book of reference might be needed, and work side by side with her pupil until the desired information was gained. This candor, far from weakening her influence over us, had so diametrically opposite an effect, that we were one and all ready to swear to the positive certainty of any thing imparted to us by Miss Wokenham as a fact.

Under her tuition I and Anna were well content to remain, until we were respectively seventeen and fifteen years old, with no more brilliant accomplishments than as much music as enabled us to rattle through a country dance or so, and a smattering of French imparted by a long-suffering Frenchman named De Beaupré, whose pension Miss Wokenhamerently styling Old Bogie. Anna had a lovely fresh voice, and used to thrill all our hearts with some old Border ballad, or a sea-song by Mr. Dibdin. I did not sound the fire in the winter twilight. I am too a little, but my voice had neither the power nor the charm of Anna's.

Meanwhile, things went on pleasantly and peacefully at the Gable House. If time began to streak Uncle Gough's hair with more than its proper allowance of life, unless his constant quarrels with every one around him afforded him gratification. His solid luxury was his pipe. He would sit by the kitchen fire of an evening, smoking his churchwarden filled with the strongest tobacco that could be bought, and talking theology to the maids; for Stock had decided views about religion. I used to think, when I was a child, that they were peculiar to him himself; but I have heard in subsequent years dogmas gravely promulgated, which, barring the difference of grammar, might have emanated from old Stock himself.

Cook was the only one of the servants bold enough to tackle Stock on this his favorite topic; but even she frequently retired worsted from the conflict. "Well," she would say, taking refuge in generalities, "I'm sure I don't know, Mr. Stock; but I always believed as them as acted accordin' to their consciences was in the right way. There's more for not one to heaven, you know."

"Heaven!" Stock would repeat, with a growl of contempt. "Much you know about heaven!"

"Deary me, then what is it, Mr. Stock! I hopes I knows as much about heaven as you do, any way."

"I'm one of the 'lect, I am," the old man would say; his face wooden as ever, and his utterance deliberate and weighty as with a sense of absolute certainties; "I'm all right. You're another, but not one or two more on us there, but there'll be very few on us — very few on us."

I remember the curious speculations this kind of talk used to excite in my mind. I never for a moment loubted that Stock was right, but I used to wonder with the vague curiosity of a thoughtful child how he would feel when he found so many more people in heaven than he expected, and whether he would be pleased or disappointed at not finding it reserved for the exclusive occupation of himself and "one or two more on us."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

To the sentiment housewife the fruit season is one continued "harvest time." Then her own pet, private storeroom, open which Winter and Spring had made fearful ravages, is gradually replenished—the long rows of well-filled jars, bottles, and cans again shine resplendent on the shelves — apricots and peaches, canned fruits and dried, are laid in abundantly; and she is certainly comfortable if she exhibits some pride in her transparent jelly, which will "out," or rawthereof, in the shape and height of freshly gathered.

Great progress has been made during the past few years in the methods of preserving fruits. Although most housekeepers still like to "make up" some jars of sweetmeats in the old rule of "pound for pound," canned fruits are much more commonly used, not only because they are more easily made and more economical, but also because they are really nicer. New contrivances for keeping fruit for table use through the year are developed every season; and nothing but actual experience can satisfy each housekeeper that any one mode is the desirable one. A few hints, however, may be accepted.

Fruit, for preserving, should certainly be fully ripe—there are a few exceptions, as for instance, the gooseberry is considered best when green. The quantity of white sugar is always the best for preserves. There is no economy in using brown sugar which requires much clarifying. A good preserving kettle is an important desideratum. Iron ones, lined with porcelain, are commonly used; but the porcelain soon cracks. Perhaps nothing is more satisfactory, on the whole, than a brass or copper kettle; but it is important that it be thoroughly cleansed immediately before using. If the fruit is to be put up with only a small proportion of sugar, or without any, it is essential, of course, to have jars or cans which can be made air-tight. There are a few more variations to any good help than to find her fruit all spoiled, and her labor lost, because the jars were not properly secured. Some use wide-mouthed bottles, with common corks, and wax or cement; others, the cans which can be sealed up; and then there are a variety of self-sealing glass jars. Some of these are very difficult to manage. It is a great labor to fasten them up, and it is as much as a jar is worth to attempt to open it. Some, however, are admirably secure. The "Mason" is good a kind as any is Willoughby's, which has an iron top to fit the glass mouth band, and is fastened down by a screw. We have never known this kind to fail to keep its fruit. The Boorman, also, seems perfected. It has recently styling Old Bogie. Anna had a lovely fresh voice, and used to thrill all our hearts with some old Border ballad, or a sea-song by Mr. Dibdin. I did not sound the fire in the winter twilight. I am too a little, but my voice had neither the power nor the charm of Anna's.

Meanwhile, things went on pleasantly and peacefully at the Gable House. If time began to streak Uncle Gough's hair with more than its proper allowance of life, unless his constant quarrels with every one around him afforded him gratification. His solid luxury was his pipe. He would sit by the kitchen fire of an evening, smoking his churchwarden filled with the strongest tobacco that could be bought, and talking theology to the maids; for Stock had decided views about religion. I used to think, when I was a child, that they were peculiar to him himself; but I have heard in subsequent years dogmas gravely promulgated, which, barring the difference of grammar, might have emanated from old Stock himself.

Cook was the only one of the servants bold enough to tackle Stock on this his favorite topic; but even she frequently retired worsted from the conflict. "Well," she would say, taking refuge in generalities, "I'm sure I don't know, Mr. Stock; but I always believed as them as acted accordin' to their consciences was in the right way. There's more for not one to heaven, you know."

"Heaven!" Stock would repeat, with a growl of contempt. "Much you know about heaven!"

"Deary me, then what is it, Mr. Stock! I hopes I knows as much about heaven as you do, any way."

"I'm one of the 'lect, I am," the old man would say; his face wooden as ever, and his utterance deliberate and weighty as with a sense of absolute certainties; "I'm all right. You're another, but not one or two more on us there, but there'll be very few on us — very few on us."

I remember the curious speculations this kind of talk used to excite in my mind. I never for a moment loubted that Stock was right, but I used to wonder with the vague curiosity of a thoughtful child how he would feel when he found so many more people in heaven than he expected, and whether he would be pleased or disappointed at not finding it reserved for the exclusive occupation of himself and "one or two more on us."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

To the sentiment housewife the fruit season is one continued "harvest time." Then her own pet, private storeroom, open which Winter and Spring had made fearful ravages, is gradually replenished—the long rows of well-filled jars, bottles, and cans again shine resplendent on the shelves — apricots and peaches, canned fruits and dried, are laid in abundantly; and she is certainly comfortable if she exhibits some pride in her transparent jelly, which will "out," or rawthereof, in the shape and height of freshly gathered.

Great progress has been made during the past few years in the methods of preserving fruits. Although most housekeepers still like to "make up" some jars of sweetmeats in the old rule of "pound for pound," canned fruits are much more commonly used, not only because they are more easily made and more economical, but also because they are really nicer. New contrivances for keeping fruit for table use through the year are developed every season; and nothing but actual experience can satisfy each housekeeper that any one mode is the desirable one. A few hints, however, may be accepted.

Fruit, for preserving, should certainly be fully ripe—there are a few exceptions, as for instance, the gooseberry is considered best when green. The quantity of white sugar is always the best for preserves. There is no economy in using brown sugar which requires much clarifying. A good preserving kettle is an important desideratum. Iron ones, lined with porcelain, are commonly used; but the porcelain soon cracks. Perhaps nothing is more satisfactory, on the whole, than a brass or copper kettle; but it is important that it be thoroughly cleansed immediately before using. If the fruit is to be put up with only a small proportion of sugar, or without any, it is essential, of course, to have jars or cans which can be made air-tight. There are a few more variations to any good help than to find her fruit all spoiled, and her labor lost, because the jars were not properly secured. Some use wide-mouthed bottles, with common corks, and wax or cement; others, the cans which can be sealed up; and then there are a variety of self-sealing glass jars. Some of these are very difficult to manage. It is a great labor to fasten them up, and it is as much as a jar is worth to attempt to open it. Some, however, are admirably secure. The "Mason" is good a kind as any is Willoughby's, which has an iron top to fit the glass mouth band, and is fastened down by a screw. We have never known this kind to fail to keep its fruit. The Boorman, also, seems perfected. It has recently styling Old Bogie. Anna had a lovely fresh voice, and used to thrill all our hearts with some old Border ballad, or a sea-song by Mr. Dibdin. I did not sound the fire in the winter twilight. I am too a little, but my voice had neither the power nor the charm of Anna's.

Meanwhile, things went on pleasantly and peacefully at the Gable House. If time began to streak Uncle Gough's hair with more than its proper allowance of life, unless his constant quarrels with every one around him afforded him gratification. His solid luxury was his pipe. He would sit by the kitchen fire of an evening, smoking his churchwarden filled with the strongest tobacco that could be bought, and talking theology to the maids; for Stock had decided views about religion. I used to think, when I was a child, that they were peculiar to him himself; but I have heard in subsequent years dogmas gravely promulgated, which, barring the difference of grammar, might have emanated from old Stock himself.

Cook was the only one of the servants bold enough to tackle Stock on this his favorite topic; but even she frequently retired worsted from the conflict. "Well," she would say, taking refuge in generalities, "I'm sure I don't know, Mr. Stock; but I always believed as them as acted accordin' to their consciences was in the right way. There's more for not one to heaven, you know."

"Heaven!" Stock would repeat, with a growl of contempt. "Much you know about heaven!"

"Deary me, then what is it, Mr. Stock! I hopes I knows as much about heaven as you do, any way."

"I'm one of the 'lect, I am," the old man would say; his face wooden as ever, and his utterance deliberate and weighty as with a sense of absolute certainties; "I'm all right. You're another, but not one or two more on us there, but there'll be very few on us — very few on us."

I remember the curious speculations this kind of talk used to excite in my mind. I never for a moment loubted that Stock was right, but I used to wonder with the vague curiosity of a thoughtful child how he would feel when he found so many more people in heaven than he expected, and whether he would be pleased or disappointed at not finding it reserved for the exclusive occupation of himself and "one or two more on us."

AFTER THE RIOT.

THE negroes wounded in the New Orleans riot were nearly all taken to the Marine Hospital, where the best of medical aid is furnished them. Dr. HANNA has charge of the hospital: he informs me that the majority of his cases will recover, though many of them are shot one or more times besides being severely beaten. Some of the negroes in the ward that I have sketched were attacked while on the way to their dinners, entirely ignorant of the existence of any serious trouble.—The nurses are nearly all mulatto females, who seem thoroughly kind and attentive to their patients, who bear their sufferings with a fortitude that is somewhat surprising. The severe heat and the painful nature of the wounds make the situation of the poor creatures pitiful in the extreme. Were it not for the advantages offered for the comfort by the excellent arrangement of the hospital many would die that will now recover.

The medical officer detailed to make an official report of the killed and wounded presented the names in full, together with the character of the wounds received by the following parties, viz.: Members of the Convention—one killed and eight wounded, or one-third of the members present; white citizens attending the Convention, two killed and nine wounded: total number of whites killed and wounded, 20. Colored citizens attending the Convention—killed, 34; wounded, 119: total of colored killed and wounded, 153. Of the Police there were 10 slightly wounded, most of whom were on duty the next day. One white citizen with the Police was killed. The evidence shows that the man was accidentally shot by the Police; also, that in the excitement many of the Police were wounded by their comrades. In addition to the above, the Doctor reports ten colored men killed and twenty wounded, whose names he could not ascertain.

THE NEW ORLEANS RIOT—THE MILITARY COMMISSION EXAMINING WITNESSES.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

I have also made a sketch representing the Military Commission receiving testimony concerning the riot. Their report is not yet published. General MOWER is President. The other members are Generals QUINCEY, BALDY, and GREGG. D.

THE FIRE IN JERSEY CITY.

EARLY on Sunday morning, August 19, a schooner laden with petroleum, lying alongside the large oil dock situated just north of the Erie Railway Company's freight pier in Jersey City, was set on fire by the careless use of a lamp in the forward hold. In some manner the flame of the lamp communicated with the gas generated by the petroleum oil with which the vessel was laden, and the result was a loud explosion, the mast being blown—according to some accounts—many feet into the air, alighting in the water at a distance from the vessel. He was rescued with great difficulty by some bystanders. The deck of the schooner was blown off, and in an inconceivably short space of time she was wrapped in flames.

Of the spread of the fire from this point the New York Tribune gives the following account:

Piled up on the dock in tiers and on the spot let in the vicinity were about 18,000 barrels of crude oil, and in the tanks near by about 3000 barrels of refined oil. Through this inflammable mass the flames rushed with a roar and fury perfectly appalling, while the dense clouds of black and stifling smoke which arose from the mass seemed to darken the entire horizon.

On the side track, which run the entire length of the pier, were standing about 100 cars belonging to the Erie Railroad Company, laden with oil and waiting to be unloaded. Efforts were at once made to save these if possible.—Gangs of men knee in the employ of the railway company were set to work pushing the cars down the track away from the immediate vicinity of the fire, and they were thus started in a loose train and drawn to a safe distance.—While thus engaged, many of the workmen had their hands and faces severely scorched and blistered. In this manner all of the cars but 13 were saved.

On the freight, or, as it is more commonly termed, the coal pier of the Erie Railway Company, were a number of cars laden with grain and other articles. Attention was at once turned to saving these, and in the manner above-mentioned the greater portion of them were removed to a place of safety.

Lying in the slips on either side of the pier were a number of brigs, schooners, and lighters engaged in taking on board the oil. So quickly did the flames spread that it was found impossible, in most cases, to cast loose from the pier and float them out in the stream.

Soon after the outbreak of the fire the wind which, up to that time, had been blowing from the northeast, es-

THE NEW ORLEANS RIOT—CARE OF THE WOUNDED AT THE MARINE HOSPITAL.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

PARIS FASHIONS FOR AUGUST, 1866.

dangering the pier and extensive freight and passenger depôt of the Railway Company, suddenly veered to the south, and in a few moments the large pier north of the men load above was found to be on fire. It was leased by A. S. Jarvis & Co., manufacturers and shippers of tobacco, whose extensive manufactory is located but a short distance from the pier.

The flames from the burning oil, reaching to an immense height, were carried by the force of the wind completely across the intervening space, and the entire pier with its contents was soon on fire. It was useless to attempt to extinguish it, the streams of water thrown by the engines seeming to have no effect whatever upon the ocean of flame, and with the exception of a few bales of cotton thrown into the slip and floated out of the reach of the fire, the pier and its contents were completely destroyed.

The freight pier of the railway company was on fire several times; but through the good management of the firemen it was extinguished each time with comparatively trifling damage.

Both the piers which are burned are new, having been erected not long since by the West Jersey Shore Improvement Company at a cost of $50,000 each. They are insured.

From the most trust-worthy data that can be obtained amidst the confusion prevailing at and around the scene of the conflagration, it is probable that at least from four to fifteen lives have been sacrificed. Of the crew of the William Bartlett, the schooner on which the explosion first occurred, but one only has been saved—Henry Kurrell, a German, about thirty-two years of age.

The entire loss from the fire is estimated at $2,000,000.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR AUGUST.

THE changes in fashion are not striking this month, and such as there are apply exclusively to toilets for the country and sea-side. Beyond those represented in the illustrations there are robes of white lawn with leaden-gray stripes, vandyked above a jupe of the same material, which is frequently also vandyked itself; or of lilac and white taffeta on a lilac jupe with a trimming of white lace, and with a loose jacket of the same material as the jupe, and similarly trimmed. For dinner and evening dress we have robes of thin watered silk, with brilliant color stripes on a white ground; the train long; the corsage quite plain, with a band of the same color as the stripes of the robe; the sleeves very tight, and especially so at the wrist. Other robes are of gaze de Chambéry, of a pale green or mauve tint, and worn over a jupe of white taffeta, the corsage being of white embroidered muslin. All these dresses are worn with trains, and generally with a trimming of white lace down the seams of the robe. Hats are, of course, taking precedence of chapeaux: they are of the ordinary shapes and materials. Black or black and white straw hats with narrow brims, and trimmed with scarlet velvet ribbon, or with bunches of red berries, seem likely to be much worn.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—Cuneque robe and jupe of pale gray satteen, trimmed with violet-colored ribbon and a row of passementerie, with rows of violet silk buttons at the back and sides of the cuneque. Chapeau and strings of violet-color crape, with jet aigrette on the right-hand side.

Fig. 2. Cuneque without sleeves, and upper jupe of delicate gray mohair, trimmed and edged with drops of black jet. The upper jupe, hanging in festoons, shows a second jupe, which, with the sleeves, is striped black and pale gray. Chapeau of white straw, with a star of black jet.

Fig. 3. Robe of white foulard ornamented with long lapels and vandykes, terminating in insets of mauve-colored taffeta. The corsage, which is cut square, is similarly ornamented. Chapeau Chinois, trimmed with bands of black velvet, which large daisies are arranged at regular intervals.

Fig. 4. Evening Dress.—Robe of foulard des Indes, covered with small spots; the jupe gored, and at every seam a trimming of quilled rose-colored taffeta, bordered with narrow black lace. Corsage similarly trimmed. Sleeves of puffed tulle, with epaulets and cuffs of foulard edged with taffeta and black lace, the hair fastened with rose-colored ribbon of the same tint as the taffeta of the robe.

A SKETCHING ADVENTURE.

"ISN'T it a beauty?" was my greeting as I strolled one morning into the salon of our little inn.

"Isn't what a beauty?" answered I.

"This pistol. Elliot bought it in Bayonne yesterday for my birthday present. I think it's the very prettiest little thing of the kind I ever saw in my life; isn't it, Mr. Campbell?"

"My dear Mrs. Harlings," I replied, amazed,

GREAT PETROLEUM FIRE IN JERSEY CITY, AUGUST 19, 1866.—[SKETCHED BY STARBUT TOM.]

"what in the world put it into your head to want a pistol? What nonsense! who do you suppose is going to hurt you?"

"I don't know; maybe no one, nor nothing, and I dare say it's very silly; but when I'm out sketching or walking by myself miles away from home, I fancy I shall feel more comfortable if I have some sort of a protector with me, although I don't suppose I shall ever meet with any thing dreadful, of course, as I shouldn't go alone."

"Well," said I, after a minute examination, "it certainly is a perfect little affair. Make sure you don't shoot yourself, that's all;" and with a laughing promise on her part to "try not," we went our different ways for an hour or two, to prepare as usual for the expeditions of the day.

What blind moles we are! How little did either she or I suspect that before another day dawned her life would hang on the way she used that little revolver.

We were a very happy partie quarrée; Ellice Hardinge and his wife; I, John Campbell, and mine. We had got tired of the coast of Biscay, where we had spent the early part of the winter, and taken to the little villages among the Pyrenees, where there was very good fishing, and occasionally plenty of shooting besides. Our wives sometimes accompanied us on our excursions, but very often mine, who was rather an invalid, remained at home, while Mrs. Hardinge, a perfect slave to her color-box, would go out alone, sketching, leaving Elliot and me to our own devices.

Thus it had been arranged for the day in question. Elliot, his wife, and I, started all together; but we two left the lady at the entrance to a small valley which ran at almost right angles with the tract of country we intended shooting over; in passing which scene she had found some particular view or another would make a good subject for a picture, and determined to take advantage of the warmth of this unlucky Friday to have a long day's work there. Accordingly, we bade each other good-by, and went our separate ways. She, of course, went armed with her revolver and plenty of ammunition, "for who knows," quoth she, laughing, "but that I may have to kill a giant or two before I return?"

At this point of my story I must change places with Mrs. Hardinge, and let her tell her own tale as she told it to me long afterward, when she had in some measure recovered from the horrible effects of this terrible day.

"The weather," said she, "was so delicious, and the scenery so beautiful, that instead of sitting down at once to my work I wandered on, always believing that I could find the present view with the one I should get by just climbing the brow of the next hill: this one led to another, and that to still another; and I had never begun to find out that I had strayed much further than I had intended, or than, indeed, was quite safe at this time of year, even though I had a grand new pistol to take care of myself with, when I awakened to the very unpleasant fact that the sun was rapidly disappearing behind the hills in the western sky, and that I really should soon have only moonlight to help me find my way back again. Of course, sketching was now quite out of the question, and I turned round somewhat anxiously to see what way-marks I could remember to have passed in the morning. Luckily, though long, the valley was straight, and in the open ground just in front of the gorge by which it communicated with the more extended country beyond, there was a group of cork-trees, the peculiar shape of which rendered them distinguishable from the bushwood which clothed the bases of the mountains. Luckily, too, the valley, precipitous and rugged on either side, had a nearly even ground, perhaps half a mile wide, upon which, when once reached, the walking would be easy. So thought the trees were a good three miles off, and I was already satisfied that, I calculated that I should reach them in about an hour and a half, all hindrances considered, and once there, I should be only one mile from the inn; and after all, I flattered myself, I could get home before you," she said, addressing her husband, "and the others had begun to be frightened about me.

"Of I started, therefore, and walked away with a will. In less than half an hour the sun set, and for a while it was almost totally dark. For mean, not minding the stumbles and occasional falls, and to keep up as brave a heart as I could, was all that was possible; and I had got nearly to the end of the last wood, close to the open ground (which I had not dared try to reach by a direct scramble in the dark), could see the cork-trees looming huge in the glimmer of the rising moon, when I thought I heard a peculiar cry far away behind me, and I paused for a moment to listen, thinking that it might possibly be some other belated wanderer in the dark as well as myself.

"For only one moment. The next I was rushing along as fast as terror could drive me, sketching-thing, cloak, umbrella, everything else, save my gun, impede my flight flung away; for in that one moment all I had ever heard of the now seldom seen Pyrenean wolf, their terribly acute scent, and insatiable ferocity, flashed through my mind, and I knew by instinct that the sound I had heard was the cry of one of these as it had stumbled on my track, and that the whole pack would be upon me long, I feared, ere I could get even as far as the cork-trees.

"At first I did along wildly, I gave myself up for lost, for the idea of defending myself never once occurred to me, so paralyzed was I with fear; but as, a minute and heard the occasional and horrible howl, the howl of the pack, and remembering now, in fearful earnest, my revolver, I resolved to sell my life at all events as dear as I could.

"At this moment I gained the open ground. The moon, white and brilliant, lighted up the valley, and brought into strong relief the group of cork-trees not far away now, and which, oh! if I could but reach, I believed I might yet escape.

"I pulled out my revolver, hardly slacking my speed, slipped the safety stop, and made for a little thicket of juniper some fifty yards in front; for now the cruel 'yapping' sounded closer and closer, and it seemed as if hundreds of wolves were at my heels; if I could not stop them so as to gain a little time, I must be torn to pieces in a minute. Suddenly facing them as I reached the juniper, and instinctively remembering the direction to fire low which you gave me, you know, Ellice, I shot off each barrel quick as lightning, then rushed on again. That I had killed some, at all events, was evident by the growling and fighting of the others over the dead ones. I knew that the dogs nowadays were never known to descend to the valleys until driven by actual starvation, and, alas, these were hungry for they did not stop to eat the dead of their own kind; so I ran on, at the same time reloading the pistol, my hope being to gain the open ground, the bright moon at the time they took while they stopped to devour those which were killed.

"How it was, I don't know, I suppose every one has felt the same when the first brunt of a great danger has been endured, and one remains for the moment still in safety; but I felt as if I had a reckless courage, and a, so to speak, determination not to be killed, take possession of me. On I went, my pace a little slackened, for I feared my strength would hardly hold out; and I was congratulating myself upon the precious minutes I was gaining, when I heard a sharp, fierce 'yap' so close that I felt an agony of terror put for the moment my late courage to flight, and I almost fell down paralyzed, as, turning my head, I saw two gliding close within a yard of me. In less time, however, than it takes to tell you, I revived again, fired, and, waiting only to see that the dog was disabled, pushed on once more: and now, only a few yards from the trees, I was looking to see which would be the best to climb, when the pack came on again in full cry. Alas! there was no juniper here for a defense for my back, and I knew all must be lost if I attempted to close and fight. So I turned again, let off all the barrels pretty nearly at random, and then made the last effort I felt would be possible, for I was well-nigh exhausted, and at last reached the trees.

"How I scrambled up one of them I don't know, and what became of me for a time I don't know either. I knew I lost consciousness altogether, but when I came to myself, and looked down on the sea of glaring eyes below, it was almost more than I could endure. Let it was evident they could not reach me, leap and jump as they might; and all the tales I had heard of creatures gnawing down trees in which their prey was seated I firmly believed to be pure fiction, so that all I had to do to be safe appeared, after all, to sit still where I was.

"But for how long? I had only three cartridges left. I could not be sure of the number of dogs in the pack, but there were upward of forty at least, and whether they could attack at night, or were equally savage during the day, I knew not. But even should they remain long, which I did not probe, as who can once they found that their prey was out of reach, I remembered that you would be sure to come to my help when you found I did not return, and I was comforting myself with this assurance when it flashed through me that you would, in likely as not, come by the valley instead, and if you did, nothing could save you. This was the worst of all, and as I sat thinking of it, the cold chaos of hideous fiends howled and yelled, and I put back the shrill whistle I always carried when wandering alone, and which I was just going to blow, lest it should give you too true a clew to my place of refuge.

"How long I sat crouched among the branches of that friendly cork-tree I know not. Hope and fears over in my mind, I hardly know. It must have been an hour at least, for the moon had travelled over the valley, and was sinking behind the snowy mountains beyond, when from the opening gorge, mentioned before, there came a shout! I knew the voice well, Elliot, and my first thought on hearing lest you should be alone. I think the few minutes of suspense which followed were more intolerable than any I had yet gone through. Supposed! But very soon there came another shout, and then several voices together, and almost at the same moment the glare of torches, as a whole party of men turned into the valley. The relief was too great. I tried to shout, too, but my voice died away in my throat. I tried once more, but I had lost the sound I produced was too feeble to be heard far away. At last, by a bright thought, I fired off my three remaining cartridges, and then, I know better what happened and what became of me than I do myself."

What happened, and what became of Mrs. Hardinge, was as follows:

As we neared the grove of cork-trees on which we looked to be the means of safety to her, and which were directed by the sound of the pistol, the pack of dogs left their unsatisfactory employment of gazing at the dead which was remarkable, and came en masse to attack us. But we were prepared for them, and they received two or three volleys so well-directed and telling that, after coming at us once again, they betook themselves to the shelter of the mountains from whence they came, while we were prepared for them; for, returning home from our expedition about an hour before, we were met by a peasant who, in the midst of his terror, powers had seen the first pack of wild dogs remembered for upward of thirty years, descending from the High Pyrenees toward these valleys; and as they certainly were not far away, it was not safe to be out, unless in a party and well-armed, for they were always exceptionally savage. Of course, the valleys were driven from their lairs (he said) by the long continuance of cold and snow.

"Which direction had they taken?" asked we, with a view to a possible day's sport on the morrow.

Judge of our horror when the man named the valley Mrs. Hardinge had chosen for her walk that morning, and pointed to the mountain immediately overhanging it as the place where he had seen them.

Before he could finish his sentence we were hurrying home at our utmost speed, hoping to find our fears needless, and her safely returned. When, however, we got there, hours later than she usually remained out, our hearts failed, when, to our quick question, "Where Mrs. Hardinge?" my wife replied, "I don't know; she has not come in; I thought she was with you!" Instantly the alarm was given, the whole village was roused; every man armed with a gun rallied round us, and we took our way to the entrance of the valley, pale and sick with apprehension for the fate which most likely had ere this overtaken her.

After the rout of the dogs we hastened to the trees, and climbing that in which, by the light of our torches, we could see Mrs. Hardinge, lifted her down. She was insensible, though, fortified than bad bruises and tears, apparently from falls and thorns, she seemed unhurt; at all events, there was no mark of the dogs upon her. We carried her home and did all we could to restore consciousness; but, alas! the horrors she had gone through had been too much for her, it was many, many days before she recovered from their effects. It was not, indeed, until three weeks afterward that she was able to give the connected account.

She still treasures her little pistol as the chief saviour, under Providence, of her life; but to me who examined it very minutely, it did thought the pistol would have been but of little use had it not been for the wonderful pluck and almost incredible courage which had borne her through hours of danger, more appalling than often falls to the lot of a man to endure, much less a delicate lady.

It is hardly necessary to add that that was the last time I ever laughed at a lady for asking for a pistol as a birthday present.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XV.

"I WISH I knew who Mrs. Grundy really was," said Lily, as she rubbed her face with the towel next morning.

"Yes, so do I," said Clover, brushing away at her hair. "Mamma's stories always mean something; and I'm almost sure I've heard her speak of Mrs. Grundy before. I want to hear the rest—it was very interesting."

"Yes, it was interesting," said Lily, in a rather doubtful tone of voice, "but I don't know how—mamma so often says something disagreeable."

"Mamma says nothing disagreeable!" exclaimed Clover, turning round with wide-open eyes.

"How you take one up!" said Lily. "Of course I don't mean mamma herself, only in her stories, you know—the stories say it, if you like that any better."

"I like mamma's stories, every one," said Clover, gravely.

"Well, so do I," said Lily, "only they make me feel queer sometimes—or I'm afraid they will, which comes to the same thing. But I'll tell you what I do wish, Clover—I wish I knew how many things are really worth having."

"Why, a great many things," said Clover. "There's flowers and books, and pictures—oh, I couldn't begin to count them all."

"No, but I mean really," "how many of each kind—how much must there be to make it really worth while? You know Maria Jarvis said that so few things were worth the trouble, or something like that. Now how many are good for much?"

"I don't believe she knows," said Clover, with a slightly disdainful air.

"Well, but she said her father always wanted a quantity—don't you remember?"

"I remember she said so," said Clover. "And I guess it wouldn't be much matter if I forgot."

"You always laugh at every thing Maria says," said Lily, with a little annoyance at the implied slight to her friend's conversation.

"Oh no, not at every thing: only at some things," said Clover, "and I don't want to know how many flowers are worth having, Lily, why don't you ask papa?"

"I guess I will," said Lily. "Wouldn't he laugh!"

"Then wait and listen," said Clover. "I do that sometimes, and often it almost seems as if papa were answering questions I had begun to talk of that very thing on purpose. Wait and listen, if you don't know. I know," said Clover, with a happy face, "I never have to wait to get, whether I like it or a hundred." Oh, I wonder how our boxes look this morning."

"I was just minded queer—so the children thought; or rather it was the panes of glass. Last night they had been perfectly bright and clear, and now each one was covered with fine drops of water, like a thick steam, so that you could hardly see the little flowers inside."

"It's that tiresome Malvina," said Lily. "She's forever washing the windows, and she hadn't eyes nor feet nor hands enough there all clean, and she's been washing them. We must get mamma to speak to her right away. I won't have her meddling with my things in her ignorant thing!"

"Who is an ignorant thing?" inquired Sam, from the fireside.

"Malvina."

"What has Malvina been doing?"

"Why, she has washed all our panes of glass," said Lily; "they are dripping with water."

"Ah!" said Sam.

"Yes, ah!" said Lily. "And, what's more, she must have taken 'em every one off, for the water's all on the inside. I guess she wiped off the top."

"Indeed!" said Sam, with the same provoking coolness. "Ah!"

Lily bounded from the window and caught hold of his book.

"Sam, you sha'n't sit there and exasperate me! Just come and look for yourself, if you don't choose to believe other people. The panes of glass are just dripping!"

"So they are—I see," said Sam, coming to the window. "Ignorance is a wonderful thing."

"It's a very troublesome thing," said Lily.

"Very!" said Sam.

"I wish Clover, who had been studying her brother's face, "Sam is just laughing at us. He means that we are the ignorant people."

"He don't!" said Lily. "Sam, you're a real humbug. The air is just as dry as a chip."

"The air," continued Sam, without heeding this polite comment, "is warmer than the heat which is in it, holds fast and hid away a certain amount of moisture which it cannot keep. It meets with something much colder than itself, then it gives up part of its heat and moisture too. Now the air inside your house is warmer than the glass, and so the glass steals away some of its heat. If a piece of cloth were there instead, it would take up heat and moisture together; but the glass can't take up only the heat. Now, then, when the warm damp air in the box comes against the cold panes of glass, some of the heat in the air passes into the glass; but the moisture which that heat held fast in the air is left behind on the surface of the glass—deposited there as you may call it."

"Well, that's curious," said Lily. "But I wish it wouldn't get deposited there—as you call it; it'll drop, drop, drop all over my pretty flowers."

"Nor much; it may run down the glass a little to the edge of the box. But that is one use of the glass, Lily, if it keeps all the moisture in."

"Where does the moisture come from—to begin with?" said Clover.

"We get the earth in the pots; and if there were no glass there the earth would be all dry in a very short time."

"Then we could water it," said Lily.

"It is a difficult matter to water the earth over small seeds without washing them out of place. Sometimes, when the plants come up, they may need a little water now and then, but even that must be done very carefully. I'll show you how many the first needs."

"Well," said Prim, "I guess Maria Jarvis would think a few flowers were something to take care of, I dare say. But she says all her father cares about is quantity—quantity!"

"I dare say. Well, he has a quantity of—almost every thing," said Sam, pausing a little to consider his words.

"Of course, our boxes and things look very well mean to her," said Lily.

"Mean, did they?" said Sam. "She is a wise young lady. How should you like to know something of time as well as money, Miss Lily? time is her life, and hardly ever heard of a quantity?"

"One flower and one penny!" said Clover, in a low, quiet voice. "She would think your boxes a whole green-house."

"Would she?" said Lily, her spirits rising at the idea of a more correct view of things. "I think I should like to see her very much."

"Well, some time you shall," said Sam; "but just now it is needful to go to breakfast."

It seemed as if Clover's words were to come true that morning for Mr. Jarvis came in to breakfast, bringing a single half-blown La Marque rose in his hand.

"There," he said to his wife; "so much I got for you in my early ride, and only so much."

"Only!" said Mrs. May, as she took the exquisite flower and gazed at it.

"Ay," said I, "I thought it was not much—compared with the store from which it came. But 'a little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked;' so you must comfort yourself with that. We'll have La Marques of our own, I hope, another year, Mary."

"Papa," said Lily, "how much is a little?"

"A sapient question!" said her father, laughing. "A little sometimes is a great deal."

"But you said it was better than a great deal, papa."

"Ah, but you must mark my conditions. A little may be wrapped up in something very sweet, and a great deal in something very bitter. Ask mamma—she knows all about it."

"But how much is worth having, papa?" persisted Lily.

"As much as you can get, I think," said Mr. May; "your mother thinks differently."

"No, I think just that," said Mrs. May, "only with the condition you are to get it in the most honorable and upright way in the love of God, and used in the fear of God—all that is precious and worth having."

"Mamma, that don't mean our flowers?" said Primrose.

"Lily was thinking of flowers."

"It means every thing, my darling."

"Flowers!" said Mr. May. "And so Lily's ideas are enlarging? I thought so. She wants more flowers, I guess, to make an enterprising child, this Lily, and digs so fast!"

Lily blushed and asked no more questions, but Prim took up the word in a most wise way.

"Mamma, I don't know how to do it."

"What, love?"

"What you said—with my flowers," said Prim, folding her childish hands and looking deep into the question. "I don't know how to take 'em per use 'em." The mother looked at her.

"Take them, as formed by the Lord's power and wisdom and love, for His glory and our joy," she said. "Then use them, as given by His kindness to His little child for her pleasure and for His service."

"Use them—my flowers?" said Prim.

"Yes," said her mother, "all for God, since all is from Him. He is the day He will ask even what we have done with our flowers."

"BENNETT'S reputation is a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of his preparations."—HENNESS's Standard Flavoring Extracts and Coriander for the Hair, &c.—Boston Journal.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE,

Superior advantages in English, Classics, Sciences, Commercial, French, German, Piano Music, and Painting. Lectures Courses for Ladies, and Military Drill for Gents. Eighteen Instructors. Term opens Sept. 10th.

Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., PRINCIPAL.
Claverack, Columbia Co., N. Y.

IMPORTANT TO SOLDIERS.

A bill has passed giving additional bounty to soldiers who served their terms of enlistment, or were discharged for wounds, or to their heirs. Also, pension for invalids and widows. Inclosing stamp, circulars with law sent. Address BROWN & CO., 1 Park Place, New York.

[From the Rev. J. W. Pollard's Autob iography.]

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated—at the moment of my family was afflicted with an ill-turn of sickness, attended with a dangerous cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation, having for its basis the tender buds of white pine, might be compounded as to be very useful in the cure of bronchial affections. To be the value of it in diseases alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the White Pine and had been planning, and getting the materials for doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, accompanied by a sudden cold, and had raised many times with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—Boston Journal.

At a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted. Sold everywhere, and by the test of twenty years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a specific for diabetes, healing from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for pile and scurvy it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

GEO. W. SWETT, M.D., PROPRIETOR,
Boston, Mass.
BURNHAM & VAN SCHAAK, Chicago, Ill.,
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio,
GENERAL AGENTS FOR THE WEST.

Take Time by the Forelock.

The miasma which generates epidemic fevers is now rising in clouds under the blazing beams of the dog-day sun. Every one's body, as well as refuse animal and vegetable matter, emits unwholesome vapors, which, crowded cities and the dense assemblages which business and pleasure bring together the elements of disease are evolved. The pressure upon every vital organ is never so great as in the second and third months of summer, and consequently we conclude us that these organs require to be reinforced to meet it.

We hold our lives, so to speak, on a repairing lease, and this is the season when the process of dilapidation is most rapid, and repairs are most required. Impure blood, up, prop, and awaken the powers of nature with that mighty vegetable recuperant, HOSTETTER'S BITTERS. He who fails to may be sold to excite himself to ordinary mail, against which epidemic disease will hurl its poison d shafts in vain. This is no gratuitous assertion, but a great medical fact, attested by twelve years' experience in every climate of the habitable globe. Extremes of temperature always distort the functions of the stomach, the liver, the bowels, and the skin. It is against these that the most dangerous maladies assail us. Tone them in advance with HOSTETTER'S BITTERS, and defy best and malaria.

VICK'S ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF
HARDY BULBS,
FOR THE AUTUMN OF 1866, AND
FLORAL GUIDE,

Is now published. It contains descriptions of the best HYACINTHS, TULIPS, CROCUSES, LILIES, &c., with full directions for their culture, and all other Bulbs, Plants, Trees, etc. Illustrated with numerous fine engravings, and a beautifully colored plate of the SNOWDROP, TULIP and SCILLA. My importation from the best bulb growers of Holland is the most extensive I have ever had before, and I flatter myself the finest lot of Bulbs ever brought to this country.

The Catalogue and Guide is published for the benefit of my customers, and will forward it to every one as rapidly as possible. To all others I charge ten cents per copy, which is not half its cost. Postage prepaid to all. All lovers of flowers who design to plant bulbs this fall will find it to their interest to send for my Catalogue.

Address JAMES VICK, Rochester, N. Y.

WANTED—AGENTS. $150 to $250 per Month for the best, cheapest and fastest selling Family Sewing Machine in the world. Sews, hems, stitches, tucks, quilts, binds, and embroiders beautifully, and is fully warranted for five years. Price only $30. Full particulars and circular sent free on application. Address with notice that amount can be made. HOME SHUTTLE MACHINE CO., 18 Dey street, New York; or Boston, Mass. All letters answered promptly, with circulars and terms.

Large Profits

Can be made in the STENCIL BUSINESS. Tools and Stock furnished by M. J. METCALF & SON, 101 Union Street, Boston, Mass. Send for price-list.

REMOVAL.
American Lead Pencil Company,
NEW YORK,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 34 John Street, New York.
Factory Hudson City, N. J.

$10. Gold and Silver Watches. $10.

We are retailing watches at wholesale rates. Every one can obtain a reliable and correct timekeeper, patent lever movement, and coin silver hunting-cases, by sending us $10.00. Send stamp for list. HASKINS & CO., 39 Beekman street, New York.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

Have selected the following kinds from their Stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST.

YOUNG HYSON, 50c., 60c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 P. B.
GREEN TEAS, 50c., 60c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 P. B.
MIXED, 50c., 60c., 75c.; best, $1 P. B.
JAPAN, $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 P. B.
OOLONG, 75c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 P. B.
IMPERIAL and GUNPOWDER, best, $1 75 P. B.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 P. B.

All towns, villages, or manufactories where a large number of men are engaged, by clubbing together, can reduce the price of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to the

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
(Post-Office Box 5643.)
31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church, New York.
For further particulars, getting up Clubs, &c., see Harper's Weekly, June 23, 1866.

STEPHENS' MAGICAL EGYPTIAN ORIENTAL EYE OINTMENT

WILL GUARANTEE TO CURE
Inflamed Eyes, Lids and Styes,
FROM 3 TO 5 DAYS, AND ALSO PREVENT AND CURE STYES,
FROM 1 TO 3 DAYS, OR MONEY REFUNDED.

This Medical Ointment has been discovered by Physicians in the East, and used with certain success for curing Egyptian Inflamed Eyes and Lids, which have so long suffered the ire physicians in the world. The most eminent Oculists, Physicians, and Diviners recommend its use, while we exhibit 1000 certificates of facts at our office.

The Ointment is manufactured from the best and highest-priced imported and domestic drugs in the market, and is offered to the public for $3 per bottle, sent free by mail upon receipt of money. Address STEPHENS & CO., (P. O. Box 226,) New York.

For Sale at Dodsworth's Family Drug Store, No. 10 Astor House, corner of Barclay Street and Broadway, New York.

Where is the Physician who will guarantee a cure for $3?

RESTORE YOUR SIGHT.
Old Eyes Made New.
SPECTACLES RENDERED USELESS.
DIMNESS OF VISION, BLURRING, Weak, Watery, and Overworked Eyes.
CURE GUARANTEED BY THE Patent Cornea Restorers,
OR RESTORERS OF THE EYESIGHT.
Write for a Circular.—Mailed Free.
NEAR-SIGHTEDNESS CURED
BY THE
Patent Myopia, or Cornea Flatteners.
ONLY KNOWN REMEDY IN THE WORLD.
PROVED A GREAT SUCCESS.
Write for a Circular.—Mailed Free.
Address Dr. J. STEPHENS & CO.,
(C. O. Box 226,) New York.
For sale at Rushton's Optical Depot, No. 10 Astor House, corner of Barclay Street and Broadway, New York.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED—Agents are now wanted in every locality to canvass for the most popular and THE ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE BIBLE, by JOHN KITTO, D.D., F.S.A., Edited by ALVAH HOVEY, D.D., of Norwich, Connecticut.

This is the best selling book ever published. Agents make from $100 to $300 per month, and say "they never have a book to sell as well." For further information apply immediately to the publisher,

HENRY BILL, Norwich, Conn.

Allcock's Porous Plasters

Lame Back.
BRANDRETH HOUSE, NEW YORK, Nov. 23, 1859.
T. ALLCOCK & CO.—Gentlemen: I lately suffered severely from a weakness in the back. Having used your Allcock's Porous Plasters much recommended in cases of this kind, I procured one, and the result was all that I could desire. A single Plaster cured me in a week.
Yours, respectfully, J. G. BRANDRETH,
Proprietor of the Brandreth House.

Cure of Crick in the Back, and Lumbago.
LYONS, N. Y., July 4, 1862.
MESSRS. ALLCOCK & CO.: Please send me a dollar's worth of your plasters. They have cured me of a crick in my back, which has troubled me for some time, and now my father is going to try them for Rheumatism about his heart. L. H. SHERWOOD.

Dr. Green, No. 803 Broadway, New York, informs us he sold, on Monday, June 23, 1862, two plasters to a young woman suffering very severely from lumbago. On Thursday she called to get two more for a friend, and then stated how the two she had purchased on Monday had relieved her immediately after putting them on, and extended HER IN TWO DAYS of a most distressing pain in her back and loins.

Principal Office, 294 Canal Street, New York.
Sold by all Druglists.

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage pr paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. By ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN, Editors of Harper's Magazine. A full Chronicle of the Causes, Progress, and Consequences of the Conflict. With more than Five Hundred Illustrations. (This volume consists of nearly 400 quarto pages, large type, each engraved to six octavo pages: the volume thus contains as much matter as five ordinary octavo volumes.) Price $6 00, in Cloth, Gilt, with Beveled Edges.

HARPER'S LIBRARY EDITION TO AGENTS.

INSIDE: A Chronicle of Secession. A Novel. By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON. With Illustrations by THOMAS NAST. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75; Paper, $1 25.

ENGLISH TRAVELLERS AND ITALIAN BRIGANDS. A Narrative of Capture and Captivity. By W. J. G. MORRE. With a Map and several Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

HOMES WITHOUT HANDS; Being a Description of the Habitations of Animals, classed according to their Principle of Construction. By J. G. WOOD, M.A., F.L.S., Author of "Illustrated Natural History." With about 140 Illustrations engraved on Wood by G. PEARSON, from Original Designs made by F. W. KEYL and E. A. SMITH, under the Author's Superintendence. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 50; Half Morocco, $6 75.

LAND AT LAST. A Novel in Three Books. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Kissing the Rod," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ANDERSONVILLE PRISON. A Narrative of Andersonville, drawn from the Evidence elicited on the Trial of HENRY WIRZ, the Jailer. With the Argument of Col. N. P. Chipman, Judge-Advocate. By AMBROSE SPENCER. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

FIREMIE KELLER. A Novel. By F. G. TRAFFORD, Author of "Mattie: A Story of Boston." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

NAPOLEON'S CÆSAR. The History of Julius Cæsar. By His Imperial Majesty NAPOLEON III. Vol. II. Superfine Edition, 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

AN ATLAS containing the Maps to Vol. II. to new ready. 8vo, $1 50, nett.

HAND AND GLOVE. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of " Barbara's Million of Money," "The Ladder of Life," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FOUR YEARS IN THE SADDLE. By Colonel HENRY GILHAM. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

ARMADALE. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "No Name," "The Woman in White," &c. With Numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $2 00.

GEN. MARCY'S ARMY LIFE ON THE BORDER. Thirty Years of Army Life on the Border. Comprising Descriptions of the Indian Nomads of the Plains; Explorations of New Territory; a Trip across the Rocky Mountains in the Winter; Descriptions of the Habits of different Animals found in the West, and the Methods of Hunting them; with Incidents in the Life of different Frontier Men, &c. By Brevet Brigadier-General R. B. MARCY, U.S.A., Author of "The Prairie Traveler." With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

SANS MERCI; or, Kestrels and Falcons. A Novel. By the Author of "Dot." By VIOLET LIVINGSTON. "Sword and Gown," "Maurice Dering." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE TOILERS OF THE SEA. A Novel. By VICTOR HUGO, Author of "Les Miserables." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

PICKPOCKETS DEFIED.

DUMOREST'S INFALLIBLE WATCH GUARD, a beautiful ornament, with perfect security and great convenience. Sent by mail for 50 cents each. Sold at all the jewelry and fancy stores. Mailed free on receipt of the price. 472 Broadway, New York.

Agents Wanted at $3 to $5 a Day.

The article invaluable, and sells rapid. Families buy three to six times over the second time. Rare inducements offered customers. Address, with stamp, A. A. CONSTANTINE & CO., 59 Liberty Street, New York.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For Merchants, Druggists, and all that wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular and Price-list of Type, Cards, &c., free. Address PEASE COMPANY, 26 Ann Street, New York, and 35 Lincoln Street, Boston.

GOLD PENS.

If you want a GOLD PEN, send to E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau St., N. Y., and by return mail receive circular showing styles and prices. Repairing done at 50c. each.

WHISKERS!

DR. LAMONTE'S CORDIAL will force Whiskers or Mustache on the smoothest face or chin. Never known to fail. Sample for trial sent free. Address
REEVES & CO., 74 Nassau Street, New York.

$5 SEWING $5 MACHINE.

FIRST PREMIUM and HONORARY DIPLOMA, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originality patented May 15, 1865; Improvement patented June 5, 1866. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with CHANGING MECHANISM, is NOISELESS in operation, and with DOUBLE or SINGLE THREAD of ALL KINDS with extraordinary rapidity, making PERFECT STITCHES in each alteration of the Wheel. Will GATHER, HEM, RUFFLE, BRAID, STITCH, HEM TO BRAID, &c., &c. Every machine manufactured. Warranted not to get out of order for 5 years. It has not removed the approval of all the principal Ladies' Fairs, and of those who have tried it.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly does the stitching exactly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

Single machines, ALL COMPLETE, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with Hemmer, Instructions, &c., on receipt of the price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Single machines sold every where. Address

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY,
Office 102 Nassau Street, New York.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.,

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you receive your article to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time for our Circular containing full list and particulars, also how to obtain an Agency, which is worth to every town and county. J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y.

£150,000,000 STERLING,

In Money and Estates, remain unclaimed in Great Britain and Ireland, in the names of persons not known. Any one to search for any name, $1 00 in U.S. Funds. All letters to be addressed, GUY & CO., Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

Wonderful "Hu Dong" Secret.

Agents Wanted in Every County. Address 6 cents. Confusing, fortune-telling, Worthington & Co., 6 Beekman Street, New York. Dr. Address Hundred & Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

AGENTS WANTED—To sell the Nonpareil Knife. A fascinating necktie, looping up dress skirts, &c. Also Agents wanted to sell Emmet, under the Ground. Circular sent on receipt of stamp. Bell & Co., Springfield, Mass.

6000 AGENTS wanted to sell six new inventions, each of a great value to families. Sample 25 cents. Before. Send 15 cts. and get 80 pages, or 25 cts. and get 99 pages of a sample paper. Agents Union Journal, Mass.

MOTH AND FRECKLES.—Ladies afflicted with discolorations on the face, called moth-patches or freckles, should use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared and sold by DR. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, No. 49 Bond Street, New York. Sold by all druggists.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR SEPTEMBER, 1866.

CONTENTS:

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.—(Third Paper.)

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Amenities.—The Drum Reclaimed.—Illustrations between Duty and Lenience.—Topographical Corps at Sunset.—Sanitary.—Topographical Headquarters, near Hyattstown, Maryland.—Camp, Dumestown.—Battery at Hyattstown.—Camp, Darnestown.—Battery at Edwards Ferry.—Adam the Soldier's Friend.—Fire Headquarters, Darnestown.

A MAN'S LOVE FOR A THAT.

ARMY LIFE ON THE BORDER.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Army Life.—Comanche Lodges.—The Ranchero and the Comanches.—Origin of the Tobacco.—Herd of Rocky Mountain Sheep.—Crossing the Rocky Mountains in Winter.—Ascent of one Peak.—Encampments.—Stampede of Horses and Mules.—Camp Life.—Jim Baker's Fight.

MIDSUMMER.

HISTORIC RECORDS OF HEROIC MEN.—XIII. TEXAS LOST AND WON.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Texas Liberty.—Capture of the Royal Yacht.—Massacre of Fugitives.—Capture of Santa Anna.—Home of Burnet.

ABSALOM MATHER.

TWO CAN PLAY AT THAT GAME.

THE STORY OF THE "LAMBETH CASUAL."

A MAY-BASKET.

WILMINGTON DURING THE BLOCKADE.

PHOTOGRAPHY.

ST. MARK'S EVE.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

THE CHRONICLES OF PEASES.

JACK AND HIS MOTHER.

OUR VEGETABLES.

EDITORS' EASY CHAIR.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

EDITORS' DRAWER.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $4 00
An Extra Copy gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $8 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements for their Magazine, at the following low rates:

One Page.....$250 00
Half Page.....135 00
Quarter Page.....70 00

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $4 00
One Copy for Three Months 1 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or Six Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.

THE BOUND VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Cloth, Binding.....$7 00 per Volume.
Half Morocco.....10 00 "

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for the first insertion. One Dollar per line for subsequent insertions. Each insertion to be reckoned as a new advertisement, each insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

GREAT SHOW OF CHIGNONS.

A Hint for a Hairdressers' Society.

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our PERSONAL ATTENTION.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

American Steel Shirt Collars, manufactured on scientific principles, do not stalk or pucker. Infinitely superior to "Paper" or the "Linen roller." Neither can approach the "Snow-White surface of these." Invisible," washed in a moment. Sent by mail, 25.
BILLOU & FOGAN, Nassau St., New York.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Canes, Revolving Rifles,
Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.

In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.
Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Ilion, N. Y.

PEABODY'S BREECH-LOADING
MUSKETS, CARBINES, AND
SPORTING RIFLES,
FOR METALLIC CARTRIDGES,
MANUFACTURED BY THE
PROVIDENCE TOOL CO. ARMORY,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

These arms are made in the most perfect manner, are interchangeable in all their parts, and are unequaled for symmetrical appearance, simplicity, accuracy of fire, and strength. They have been received with remarkable favor in our own and several other countries, and can now be supplied in large numbers. Send for descriptive pamphlets and illustrated price-lists, printed in English, French, German, or Spanish.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP
USING B. T. BABBITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH, or READY SOAP-MAKER. Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. For up in cans of 3 pounds, 6 pounds, 9 pounds, 6 pounds, and 12 pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making hard and soft Soap. One pound will make 10 pounds of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.
B. T. BABBITT, 64, 66, 68, 67, 69, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
and others, sent to all parts of the United States by EXPRESS, to Groups by

Bounties and Pensions, $100.

Now laws have been passed giving increased pensions to soldiers who have lost limbs or the total use of same, and to Widows and orphans, and a new law giving $50 and $100 more bounty to soldiers and the relatives of deceased soldiers. To get the above, send or apply in person to CHARLES NETTLETON, No. 111 Broadway, New York City. Above laws for sale at 50 cents.

To All who Want to Know.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW how to restore your sight, and give up spectacles, without the aid of Doctor or Medicine, address Dr. E. B. FOOTE, 1130 Broadway, New York. Pamphlets sent free.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW how uncomfortable trusses may be thrown aside, and comfort and cure attained by the unerring, scientific Dr. E. B. FOOTE, 1130 Broadway, New York. Pamphlet sent free.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW valuable information, suited to the married, address Dr. E. B. FOOTE, 1130 Broadway, New York. Pamphlet sent free.

THE REV. ISAAC AIKIN, Pastor of the Beaver Street Methodist Church, in Allentown, Pa., states that he has been so manifestly cured of Dyspepsia, after Fifteen Years' suffering, by the use of COE'S DYSPEPSIA CURE. This is but one of a thousand who have had the same experience.

BOKER'S BITTERS,

For sale by all prominent Grocers, Wine-Merchants, and Druggists, and wholesale only by L. BOKER, 39 Park Row, Agent, No. 66 Liberty Street, New York.

TRADE MARK

OF THE

MAGIC PUFFLE COMPANY,

To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and infringements on the patents of the Magic Ruffle Company. The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction to consumers. Office of this Company No. 69 Chambers Street, New York.

GRAND NATIONAL CONCERT,
FOR THE
Benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home Fund,
AT
Grover's Theatre, Washington, D. C., Postponed until Thursday Evening, October 11, 1866.

300,000 Tickets, at $1 each. 75,000 Presents, valued at $250,000, consisting of Fine Residences, Lots, Pianos, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silverware, &c., &c.

A CARD.—A large number of the tickets remaining unsold, it will be necessary to POSTPONE THE DRAWING until Thursday, the 11th of October, 1866, at which time it will positively occur.

The many swindling schemes that have been presented to the public during the last few months somewhat delayed our sales; until we were able to satisfy the people throughout the country that this enterprise was genuine, and solely for charitable purposes. The Directors are confident of the sale of every ticket, and have allotted sufficient time to give ample time for sales without any further postponement.

Postmasters, Bookseller, &c., are requested to act as Agents, and tickets will be supplied upon application; but no commission will be allowed.

Major H. A. HALL (President Soldiers' and Sailors' Union), Colonel CHARLES CAPEHART, Major M. H. ALDRIDGE, WILLIAM S. MORSE, Managing Directors.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE, WASHINGTON, June 27, 1866.

Whereas H. A. Hall and others, "managing directors" of the "Grand National Concert" to be held in Washington, D.C., on the 3d of August next, have made due application to L. Clephane, Collector of Internal Revenue for the collection district of the District of Columbia, for permission to lawfully dispose of a lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise, and have submitted to him satisfactory evidence that the proceeds of said lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise are to be devoted to charitable purposes, and that the said "managing directors" have given bonds for the faithful performance of their duties as required from all charge, whether from tax or license, in respect to such lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise.

D. A. ROLLINS, Commissioner.

All orders must be addressed, with stamps enclosed, to
WILLIAM S. MORSE, Secretary, Lock Box 37, Washington, D. C.

WE REFER, BY PERMISSION, TO

Major-Gen. Winfield S. Hancock, U.S.A.; Gen. Robert C. Schenck, M.C., Ohio; Gen. Halbert E. Paine, M.C., Wis.; Gen. John H. Ketcham, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. Thos. W. Ferry, M.C., Mich.; Hon. George Lowrence, M.C., C. McCallum, D. C.; Gen. O. V. Dupont, D. C.; Major J. C. Doughty, N. Y.; Hon. Henry C. Deming, M.C., Conn.; Hon. Ebon Stone, D. C.; Gen. Geo. Cook, D. C.; Major J. C. Doughty, N. Y.; Hon. Henry C. Deming, M.C., Conn.; Hon. Ebon Stone, D. C.; Gen. Geo. Cook, D. C.; Major J. C. Doughty, N. Y.; Hon. Henry Winn, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. Henry Wilson, C. Ingersoll, M.C., Ill.; Hon. Samuel J. Randall, M.C., Penn.; Hon. T. G. Bergen, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. Henry Winn, U.S.C.; Hon. Ira Harris, U.S.S.; Hon. B. F. Wade, U.S.S.; Hon. Kellan V. Whaley, M.C., West Va.; Hon. Wm. H. Kelley, M.C., Penn.; Hon. A. H. Laflin, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. Leonard Myers, M.C., Penn.; Hon. William A. Newell, M.C., N. J.; Hon. George W. Julian, M.C., Ind.; Hon. Stephen F. Wilson, M.C., Penn.; Hon. J. B. Grinnell, M.C., Iowa; Major G. M. Van Buren, N. Y.; Gen. E. B. Hayes, M.C., Ohio; Hon. S. T. Hoisted, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. G. E. Latham, M.C., West Va.; Hon. James M. Marvin, M.C., N.Y.; Hon. Thomas T. Davis, M.C., N. Y.

Address all orders to DUNCAN, NAVARO, & CO., Bankers, General Agents, No. 8 Bowling Green, New York.

Harper's Hand-Book for Europe.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to July, 1865, and a Map embracing Colored Routes of Travel in the above Countries. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Fifth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $7 50.

"KA-FOOZLE-UM."

"The Daughter of the Bahsh," comic song 25c. Balfe's beautiful serenade, "The sleeps, though not a Star," for guitar, 25c.; piano, 25c. "Nellie's gone Forever," waltz, 25c.; piano, 25c. Cuckoo notes with "Cuckoo" call; violin, 25c.; piano, 25c. The Organ Grinder Polka; violin, 25c.; piano, 25c. Mailed. FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, New York, Publisher.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

Dr. Gilbert's Pile Instrument for the radical cure of piles, prolapsus, &c., without an operation or medicine, relieves the worst case in 5 minutes, and has never failed to effect a permanent cure. Send for circular. Sold by druggists generally. Discount to Dealers. Sent by mail to any part of the U. S. on receipt of $3. J. B. Romaine, Prop'r, 353 B'way, N.Y.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

MERWIN & BRAY,
283 BROADWAY,
MANUFACTURERS OF THE CELEBRATED BALLARD BREECH-LOADING RIFLES, MILITARY AND SPORTING STYLES.

These Rifles carry a ball varying from one half ounce each to 150 to the pound. Material and workmanship of the best quality. They are warranted in every respect.
SOLE AGENTS
for the well-known Eagle Arms Co.'s Cartridge Revolvers, bolt and reducer. These Pistols receive but four motions to load and discharge, a degree of perfection never before obtained. Are sure fire, and carry a much larger ball than any other revolver of the same weight and size. Also Agents for the Whitney Arms Co.'s Celebrated Revolvers, and the New York Metallic Ammunition Co.'s Copper Cartridge of every style and size.
Dealers in Arms and Ammunition of all kinds. Illustrated Circulars furnished when ordered.
283 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL POMADE
The best hair restorer and dressing. Sold by druggists.

Economy is Wealth.

If you want the best-fitting, strongest, and most serviceable Paper Collar ever offered to the Public, don't fail to purchase the

PATENT REVERSIBLE PAPER COLLAR
MARCH BROS., PIERCE & CO.,
AGENTS,
WINTHROP SQUARE, BOSTON.

SENSIBLE! CAUTIOUS!!
I had my wedding suit up in an of Bassett's Patent Graduated Vials, and now have a clean and reliable eradicator always at hand. A word to the wise, etc. HAGERTY BROTHERS, Agents, New York.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Revolver excels all others in simplicity, perfectness, durability, power, and safety in carrying. Weight (6 in.), small (only 1 in.), with larger metallic cut-off cartridge (27-100 ball) than any Revolver made of same size and weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. HICKOK, 72 Beekman Street, New York.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING
B. T. BABBITT'S STAR YEAST POWDER. Light Biscuit or any kind of Cake may be made with this Powder in Two Hours. No shortening is required when sweet milk is used. Nos. 64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have Just Published:
FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL.
A NOVEL.
BY GEORGE ELIOT.
8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send "Felix Holt" by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 75 cents.

NEW EDITIONS OF
GEORGE ELIOT'S WORKS
PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, N. Y.

Adam Bede	12mo	$1 50
The Mill on the Floss	12mo	1 50
"	8vo, Paper	75
Silas Marner	12mo	1 50
Scenes of Clerical Life	8vo, Paper	75
"	8vo, Cloth	1 00

HARPER & BROTHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—No. 506.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH—MAGNOLIA GROVE, ON THE SHELL ROAD AT MOBILE, ALABAMA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 566.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1866.

THE TRUE ISSUE.

A FRIEND writes as follows: "My views of the riot itself in New Orleans do not differ from yours. There is no apology for the action of the citizens and police. But I believe that the persistence of Radical politicians in the North in holding fast to the issue of 1860–61 instead of that of 1865–66, and in continuing the animosities of the past (which ought now to be buried) has tended to keep alive in the secessionists their prejudices and animosities. It seems to me that the situation in the South is far worse than it would have been if Johnson's conciliatory policy had been carried out without interruption."

If our friend be correct in saying that the Radical politicians, or the Union party—for the action of Congress is undoubtedly sustained by the numerical strength and most vital convictions of the party—are still clinging to old issues, their doom is sealed and it ought to be. But what was the issue left by the war? Was it not that the fair and legitimate results of the war should be secured? This was, and is, to be done certainly in no hostile and offensive spirit, but it was to be firmly and surely done. And what were those results? Were they not, since the war had left no slaves, the civil equality of all citizens of the United States and the equable adjustment of the basis of national representation with the measures of the war had deranged so as to leave it unjust to the loyal States? If these were not the legitimate issues, what were? And if these could not be urged upon the late insurgent States, what could be? If we could do any thing, could we not do this, and if we could do nothing, was not the Executive's action wholly unwarranted and censurable?

When the rebel armies surrendered, the secret status of the rebel States in 1860 was either restored in every particular, or it could be restored only by an authority external to them. If by the fact of surrender of arms those States instantly resumed every right they had previously enjoyed, the first and most fundamental was that of internal reorganization at their pleasure, but this was not allowed by the President nor by the sentiment of the country, nor could it be. The country would have been imperiled upon a theory, "a pernicious abstraction." The saving spirit of the Constitution would have been sacrificed to an apparent letter. The situation was one of those extraordinary exigences which seldom occur in the history of nations, but when they do arise are to be met and directed by that instinctive wisdom called common sense acting from the necessity of the case. The President at once, and with the approval of the country, He acted without consulting Congress, but with the express assurance upon his part that his action was an experiment the results of which were to be estimated and finally sanctioned by the nation in Congress.

The principle was thus established as the basis of reconstruction, that the late rebel States were not restored to their old relation in the Union by the fact of surrender, but by the acceptance of conditions imposed by the National Government. In other words, the resumption of equal constitutional rights was made dependent upon a new and formal will. This was the President's own principle; and the only remaining question was, what the national will should require. At that point the President and Congress parted, discussing the difference and the consequent distraction. Mr. SUMNER, Mr. STEVENS, and other vehement orators foolishly shot bolts at the President, who was retorted by fierce accusations which were simply outbursts of illogical folly. If Mr. SUMNER were a traitor, so was the President. If Mr. STEVENS was a rebel, so was the President. If Congress were revolutionary, the President was not less so. For the difference between the Executive and Congress, despite his assumptions and assseverations, was not a constitutional difference. It was merely one of expediency. Both held that conditions might be imposed. The difference was that the President insisted that his were sufficient, while Congress thought that to make them effective something more must be added.

If, therefore, the Congressional policy is less conciliatory than the Presidential it is only because the President was willing to leave the civil rights of the colored population entirely to the insurgent States wholly at the mercy of the lately disloyal white population, while Congress was not. And again the President was willing to allow the late rebel States a gain of twelve representatives in Congress, while Congress was not willing. Of course we are not so foolish as to urge that because we had the clear and conceded right to require equal civil rights and the adjustment of representation they should, for that reason only, be required. It is not enough that the right exists; it must be also expedient and necessary that the right be exercised, and these conditions should be demanded because they are essential to peaceful reunion. Now these, it seems to us, were the fair and legitimate results which the war had given the Government—not merely the suppression of an armed rebellion, but the adjustment of the political relations which the war had essentially and unjustly to the loyal States deranged. These surely are not the issues of 1860–61, but of the autumn of 1866.

We suspect that it is really not with the policy of the Union party, but with the rhetoric and arrogance by which it is sometimes supported, that our friend quarrels. He reads of slavery and slaveholders, and rebels and treason, when, as he would say, they are words of the past, and needlessly exasperating. Party rhetoric of any side we shall not undertake to defend. We have certainly not spared in these columns when we have considered the rhetorical excesses and follies of our friends. But these words are used to express a certain spirit and tendency in our politics which are perfectly well understood. No one, we are very sure, knows better than our correspondent that convictions and systems, which are deep and strong enough to be defended by the force of a war, have seen, are not destroyed because the war is unsuccessful. They change their form and renew their activity, and are outworn only by steady opposition and the lapse of time. The struggle between the spirit of caste and of equal rights in this country is not at an end because chattel slavery is abolished. The States in which the feeling of caste is strongest will resume their relations in the Union, and the contest will continue. But it is unfair, unmanly, unconciliatory to insist that no unfair advantage shall be conceded to them while it is yet possible to withhold it? It suits the purpose of the partisan Democratic press which has disfigured our history and disgraced our national name to accept the Union party of vindictiveness, of a lack of Christian charity, of a wish to degrade and humiliate brethren of cherishing old quarrels, and of a revolutionary excision from Congress of States equal under the Constitution. This is not a mere rhetorical fact. To ask of States which have renounced by war their constitutional fidelity to the Union, and which, by common consent, are to resume them only upon new conditions, that the equal civil rights of all United States citizens shall be maintained, and that the Constitutional basis of representation shall not be prejudicial to the loyal States, is surely always faithful, is not vindictive, nor uncharitable, nor degrading, nor humiliating, nor revolutionary, nor even extravagant. It is reasonable and generous.

"SATRAPS AND DEPENDENTS."

THE loudest asseveration of virtue is not always the best proof of its existence. The President loses no chance of telling us how much power he has taken, and how bitterly bent upon despotism Congress is. This at least is amusing from a chief magistrate who has not only assumed to settle every point without consulting the people, but sneers at their representatives as a body "assuming to be Congress." Yet, not content with abolishing Congress, the President is evidently anxious all the other officers of the Government his personal agents; and by way of illustrating his self-denial and disinterestedness he actually announces that, if he had chosen to use the machinery of the Freedman's Bureau and Civil Rights bills, he might have proclaimed himself Dictator! Certainly, he might have by negligence if he chooses, but what are we to think of a man who prides himself upon not being one? The President knows, as well as we already do, that the office-holders and "the fifty or sixty millions of appropriation" would not have availed his Dictatorship a single day, and he knows perfectly well, and we think he knows that he knows, that if by vetoes deprived him of the power of appointing certain office-holders, they gave him the solid vote of all in the Southern States who were friendly to the rebellion, a number considerably greater than any number of agents of the bills in question.

But the most significant and the weak mark of the President's is, that he speaks of the officers who, by an act of Congress, are to be appointed upon his nomination, as "My satraps and dependents in every town and village." This little remark shows how truly Postmaster-General RANDALL interpreted the Presidential theory when he spoke of the various officers of the Government as "eating the President's bread and butter." We all know, of course, that the theory of honesty, intelligence, patriotism, and ability having qualified them for the discharge of the myriad minor official duties of the Government, was long since exploded by the famous declaration that "to the victors belong the spoils." But that Postmasters, Customhouse officers, and Revenue agents are the "satraps and dependents" of the President only, had not been before so plainly announced.

This being the President's view, he is acting upon it vigorously. The country has felt the effects of his summary removal of subordinates, but the war has so enormously increased the number of offices that this force will be felt as never before. Those who are familiar with politicians in their own neighborhoods will have remarked that the enthusiasm for the Philadelphia Convention outside of the Democratic lines appeared only among the "satraps and dependents." So that it is clear, if the President plumes himself on not making himself Dictator by their aid, he does not scorn their assistance in making hostility to Congress effective.

The perilous evil of the vast Executive patronage in this country is becoming constantly more apparent. The overwhelmingness of this public bribe is almost inevitable when the bread and butter of thousands and thousands of citizens depend upon the whim of one man; and every official agent of the Government becomes an interested propagandist of his master's views. The corruption is necessarily such that the very nature of the Government is changed. It ceases to represent public opinion; and a policy which the conscience and sense of the country condemn may deceitfully prevail by means of that corruption, until the difficulty is beyond peaceful remedy. The late war was a terrible illustration of the peril of regarding the agents of the Government as Presidential "satraps and dependents," and every party which considers its honest debates, as well as every citizen who desires a pacific progress of the country, must be interested in seeing that virtually irresponsible power which the President is now actively wielding.

A RETIRED STATESMAN UPON THE PRESIDENT.

MR. ROBERT C. WINTHROP is a statesman in retirement, like Sir WILLIAM TEMPLE in his later days. But eventually he comes forth for the public good. Thus in the autumn of 1864 he came all the way to New York to stand side by side with that sterling patriot Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, and to urge with him that the salvation of the country lay in the direction of Mr. VALLANDIGHAM'S Chicago platform and the election of GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN. Thus, again, in these stirring times Mr. WINTHROP has seized his pen, and covertly and ingeniously, but none the less severely, censures the conduct of the President.

Mr. WINTHROP writes that he agrees with Judge CURTIS "that the Southern States are now as rightfully entitled to be effectually in the Union as they were before the madness of their people attempted to carry them out." And adds, that he "hopes the people may be aroused to the duties of allowing the Constitution of the United States to be longer the subject of partial or discretionary observance on the part of those who are sworn to support it." This is a terrible blow at the President, who plays fast and loose with the Constitution at his pleasure, and who without a shadow of Constitutional authority, but in his own constant assertion be true, interferes with GOVERNOR WELLS of Louisiana as if he were his provisional lieutenant. Mr. WINTHROP, in his colloquial statement, more clearly that if, as he declares, Louisiana is as much in the Union as his own State, the President may as lawfully dispense with the services of Mr. BUTLER as Governor of Massachusetts as call Governor WELLS to account, or peremptorily supersede him. Mr. WINTHROP wisely entreats the people to perceive the drift of such action.

Again Mr. WINTHROP startles the country by declaring that he is in danger of despair if "there should be found exhibited at Washington nothing of that scrupulous adherence to the Constitution and the laws which characterized the earlier days of the Republic." This is another broadside at the President, although, with all the sagacity of Sir WILLIAM TEMPLE calmly cultivating his cabbages, no names are mentioned. For we all know, as Mr. WINTHROP knows, whether in those earlier days it was the custom for the President to call to account those whom he acknowledged to be the lawful Governors of States for peaceful State acts, performed by State authority, within State limits. Moreover, Mr. WINTHROP condemns State action "under duress," in the language of the President's proclamation of the action of last year. It is still another heavy blow at the President, who might have hoped that, since Mr. PENDLETON and Mr. VALLANDIGHAM now commend him, Mr. WINTHROP, their fellow-laborer in 1864, would at least not censure him.

Indeed, can it be possible that Mr. WINTHROP is a statesman so deep in retirement that he supposes his letter to be an argument in support of the President?

"OR RIGHTS OF OUR FOES?"

"FELLOW-CITIZENS," says Governor ORR, "we have assembled at the door for eight long months, asking Congress that the best of the intellectual and leading men of the South shall be admitted into Congress to represent us there..... Is it just or right that we should be excluded from these privileges?"

The Governor does not ask why they are not admitted to Congress. And the country does not try knows. It is simply because having made a terrible war upon the Union, during which slavery was abolished, the victorious Government asks that Governor ORR and his friends shall not insist that in consequence of that war and the consequent emancipation they shall have a disproportioned increase of power in the Union. While the colored population of the South were slaves the eleven rebel States were entitled to eighteen representatives. Now that they are free the same population is a basis of thirty representatives. Governor ORR and his friends claim that having made a bloody and desolating war entirely useless to them, they suppress which has cost the Government countless lives and unspeakable suffering and hundreds of millions of dollars, they shall have gained nearly twelve votes in Congress. Governor implies that it asks only that the Governor and his friends shall stand upon an equal footing with the States that did not rebel, and Governor ORR turns with a fine tragedy air and asks his fellow-citizens, "Is this fair? Is it just? Ought we to be taxed without representation?"

The Governor may be very sure that his fellow-citizens will answer, "if you wish to come in, come in on the same terms." If you insist upon a disproportion of power, you have nobody but yourselves to thank if you stay out. In any case you are to be taxed for expenses of a war demanded and which you were not represented; and remember while you appeal to us upon the ground that you are governed without representation, you yourselves insist upon governing more than half your population without representation. Every word of your appeal to us convicts yourselves, your Excellency."

Governor ORR will perceive, if he is a diligent student of the elections, that the people of this country have learned the difference between words and things.

THE PRESIDENT.

In his speech, upon taking the chair at Philadelphia, Governor DARSIE said: "The President, not in pursuance of any constitutional power, had called on the Confederate States to accept conditions for their admission to the exercise of their legislative functions as members of the Union." General DIX applauds and justifies this proceeding. But is it not clear that if the necessity of the case compelled the authorized imposition of conditions, Congress can not be denounced as treasonable and unconstitutional because it demands that the conditions shall be made to accomplish the proposed end? Moreover, if conditions are to be named, should it be done by the President alone or by the immediate representatives of the people? Or, if the President acts in his capacity of Commander-in-Chief, can his authority as a military commander be fairly construed to cover the final settlement of the political questions springing from a civil war?

General DIX added: "The exaction of new conditions is unjust and a violation of the faith of the Government." Is then the President the Government? Does his opinion upon a subject where, as General DIX concedes, he has no constitutional authority, engage the faith of the United States Government? If the President had said that the rebel States upon laying down their arms might be represented, without repealing the acts of secession, or accepting the Emancipation Amendment, or disavowing their war debt, would the honor of the United States have been pledged to those conditions? Would the country have been barred from requiring others?

General DIX affirms that "when the President of the United States had declared the armed resistance to the authority of the United was over, all the States had a right to representation in Congress." That is a perilous interpretation of the scope of the President's power. It is again denying to the country the right of obtaining reasonable securities for the peace of the Union. It is again saying that if the President had declared such a proposition upon JOHNSON'S surrender to SHERMAN Congress could not have interfered, and that the country would have had no remedy save impeachment of the President. It is again asserting that, in his military capacity, the President may, at his pleasure, settle the most momentous civil questions without consulting the people in Congress. General DIX forgets that this is a country in which the will of the people, and not of the President, is the government.

THE CHOLERA CAMPAIGN.

AMONG the many campaigns of the summer that in which the country has the greatest stake but in which it means least is the most regarded. The contest of the new Board of Health with the cholera has been prolonged and incessant, and conducted by defenders with such sagacity, skill, and patient fidelity, that we are almost justified in believing that the worst of past before the disease became a pestilence or even an epidemic. Indeed it is hardly probable that, with the experience of this year, the cholera will ever again assail the community with a pain, a panic, a mortality so universal that, with proper and seasonable care, the disease may be controlled. The mystery has become familiar, and the vague terror which always accompanies such mystery has disappeared. The campaign of the Board of Health against the cholera has been like that of Prussia against Austria. It is a triumph.

Yet there was never a body of public benefactors more fiercely denounced than the Board of Health. If President SEWARD and his associates had conspired against the health and order of the city they could not hardly have been more vehemently opposed. Remonstrances, resolutions, protests, and injunctions have been the barricades erected in their path by the interest of cholera. Delays were forced upon them, and every kind of resistance. Even the city they have pertinaciously pushed on. For the first time in a generation the city, in one department at least, has felt the intervention of a moral force; and we have all seen what good results are possible even in New York. The wisdom of the legislation which created the Board is justified, as it is constantly in the case of the Metropolitan Police.

If it be true that the Commissioners have selected the West Bank in the Lower Bay as a site for the Quarantine hospitals, we hope they will be no delay in the erection of the buildings. That the city has been spared the ravages of a pestilence is certainly not to its moral foresight and vigilance of the Quarantine Commissioners. The health of New York is due to the intelligent care of the Board of Health.

THE PUBLIC FINANCES.

It is amazing that the people who administer our public finances should so persistently provoke criticism. They have every thing in their favor. The price of public securities rises steadily. The European demand develops day by day. Money flows into the exchequer at a rate which surpasses the most sanguine hopes of the Secretary. Last year, instead of a deficit of $125,000,000 as anticipated in the Treasury Report, the Secretary had a surplus of $125,000,000. This year, 1866-67, the prospects are that a still larger sum will be available for the reducing of the public debt. Surely if ever men had an easy task, and a task which promised triumph and fame to those who had it to perform, that is the task which has devolved upon the managers of our public finances. Yet somehow matters are so managed that the public never cease to growl.

We pass over, as by-gones, the gold clause. Mr. VAN DYCK has sold no more, and the growlers have no excuse for fresh complaints on this head. But what are the temporary deposits but paid off in National bank notes instead of legal tenders? Mr. MCCULLOCH must be perfectly well aware that the stocks—Government stocks, duly certified—are saleable, and about the streets of New York at 4 per cent. discount. The banks will not receive them on deposit as money, for the simple reason that it takes from 3 to 15 days to convert them into legal tender, which is the only medium used for exchanges between the Associated banks of New York. And the honest fact, who deposited legal tenders with Government on the pledge that they would be repaid on demand, are now forced to contest themselves with payment in a currency other than the banks, and which can only be sold at a discount of one-eighth per cent. Is this fair? Is it business-like? Is it calculated to help the public credit? Is it just to the people who deposited their money with Government on the tacit understanding that they should receive a good as they gave? If JOHN, the every-day good dealer, behaved in this way toward SMITH the banker, would not SMITH and all SMITH'S friends pronounce him a tricky fellow—to be strictly avoided hereafter? And is not the Treasury Department subject to the same law as individuals?

Prosecution is not wanting for the proceeding. In 1861 the Sub-Treasurer at New York borrowed money of individuals on call. The lenders deposited Treasury Notes, which, at the time of their issue, and throughout their existence were held to be equivalent to specie. Yet when these lenders asked for their money the Sub-Treasurer tendered payment in new United States notes, then at a discount of 5 to 6 per cent., and denounced fiercely the suffering innocents who brought him to return them their money in the kind of currency in which they had lent it to Government. There is nothing new under the sun.

Another brilliant example. A New York merchant received from a correspondent residing abroad a draft on the United States for a trifling sum—let us say $87 50. He indorsed the draft, and sent it to the Sub-Treasury for collection. Being then abroad he might have considered it a specie draft, as such a draft drawn by any foreign merchant on his New York correspondent would have been so considered. The New York Assistant Treasurer at once pronounced it a currency draft, and paid it—a check on the Postmaster at Newark, N. J. No such check, of course, was bankable; the merchant was obliged to send a check to Newark to collect the check, which took a whole day. How would a merchant's credit stand who so conducted his business?

We alluded in a recent Number to private negotiations between the United States Government and the New York house of JAY COOKE & Co., by which the latter obtained fat commissions for services which other houses would have been glad to get at one-third the money. Our remarks appear to have proved distasteful in certain quarters. We have collected in Pennsylvania papers about a score of articles—to say nothing of private letters—abusing us, and setting forth in vermilion characters the virtues, and purity, and wealth of the house in question. In reply, we have simply to say that we admit the great services rendered to the country by JAY COOKE during the rebellion. He was one of the few men who forsew the end of the war. He was one of the very few men who believed in our finances. And he was the man, who, to the best of our knowledge and belief, who could have floated the loans which the nation required. For all this the country owes him a reward. But has he not got it? Has he not received five, ten—nay—if some Pennsylvanians are to be believed fifteen million dollars by way of commissions? Is not this enough? Are we—who admire and respect JAY COOKE as a loyal and masterly man—to be accused of abusing him because we think that, having received so much, he can spare millions from the public purse for his great services, the time has at length come when the Government business may fairly be thrown open to public competition, and that it is by no means any necessity for reserving it as a private monopoly in the house of JAY COOKE & Co.? We repeat—what we may have to repeat again—it no excuse for giving to any house, however loyal and eminent, a monopoly of the exchanges which the Government requires to effect in its securities; and if Mr. MCCULLOCH persists in throwing those fat spoils into any single purse, he must expect that his opponents will make a handle of it as the next election. JAY COOKE and his subordinates will be charged by not a few of the baser and more reckless partisan journals with participating in the profits which he gratuitously awards to the Secretary's friends.

Our financial history is just commencing. Until the war began it was so simple that any smart grocery clerk knew all the mysteries of public finances. The war developed new necessities, which called forth financial expedients of more or less value—but none of which, in the severe process of the war, could be fairly judged. Peace restored, there is time to manage matters more carefully, and to adjust our finances to the fixed and permanent laws of political economy. A very few principles should serve as the basis of our financial administration. In the first place, the Government must keep its word. It must not palter, nor use its debts, either in whole or in part, in the manner or in the form or in the time of payment. Where engagements are made, they should follow the example of high-minded merchants, and adopt the construction adverse to itself. This is the way to command high credit. And as all high-minded merchants are careful to check the zeal of clerks who would gain undue advantage for their employers by sharp practices, so Government ought never to suffer its employés to perpetrate such small frauds on its creditors as the one above described in the case of the merchant who was paid in a draft on the New York Assistant Treasurer's petty tricks do not save the country a dollar, but discredit the Department to the extent of thousands. And there is no reason why longer favoritism, or devotion to pet bankers. Sound business principles dictate dealing with those who will do the business best and at the lowest rates, no matter what political claims they may be. If Government proposes to exchange Seven-Thirty notes for Five-Twenty bonds, and does not intend to take advantage through its salaried agents, it should offer the business to public competition—just as the State and City of New York do under the like circumstances. To confine the business to one or two houses, by reason of their services during the war, is just as unreasonable as it would be for the War or Navy Department to refuse to receive tenders for supplies from parties which did not rally to the support of the Administration in the old dark days. Sentiment is a fine thing: but if the Secretary of the Treasury wishes to afford no handle for abuse to his opponents at the fall elections he will deal with the bankers of the United States on simple business principles; and if Cooperation is able to do his work at 1/8 per cent. cheaper than loyal Union men he will give his orders to the former. This may be aggravating to some intense loyalists, but it will pay.

THE NEW ORLEANS MASSACRE.

The publication of the official dispatches in relation to the massacre in New Orleans on July 30, furnishes corroboration of the worst which we have previously expressed in this paper. We find that the dispatch written by SHERIDAN to GRANT on August 3 was not originally published as it was written. The following important sentence was left out: "In the mean time, official duty called me to Texas, and the Mayor of New Orleans, my absence, suppressed the Convention by the use of their police force, when, in so doing attacked the members of the Convention and a party of two hundred negroes, and with fire-arms, clubs, and knives, in a manner so unnecessary and atrocious as to compel me to say that it was murder."

This judgment of General SHERIDAN coincides exactly with our own, after a careful reading of all the reports given of the riot, and before this entire dispatch was permitted to see the light. The following is the last report received made by General SHERIDAN to the President in reply to the inquiries addressed to him by the latter:

His Excellency Andrew Johnson, President of the United States: I have the honor to make the following reply to your dispatch of August 4. A very large number of colored people marched in procession on Friday night, July 27, and proceeded from the steps of the City Hall by Dr. DOWNS, Ex-Governor HAHN, and others. The speech of the latter was inflammatory in language and sentiment. The speeches of the others, as far as I can learn, were conservative and moderate. I have not given you the words of DOWNS's speech, as the version published was not correct. It was to the effect that the man I believe they were intemperate. The Convention assembled at 12 M., on the 30th, the troubles were shooting themselves because the tone of the general public was cautious or timid.

I think there were but about 95 members present. If three of the Radical members, when the meeting was held, there was assembled some colored men, women, and children, perhaps 200 or 250, and in the immediate vicinity a number of colored men, probably 150. Among those outside and in the street would be found a number of the police, and every tenth man. About 1 P.M., a procession of say from 100 to 150 colored men, marched up Dryaders Street to Canal Street, toward the Convention, carrying an American flag.

There men had about one pistol to every ten men, and some axes and clubs. Arrived at the crossing Canal Street, a row occurred. There were many spectators on the corners, and these rushed out and tore toward the procession uniformly. A shot was fired, by whom I am not able to state, but believe it to have been by a policeman or some colored man in the procession; this led to other shots and then what then occurred.

On arrival at the front of the Institute there was some throwing of bricks and a few pistols. The police, who had been held in hand, were vigorously marched to the scene of disorder. The procession entered the Institute with the flag, about six or eight remaining outside. A fight occurred between the police and the colored procession, and a shot was again fired by one of the parties, which led to an indiscriminate firing into the Institute from the windows by the policemen.

This last firing lasted for a short time, when a white flag was displayed from the window of the Institute; whereupon the firing ceased and the police rushed into the building. From the testimony of wounded men and others who were in the building, the policemen opened an indiscriminate fire upon the audience until they had emptied their revolvers, when they retired, and the police barricaded the doors.

The door was broken in and the firing again commenced, when many of the colored and white people either escaped through the doors or through the front or rear, or were passed out by the policemen inside, but as they came out the policemen fired upon them. Many were killed as they fired upon them, and they were again fired upon by the citizens from the windows and yards.

Many of those wounded and taken prisoners, and others who were not wounded, were treated, were fired upon by their captors and by citizens. The wounded men were taken to the Mint, and there many of them were finished with brick-bats. In the yard of the building, whither some of the wounded had been taken, they were brutally served themselves, they were fired upon and killed or wounded by policemen and citizens. Wounded and unwounded were thrown from the cells. Members of the Convention were removed by the police, and, with a few exceptions, were, some of them mortally.

The treachery and cruelty of the terrible affair was the astonishing of this Convention. The remote cause was the fear of the white people of the negro, the fear existing in this community since the advent of the present Mayor, CLAPP, to the appointment of his police force, selected with a desperate care, and some of them known murderers.

The people of this State were prepared for a state of excitement in the Mayor and fear of the "Thugs," many of whom had enlisted for his police force. They were frequently bragged of by prominent citizens on the subject, and have been known to express fear and want of confidence in Mayor MCENERY ever since the intimation of the Mayor's intention. The immediate cause of excitement in the city papers for supporting by their articles the bitter hostility of the people to the Convention, and since in which the Convention was broken up, I feel obliged to confess my inability to state.

It is useless to attempt to dispute the hostility that exists in the public mind against the Convention. Northern men and this unfortunate affair has so precipitated the feeling that I do not believe that what could be the status of Northern men—whether they can live here or not—that they can be protected in their lives, that they can be protected in life and property, and have justice in the courts. My rule since the surrender has been to favor without a thorough and determined prosecution of every attempt to do my look for frequent scenes of the same kind, not only here but in other places.

No steps have as yet been taken by the civil authorities to arrest the murderers who participated in the massacre, or policemen who perpetrated such cruelties. The members of the Convention have been informed by the Grand Jury, and many of them arrested and held to bail. As to whether the civil authorities will ever make any further to be guilty parties on both sides I must say it is my opinion they could not do so. Judge ABELL, who is holding the courts I have chiefly watched for nearly a year, I now believe to be honest, but he is afraid to act. He is not here to peace and quiet of the city.

The leading men of the Convention, KING, CUTLER, HAHN, and others, have been political agitators, and are known. I regard them as having been the cause of GOVERNOR WELLS has been vacillating, and that during the last trouble he has not been the friend of the men.

P. H. SHERIDAN, Major-General Commanding.

We have no comments to make. Mr. JOHNSON'S policy must commend itself to all men of sense, and whole meaning is borne out by the published official dispatches. The inquiry there put, Which was the illegal party? is one of our readers will answer for himself. Admit that the Convention was all that General SHERIDAN says it was, and that his denunciation of the police is perfectly just, still the question recurs, Was it more illegal that such a body of peaceful men should come together and deliberate regarding a change in the Constitution of Louisiana than that a mob, assisted by the police of New Orleans, should be let loose like a party of bloodhounds against the Conventionists, to hunt them down and murder them at their will? It remains to be seen whether the murderers and rioters are to escape without suffering the just penalty for their crimes.

One thing is certain. The people of the South, in order to convince us of the sincerity of their allegiance to the Constitution and the laws of the nation, must put down another mob than this of murdering, on the slightest pretext, citizens of the United States. The American people have a pretty well settled conviction as to this matter, and will make its voice heard in every city and hamlet in the South in terms which can not be evaded or misunderstood. The South is a hotbed of lawlessness, which is incompetent to perform its first great function—the protection of its citizens. We have had enough of this wholesale system of murder—enough of the suppression of the right of free speech. The same spirit which made the New Orleans massacre a possibility existed before the war, and the Government looked on in silence. Since the war this spirit has revived again, and in a more formidable shape than before. How to meet it is one of the practical questions of reconstruction.

MEDICAL EDUCATION IN NEW YORK.

THE UNIVERSITY MEDICAL COLLEGE.

Our readers will remember that the University Medical College was destroyed by the great fire of March 1865, and that the Academy of Music was burned. The reason is now approaching for the reopening of the Medical Schools, and we are glad to find that this institution is in readiness, notwithstanding its losses by that accident, to go on with even greater facilities and privileges for its students than ever heretofore.

It has been removed to the New York City Hospital, the Governors of which, with their accustomed liberality, have assigned it the use of one of their large buildings. In this, during the summer, the various lecture-rooms, laboratory, anatomical room, museums, etc., have been prepared.

The circular recently published shows very significantly the favor in which the University of New York is held by the medical profession. We find that it has educated more than 8000 students, from every State of the Union and from many foreign countries. It deserves the support of the City of New York, for it first turned the tide of medical education to our metropolis, at a time when not more than fifty students annually resorted here. Now they congregate by more than 1000. It accomplished this by providing what are called Clinics—that is, bringing patients into the College lecture-rooms before the students. This was first done by the late venerable Dr. VALENTINE MOTT, one of the founders of this institution, for many years its President, and died in its service. Among other great improvements in medical education it introduced the course of instruction throughout the year, the term in other colleges being only four months long.

The energy that has been shown under the recent disaster will command it to patronage everywhere. During the summer a lecture or clinic was lost. The duties literally went on while the old building was consumed by fire. Such enterprise will doubtless be no small recommendation in behalf to students now flocking to the city, who will find the means of instruction, both theoretical and practical, unsurpassed by any institution in our country. Its management still continues in the able hands of Professor DARLING, who is so well known in the medical and scientific world.

A student who has been educated in such an institution will be a credit to the profession. Its hospital are together, obtains the practical with the theoretical, and is fitted to enter on the practice of medicine as soon as he graduates.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

NEWS ITEMS.

THE report of deaths in this city and the public institutions for the week ending August 25 showed a total of 564 deaths, of which 214, nearly two-fifths, were of children under the age of five years. This is a decrease of 94 from the number of the previous week. The number of deaths from cholera was 116, of which 45 took place on the 23d and 24th of the public institutions. The decrease in the total number of deaths from cholera during the week was 45 less than of the previous one, was 51.

DAVID Bennett died at two o'clock A.M., August 28.

General Hooker has gone to Detroit to take command of the 7th Department of the Lakes, which relieves General Gibbon.

Judge Charles A. Dewey, the oldest Judge of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, died on August 22. He has been on the bench since 1851, and was appointed by the late President Edward Everett.

Senator Senator Grimes, of Iowa, announces his determination to retire from public life at the close of his present term. Paul A. Chadbourne, of Williams College, has been chosen President of the Wisconsin State University.

FOREIGN NEWS.

BY TELEGRAM.

August 21:

General LA MARMORA has resigned as chief of staff to the King, and is succeeded by General CIALDINI.

August 22:

It is said that the Emperor of Mexico has failed to borrow in Belgium, having, it is supposed, refused to grant the assistance of the French troops, prior to their withdrawal of Mexico, to quell the rebellion.

Governor Eyre was received enthusiastically at Southampton on the 21st inst. The Jamaica Committee's resolutions were passed condemning his course in Jamaica.

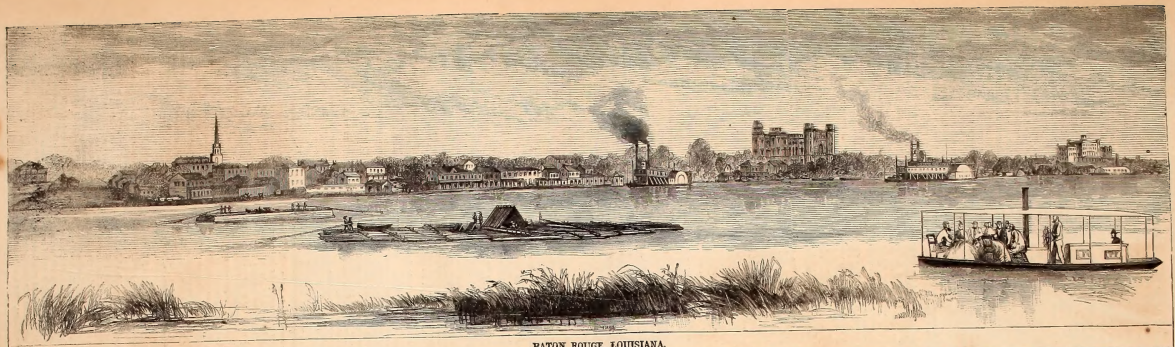
The Turks have commenced hostilities against the Cretans in the Island. The Consuls have given no additional important positions.

The Spanish Government has issued a decree, proclaiming an amnesty to political exiles and prisoners throughout Spain and its dependencies. The decree includes Mazzini, as well as others of lesser prominence.

August 23:

Orders have been received to-day in official circles in London announcing that a treaty of peace between the Prussian Diet and Prussia has been signed. The treaty was concluded by the Plenipotentiaries in session at Berlin on the 20th inst. The treaty has been formally signed by the Plenipotentiaries on behalf of their respective Governments on the same day. Among the provisions of the treaty is one that the troops now at different points in Germany shall be withdrawn to their respective territories within three weeks.

The cession of Venetia to Italy is fully accomplished. Before the treaty of peace between Prussia, Austria, Italy, and Bavaria was concluded, Austria formally transferred Venetia to Victor Emanuel.



An international horse show opening in Paris for United States Five-Twenties, and heavy orders for supplies have been telegraphed to America since the receipt of breaking horses in this city.

Advices have been received to-day from Point de Galle, Island of Ceylon, via the Persian Gulf and Mediterranean cables, that a civil war has broken out in Japan.

The Cunard steamship Scotia, Captain Judkins, sailed from Liverpool at noon on August 22, for New Orleans. She has a large number of passengers, and takes £110,000 in specie for American ports.

August 25:

The reading of the National Imperial Party has resolved that Savoy ought to be incorporated with France.

BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH—BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA.—SCENE ON THE LEVEE; LANDING ICE, ETC.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 565.]

MATAMORAS.

We give on this page a very excellent and accurate view of Matamoras. This city is a river-port town of Tamaulipas, in Mexico, on the right bank of the Rio Bravo del Norte, forty miles from the Gulf of Mexico. Its port on the Gulf consists of two harbors—the Bravo del Santiago and the Boca del Rio, about nine miles apart, and both obstructed by bars impassable under the prevalence of strong winds. The relation of the city to Brownsville is apparent from our sketch.

The port of Matamoras is one of those which MAXIMILIAN, several weeks ago, declared under blockade. The proclamation enforcing a blockade was supported by no efficient naval force, and we are glad to see that President JOHNSON has declared this blockade, so far as the United States are concerned, "absolutely null and void." President JOHNSON'S proclamation is the most popular act of his administration. It says virtually to the pseudo-Emperor: "You have undertaken under false auspices to manage Mexican affairs. We of the United States happen to have a more intimate concern in those affairs than any European nation can have. We have made the necessary arrangements to secure the withdrawal of the troops by which thus far you have succeeded in supporting a false position. Your temporary success has been a menace to republican institutions on this continent. In the mean time we shall not become a party to your scheme of foreign intervention by supporting or recognizing any mere paper blockade which you may think proper to institute. For the rest we shall wait, which we can well afford to do, while you can not."

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,

Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XVI.

AND so the beautiful work went on. Oh, what an amount of care was bestowed upon the three boxes!—how they were set in the sunshine, and then moved away if the sunshine seemed to be too hot! and the panes of glass were raised a little to let in air in the middle of the day, and closed again before night, so as to keep in the warmth till morning. And it was no trifle, as Lily remarked, "to lug the boxes about; and it needed judgment to tell just when they should be aired; and then there were cloudy days, and cold days, and warm days, and all sorts of days to puzzle the children, and keep their thoughts at work. Sometimes when it rained and was very cloudy and cold, you might see the three boxes paraded in front of the fire to get dry and warm; and then, with a sudden fear of some dangerous degree of heat, back they went to the window again; so that, as Prim said, there was more gardening to do in bad weather than in fine. But the fair days brought plenty of work too; and by-degrees Sam dug up all the three little gardens, and got them in beautiful condition, only as the ground thus newly turned up was very damp and cold, he advised the children to wait a little before they sowed any seeds in it, and let the sun try his warming power for a few days first.

"If the ground is too cold when the seeds are put in," said Sam, "they will as like as not mould and come to nothing; and then you will wait and wait, and have no plants after all. But if you wait while the seeds are safe in your pocket, then there'll be something to reward your patience."

"Well, I should think these seeds in the boxes must be dry enough," said Lily. "I expect they will die that way."

"Let me see," said Sam, taking off the glasses. "They're doing well enough—but they may have just a little water. Run up to my room, Prim, and fetch me that brush that lies on my table; and you, Lily, get me a cup of water."

"A cup of water!" said Lily. "How many flower-pots will that do any good to, I wonder?"

But she brought it, and Sam went to work: the brush was a small painter's brush, quite new and clean.

"Is this cold water?" said Sam.

"Yes, it is," said Lily. "I suppose you don't want hot to scald 'em?"

"No, nor ice-cold to freeze them," said Sam. "I want it just about as warm as the air inside the boxes."

A little hot water from the kitchen made this all right, and then Sam dipped the brush into the cup, and drawing it skilfully through his hand, he sent down the warm drops upon the flower-pots in a shower almost as fine as dew.

"Oh, how beautiful!" cried Clover. "I wonder if I could do that?"

"It's finer than the rose of my watering-pot," said Primrose.

"Yes; no watering-pot is fine enough for this work. You see if the drops are too large they will just displace the little seeds; and if the young plants were up they would be beaten down and half drowned."

"But you give them so very little!" said Lily, as her brother closed the panes of the first box.

"A little at a time. Seeds mould very easily, and young plants 'damp off,' as the gardeners say—die of the wet, if they have too much of it."

"I wonder when there will be any young plants there!" said Lily. "It takes 'em a great while to grow."

"Yes, and I get so impatient watching 'em," said Primrose. "Oh, I wish mamma was here to tell us the rest of her story! that would divert my mind a little."

"Come here, poor little mind that wants diversion," said Mrs. May from her work-table, with a laugh. "You want me so much, Prim, that you can not see me when I come."

"Ah, but I can see you now," said Primrose, running to the table: "and I was looking at my boxes, you know. Now for Mrs. Grundy, mamma!"

Sam went off, muttering that Mrs. Grundy was no friend of his; and the rest gathered round Mrs. May, and she began:

"I said Mrs. Grundy had a great deal of power, but it all lay in doing mischief and in making slaves. That is the proper word, rather than prisoners—she took people captive, and then, setting a mark upon them, she left them free—to do her pleasure. Whatever she said they must believe; whatever she ordered they must do."

"What sort of a mark did she give 'em?" asked Primrose.

"A shackle upon all their life; a bit of a chain to carry that bound even their thoughts and opinions. And then, to amuse herself, she would issue the most ridiculous orders, sending them here and there by her waiting-maid, Miss La Mode, or her Secretary, Ir. I. De Cule. But whatever she ordered it was all the same to her captives—they never thought of resistance, but went where she bade them, and said what she said; and wore carrots or beetles on their heads, just according to her fancy."

"Beetles! why that's like Maria Jarvis's rose-bugs!" cried Primrose.

"How absurd you are, Prim!" said Lily. "Maria's rose-bugs were on her frock, child."

"Well, Sarah's butterfly wasn't," persisted Prim.

"Mamma, did she ever get hold of any body but grown-up people—any children?"

"Sometimes, when their mothers were not careful," said Mrs. May, "and then it would have made your heart ache to see the poor little things. I'll tell you of one who was called Ruth Rural. Ruth had always lived a very happy life with her mother in the country, running about the fields in a white sun-bonnet, and having a pink one for Sundays; picking blackberries, and hunting for birds' nests in the long grass of the meadow or the dry hay in the barn; studying with all her might in the morning, and playing just as hard in the afternoon. Until one unhappy summer, when Mrs. Rural (venturing too near the grounds of Grundy Castle) was taken captive, and was then at once so bewildered that little Ruth fell an easy prey."

"But didn't she run?" cried Primrose. "I should, I know that. Mrs. Grundy would never have got hold of me."

"She might," said Mrs. May. "You would not be afraid of any place where you saw me, Prim, and Ruth just staid by her mother. And what a life Mrs. Grundy led the poor child! Ruth had gone away from home in a nice print dress and strong black shoes; able to run, and jump, and dance, and climb fences; and she came back in a large hoop, and a flounced robe, and silk boots. Her hair was crinkled, and braided, and bewitched, tilt it stood on end, as if she had been hearing the worst sort of a ghost story; and (no small misfortune) Ruth had learned that she had a complexion to take or be spoilt, and for that Mrs. Grundy had prescribed as little fresh air as possible, taken through a blue gauze veil.

MATAMORAS, MEXICO.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

"Well, when all the poor child got home, and Grundy Castle was left far behind, the first night she was too tired to look at any thing. The next day, or as near as all the various duties enjoined by Mrs. Grundy were disposed of, Ruth thought she would run out and look at her flowers. So she caught up her watering-pot and ran to the pump; but her hoop was so large she couldn't get near it, and she had to go to the kitchen for water."

"Mamma, I wish you'd just tell us how she was dressed," said Clover, laughing.

"As near as I remember," said Mrs. May, "her dress was one which Miss La Mode had called 'extremely pretty, and even with pretensions to elegance.' It was light blue summer grenadine, with a white clip hat and a blue wreath, and high light kid boots. Well, Ruth went to her garden, and the delicate leaves had drooped into the soft earth, and came up quite smother color. Then a sweetbrier seized hold of the clip hat with its sharp fingers, tearing one, and also forget-me-not and setting a rent by which it was pretty sure to be remembered for some time to come; and the wind rushed about through the frizzed hair till Ruth looked like a wild thing. Ruth was in despair. All her flowers, she thought, looked strange at her; and she could then tell of with her hat swung up in the sweet-brier bush, and her blue veil all tangled in the moss rose. She walked off, quite forgetting her complexion, to another part of the garden; and there was her own white rose-bush, all shining in the sun, bending her head and blusher with sorrowful sweetness at the make-up perfumes in the world. Ruth stood there for a minute, feeling very enormous; but suddenly she thought she heard Mrs. Grundy's voice coming along the road; and Ruth dropped her watering-pot and fled into the house."

"Is that all, mamma?" asked Primrose.

"No: I am sorry to say that is only part."

"Please don't tell any more now, mamma," said Lily. "I don't like your stories."

"I do," said Prim; "they're splendid. Only I don't quite understand 'em sometimes. Oh, Jack saw a monkey to-day, Jack!"

"Mustn't touch it, hey?" said Jack, leisurely lifting the pones of glass and peeping while the alarmed little nurse came rushing to the bow-window. "What's the matter? Are you afraid something will grow if I look in?"

"No, we're not, you profane boy," said Lily. "They'll grow fast enough if you'll keep your fingers off."

"Fast enough!" said Jack, whistling. "Fast enough! Much you know about growing, or seeds either. Ah! I could tell you how seeds can grow when they are left to."

"Well, tell away," said Lily.

"There was a farmer once," said Jack, taking an easy attitude upon the window-seat, "who had a lot of cucumber seed to plant."

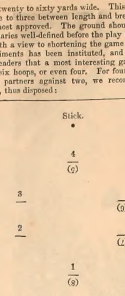
"How much a lot?" asked Prim.

"I don't know—half a handful. Well, he put the seed in his pocket, and started for the garden; and before he got there he found his pocket full of cucumber—ahey, so he put his hand in to see."

"To feel, you mean," said Clover.

"Be quiet, and don't interrupt one!" said Jack. "He put his hand in, as I said, and there the seed had sprouted. Well, that was good news, and he hurried on to his patch; but all the time his pocket kept feeling quearer and queerer, till by-and-by the cucumber leaves began to shoot out of the pocket-hole. Then the man started to run; but the shoot grew and grew till it got down to the ground, and then it went as fast as he did. The man was getting tired now, and turned about and ran for home as fast as he could go; and the shoot ran with him all the way. And if you'll believe me, Jack, if when he reached the house there was a great, large, big cucumber gone to seed in his pocket!"

THE GAME OF CROQUET.



CROQUET has become so universally popular, and deservedly so, that, in connection with our illustration on page 568, we propose to lay before our readers the nature and rules of this charming game.

We have not the space to enter into the history of Croquet. The game as it stands now has taken its final shape from the decisions promulgated by the Croquet Committee of London.

The best number of players for general purposes is four, two playing against two; and for matches, etc. Where there is only one ground, and more than four desire to play, it is a good plan to divide the candidates into two sets, one set commencing at the starting and winning stick, the other at the turning-stick, and what is the starting-stick to one party is the turning-stick to the other. The two games go on simultaneously; the two sets of players interfering scarcely at all with each other. Occasionally a ball belonging to the other game lies in the way of a stroke, when it must be taken up while the stroke is made; or the striker in one game has perhaps to wait a moment while the striker in the other game makes his stroke.

As regards the ground, it often happens the best that can be obtained is small, inconvenient, and may bring the best of players to such cases all that can be done is to make the best of a bad job. But where space can be got, and money is "no object," the ground should be level, of well-mown and well-rolled grass, not less than thirty yards long, for general purposes, more than forty yards long, and from twenty to sixty yards wide. This proportion of five to three between length and breadth is the one most approved. The ground should have its boundaries well-defined before the play begins.

With a view to shortening the game a series of experiments has been instituted, and we assure our readers that a most interesting game results from six hoops, or even four. For four balls, two being partners against two, we recommend six hoops, thus disposed:

The numbers appended to the hoops show the order in which they are to be run. A string should be one one-sixth of the direct length between the two sticks. From the starting-stick to hoop 1 is one string, and there is the same distance between the turning-stick and hoop 4 (5). The side-hoops are first two on either side, one string apart, and each of the four two strings from a point midway between the two sticks. Hoops 2 and 3 are at the same distance from hoop 1 as hoops 3 and 6 from hoop 4.

For six balls a capital game may be played with only four hoops: hoops 2 and 3 (see diagram) being taken out, and a hoop placed half-way between them; the same with hoops 6 and 7; so that the four hoops correspond to the four corners of a diamond. And, where time presses, or where others are waiting to play, this plan is well adapted for four balls, the game lasting about half an hour.

The term in order is well understood by every croquet player. It regards the sequence of hoops, etc., which have to be run. A player having run No. 1, must take No. 2 "in order," that is, if he takes No. 3, or any other hoop, before having taken No. 2, he gains no point by it. Of course the game is won by the side that first drives all their balls through all the hoops "in order," and hits all the sticks "in order."

The terms in play and in hand present more difficulty. A great many nice points turn on the question whether a ball is "in play" or not, it is important to comprehend precisely the meaning of the terms, and they are by no means void of definition. We quote the definition of the Committee, which we think very clear:

"A ball is 'in play' as soon as it has run the first hoop. It continues in play till it makes a croquet, when it is 'in hand.' A ball 'in hand' must take croquet, and can score no point until it has done so. Having taken croquet it is again 'in play;' but it is not permitted to croquet again the ball or balls it has croqueted for the remainder of its turn, unless it makes another point. Having made another point, it is 'in play' again to all the balls as at the commencement of its turn."

Running a hoop means, as every body knows, sending the ball through it in a line of the mallet. It must be run "in order," and in the right direction, and the whole of the ball must go through, or the hoop is not "run." A ball remains under the hoop, and it is doubtful whether the ball is quite through, the question is decided by applying a straight-edged board the long the hoop being of course perpendicular. If the straight-edge (the handle of the mallet is commonly used for this purpose) touches the ball, the hoop is "run."

Roquet is made by the striker driving his own ball, by a blow of the mallet, against another ball. If he is "in play" to the other ball, the "roquet" gives him the privilege of a croquet off the hit ball.

Croquet is taken in this way. The striker places his ball in contact with the one against which he has his own with the mallet. After the croquet, the striker is entitled to another stroke.

Croquet may be taken either with the striker's foot fixed firmly on his own ball while he strikes, when it is called a "tight" croquet, or without the foot, when it is termed a "loose" croquet.

A point is made on running a hoop, or hitting a stick, each, of course, "in order."

We have already stated what constitutes "running" a hoop. A stick is hit when the striker's ball is seen to move it, or when the stick on the ball against it is heard. It has been suggested that a ball should be placed on the top of the stick, and that the stick shall not be deemed to be hit unless the ball falls. But in practice it seldom happens that there is any question as to the hit, and a ball would be a complication. It is question, however, whether in a grand match balls should be used.

A turn is simply the innings of any one player.

We are now in a position to explain the meanings of the definition of the terms "in hand" and "in play."

A ball is in hand as soon as it has made a roquet. It takes croquet, after which it is in hand only to the ball roqueted for the remainder of that turn, or until it has scored a point. If it roquets another ball, it similarly remains in hand to it after the croquet, and so on. It follows from this that the croquet can only be taken once in each turn from each ball, unless another point is made. A second roquet may be made on a ball previously roqueted without any point made in the interval, as, for instance, for the purpose of driving away, cannoning, etc.; but such roquet does not entitle to a croquet, as the striker is in hand to the ball roqueted. The striker's turn ends there, unless by the same stroke he makes a point, or roquets another ball to which he is "in play." In this case he can go on with his turn, the roquet of the ball to which he is in hand being of no more advantage or disadvantage than hitting any other one that might happen to lie on the grass.

We now come to the laws themselves, which are much more than an anticipation with regard to them that we shall pass them through very rapidly. One recommendation of the laws under review is, that they are clearer, fewer, and shorter than any other published set.

First, the choice of play has to be decided on, the captain of each side allotting the colors as he pleases.

The first stroke is made by placing the ball any where not exceeding one mallet's length from the starting-stick, and striking it toward the first hoop. If this point is missed, the player is entitled to another stroke. If he fails to run the first hoop (and this is the rara avisorum of unskilful players, and often in real life the ball is taken off the ground till its next turn comes round.

The striker having run a hoop as he proceeds in the course of continuing his play as he succeeds in making a point in order, or a roquet on a ball in play. Having made roquet, he must next take croquet, after which he is entitled to another stroke.

We now come to the most important law of the lot. It is that the course of the mallet in striking from the ball shall be from left to right, or from right to left. This regulation is intended to do away with the front stroke. Either one or both sides of the mallet may be used, but the head of the mallet must be eighteen inches at least from it. When the mallet is held in this way, and its course in striking it runs parallel (i. e., at right angles, or nearly so, to the long axis of the player's feet), the abominable practice of "spooning" is almost impossible.

If a ball is not fairly hit, but in the opinion of the umpire is pushed or spooned, and if the regulations of the law last quoted are not complied with, all benefit from the stroke is lost: the ball is to be replaced by the direction of the adverse captain, and the player loses his turn.

Strokes must be given with the end of the head of the mallet, and not with the side.

Balls struck beyond the boundaries of the ground must be at once replaced ball a mallet's length within the edge, measured from the spot where they went off, at right angles to the margin.

As regards the penalties for various offenses, the most severe is that appointed in that respecting the slipping of the ball from under the foot when taking tight croquet. According to the laws before us, the player who does this has to slip less his next stroke—i. e., the remainder of his turn.

If a ball while rolling is touched or stopped by the player or his side, the player ceases to play for that turn. If by the other side, the striker may at his option take his stroke again, or, if entitled to another stroke, may proceed with the balls left where they stopped.

If the striker croquets a ball which he is not entitled to croquet, he loses the remainder of his turn, and the ball or balls moved are to be replaced.

If a player makes a second hit (as, e. g., seeing that the first is not enough) he loses his turn, and the balls are to be replaced.

Playing out of turn with the right or wrong ball loses all benefit from any point or points made in the turn played in error, and the balls hit are to be left where they are, or are to be replaced where they were at the commencement of the turn, at the option of the adverse side.

If a player plays a proper turn plays with the wrong ball, he loses his turn and all benefit from the stroke, and the ball or balls moved are to be replaced.

If a ball is moved in taking aim it should in strictness (e. g., in a match) count as a stroke; but it is ordinary usage to allow it to be the ball to replaced to the satisfaction of the adverse side.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

MOBILE.

THIS city is so thoroughly uninteresting that your artist made but one sketch there. That was the picture of the Magnolia Avenue on the Shell Road—or rather what is left of it, for many of the finest trees were cut down in getting range for the guns which were to defend the city—a needless destruction, as they never fired a shot.

The Magnolia, when in bloom, is a handsome tree. It grows tall, and the deep, glossy green of its leaves is a capital foil to the delicate white of its large and perfumed flowers. The tree through which the Shell Road passes—the fashionable drive of Mobile—have long been famous, and it is a great pity so much more than a mile have been destroyed.

Mobile was a terribly demoralized city during the war, and it is not to be wondered at. Garrisoned by a force which was entirely without occupation till toward the close of the war, such looseness pervaded its society as to make it the subject of remark even in the rebel local newspapers. Since it fell into Union hands it has shown itself to be by no means a community where liberal or peaceful sentiments prevail; as witness the repeated burnings of colored churches and school-houses, "entirely the work of accident, unless the niggers did it themselves," as I was assured by a citizen. These and other things—the result of bad policy—are driving much of the trade and even the merchants to New Orleans, whither many of the planters of Alabama follow to get their supplies.

BATON SOUGE.

Inquiry of the citizens failed to throw any light upon the origin of the name of Red Stick. Probably our novelists may be induced to take it upon the baton rouge, but the construction of some magnificent story, connecting the foundation of the city with the most hideous deeds, committed by amiable scoundrels and sweet criminals, in whom the worst vices shall appear worthy of imitation and consonant with the true principles of Christianity. Like all the Southern cities, business here is entirely stagnant, the principal occupation being to keep out of the sun and drink iced drinks. The State House still stands, a melancholy shell, and looks much more than an ancient ruin than it ever had any hopes of doing while perfect. Meanwhile the Legislature meets at New Orleans.

The other prominent building is the Louisiana State Deaf and Dumb Asylum—a very pleasant and commodious building, but having other objects. From its roof the spectator can look over the city and the battle-ground where General WILLIAMS held at the head of his men in 1862. The field is flat, extending in an arc around the city, bounded by woods, where the Confederate army found shelter when drived driven off. Above them a number of good residences are missing, near the arsenal, having been torn down and destroyed to make way for fortification. In this way all chance of an old Spanish defensive works disappeared. The places can still be seen where the shells of the Union fleet tore through the houses, when compelled to open upon the city in revenge for the dastardly conduct of some men (said to be guerrillas) who, concealed behind fences, fired upon a boat's crew who landed to get ice, and killed an officer and a number of men. On that occasion the citizens left in such a hurry that, though the fire killed none, a number died of the unaccustomed exercise.

In all the Southern cities along the rivers the Levee is the place of first importance. If there is any life it will be seen here. In one of my sketches a New Orleans steamer, one of the Atlantic and Mississippi line, has made a landing: while another on its way down is visible in the distance. On the right are the darkies in ice-boats discharging their frosty cargo. This is done, as befits the sunny South, in a clumsy and slovenly manner. The ice-boats are flat-bottomed, with a hold for the ice in sheds, and which might as well be made in one inclined plane to the shore, is constructed with several angles. The sorry and lean appearance of the horses makes the animal carry his bulking frame as well as haul the ice adhere. Fancy a man on a New York dray riding the horse engaged in unloading cargo. While making the sketch a hitch occurred and a derkey fell overboard. Although it did not appear that he could swim, a boat-load of white boys kept out of his way and yelled at him derisively.

The Southern people hate the adverse criticisms of Northern people upon the usual manner in which things are done in the South; but as soon as they realize how much they lose in comfort and dignity as well as money, they will begin to enjoy life as they have not had a chance to do under the demoralizing influences of "the institution."

A. R. W.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

HOW TO BECOME INVALUABLE.—The gift of inviability was formerly believed to be procurable by means of fern-seed; but as seeds are not rendered people inviolable resides especially in the seed of fern. Put on any very seedy suit of clothes and walk about in the streets. You will very soon find that your acquaintance will pass you without seeing you.

A wag thus eulogized a musical ventriloquist: "I know the tune, it is called Long Syne, and the other isn't. I always sing the latter."

THE BEST OF HUSBANDS.

Oh, I have a husband as good as can be;
No women could wish for a better than he!
Sometimes, indeed, he may chance to be wrong,
But his love for me is unchanging and strong.
He has one little fault that makes me fret,
He has always less money by, the first debt;
Moreover, he wishes me now and then—
But, excepting that, he's the best of men!

I own he is dreadfully given to drink:
And, besides, he is rather too fond, I think,
Of playing at cards and billiards, but then,
Excepting that, he's the best of men!

He loves to waltz with the girls, I know
'Tis the way with the men—they're always so,
But what can I do but love him, excepting
Excepting that, he's the best of men?

I can't but say I think he is rash
To pawn my watch and spend the cash;
But how can I avoid my darling, when,
Excepting that, he's the best of men?

When soaked with tipple, he's hardly polite,
But knocks the furniture down. That was Just pulls my hair, and growls again—
But, excepting that, he's the best of men!

Yes—such is the loyalty I have shown;
But I love a husband to call my own:
As good, indeed, as a man can be—
And who could ask for a better than he?

Who was Jonah's tutor?—The whale who brought him to.

"Well, what is it that causes the sultriness of the weather of the ocean?" inquired a teacher of a bright little boy. "The cook, ma'am," said the little elfin.

Why is a mad bull an animal of a convivial disposition?—Because he offers a Keen to every one he meets.

A man who was once on a journey said he never liked to see the bible covered with leaves and newspapers when he stopped at night. "For," said he, "I can never find any subject I want about places."

"If there is any body under the canister of heaven that I have in utter excrescence," says Mrs. Partington, "it is that abominable, going about to destroy character, calculating his calumni upon honest folks."

> A mirror has been well defined
> As a looking-glass or a thoughtful friend.
> For look upon it when you will,
> You find it is reflecting still.

The captain of a vessel is not governed by his mate, but is married to him generally is.

The State of Matrimony is bounded by hugging and kissing on one side, and cradles and babies on the other. Its chief products are flirtations, honeymoons, and staying out late at night. It was discovered by Adam and Eve while trying to find a passage round Paradise. The climate is sultry until you cross the equinoctial line of housekeeping.

ing, when equally weather sets in with such power as to keep all hands cool as cucumbers. For the principal roads leading to this interesting State beneath the first pair of bright eyes you run against. It is one of the United States.

TAXATION.—A grumbler explains the present system of raising revenue as follows: "Now you see, in the first place, they get the answers of a father's business. That's taxed. Then they find out how much he earns every month, and that's taxed. Then they find out all about his profits, and on that they lay their tax. Then they manage to get some tax on what he owes. Next comes when they call income, and that's taxed. Then, if any thing is left, the preacher rolls around, and gits it to sustain the church and convert the heathen."

"GO AWAY," said Mugglins, "you can't stiff sich nonsense in me—its fust in his boots! No man as lives stands more nor two foot in his boots, and no use talking 'bout it. Might as well tell me the man had six heads in his hat!"

Effectual destruction of weeds—marrying a widow.

THAT.

Till prove the word that I've made my theme
Is that that may be doubled without blame;
And that that that thus twisted, I may use,
And that that that that critics may abuse,
May be correct. Further—the dose to bother—
Five thats may closely follow one another;
For, be it known, that we subtle write,
Or say that that that that that man writ was right;
Nay, 'tis that that that that that followed
Through six repeats the grammar's rule has hallowed;
And that that that that that that that began
Repeated seven times is right!—deny't who can.

There is a story of a Scotch boy, asked whether he wished to be regenerated, replying, "Na, na!" "What for not, Robin?" "Because regeneration means being born again, and then who can tell I mightna be a lassie?"

What metamorphosis does a washer-woman undergo in the night?—She goes to bed a washer-woman and gets up fine linen.

PENALTIES FOR CLERKS.

Dropping a pen-stick, five cents.
Sitting down, between the hours of 8 A.M. and 7 P.M., ten cents.
Conversing with a gentleman, ten cents.
Five minutes late in the morning, ten cents.
Dropping a piece of goods on the floor, five cents.
In case of sickness, wages suspended. "Saturies," from one to four dollars per week. Board, from three to six dollars.

An advertiser in one of the papers says he has a cottage to let, containing eight rooms and an acre of land.

A love-sick young pair who had only a dollar
To pay to the priest for the conjugal collar,
Were told by the parson his regular fee
For marrying people was only a V.
"Nay, then," quoth the swain, "good parson, now come!
A dollar, I'm sure, ought to marry us some;"
"In all I have got you can take it, you know,
And marry as far as the money will go!"

A STRONG LETTER.

"MESSRS. ——: I return your firkin of butter. It is of no use to me, and it might do for a 'leader' on one of your fast freight trains. The reason of the year requires strength. Yours respectfully."

A statistician says he has perused fourteen hundred and thirty-three different articles upon the cholera, in all of which the authors advise different preventatives.

Two duellists, having exchanged shots without effect, one of the seconds interfered, and proposed that the parties should shake hands. To this the other second objected as unnecessary, "for," said he, "their hands have been shaking this half hour."

The brave man tries his sword, the coward his tongue:
The old coquette her gold, her face the young.

At what time of life may a man be said to belong to the vegetable kingdom?—When long experience has made him sage.

PROGRESS OF THE ART OF WAR.

Primitive Arms.

Invention of pugilism and wrestling.—The war lasts as long as the fellows can stand it.

The Cane.

First application of the principle of the lever. The art progresses.—The war lasts till one of the fellows gets his head broken.

The Bludgeon.

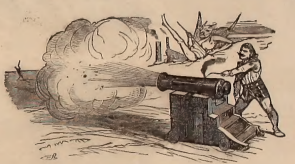
The cane is outdone. The head-breaking process is facilitated.—The fight is an affair of all-day or not, according to the circumstances.

The Sword.

The fellow that was overcome by the bludgeon gains an advantage over his enemy by means of a more convenient and effective weapon.—The war lasts for a couple of centuries.

The Long Sword.

The invention of this weapon gives the fighter the satisfaction of piercing his antagonist at a safe distance.—The war lasts for a century.



The Pistol.

The Devil puts in an appearance, and suggests the invention of gunpowder. General enthusiasm. Startling progress. The fellow with the long sword is slightly astonished at a piece which pierces at a distance of twenty-five paces.

The Gun.

A new stage of progress. The fellow with the pistol is outdone and killed at the distance of a hundred paces.—The war lasts thirty years.

The Cannon.

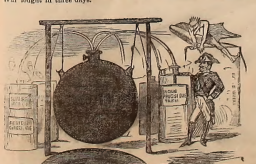
Those who have escaped the gun, after some reflection invent the cannon. Delightful success! At five hundred paces several antagonists are killed at once.—The Thirty Years' War reduced to seven years.

The Needle-Gun.

But there is no limit to human sagacity. A remarkable discovery is made—the Needle-Gun is invented. The enemy finds it difficult to get in a shot until he has dodged a dozen.—The Thirty Years' War reduced to thirty days.

The Fusil Foentail or Fan-Gun.

The manner of fighting in 1870. Twenty-five needle-guns in one. One man destroys a company in five minutes at a distance of 3,000 yards.—The Thirty Years' War fought in three days.



The Electric Organ Gun.

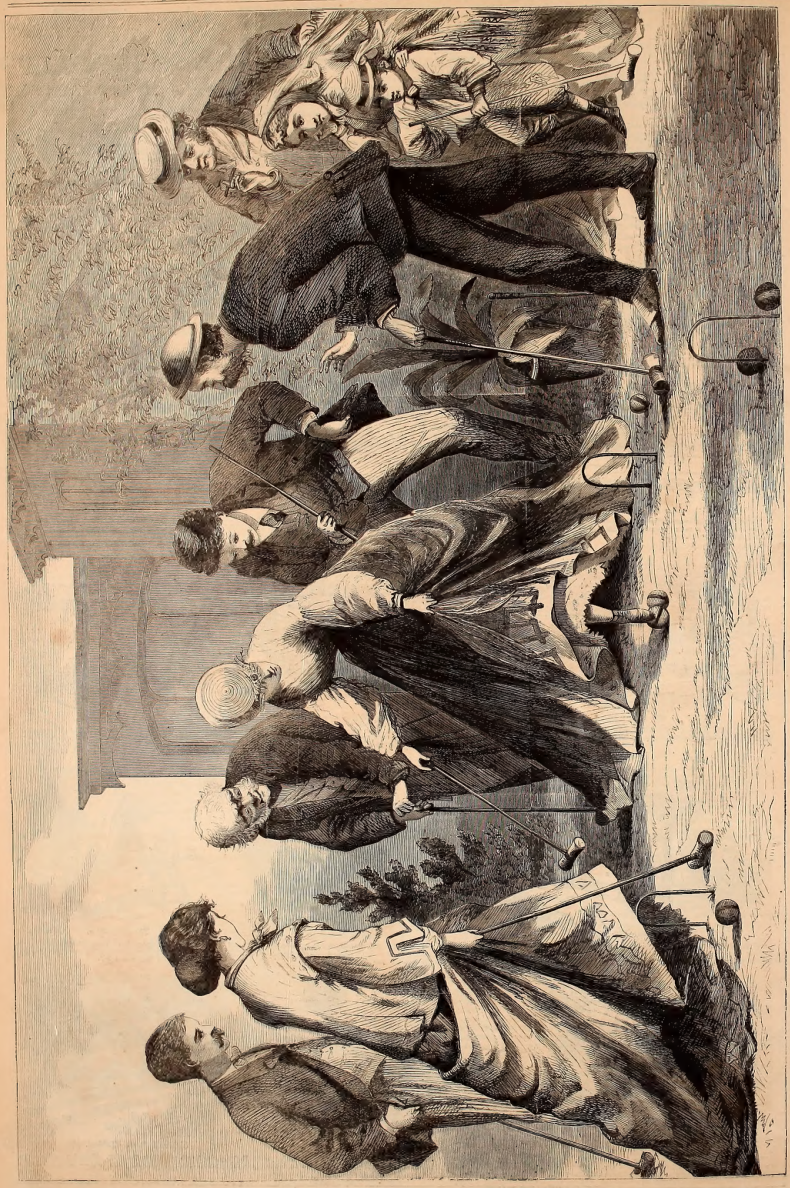
The manner of fighting in 1880. Twenty-five fan-guns in one, discharged by means of an electric battery with a musical accompaniment.—The Thirty Years' War fought in a day and a half.

The Steam-Gun.

Manner of fighting in 1890. Twenty-five organ guns in one, manœuvred by steam, and acting continuously.—The Thirty Years' War fought in a day.

The Surprise Bomb.

The manner of fighting in 1900. The Engineer of the Army beaten by steam, in his moments of leisure invents a terrible asphyxiating surprise bomb, which will choke off a division at ten thousand yards.



Another Surprise Bomb.

But the Field-Marshal of the Asphyxiated Army executes a more diffusive asphyxiating powder, which, at ten thousand yards, disposes of an entire army corps.

Universal Peace—Tableau.

Each army at length annihilates the other. There is a reign of calm and tranquillity.—The War of Thirty Years lasts for three minutes.

THE GAME OF CROQUET.—DRAWN BY MR. BERG.—[SEE PAGE 567.]

TIMELY WARNING.
UNION BLOOD
Th. Nast.
TO UNION MEN.
THE NEW ORLEANS SUFFRAGE
CIVIL RIGHTS
FREEDMEN'S BUREAU
EQUAL RIGHTS
CONVENTION OR MASSACRE.
WHICH IS THE MORE ILLEGAL.

ONLY SOME RELICS.

A RING she wore, a jewel that pressed
The maiden beauty of her breast.

A glove our happy hand once drew
From her small fingers veined with blue.

A ribbon that around her throat
Loved in the dallying winds to float.

A golden clasp that once had known
The silken pressure of her zone.

A little slipper with blue rosette,
In which her fairy foot was set.

And one brown tress, through happy years
Binding the shell-dome of her ears.

Ah, me, what treasures of dull relic
Are all of our Dear One that now remains.

All the dear relics that are left
Of her by whose loss our hearts are cleft.

Leaving the world a dim, dead space
Of care and pain where with little grace.

A dull, dead level of weary years
In which no blossoming joy appears.

No girl with teeth like the rows of corn
When you strip the ear as the summer is born.

And tresses of clanging gold and brown,
Over shoulders of ivory, shaken down.

And lips in whose arched and crimson bow
All the dainty blooms of the tropics glow.

And over whose dimpled cheeks, like light
And shade over meadows, the thoughts take flight,

Winged by her innocent, dancing eyes,
With curious and coquetry, smiles and sighs.

Her voice was the hum of a summer wind
When it breathes through a lattice with roses twined.

Her soul was as pure, as unsullied and white
As the clustering scraps in robes of light.

And the kindness that dwelt in her heart, I deem,
Of the Heaven she now dwells in was some stray gleam.

Oh loved and lost! our soul's adored!
Our dove with silver wings—our bird!

Beauty embodied, and joy, and peace,
Whose breath had a charm bidding sorrow cease.

Rest gift that Heaven to bless us gave—
We cast this chaplet on thy grave.

HELEN O'KELLY.

THE TALE OF AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE.

In Six Weekly Portions.—Second Portion.

CHAPTER III.

AUNT AND UNCLE GOUGH were neither rich nor grand people, though the Gable House was, as I have said, the noblest looking dwelling in Willbrook. The house was not my uncle's own property, but he held a long lease of it. It belonged to some great county magnates: a baronet whose seat was a few miles off, though he was a mighty person in Willbrough, and held property for miles around it. But society, or speaking, be sure as far removed from my household as if he had lived in Kamschatka. His steward, Mr. Lee, we knew slightly, and shabbily-genteel we met him in the street on market-days; but he was so solemn and grand a person that he always chilled me into awe-struck silence, though he often condescended to smile and speak to us girls as we grew up. Once he told uncle that Miss Anna had a monstrous sprightly air and a fine riding-habit, and would turn all the young fellows' heads by-and-by. "And did he say nothing of our sweet Madge?" asked my aunt when the flattering words had been reported at home and had been blushed and smiled at. Aunt Gough, dear, tender-hearted soul, feared that I might feel slighted; but, in truth, it had never occurred to me as possible that the pompous Mr. Lee should have noticed or remembered me at all. "Well, well, well," said my uncle as he drew me to him with no sweet and fond a smile that I felt my eyes fill with tears, "I'm not sure that I want Mr. Lee to make pretty speeches about Madge. He can tell what lots of them has the brightest eyes; of that he's a good enough judge, so don't think I want to rob you of your compliments, Anna. But if Madge won't turn heads she'll creep into hearts; won't she, my dear?" He passed his hand softly over my hair as he spoke. I want to be true, and I must confess that, just for a moment I felt a sort of irritable impatience at being told I should not turn heads. Why should I not turn heads as well as another? I half withdrew myself from the touch of the fatherly hand that was caressing me. But the little unworthy feeling passed directly, and in an instant I had kissed my uncle, and we were all laughing together at Anna's annoyance that she would not be permitted to be turning precess on Mr. Lee himself, the very next time she saw him.

The opportunity was not long in coming, but I think Anna had forgotten her vow: at any rate, I don't believe she tried to fulfill it. It was a fortnight since uncle had told us of Mr. Lee's appointment, on the next market-day but one, that my sister and I, coming homeward up the High Street, as we usually did, under the tall figure of my uncle, one on each side with the portly Mr. Lee. They were talking earnestly together, and going at a much slower pace than we were, so we soon overtook them. The foot pavement of the Willborough High Street was very narrow: so narrow that two persons walking abreast needed its whole width. We could not pass my uncle and Mr. Lee by stepping off the pavement, because on market-days the roadway was filled with country folk. Vendors of poultry, eggs, butter, fruit, and vegetables stood all along the edge of the causeway. Great carts, piled with country produce, or laden with a ruddy-cheeked farmer's family, jolted ponderously along, the wagoner whip in hand steering his unwieldy horses amidst the crowd as well as he could; and the docile beasts seeming to understand his uncouth gees, and woes, and wots, with almost human intelligence. Now and again a prosperous yeoman would ride by, his well-fed cob chafing and fretting at the enforced slowness of the pace. Then there were stout servant-girls with heavy baskets, traveling pedlars hoarse with vaunting their wares, a blind fiddler or doleful ballad-singer, farm-laborers slow and bewildered of aspect, busy shop-keepers showing school-boys, barking dogs, cackling hens, and I don't know what else.

We came close behind my uncle and his companion, and had even walked some paces at their heels before they were aware of our being near them.

"Yes, Mr. Gough," said the steward with pompous emphasis, "so it is arranged. He will have the advantage of my name, position, and connection, and I think on the whole we may expect a fair start—a fair start. If a young man is put in the way of making a fortune, I consider it to be his own fault if he does not—if he does not, in fact, start fair."

"Quite so, quite so, Mr. Lee," returned our guardian with a pleasant laugh. "And I make no doubt but the young gentleman will do you credit."

Here Anna, pushing forward, gayly stretched her arm over uncle's shoulder and thrust a bunch of sweet herbs we had been buying for home under his nose. He said Ah! Mr. Lee stopped and turned round; as they did so, a third gentleman, who had been walking a little in advance of them, and whom we had not seen until now, stopped too on hearing my uncle's exclamation. "What now!" cried uncle, his face fighting up into smiles, as it always did whenever he saw any of us, "Anna! Nancy! I might have known it was one of your pranks. Fie, miss! Ain't you ashamed? Here's Mr. Lee blushing for you."

I don't think Mr. Lee was blushing, but I know Anna was, and laughing too, and looking very pretty. Mr. Lee shook hands with us girls with enough condescension; and as we were blocking up the pathway, and were being huddled and pushed this way and that, Uncle Gough bade us two walk on, and said: "Perhaps Mr. Lee and Mr. Horace will be good enough to come to the Gable House and see aunty, and give us the pleasure of drinking a toast to Mr. Horace's success and prosperity, in our homely fashion, after dinner." Then the third gentleman, who had been in advance of them, was presented to us by Mr. Lee as "My son Horace, young ladies;" and our uncle's invitation having been accepted, we all proceeded homeward. The two elders resumed their talk immediately, and chatted together all the way. Mr. Horace walked quietly side by side in silence until we reached the old iron gateway of the Gable House.

That was the first time I ever saw Horace Lee.

CHAPTER IV.

It is difficult for me now to separate that first impression from my subsequent knowledge of Horace, but I am nearly sure that I liked him from the first, although he was not my style of beauty at all, stiff, perhaps. I remember, quite certainly, feeling pleased (though I should have been puzzled to say why) that the pompous Mr. Lee was not very like his father. Just the color of the bluish-gray eyes, and the expression of them, were alike in the two. But Horace had not his father's massive jaw and coarse mouth, and he had altogether a gentlewistful look of expression, which was new to me, to a man, which I suppose he inherited from his dear mother.

Uncle Gough stepped forward and led the way beneath the porch of famous memory, and into the hall; and we four, Anna and I and the two Mr. Lees, followed in a procession having been forbidden. But I noticed that when we came to the dining-room door and my sister and I passed on instead, all Mr. Lee's pompousness left him, and he actually bowed way, and entered before us; and that a slight look of annoyance came across the young man's face as he found himself deserted little boy to allow us to pass. Dear Aunt Gough was the soul of hospitality, and I believe if uncle had brought home half-a-dozen guests to dinner his wife would have felt no more regret than might be occasioned by anxiety lest they should not all be comfortable and well cared for. She looked a little surprised when Mr. Lee walked in, for he had never been on intimate terms at the Gable House; but she welcomed him kindly, and in the next, simple kindliness that can not be counterfeited. And then, during dinner we heard how it was that Mr. Horace was to be taken into what would be meant by speaking of a toast to his success and prosperity.

"Mr. Lee's son is coming to settle among us here, old woman," said my uncle to my aunt. "He has been studying engineering and land-surveying away in Birmingham, with Mr. Topps."

"Topps," said the elder Mr. Lee, seeing that uncle paused for the name. "Topps. A very eminent man, Madam. Very eminent. An extensive, very expensive. Put eminence is ever expensive." The old gentleman looked round as he said it, and had evidently been highly gratifying, and expected us to appear pleased. Horace kept his eyes on his plate.

"Yes," resumed my uncle, "Mr. Horace has been studying with Mr. Topps. I am sure that Mr. Horace has profited by the opportunity; and his course of study being now finished, I am glad to say that coming to give us Willborough folk the advantage of his skill."

"I have bought him a share in the old established business of Phillips and Rotherwood," put in Mr. Lee. "Mr. Phillips is about retiring, and there is an opening for a young man with moderate capital and a good connection. I consider that I have done my duty by my son, in keeping before him from boyhood the advantage of a good connection. And, if I may be allowed to say so, I think he will find a good connection ready to receive him, and to respect him—for his father's sake."

"No doubt of that, Sir," said Uncle Gough, after no short a silence that Anna secretly seemed to have been a pause at all; "and to like him for his own."

Horace looked up at my uncle then, and thanked him with a smile so bright that it seemed to light up his face as if a ray of sunshine had fallen on it.

After that we girls went away with my aunt, and left the gentlemen over their wine. They did not remain apart very long, for the Lees had a tenmile drive to their home, and the days were drawing already at the approach of autumn. They came into the morning-room where we were sitting to take leave of my aunt. Old Mr. Lee was a good deal flushed, and had been doing justice to my uncle's ollar. That was no uncommon circumstance in those days, but it was one we never saw them.

for James Gough was the most temperate of men.

"Won't you stay and drink a dish of tea, Sir?" asked my aunt, hospitably, though she looked a little fluttered as Mr. Lee took her hand and glared at her solemnly. He was not intoxicated, but he had taken enough to make him more pressy and pompous than usual.

"I thank you, Madam, but 'tis a beverage I never partake of, and we are pressed for time. My horse and gig are awaiting us at the Blue Bell, but I could not depart without expressing my best thanks for your hospitality." Anna, my dear, why do you not join your acknowledgments to mine? I am surprised at your negligence."

"Oh, papa!" cried our aunt, quite earnestly, "I'm sure there's no need, none in the world. It's a great pleasure to us to have entertained the young gentleman in our homely fashion."

"But there is need, Madam," persisted Mr. Lee. "There is need; pardon me for contradicting you, but I am sure there is need. The observance of these polite forms which—which—gild the wheels of life. Likewise, I was brought up in the observance of the utmost courtesy and deference to my fair sex. You may deem me punctilious and over-precise, young man, but in my day it was thought no part of a gentleman's duty to be a lady's lounge without a parting compliment. Courtesy, courtesy and consideration for the fair sex, even in the most trifling matters, has been the study of my life."

I couldn't help thinking of the little scene at the dining-room door, and I had an uncomfortable idea that Mr. Lee was speaking of the same thing, and I felt my cheeks grow provokingly scarlet. Mr. Lee went on some time longer, and made quite a speech, which, however, seemed to be spoken rather at us than to his son; but at last it came to an end, and he took a dignified leave of me, and an admiring one of Anna, after her several high-flown compliments, which she received very graciously and with much self-possession. Horace made each of us his silent little bow. I fancy his father's paternal admonition had not tended to put him more at his ease. But no bashfulness could have helped shewing under the influence of Aunt Gough's genial motherly manner, and the young man took her hand, and bade her farewell, quite cordially.

"I hope we shall see you at the Gable House very often," we heard my uncle saying, as he accompanied his guests down stairs. "You'll be a welcome visitor, Sir, I'm sure. If you can put up with hohmdum old-fashioned folks like us, you will always find a warm welcome and a cool tankard."

I have been sure since that old Mr. Lee had accosted my uncle that market-day, and introduced his son to him, because that he might receive some such invitation, and secure a footing in the Gable household. I know not if he had any further end in his mind at the time; but it was of course but a trifling advantage to a new-comer in Willborough to be known as a welcome guest at the Gable House, the house which the baronet's steward was very sensible of, notwithstanding his boasts about his good connection. We had never been honored by so much of Mr. Lee's company before that day, and I think we were all tacitly agreed that we liked him much better in his own house than in very often. But my uncle had taken a liking to the son, and said over and over again, "He's a nice lad. A well-spoken, well-mannered, handsome lad; that's strange among us as yet. But where in the world he gets his shyness from the Lord knows! His father is as free and easy as possible. I never knew her; but he looks like a lad who has had a nice mother."

The autumn days grew shorter and shorter, the faint smell of dead leaves was in the air, and the pale evening sky, pricked here and there with a star, looked cheerless, began to show the delicate tracery of leafless boughs relieved against its faint western yellow. By that time Horace Lee was a familiar and welcome figure beneath my uncle's roof as old Stock himself. His shyness wore off as he grew intimate with us, and we found him to be the most pleasant companion in the world—a simple, boyish fun and merriment which especially delighted my uncle. A clever bond of good-fellowship between them was that which Horace found that he had in common with my uncle's native place! How was a pleasant discovery! Uncle Gough was very fond of questioning Horace about his dead mother, and rubbing up his own reminiscences of her family, the McNaghtens, until he ended by persuading himself that he must have known Mrs. Lee in her early youth, though I am afraid it was inexorably proved by dates and figures that he could never have seen her. He would sit and talk for hours of the wild moorlands and the heathery solitudes he had tramped through when a boy, relating one adventure after another, until the northern burr would come back to his tongue, and the sparkle into his eye, and he would bid Anna stay some old Border ballad, and would sit listening with closed eyes to every fresh thrilling verse, while his heart lived over again the days of auld lang syne, and the tears stole unchecked down his dear honest face.

Horace too would listen, charmed and attentive. Anna, who loved excitement and admiration as much as most girls conscious of their beauty, and accustomed to receive praise in no stinted measure, never threw so much power and pathos into her voice, or so much expression into her changing face, as when Horace united the membership of her home audience and added novelty to the chorus of our familiar praises.

CHAPTER V.

MISS WORKNIAM was a frequent guest at this time at our fireside. She had made a confidence to us, and imparted a great piece of news, which we received half with pleasure and half with pain. The pleasure was occasioned by the hope that she would be happy, and the pain by the thought of losing her. Miss Workniam was going to be married! And her husband was to take her out of Willborough, out of England, out of Europe, away across the salt sea as far as North America. I well remember the day when she first broke the news to us, and the comical intrigue between crying and laughing which switched her face all the time she was telling it. It was the afternoon of a half-holiday, one bright October day, when she walked into the parlor where Anna and I were sitting with Aunt Gough, who was half asleep over a perfect Arachne's web of fine-sewing. "Well, my half-educated Philosophy," said Miss Workniam, greeting me with a kiss, which I had to stoop down to receive. (Almost every one of my pupils in the diminished by a head.) "Well, miss Philosophy. Anna she always called Will-o'-the-wisp.) "Well, mild-eyed Philosophy! I need not ask how are you!" for a face more expressive of health and peace, and, abruptly, "I'm not used to tell lies, and I find it extremely hard to do well. It's of no use my coming in with a swagger and pretending to be quite at my ease; for I'm not at my ease, and I'm not well-bred enough to pass; and I know that you know I'm not at my ease. I've come on purpose to tell you something, Mrs. Gough, and as the dear girls are all here, I may as well stay and hear it too, for they must know it sooner or later." She stopped an instant; but, seeing my aunt was about to speak, held up her hand to bid her silence, and went on with a plunge. "I am going to be married, and I know every thing that such a human event is to comfort and to cause sorrow, against the disadvantages of being laughed at for an old fool who threw away herself and her savings on the first frog-eating Frenchman who chose to hold up his finger to her, and I've come to the conclusion that I can endure existence in good company better than dreary old age by myself. So there's my great news, my dears, and you needn't put any restraint on the expression of your feelings."

I never heard any one observe that Aunt Gough was remarkable for tact; but she certainly had a way of saying and saying the right thing at the right moment, which fell like soothing balm on the feelings of those around her. She was not at all in woe the fashion to call "sympathetic," in a greater degree than any one I have ever known. When little Lisa Wakeham had finished her confession, and sat panting with her mouth twisted into a strained smile, and her bright black eyes brimming with tears, my aunt took her unto her motherly lap by her own, and, patting it soothingly, said in her soft, slow way, and without a trace of surprise in her voice: "I always suspected you knew it, my poor sensible woman I think you for bringing it. And who is to be the good man, my love?"

The little woman jumped up and put her arms round my aunt's neck; giving way now to a gush of tears.

"That's the phrase," she said. "The very phrase, you dear, kind soul! I have been puzzling how I should call him—not in my own thoughts, you know, but to other people; and that's the very, very, or my betrothed, was out of the question. Even husband gave me a kind of shock. It's no use to begin, you know. But 'good man' is the very phrase! Cozy and proxy, and yet kindly. And you don't think me a weak old idiot, do you?"

By-and-by the tears were dried down and received our congratulations with her usual sensible self-possession. Then by degrees she told us the story of her courtship.

"It's Mons' de Beaupet, the French master—Old Bogie, you know, girls. I shall be Mrs. Old Bogie. Won't that be a good name for me? I'm sure I never thought of such a thing all the years I've known him. He seemed always an old man, and a mamma, until, about a month ago, he came to me and told me that he had had an unexpected piece of good fortune. 'I have succeeded to a property, I said,' for I have a great respect for you, and I'm sure you deserve a noble from Fortune after bearing so forsen with her all these years.' But all the world knows how natural cheerful bravery is to a Frenchman.' My dears, I knew he had been very, very poor, and had fought a hard fight without asking aid from any one. So it was not a mere flourish on my part. He made me a grand bow, and said, 'I accept the compliment for my nation, mademoiselle, not for myself.' And then he told me that a distant relative, from whom he had not expected any favors, had died in Canada, whither he had emigrated many years ago, and that this distant relaive had left a small property and a farm near Quebec to his second cousin, Louis Auguste Philippe Emile de Beaugeust. I wrote the names down afterward, and that's how I remember them so glibly. And then he said that he had resolved to give up teaching and to go out and settle in Canada, where there was quite a colony of his country people; but he was full of his plans and hopes. He didn't say a word about—about me—then. After he was gone I don't mind owning that I felt much depressed. I was full of his good prospects, really glad; and yet the idea of his going away all that distance, set me thinking how all those to whom I was attached—I had other and stronger ties in the world—how the girls I had loved and taught grew up and passed out of my life, generation after generation, vanishing away to be bright and pretty and clever in their distant homes, without a thought of their poor schoolmistress growing old by herself in their poor acquaintance. And I could not help thinking how other women took root, as it were, in the world, and here fruit, and blossomed into a green old age; while I stood alone, like some cold bare rock that had no beauty and little use, and must some day topple down and be forgotten where it falls. I worked myself into such a dismal, desolate frame of mind—more shame for me!—that I sat huddled up by the fire, crying and sobbing like a fool, when my little servant Kate came bouncing into the room—you remember, Philippsky, my love, that we never could teach her to knock at the door—and brought me a great square letter, sealed with a coat of arms as big as a cheese-plate. It was from De Beaugeust, of course. I'm not going to repeat it to you, don't be afraid, though I do know it by heart—here a faint pink flush came over Miss Wokenham's pale cute pale face—but I may say it was a good letter, a very good letter. He said he felt alone in the world. He had been exiled from his country and all he held dear in it for so many years that France was more like a beautiful dream to him than a reality. He said a great deal more than he need have done about generous kindness and delicate sympathy on the part of your humble servant. I'm not going to repeat that, and I was not gratified; but he gave me more than my due ten thousand times over. And then at last he said that if I would—there!—condescend to unite my lot with his, and go abroad with him, he would undertake that I should never repent my confidence. I took a week to consider about it, and then I said—upon my word I am not sure—that my mind was made up from the first. And the end of it is that I've promised Lewis to take him for better, for worse, and to be a faithful, kind companion to him, as well as I know how, so long as I have life and strength, and longer."

After this Miss Wokenham was a great deal at the Gable House. She had many preparations to make, and not too much time to get ready in. They were to be married in Liverpool, and to sail from that port in a merchantman bound for Quebec. Monsieur de Beaugeust had arranged all that. My aunt was a perfect mistress of the craft of needlework, and Anna and I were fairly creditable scholars of so accomplished a teacher. So we all three were able to be useful to our old friend, and were happy to, be allowed to help in the preparation of her wardrobe. The year was drawing to a close by this time, and we worked our way through the very core of the winter. Anna was a better seamstress than I, and her rapid fingers did good service in the manufacture of caps and aprons, and such other sober decorations as Miss Wokenham thought becoming her years. I worked neatly but slowly, and our shrewd little bride elect was wont to say: "You're both dear, kind children; but, on a stitching emergency, give me Anna! Philippsky, with the very best intentions, stops at every crossroad to deliberate which turning she shall take. Will-o'-the-wisp never marying and does get over the ground, even though it be after a somewhat sniggling fashion."

One cold bleak day we had all been busy in the morning-room from an early hour. When, in the sudden dusk, Miss Wokenham folded up her work and prepared to go homeward my aunt stopped her and insisted that she should stay to take tea and sup with us.

"Hector will be here too, by-and-by," said Aunt Gough—"young Mr. Lee that is; but he seems so much one of us now that I give the lad his Christian name as often as possible. And both of them will be so glad to see you."

"I should like to stay very much, but—but Mr. Lee's not to meet me this evening at your boy's way home, and perhaps he'd be disappointed if I was not there."

"Perhaps he would?" echoed Aunt Gough—"Why, of course he would. But I will send some one to him with my respects, to say that you are here, and that you'll see him to tea, if he will do us the pleasure of coming without ceremony."

"Thus tempted, Miss Wokenham remained; and in due time Lee "arrived." We had seen him since the announcement of his engagement to our old schoolmistress, he having made a formal visit to my aunt, and also been presented by his affianced with all due observance and punctilio. But on this occasion he came on a more intimate footing, and without the precept of etiquette and ceremony which it had pleased him to assume at first. "Mister, without his mail of proof, was a very genial, simple creature, with more of youthful freshness and romantic chivalry than I have often seen remaining in dashing young officers of half his years. He was a handsome man of fifty, with high, clear-cut features, a florid skin, and the bluest of blue eyes.

"I look up to you all of you, Ma'am," said my aunt, thus pronouncing his patronymic in all simplicity and good faith; "I very kind, that you should have come to us in this friendly way, and I hope you'll be able to make yourself comfortable among us."

Mister was at home in a minute.

"Ah, Elise!" said he, sitting cozily beside Miss Wokenham in the glow of the fire-light, "dese is de occasion dat make me suggester to leave Paris."

"Yes, indeed," she replied; "I can't commend your grammar, but your sentiment is mine exactly. I shall never get him to talk good English—no, Gough, no more than he will ever teach me to pronounce good French; and that's speaking pretty strongly, as you would know if you had ever heard my attempts."

She speaks very well, Madame," interrupted her bridegroom elect. "She can say 'oui,' and 'je t'aime,' and that's so much French as I ask of her."

While we were laughing at this, and Miss Wokenham was protesting with unnecessary exactness that she never said "je t'aime" to him, and was declaring that her friends would think she had taken leave of the last remnant of her senses if he went on in that way, my uncle and Horace Lee entered together.

"I picked up this young gentleman on my way home from Ostlands; or, rather, he picked up me, for I was afoot, and he driving in Rotherwood's gig. He has been very civil to my horses, and tramping through plowed fields with a chain round his middle, or some such adornment, and—"

"—And he has been very civil to the presence of ladies, Mrs. Gough," said Horace, finishing my uncle's speech. "But there was no refusing. You know how positive your lord and master can be on occasion."

"She does!" said my uncle with a laugh. "Of the sweet simplicity of three-and-twenty! As if a man was ever positive with his wife! But there, Phillis, run to my room—you know the way—to polish yourself up a bit, my dear; and tramping through plowed fields with a chain round his middle, or some such adornment, and—"

"—And he has been very civil to the presence of ladies, Mrs. Gough," said Horace, finishing my uncle's speech. "But there was no refusing. You know how positive your lord and master can be on occasion."

"She does

THE NEW LIFE-BOAT.

THE Red, White, and Blue is what is termed an "Ingersoll Metallic Life-Boat," being the invention of Mr. O. R. INGERSOLL, of New York. The boat is built of galvanized iron, has large air cylinders at each end and along the sides, which, combined with certain valves in the bottom, render the boat capable of freeing herself from water in a few minutes. This identical boat was exhibited at the American Institute Fair in 1865, where a gold medal was awarded it; and as it is the intention to have it exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, it will undoubtedly take the prize, having been subjected to a severer test than any life-boat ever before. While the Great Eastern—the largest ship the world ever saw, and an honor to old England—was approaching our shores, the Red, White, and Blue, the smallest ship that ever crossed the Atlantic, and the wonder of this country, was at the same time winging her course to Europe. She was manned by Captains J. M. HUNSON and FAVER, both well-known navigators, and natives of New York. The passage was made in 37 days, most of the time in rough weather, as the Great Eastern reports. The sails were made and presented to the boat by D. M. CROWNINSHIELD, of this city, who has manifested great confidence in the success of the voyage. The vessel was stocked with all sorts of condensed meats, vegetables, and fruits. The boat averaged $5\frac{6}{10}$ miles an hour, which is much faster than many of 1500 or even 2500 ton vessels (the Red, White, and Blue is $2\frac{1}{2}$ tons), which seldom make the voyage in less than 45 days.

THE "RED, WHITE, AND BLUE."

"THREE-CARD MONTE."

THE scene presented in the accompanying sketch is one frequently seen on Coney Island. The sharper who performs the trick, having gathered about him a crowd, selects from his pack a figured card—say the Queen of Diamonds, which he facetiously nick-names "Polly Perdyne," or something else, as the humor takes him. He shuffles the cards in such a way that it is perfectly easy for the spectators to follow the card in all its wanderings; and, as if to aid the eye, the card usually bears upon the back some mark which gives the spectator unusual confidence as to the accuracy of his vision. The sharper offers to bet against the spectator's eyes. "I'll bet you five dollars," he says, "you can't follow Miss Polly." The spectators are pretty sure they can; and one of them bets, and as the cards are laid out in three packs upon the stand, they all watch the card narrowly. After the deal, the spectator points out the card, and, sure enough, it is Miss Polly. Sharper looks a little frustrated, but is willing to bet again. The operation is repeated with a similar result. The spectators get excited, and think the sharper is having a losing game. "He doesn't see," they whisper among themselves, "that little black speck on Miss Polly's back." So they are in for another trial, and the sharper, as if in bravado, declares he is willing to bet a hundred dollars on the result. He will have no more small play. The confident spectators may not be able to stake so large a sum, but by clubbing together some of the more excited ones make up a purse of from thirty to fifty dollars, and the cards are dealt again. But the sharper is too much for his opponents this time. By some sleight of hand he slips in another card, similar in appearance on the reverse, black speck and all. The spectators follow this as curiously and confidently as on the previous occasions, but upon pointing out the card find to their astonishment that Miss Polly has vanished—and likewise their money!

"RESCUED FROM THE WOLF."

EVERY one is familiar with anecdotes of the faithfulness, perseverance, intelligence, and courage of dogs employed to guard and protect the silly, defenseless, gregarious sheep. Somewhat different breeds of dogs—all, however, possessing the same valuable qualities—are used in various countries; the larger and more powerful kinds being of course required where danger from wolves still remains. But many instances are related of dogs far inferior in size beating off from the flock and killing the savage but cowardly wolf. Some naturalists may tell us that the wolf is really identical with the dog, but generations of domestication have deprived the latter of ferocity without diminishing his courage. Certainly the most wonderful fact relating to domestic animals is the transmission of acquired qualities from the parent to the offspring; the peculiar sagacity of the shepherd's dog seems, however, rather intuitive than acquired.

That the scene of the picture is laid, say, in Switzerland or the Black Forest is apparent from the slight indication of costume answering to those localities worn by the shepherd, who is also coming to the rescue; and in the winter season (also represented) such an incident as that selected by Mr. CARTER must be of occasional occurrence. A ram or wether has strayed from the flock—perhaps benumbed with cold; the wolf has fallen upon the straggler, and, before even the watchful dog can interpose, has mangled and disabled it; but, just in the very nick of time, "the shepherd's best friend" rushes to the rescue, dashes at the "thief and murderer," and, seizing him by the throat, pins him till dead, or till the shepherd comes up; when, as if acknowledging the natural supremacy of man, the wolf will almost invariably give himself up to destruction without further resistance.

HAZELEY MILL.

I.

A BUSY place is the old wooden mill at Hazeley from the rising to the setting of the sun, as the clacking wheels whir steadily round to the music of the falling waters, and the miller's men bustle in and out, and up and down at their dusty labors.

THE "THREE-CARD MONTE"—A SCENE ON CONEY ISLAND.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

And a cheerful place is the mill when the light of day is gleaming and glistening on the rapid stream beside it; and wagons from the neighboring villages, or broad-faced farmers, in their chaise-carts, come to and fro to traffic with the wealthy miller; or tarry—for old acquaintance sake—on their way home from the town to discuss the rise in prices, or the latest news gathered there; or to have a social chat and cup of tea with the miller's pleasant, hospitable wife.

But when night falls and work is over, the spot wears, to unaccustomed eyes, a dull and solitary aspect. On two sides the little river environs it closely; on the third, the miller's garden and fields extend for a considerable distance; and on the other, the narrow highway alone separates the miller's domain from a few acres of woodland, the poor remnant of what had once been an extensive forest.

Not a house is nearer than a cluster of laborers' cottages, half a mile away; and the village of Hazeley, in itself but one straggling street, lies still further from the solitary mill. But those who once dwelt within it knew no fear. For years they had found shelter and safety under its roof, even when floods from the adjacent hills roared around the very door-step, and isolated them for days from the dry ground beyond.

Their most troublesome visitors were but a footsore tramp, whose thanks and blessings were easily won by a seat in the porch, and a hearty meal; or —and this was but rarely—a gang of gipsies, whom the prudent dame, with a view to the safety of her hen-roost, while they encamped in the vicinity, was careful to conciliate.

Besides, Abel Weston, the miller, was large-limbed and strong-armed; and in the peaceful valley where he lived and prospered greater crimes than the petty pilfering of saucy boys in the orchards or farm-yards were almost unknown.

From the time she was a merry, active child, delighted to help Mrs. Weston in her garden, or peep with awe-delighted eyes into the mysteries of grinding and bolting, Katie Morris, the neatest and prettiest little girl in Hazeley, had been a member of the miller's household.

At first she was welcomed as an amusing visitor; then prized for her tender assiduities, when the dame's eyes began to fail and her once active limbs to stiffen; and, eventually, as Katie was one of a large family whose parents could scarcely contrive to maintain them all, it was arranged that she should receive a regular wage for her willing services.

From thenceforth she resided entirely with the aged couple; and as she blossomed into fair womanhood, her light footfall and merry songs filling the house with pleasant sounds, the miller and his wife grew to love their protégée as dearly as if she were their own child.

But her friends were not without that frequent blemish—family pride. In their great Bible there were registered generations of staunch yeomen, who had intermarried with the most reputable and ancient families in the county; and Katie, who had never heard a regrateful word from her indulgent employers, saw their brows bent upon her sternly and disapprovingly when their nephew and heir, handsome Hugh, so far forgot himself as to linger by her side in the porch at twilight, and to steal a kiss from her cheek as they parted.

Abel Weston could easily separate the young people, and he did so, by sending Hugh to London to see a little of the world, under the guardianship of a bustling trader, who claimed kinship with him. But would this root out the love with which Katie had inspired the lad? And if not, what was to be done?

Hugh was ardent and impetuous, and if aroused by aught he deemed unjust, or even ungenerous, obstinate to a degree. Against his choice what had they to urge but her poverty and her birth? They had well liked Katie, and she deserved that they should; but they never forgot that her mother was the daughter of a carter who had grown gray in their own service, or that her father? ay, here lay the greatest difficulty of all—

Abel Weston had his hobbies, another men have; his violin, which he treasured and caressed, and played with the enthusiasm of a fanatic; and his politics.

A Conservative, as his sires had been before him, he stanchly upheld Church and State, and refused to believe that the party for whom he voted—whether in power or out of power—could ever do wrong. And his opinions and prejudices, strenuously adhered to, and always vehemently expressed, were sometimes exhausted at the White Horse at Hazeley, where the wealthy miller was generally listened to with respect. But Harvey Morris, the father of Katie, a journeyman carpenter, in a paper cap and patched jacket, not only chose to consider himself superior to the farming men who sat in the tap, and so quaffed his occasional pint at the door of the bar, but joined in the conversation carried on by the favored few admitted to a seat within it. And not content with this intrusion, he had on more than one occasion ventured to contravene some of the miller's assertions, and to argue the rights and wrongs of the working-classes with all the rhetoric of an intelligent but uneducated and dissatisfied man.

This Morris, with his radical notions and errors, must be be permitted to link himself with their family, and perhaps infuse his wild fancies into the mind of the young and enthusiastic Hugh? Abel Weston had begun by fostering a distaste for the saucy workman, whose noisy denunciations of the Government measures had shocked and disgusted him; but little by little the rancorous feeling spread until it deepened into hate; and in his wrath he declared to his grieving dame that he would sooner disinherit the boy than see him the husband of Katie Morris!

Katie was accounted by those who knew her best a high-spirited, quick-tempered girl; but now she bore changed looks and cold words uncomplainingly. To leave the mill was to quit Hazeley, and very possibly to see Hugh no more.

Besides, were not they who rebuked her his nearest and dearest relatives? and for his sake what could she not endure? By-and-by—so she hopefully argued—they would see that the love which had sprung up in their bosoms was no light passion which would wither beneath the first cloud in the sky; and, subdued by her patience and Hugh's entreaties, his uncle would withdraw his tacit opposition, and they should be happy once more.

And thus it might have been, but for the interference of her father. Some gossip-loving neighbor seized the first opportunity of confiding with him on the sorrowful looks of his daughter, Hugh Weston's departure, and the miller's harshness.

His pride in arms that a slight should be cast upon his child, Morris threw down the plane with which he was industriously flogging floor-boards, and without vouchsafing a comment to his officious and now half-alarmed informant, put on his jacket and went to the mill.

At the gate he encountered Katie on her way to the village shop; and drawing her across the road to the shelter of the wood, angrily questioned her.

"You have been in tears! Nay, no denials! These purse-proud Westons have cast your poverty in your teeth, and told you that you are no fit match for their nephew; is it not so?"

She attempted a faint disclaimer, but he would not listen to it.

"RESCUED FROM THE WOLF."—BY J. S. CARTER.—[SEE PAGE 573.]

"I have heard the whole truth of the matter, so why try to deceive me! Come home, child! Nay, you shall stay there no longer. Why, who and what are they to despise you? There is more sense in your little finger, Katie, than in all their shallow pates together! They shall pay dearly for their insolent treatment of you!" and he shook his fist menacingly in the direction of the mill.

"Who has been telling you this, father? I have made no complaints. Is it known in the village?"

"Ay, child, for it was there I learned it. Leave this house at once. There is food and shelter for you at home."

"No," Katie replied, spiritedly, "I will never be a burden to you, nor stay in Hazeley to be pointed at. I will go first to Harvey."

"That's my brave girl! Never fret for Hugh Weston! The lad's well enough, but there are better husbands to be had than he."

But with the sound of that name Katie's resolves melted away, and sitting down on a felled tree she wept piteously.

Not knowing how to console her, Morris paced about, his ire increasing with every sob that burst from the lips of his daughter as she wept.

At last he broke out furiously: "I must be a blind fool or I should have seen this long ago and taken you away. But they shall repent every hour they have made you shed, as sure as my name's Harvey Morris! I'll have a day of reckoning with Abel Wetter for this. Come home, I say, at once!"

"Oh! no, no, father!" she pleaded; "the dame is not well; I could not leave with no one at hand to help her. I will quietly say that you have bid me come away, and I promise you that some time in the evening I will let you know when I can be spared."

At first Morris would not hear of this concession. The womanly tenderness Katie felt for the wife whose board she had sat so long he could not comprehend, and was half disposed to rate her roundly for her want of spirit. But she was resolute; and, still muttering threats against those who contemned her, he plunged more deeply into the wood, too much discomposed to return to his daily labors.

Katie went on her errand; heard her delay cheerily commented on without reply; and then faltered out her intention of quitting the mill.

Dame Weston clasped her feeble fingers and sighed piteously. The miller, although more moved than he would have confessed even to himself, heard her with apparent composure and satisfaction.

"It will be for the better, my wench," he said; "it's better late, and for all of us. And now, one thing quite away? Right; quite right. Get into the town and see a little more of life; and if you marry a decent steady lad, let's know. And then the missus shall send ye a wedding-dinner, and I'll find something toward the house furniture."

"Could you, Harvey, wherever you be," said the old lady, tremulously, "I shall miss ye sadly. I wish——"

She caught the warning look of her husband and paused; and, by common consent, Katie's future was not discussed again.

With a strange heart the poor girl all through that day went slowly about the house bidding a mute farewell to the cozy chambers her willing hands were so strange no more. On the morrow, when the wagon went to the town with a load of flour, the carter was commissioned to bring back with him an elderly cousin of Mrs. Weston's, who could take Katie's place for the present.

Ah! they would soon replace her. Perhaps when Hugh married another would be filling her dutiful so deftly that they would almost cease to remember her.

But where would she learn equal forgetfulness?

The mill had been her home so long, that even now, with her trunk packed for removal, the quiet and silent farewells said to those nooks in the garden and by the river, where Hugh had first whispered his love, it was difficult to realize that she was going away, and forever.

The evening closed in; the cloth was spread for supper, and Dame Weston, who had forgotten her counting-house until the last moment, came in to partake of it.

And now Katie remembered her promise to her father, and reached down her bonnet and shawl.

"She needn't hurry back, child," said the miller, with unwonted gentleness of remonstrance in the tones of his voice. "If thee art a bit late, dame shall go to bed, and I'll smoke a pipe in the garden and wait for thee."

Katie's soul was too full of heaviness to make more than a brief reply to this unexpected offer; but she stooped over Mrs. Weston as she sat dozing, and kissing the old lady's wrinkled cheek, whispered an assurance that she would return in time to assist her up stairs; an effort that would never be here again.

It was a relief to Katie to find the children asleep and her father out. From her mother she could procure the address of an old friend who resided at Ashton, a market-town twenty miles from Hazeley. Thither she would go and seek a service in the crowded farm-house where the name of Hugh Weston could scarcely hurt her.

Unceasing struggles with poverty, and wearying endeavors to support a large family honestly and decently, chafed and fretted Harvey Morris's proud nature at his hard fortune. But they had a different effect upon his wife; perhaps for the reason that he met them in his own strength, while she, with more wisdom, sought the sustaining aid of a Divine arm, and learned in the only book she ever read to be patient and hopeful.

From her sympathizing tenderness Katie won consolation; and when she rose up to depart it was with changed feelings, and a determination to emulate that dear mother's resignation and unfailing trust in Providence.

As she crossed the threshold a sudden thought made her pause and return into the kitchen. "Mother, I'll not go back along the road. Betty Jones is standing at her open door, and I can't bear her to see my swollen eyes. I'll run down the garden and cross the fields, and so home by the wood."

"It's a long round and an unked (lonely) one," her mother dubiously remarked; but Katie was resolute, and with another hasty "God bless you!" she sped away.

The night was closing in somberly, but Katie was familiar with the narrow track she had chosen, and trod it unfrightedly, even when the trees clustered thickly together, and threw their shadows darkly across it; and her thoughts were wandering in that blissful fashion of dreaming in Hugh's fidelity whispered was not impossible, when the tramp of heavy feet aroused her from her reverie.

Katie was no coward, and was free from foolish timidity that she instantly stepped aside and crouched behind a convenient thicket. The same disinclination to betray tears to the curious eyes of Mistress Betty Jones now actuated her desire to avoid the rude stare of others, and she saw no harm in thus avoiding a threatened encounter.

The next moment three men in the rough garb of the working-class came hurrying by, huddling together, hurried loudly and quickly, and glancing fearfully to the right and to the left, as if some terrible shadow which they vainly sought to avoid was dogging their uncertain steps. Scarcely had they passed the hidden listener when she started up with the word, "Father!" upon her lips, for on the one nearest to her she certainly recognized in the dim twilight the old but neatly-patched jacket he commonly wore.

But without perceiving her they had gone on; and wondering a little at their haste and the direction they were pursuing, Katie at once resolved to run down a by-path leading to a bleak common beyond —she went on her own way to the mill.

A couple of hundred yards onward and the stile was reached; but here Katie stopped with an exclamation of surprise, for, fluttering on a bramble beside it, was the unmistakable fragment of material which Mrs. Weston was in the habit of folding over her head as she dozed in her arm-chair in the evening.

Carrying it in her hand, and wondering how it came there, she ran across to the gate of the miller's garden, where she expected to find him awaiting her coming.

But Abel Weston was not there, and the house-door was closed and fastened. This was unusual, for the miller, accustomed to rise early in the summer, seldom sought the fireside in hours so mild as this fair spring gloaming.

Katie forgot her admittance, and the summons remaining unanswered, she stepped back to reconnoitre the chamber windows. Was it later than she had imagined, and they—were so indifferent about her—retired to rest?

If so, surely the key was hung in the porch as it had been appointed for Hugh; and, standing on tip-toe, she groped for the nail. It was empty; and now disposed to resent the inhospitality of the house, she rattled the latch loudly and repeatedly, and then put her ear to the key-hole, and listened for the coming of the miller.

The ceaseless rushing of the water over the weir, and the steady ticking of the Dutch clock hanging in the nook by the dresser, broke the dead, solemn stillness of the hour; for so calm was the night that even the leaves on the beech-trees opposite seemed to be at rest. Suddenly, however, a prolonged groan, followed by a choking sigh, echoed through the quiet house; and Katie, with a shriek of terror, fled from the door, and down the lane to Hazeley.

II.

PALE as a corpse, breathless with running, and unconsciously retaining in her hand the silken kerchief, she reached the cluster of cottages already alluded to.

On a bench outside one of these, where a widow eked out the parish allowance by selling a variety of odds and ends, sat a group of men, two or three laborers were lounging to have a gossip and a neighborly pipe when Katie appeared.

"To the mill! to the mill!" she frantically cried. "The door is fastened—I can not open it—and some one is dying within!"

A few words are the astonished men in possession of what little she knew, and they began to don their hats and rouse up a sleeping blacksmith, whose services might be required in breaking open doors.

The widow had now heard the unusual stir, and she joined the group gathering around the terrified-looking Katie.

"Lordsakes, child!" she cried; "but you've hurt yourself, ain't ye? No? Why, what's this on your pretty handkercher?"

Ay, what indeed! The prudent and pitiful woman forcibly detained the frenzied girl, while the men—their faces blanched with fear—hurried off at some fearful occurrence—hurried off to ascertain what had really happened.

It was well for Katie that, despite her struggles and angry remonstrances, those kind hands detained her; for fearful indeed was the sight that met the beholders, when they had burst open the door and entered the miller's living room.

There had been spoilers in the home of the good couple—ruffians who had come to do their work, and killed in defense of his hard earnings, Jay Abel Weston; and his wife, in feebly endeavoring to protect him, had perished too.

Like one stunned by the vastness of the misfortune, Katie stood there, insensible to the condoling and pitying speeches of those who crowded around her, chafing her cold hands and bathing her temples; and a simple, kindly creature, the wife of the miller of the mill, in a burst of sorrow for the good old master and mistress, mentioned the name of their absent daughter.

Then Katie awoke from her lethargy. "Hugh! eh, Hugh !" she moaned, and bursting through the throng, ran wildly down the road toward Hazeley.

"She's gone to her mother's," said one to another. "It's best so, for she'll feel it sorely. Poor thing!"

Mrs. Morris divined something amiss from her first glimpse of Katie's haggard looks, and throwing aside her work, she folded her arms about the trembling young creature.

"My child, my dear child, what is it?"

"Father!" gasped Katie; "where is he?"

Ere the mother could reply he entered, as ghastly as the girl whose eyes were fearfully surveying him.

With a shudder he raised his hands to the light, and without speaking plunged them into a bowl of water.

"Katie! Harvey!" cried Mrs. Morris, her voice unsteady with apprehension. "What has happened to that blissful time when you did not answer? Where is your jacket?"

"I have lost it," he said, sullenly.

"Lost it! But how?"

"No matter how. It is lost. Was it worth so much that you make so many words about it?"

"But there is something wrong. Oh, I am sure that there is! What is it?"

Ere a reply could be given the tidings of the double murder were loudly told outside the window by one passer-by to another; and Katie and her mother clung together in a closer embrace, while Morris, sinking on a bench, hid his face in his hands.

When he looked up it was to exclaim in low tones, "For God's sake, Katie, repeat to no one the words I said this morning. Why do you look at me so dreadfully, child?"

He came toward her as he spoke, but with extended arms she repulsed him.

"Father, they came through the wood—the murderers! And I crouched down and hid until they had passed."

Her mother uttered a devout exclamation for her safety; but Morris eagerly questioned, "Did you know them?"

Katie flung herself on her knees.

"Oh, tell me that you are not. It was your dress, and I spoke your name as you went by. But no, you could not mean this when you said those fearful words! Harvey Morris, tell me that you are innocent, or I shall die of shame and horror!"

The over-wrought girl now lay on the floor in an hysterical attack, the neighbors, who heard her cries and moans, hastened to proffer their assistance. But Morris, recovering his usual acuteness, civilly dismissed them, and aided his wife in conveying their miserable child to bed.

There for many weeks she lay in the delirium of a low fever, unable to reply coherently when questioned respecting her partial knowledge of the murder; unconscious when the doctor pronounced her recovery hopeless, Hugh Weston had stolen to her side to kiss her burning cheek, and that believers raving, added to his previous unfavorable, unconscious, had made Harvey a marked and suspected man.

Mistrust of the guilty parties, who had possessed themselves of a large sum of ready money, had been discovered.

It was surmised that, after securing the door and flinging the key into the mill-pool, they had made their way across the wood to some convenient retreat, but that, unfortunately, he had made his appearance without his jacket. And, in strange and as it seemed, remorseful silence, he had assisted his wife in her sickness, who still breathed, and carried him up stairs.

Where had he been all this time, and with whom? So strong was the doubt of his innocence, that he was examined by the county magistrates; but his explanation, though unprovable, was possible.

He frankly admitted that the angry feelings he had cherished, and the idle menaces to which they had given birth; and allegat that, too much annoyed to return to work, he had gone to a small, out of the way public house on the road-side, where he drank deeply, spending all the money he possessed, and on setting out in a state of stupor which followed this unusual excess, had found the jacket on which he had pillowed his head stolen. That, ashamed to speak the truth, he had not or confess his folly to his wife, he had skulked about the wood until the evening, arriving at the mill on his way home, just in time to be present at the first woe entered.

Although many shook their heads over this tale, yet the man's previous good character obtained his release. But the grave mutterings and sullen people began to avoid and point at him, and the men with whom he worked to utter covert insinuations, to which he replied with a resent them with his fists only gave a deeper coloring.

"Mary," he said to his wife one night, "we must escape—neighbors and kin will not poor child let us be moved, or I shall be goaded into worse deeds than they accuse me of. Even you," he said, fiercely "when Katie left you, you turn from me, shrink away too, as if you believe me guilty. God help a man when his own wife and children turn against him!"

The faithful wife put her arm round his neck. "Don't speak so bitterly, Harvey! It now and then a distrustful look come over me, this is not to the mill that night to ask for Katie, and a quarrel arose, only tell me that it wasn't so, and I'll believe you."

"I didn't think that I should ever have to say to you, Mary, I'm an innocent man. You ought to know me better, if no one else does."

"Forgive me, Harvey," she pleaded; and putting his arms about her as she knelt beside him, the harassed and depressed Morris forgot his manhood, and wept.

"We'll go away, Mary. Perhaps in some new home, where we are known to no one to throw in our teeth, I shall get back my old spirit and work with a will. But I can't here! I'm like feloned, every one seems set against me. And though I try to keep a bold front to 'em, my heart gets heavy, and I'm sick of the struggle."

So it was resolved that Harvey should start on the tramp for work the following morning, and in the course of another week his family left Hazeley also. Katie, though fearfully weak, was recovering; and was equally anxious to bid farewell to the scene of so much sorrow.

Hugh Weston had only heard of their projected departure an hour before it occurred, hastened to the cottage and bent over the fragile form of her he loved.

"Katie, how can I let you go away from me? But it is only for a little while, is it? By-and-by I shall come and fetch you back."

"No, Hugh, no; I must never see you again. Even if we could resolve to forget your poor uncle's disapproval, you could not wed with the sister of the man whom people—" Her voice died away in a sob.

"But I do not believe him guilty, Katie. He came to me before he left Hazeley, and we did not part like men who mistrust each other. You will come to me by-and-by, dear?"

But she repeated her "No" with equal firmness. "For your sake, Hugh, it must not be. If ever my father is cleared, then—but in a little while you will marry some one more suited to you in station, and I mustn't wish it otherwise." However, Katie wept bitterly as she sobbed this.

Hugh said but little more, for she was evidently unable to bear excitement or conversation; and the last words were, "Trust me, Katie! We're not parting for ever, remember!"

And, in spite of her better judgment, she did trust him, and cherished a secret hope that they should meet again, even when a report reached her that Hugh had sold his share in the mill and left the county. Even when months elapsed, and no sign came from him. But these were not the days of the penny post, and Katie felt herself amply rewarded for her faith and patience, when, on her birthday, a parcel arrived by the carrier, containing a handsome gift from Hugh, and a letter—a letter of over a tiny simple locket, which held a wave of Hugh's black hair.

Long before this Harvey Morris had secured constant work at excellent wages; and Katie, restored to health, was the active and intelligent manager of a happy home, belonging to a man universally who owned a splendid estate in the vicinity of the town where her parents now resided.

And out of evil came good, in many ways, that if she sometimes remembered the old home at Hazeley with a sick of heart, it was quickly followed by self-reproach. Her father, no longer the ailing, dissatisfied man, but sobered and steadied by what had been borne, now labored assiduously for his family. Her mother had lost the haggard look of over-work and scant food; the boys, under better teaching and more regular habits, were developing fine lads; and one of her sisters was in training under her own kind and steady supervision.

Betsy Jones's daughter as these, mingled with some secret yearnings to know if Hugh still remembered her, were in Katie's mind, as a few weeks before her birthday she was returning home one quiet soft summer eve watching the setting of the sun from the little flower-garden she called hers.

The parcel was expected to include hers long. Mr. ——, the gentleman who employed her, was about to leave England for a lengthened period, and she was to see him that night and receive some final directions, etc.

So, gathering the wild roses and honey-suckle from the hedge-row as she went, and humming, with a lad for a protector, went up the pretty lane which separated her domain from the garden, and entered the kitchen by the other door.

It was an hospitable mansion, and it was nothing uncommon to find vagrants seated on a bench outside the kitchen door, the food stinted bestowed on all who craved it; and a ragged footsore man limped from it as she approached, and entering the lobby with a profusion of thanks and apologies begged permission to light his pipe.

The good-natured cook brought him some matches, and he was about to turn away when Katie, with and trembling with eagerness, clutched his arm. "Where did you get that jacket?"

The man, taken by surprise, tried to slip away, but flinging-to the outer door and bolting it, she repeated the question.

Seeing that the servants—both male and female —were beginning to gather around him, he told a rambling story of having bought it of a mate some time ago.

There was falsehood in his shifting eye and stammering tongue, and she followed up the inquiry with another.

"Where are the men who went with you to Hazeley Mill the night Abel Weston was murdered?"

For a moment the man looked at her aghast, then declaring with a blasphemous asseveration that he knew not what she meant, he thrust her from him, and rushing into the yard, and through the house, pushing her aside, sought to escape.

But Katie seized and held him firmly. "Help! she shrieked; "this man is one of them, and is a murderer. I can swear to the pouch now in his possession! It was Abel Weston's; and he had it in his hand when I saw him last."

Mr. ——, who was a magistrate, was quickly summoned, and Katie's prisoner spent that night in the county jail.

The excited girl flew rather than ran to the neat little dwelling in the suburbs of the town, where her family resided, and rushing into the room fell upon her father's neck.

"You have forgiven me long ago, have you not, for my cruel suspicions? and now, my own dear persecuted father, the whole world will know your innocence. One of the men, he who wore your jacket, is taken! How shall we find Hugh Weston? he must be sent for."

"Hugh Weston is already here," said a well-known voice, and Katie started up to meet his loving embrace. "I should have been with you before this," the young man continued; "but at first the success of my new undertaking was doubtful. Now, there is a home waiting for my true-hearted Katie."

"But what is this about a man being in custody?" asked the impatient Morris, and his daughter told the full particulars of her providential meeting with one of those for whose crime he had so nearly suffered.

The prisoner, seeing his danger, turned Queen's evidence; and his accomplices were seized and punished for the brutal deed they had committed; the good folks for many miles around Hazeley flocking into the county town to witness the execution of these stolid sullen murderers of the inoffensive and respected miller and his kindly wife.

When the trial was over, Hugh Weston talked of returning to his business, and it was an understood thing that he did not intend to travel alone. But Katie shook her head sadly when he urged her to fix the day for their nuptials.

"I could fain say yes," she faltered; "but the memory of those who loved us both is still very dear to me, and how can I do what I know would have angered them in their life?"

"Dear Katie," was the earnest reply; "in all that is right and just, I, too, will try to do what would have been pleasant in their eyes. But think you, that if they see us now, the same worldly motives that governed their objections to our union can influence them? Rather believe that their blessing hallows the love which time and trial has strengthened."

The argument was convincing; and after a brief visit to Hazeley, where the tears of the young couple fell fast as they wandered around the old house, and stood by the grave of Abel and Martha Weston, they were quietly united; from thence departing to Canada a new family of Westons to multiply as green, and beside a river as brisk and clear as the never-forgotten stream that still turns the weather-stained wheels of Hazeley Mill.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE LOYAL SOUTHERNERS' CONVENTION.

WHAT though the loud fierce storm-wind howls?
What though the night be dark?
What though the lowering tempest growls
Above the wo-caused bark?
What though New Orleans' whirlwind,
And Memphis' iron boil,
Again, unchecked, our round your homes—
There's no such word as fail!

For bright upon our Northern plains
There stands a glittering band,
That soon will pass fair Freedom's torch
Alight, from hand to hand.
Before its gladsome, cheerful blaze
The cowering storm shall pale;
So courage, friends! Bear nobly on!
There's no such word as fail!

The time is past when slavery dire
Our every step controlled;
The Copperheads are scared with fire,
The Dough-faces are dead.
A few more warn and trembling ghosts
At truth and justice rail;
But soon they'll vanish with their hosts—
There's no such word as fail!

No tyrant's will can curb the bold,
Free spirit of our land;
His chain will break who seeks to bind,
His sword fall from his hand.
Our Israel, of the Lord beloved,
Shall o'er her foes prevail;
So bravely tread glorious path—
There's no such word as fail!

The time is past when lips were sealed
From uttering words of truth;
Regard in blood, our Union dear
Again renews its youth.
Like a young giant, for the fight
Arise in pride and mail,
Young Liberty essays his might—
There's no such word as fail!

From Ellsworth's blood to Dostie's true
We've counted every drop;
The sacrifice is nearly through,
And soon the plague will stop.
Our prayers and tears, our sin and shame
To purge will soon avail;
Then, crowned with Victory, we'll know
There's no such word as fail! JOHN.

A VISION OF PARADISE.

THE spirit is passing,
The earth is retreating,
The window of hope
Closes over the eye;
The pulse is throbbing,
The breath it is floeting—
Fluttering—quivering—
Lost in a sigh!
The angel protecting
The pure soul is greeting;
The glory of heaven
Illumines the sky!
While soft on the wings
Of young cherubim sleeping,
Earth's fairest daughter
In odor floats by.

Sweetly she slumbers,
As, wafted afar,
She leaves the lost world
For a happier star,
And angels are winging
The found one to kiss,
Who sleepeth in beauty
To waken in bliss.

Hark to their harps,
The rapt seraphs are singing!
As, wafted on zephyrs
The wanton notes stray;
Tripping, the Houris
Fresh flowers are bringing,
With perfume and fragrance
Embalming her way.
List, the glad chorus
Through Heaven's arch ringing!
Resounding it echoes
In musical joy;
From the portals of bliss
To the distance where, swimming
In ether, the lost comet
Wanders astray!

Wake! for thy morning
Hath risen in light!
Thy sorrows are vanished,
And gone is thy night.
Rise in thy purity,
Daughter of Earth!
Glory awaiteth thee,
Wake into birth!

To melody rising,
With voices ascending,
The maiden is changed
To a Spirit of Light;
From her ivory shoulders
Fair wings are depending;
She flutters—she mounts—
She is lost to my sight!
The gates are receiving,
The guards are defending,
The entrance of Paradise
Melts from my view;
The vision is fading,
Its beauties are blending!
And waking—I mourn her
Beneath the dark yew.

"Once used they recommend themselves."—BURNETT'S Standard Cooking Extracts, Kalliston for the Complexion, Florimel the finest Perfume in the World, and Cocoaine, the hair-dressing extant.—Christian Freeman, Boston.

MOTH AND FRECKLES.—Ladies afflicted with discolorations on the face, called moth-patches or freckles, should use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable. Prepared and sold by DR. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, No. 49 Bond Street, New York. Sold by all druggists.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE.
Superior advantages in English, Classics, Sciences, Commercial Branches, Drawing, Music, and Painting. Lewis's Gymnastics for Ladies, and Military Drill for Gents. Eighteen Instructors. Term opens Sept. 13th.
REV. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., PRINCIPAL.
Claverack, Columbia Co., N. Y.

IMPORTANT TO SOLDIERS.
A bill has passed giving additional bounty to soldiers who served their term of enlistment, or were discharged for wounds or their heirs. Also, pension for invalids and widows having children. Circular with law sent. L. BROWN & CO., 1 Park Place, New York.

VICK'S ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF
HARDY BULBS,
FOR THE AUTUMN OF 1866, AND
FLORAL GUIDE,
Is now published. It contains descriptions of the best HYACINTHS, TULIPS, CROCUSES, LILIES, etc., with full descriptions, and plain and full directions for Planting, Culture, Flower, etc. Illustrated with numerous fine engravings, and a beautiful colored plate of the SWAN and DOUBLE WHITE and SCARLET. My importation from the best Bulb Growers of Holland is this season larger than ever before, and I offer some of the finest lot of Bulbs ever brought to this country.
This Catalogue and Guide is published for the benefit of my customers, and I will forward it to every one so regularly as possible. To all others I charge ten cents per copy, which is not half the cost. Postage prepaid to all. All lovers of flowers desiring to plant Bulbs this fall will find it to their interest to obtain my Catalogue.
Address JAMES VICK, Rochester, N. Y.

IMPORTANT QUALITIES.
Brandreth's Pills
So stimulate all the interior powers of the system that every poison or impurity is forced from the blood into the bowels, and thus passes off. Recent cases of sickness will often be cured by the effect of 6 or 8 Brandreth's Pills, which, when the operation is full and complete, leave the blood as free from poisonous and unhealthy matter as that of a new-born babe. In colds, inflammatory diseases, and even in cholera, their use restores to health sooner than all other remedies, because they take from the blood and bowels those matters upon which pains, cramps, and aches depend for existence.
Captain Isaac Smith, of Sing Sing, says thirty of Brandreth's Pills, taken according to directions, cured him of a very severe bronchial affection after other means had failed, and he wishes his numerous friends to know the fact.
Brandreth's Pills, Principal Office Brandreth House, New York. Can also be had of druggists. See my name on Government stamp, without which the pills are spurious.
B. BRANDRETH.

"How 'tis Done." Whiskers in 6 wks. Gumlike exposed. Fortune-telling. Ventriloquism, &c. 100 great secrets. Free for 15c. Address Hunter & Co., Hinsdale, N.H.

AGENTS WANTED for the Desideratum Holder for A fastening neckties, looping up dress skirts, &c., &c. Our Agents, male and female, make $5 to $10 per day. Circulars sent on receipt of stamp. Bell & Co., Springfield, Mass.

6000 AGENTS wanted to sell six new inventions, all great value to families; all pay great profit. Send 15 cts. and get 80 pages, or 25 cts. and get 80 pages and a sample gratis. Ephraim Brown, Lowell, Mass.

"Now is the Winter of our Discontent."
Made glorious Summer by the use of
BURNETT'S COCOAINE.
A delightful, cooling, and refreshing preparation for the hair. Ask for BURNETT'S COCOAINE, and take no other. Sold by all Druggists.

THE
GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Have selected the following kinds from their Stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold as Cargo Price, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show. All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

PRICE LIST.
YOUNG HYSON, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 ℔.
GREEN TEAS, 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 ℔.
MIXED, 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 ℔.
JAPAN, $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 ℔.
OOLONG, 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 ℔.
IMPERIAL and GUNPOWDER, best, $1 25 ℔.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 ℔.

All towns, villages, or manufactories where a large number of runs are engaged, by combining together, can reduce the price of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to the

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
(Post-Office Box 5643.) 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church, New York.
For further particulars, getting up Clubs, &c., see Harper's Weekly, June 23, 1866.

100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000!
To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, and terms to Agents, which we want in every town and county. J. H. WINFIELD & CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y.

£150,000,000 STERLING,
In Money and Estates, remain unclaimed in Great Britain and Ireland, in many cases to the heir at law. Fee to search for any name, $3 00 in U. S. Funds. All letters must be prepaid. GUN & CO., Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, 6 Pelham Walk, Reading, England.

Window Shades,
NEW STYLES WITH PATENT FIXTURES,
Sold only by G. L. & J. B. KELTY,
447 Broadway, above Canal Street.

Malaria Everywhere.
Rarely has there been a season so fruitful as this of malarious diseases. Not only on the prairies and in the valleys of the West, but nearly in all the old haunts of Fever and Ague and Bilious Remittens Fever have these prostrating diseases been unusually virulent; but they have extended to many of the cities never before infested with them, and have even ascended the mountains and attacked thousands of people supposed to have been placed by the laws of Nature above their reach. Hence we are compelled to admit that a fatal element pervades the Universal Air this season, and should at once resort to the only agency known to the remedy of its consequences,
Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,
a tonic so potent, an antiseptic so perfect, an alterative so irresistible, and a stimulant so pure, that it enables the human system to resist and baffle all the prolegomena causes of disease. Those who neglect and omit the clothed in incombustible garments might move among blasting bullfrogs, the man who arms himself against malaria with this powerful arcanite medicine may walk a fever-scorged district fearless of its insalubrious atmosphere. The intermittents and remittents at present so general in all parts of the country may be but the forerunners of a deadlier scourge now on its way westward from the far East. Prepare the system with
HOSTETTER'S BITTERS
for a successful battle with the nephitic causes of all epidemics. So who run to time. Sold everywhere.—New York World, Nov. 6, 1865.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS.

SELPHO'S PATENT.
Are pronounced by the most eminent Surgeons and upward of ten thousand persons to be the most valuable and only reliable substitutes for lost limbs ever invented. Illustrated pamphlets sent free. Address SELPHO, Entrance, comfort, lightness, durability, and simplicity. Send for Pamphlet. SELPHO & CO., 516 Broadway, New York, Patentees and Manufacturers, No. 516 Broadway, New York.

NEW PHYSIOGNOMY; OR, SIGNS OF CHARACTER—as manifested through Temperament and External Form, and especially in the Human Face Divine. With more than 1000 Illustrations. By S. R. WELLS, Editor PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. In one large volume, bound in cloth, $5; library calf, $6; Turkey Morocco, full gilt, $10. Agents wanted. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—NOW READY,
The only official Southern History of the War,
The Lost Cause.
By E. A. POLLARD, the popular historian of the South, in 1 vol. 12mo. To 640 pp. Publishers, 656 Broadway, N.Y.

BOYS single Case, $2 25; mens do., $3 50; double Cases, $7, $8 50, and $10; Patent Breech do., $10 50 and $12; single Case, $4 50, $5, and $14 50; Harness Case, $10 50, $60 50, up to $200. Rifles, Revolvers, Percussion Caps, Shot, Gunpowder, Materials, including every article in the line, on official terms at lowest wholesale rates. Send for a circular or a sample lot. CHARLES FOLSOM, 35 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Diseases of the Nose, Throat, and Lungs; Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Deafness, Sore Throat, Loss of Voice, Weak Lungs, and all other diseases of the respiratory organs successfully treated by inhalation, at home. Send for circular who have been permanently restored to health by this mode of treatment. Patients treated at a distance by letter. Write for a circular and pamphlet. Address DR. T. S. MARSH, Med. Specialist, Albany St., N.Y.

$1500 PER YEAR paid by SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine, or Chicago, Ill.

$150 A MONTH! NEW REVOLVING SEWING MACHINE. Agents Wanted. Address H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

AGENTS wanted for Jacobs's Universal Scissors and A Knife Sharpener. The demand is unlimited. Sells at sight. Sample, with circular, Scissors sharpener, 25c.; knife do., 25c. Address Southwick & Hastings, Manufacturers, 7 Cyprus St., Worcester, Mass.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have Just Published:
THE HIDDEN SIN.
A NOVEL.
WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.
8vo, Cloth, $1 50; Paper, $1 00.

"The Hidden Sin" has a touch of originality, and shows an ingenuity of invention which distinguishes it from the ordinary run of romances. . . . The author also shows a facility for drawing character, making his personages like human beings, and not mere stage actors in theatrical properties.—Athenæum.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send "The Hidden Sin" by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

"The Mammoth Informer" gives away to every body. Send stamp for it. Courtship made easy, 15 cents. Bridal etiquette, 15 cents. Laws of love, 30 cents. W. G. WEMES, 308 Broadway, New York.

REMOVAL.
American Lead Pencil Company,
NEW YORK,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 34 John Street, New York.
Factory Hudson City, N. J.

$5 SEWING $5
MACHINE.
FIRST PREMIUM and IMPROVED, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented June 5, 1860; Improvement patented June 6, 1865. The celebrated FAMILY SEWING MACHINE, combining all the essential attachments, is now in operation, and we will DOUBLE OUR STOCK of these machines to meet the demand for them, and are prepared to sell to such evidently as the Wheel. We will CAUTION YOU, HOWEVER, against buying the Wheel machine manufactured. We warrant not to get out of order in 5 years. Read the recommend that appear in the principal journals, and of those who have used it.
With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly does the stitching exactly like hand-sewing.—New York Tribune.
Single machines, $5 each, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instruction, on receipt of the price, $5. Safe delivery warranted. Agents wanted every where. Address all orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY,
Office 102 Nassau Street, New York.

Swiss & Nottingham Lace Curtains.
A complete assortment of Styles and Prices.
G. L. & J. B. KELTY, 447 Broadway.

PETERS ON CHOLERA.
A Treatise on the Origin, Nature, Prevention, and Treatment of Asiatic Cholera. By C. D. PETERS, M.D. 1 vol., 12mo, tinted paper, cloth, $1 25.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
192 Broadway, N. Y.
☞ Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

THE ORGAN MANUAL,
Containing DIRECTIONS AND INFORMATION RESPECTING THE PURCHASE OF AN ORGAN, and the Tuning of Upboring and other Simple Casualties without the assistance of a builder; also, a Brief History of the Organ, and Rules for the Construction. By Rev. HENRY D. NORCOM. Price, 50 cents. Address PETER PAUL & BROTHER. With an APPENDIX containing Remarks on the Use of the Reed Organ. Price 75 cts. Sent postpaid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES
For Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Stores of Type, Cuts, &c., 16 cts. ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 98 John Street, New York, and 25 Lincoln Street, Boston.

GOLD PENS.
If you want a GOLD PEN, send to E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau St., N. Y., and by return mail receive circular showing styles and prices. Especially adapted for all classes.

BABY-JUMPERS.—A new invention. Price $8. Received silver medal at New York State Fair. Send for circular to A. T. TIBBALS, 478 Broadway, near Broome Street, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.
CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $10, $15, $23, and $30. Price of Job Presses, $50, $75, $100, $125, and $150. Send for a circular to the LOWE BROS. CO., 49 Beekman Street, New York.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.—Agents are now wanted to collect orders in each town in the United States for THE ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE WAR, by JOHN KITTO, D.D., F.S.A., Edited by ALVAN BOND, D.D., of Norwich, Connecticut.
This is the best selling book now published. Agents make from $100 to $200 per month, and say "they never knew a book to sell so easily." For further information apply immediately to the publisher.
HENRY BILL, Norwich, Conn.

WHISKERS!
DR. LAMONTE'S CORNELIA will make Whiskers or Mustaches on the smoothest face or chin. Never known to fail. Sample by mail, free. Address
REEVES & CO., 18 Nassau Street, New York.

FISHING ALONG THE RHINE

NAPOLEON. "Ah! my Line is too short to reach the River. I must have a piece of yours."

COUNT BISMARCK. "Not a bit of it."

NAPOLEON. "Ah, well, keep it yourself then."

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our personal attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

American Steel Shirt Collars, manufactured on scientific principles, do not chafe or irritate. Infinitely superior to "Paper" or the "Linen Collar." Neither can approach the "Snow-Whiteness" of these "novelties," washed in a moment. Sent by mail, $3.
BILLOU & FOGGAN, Nassau St., New York.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Canes, Revolving Rifles,
Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.
In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.
Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Ilion, N. Y.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, CASH DIVISION, JUNE 22, 1866.
SIR: I have examined your "Detector," and consider the rules laid down therein.
Infallible means of detecting Counterfeit or altered Bank Notes, and Equally applicable to Government Securities.
I found Our every issued by the United States, and I most cheerfully recommend it to the public as an invaluable book for every business man.
To C. E. TWOMBLY,
A. S. GEAR, Bookkeeper. Finding Teller U. S. Treas'y.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING
B. T. BABBITT'S BEST MEDICINAL SALERATUS, made from common salt. Bread made with this Saleratus contains, when baked, nothing but common salt, water, and flour. Nos. 64, 66, 68, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
and others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 66 Broadway.

Bounties and Pensions, $100.
Now have been passed giving increased pensions to soldiers who have lost limbs or the total use of same, and to widows and orphans, and a new law giving $50 and $100 more bounty to soldiers and the relatives of deceased soldiers. To get the above, and any or apply in person to CHARLES NETTLETON, No. 111 Broadway, New York City. Above laws for sale at 25 cents.

"KA-FOOZLE-UM."
DAUGHTER OF THE BADAH, COMIC SONG ..... 35c.
" SHE SLEEPS, THO' NOT A STAR," Serenade ..... 35c.
THE CHURCH'S NOTES, Ballad, for voice, 25c.; piano.. 30c.
" NELLIE'S GONE LOOPERS," for voice, 25c.; piano.. 30c.
" OMAH GHOSH POLKA," for violin, 25c.; piano .. 20c.
Mailed postpaid. FREDERICK BLUME, 205 Bowery, New York, Publisher.

PEABODY'S BREECH-LOADING
MUSKETS, CARBINES, AND SPORTING RIFLES,
FOR METALLIC CARTRIDGES,
MANUFACTURED BY THE
PROVIDENCE TOOL CO. ARMORY,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
These arms are made in the most perfect manner, are interchangeable in all their parts, and are unequaled for symmetrical appearance, simplicity, accuracy of fire, and strength. They have been received with remarkable favor in our own and several other countries, and can now be supplied in large numbers. Send for descriptive pamphlets and illustrated price-lists, printed in English, French, German, or Spanish.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

50 MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP PER-CENT SAVED BY
USING B. T. BABBITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH, or READY SOAP-MAKER. Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of 1 pound, 2 pounds, 4 pounds, 6 pounds, and 12 pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making hard and soft Soap. One pound will make 15 gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.
B. T. BABBITT, 64, 66, 68, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

MERWIN & BRAY,
262 BROADWAY,
MANUFACTURERS OF THE CELEBRATED BALLARD BREECH-LOADING RIFLES, MILITARY AND SPORTING STYLES.

These Rifles carry a ball varying from one half ounce each to 120 to the pound. Material and workmanship of the best quality. They are warranted in every respect.
SOLE AGENTS
for the well-known Eagle Arms Co.'s Cartridge Revolvers, Belt and Pocket size. These Pistols require but four motions to load and discharge, a high degree of perfection, never before obtained. Are small, and carry a much larger ball than any other revolver of the same weight and size. Also Agents for the Whitney Arms Co.'s Colt's model Revolvers, and the New York Metallic Ammunition Co.'s Copper Cartridge of every style and size.
Dealers in Arms and Ammunition of all kinds. Illustrated Circulars furnished when desired.
262 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Agents Wanted—$2000 a Year and expenses to male or female Agents, to introduce a new and useful invention needed in every household. Agents preferring to work on commission can make from $50 to $80 per day. For particulars address
W. G. WILSON, Cleveland, Ohio.

Steinway & Sons'
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANOFORTES.
WAREROOMS, Nos. 71 and 73 East Fourteenth Street, between Union Square and Irving Place, New York.

TRADE  MARK
OF THE
MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,
To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods, of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and infringements on the patents of the Magic Ruffle Company. The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction to consumers. Office of the Company No. 05 Chambers Street, New York.

Dr. Gilbert's Pile Instrument for the radical cure of piles, prolapsus, &c., without an operation or medicine, relieves the most severe cases in minutes, and has never failed to effect a permanent cure. Send for circular. Sold by druggists generally. Discount to Dealers. Sent by mail to any part of the U. S. on receipt of $5. J. B. Rominger, Prop't, 576 B'way, N. Y.

GRAND NATIONAL CONCERT,
FOR THE
Benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home Fund,
AT
Grover's Theatre, Washington, D. C., Postponed until Thursday Evening, October 11, 1866.
300,000 Tickets, at $1 each. 75,000 Presents, valued at $250,000, consisting of Fine Residences, Lots, Pianos, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silverware, &c., &c.
A CARD.—A large number of the tickets remaining unsold, it will be necessary to POSTPONE THE DRAWING until Thursday the 11th of October, 1866, at which time it will positively occur.
The many publications that have been presented to the public during the last few months somewhat delayed our sales, until we were able to satisfy the people throughout the country that this enterprise was genuine, and solely for charitable purposes. The Directors are confident of the sale of every ticket, and sufficient time will guarantee the sales without any further postponement.
Postmasters, Bookselling Agents, &c., are requested to act as Agents, and tickets will be supplied upon application; but no commission will be allowed.
Major H. A. HALL (President Soldiers' and Sailors' Union), Colonel CHARLES CAPEHART, Major M. H. ALBERTER, WILLIAM S. MORSE, Managing Directors.
TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE, WASHINGTON, June 27, 1866.
Whereas H. A. Hall and others, as "managing directors" of the "Grand National Concert" to be held in Washington, D.C., on the 5th of August next, have made their application to T. Clephane, Collector of Internal Revenue for the District of Columbia, for permission to hold a lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise, and presented collection district of the United States, and the proceeds of said lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise to be devoted to charitable purposes, and whereas evidence that the proceeds of said lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise five cents per cent. upon the gross receipts of such "managing directors" to hold such lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise free from all charge, whether from tax or license, in respect to such lottery, raffle, or gift enterprise.
E. A. JOLLON, Commissioner.
All orders must be addressed, with stamps enclosed, to
WILLIAM S. MORSE, Secretary, Lock Box 37, Washington, D. C.
WE REFER, BY PERMISSION, TO
Major-Gen. Winfield S. Hancock, U.S.A.: Gen. Robert C. Schenck, M.C., Ohio; Gen. Hobart E. Paine, M.C., Wis.; Gen. John H. Ketchum, M.C., N. Y.; Gen. James G. Blunt, Kansas; Gen. N. G. Hotchkiss, Iowa; Gen. D. C. McCallum, D. C.; Gen. O. V. Dayton, N. Y.; Hon. Thos. W. Ferry, M.C., Mich.; Hon. George Lawrence, M.C., Penn.; D. C. Forney, Esq., Pa.; D. C.; Major J. E. Doughty, N. Y.; Hon. Henry C. Deming, M.C., Conn.; Hon. John C. Ingersoll, M.C., Ill.; Hon. Samuel J. Randall, M.C., Penn.; Hon. T. G. Pomeroy, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. Henry Wilson, U.S.S., Hon. Ira Harris, U.S.S.; Hon. B. F. Wade, U.S.S.; Hon. Kellen V. Whaley, M.C., West Va.; Hon. Wm. D. Kelley, M.C., Penn.; Hon. A. H. Laflin, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. Samuel Hyde, M.C., Penn.; Hon. William Mitchell, M.C., N. J.; Hon. George W. Julian, M.C., Ind.; Hon. Stephen F. Wilder, M.C., Penn.; Hon. J. B. Grinnell, M.C., Iowa; Major G. M. Van Buren, N. Y.; Gen. B. Piatt Moore, D. C.; Gen. Wm. H. Emory, D. C.; Hon. O. D. Latham, M.C., West Va.; Hon. James A. Marvin, M.C., N.Y.; Hon. Thomas T. Davis, M.C., N. Y.
Address all orders to DUNCAN, NAVARO, & CO., Bankers, General Agents, 38 & 40 Bowling Green, New York.

BOKER'S BITTERS,
For sale by all prominent Grocers, Wine Merchants, and Druggists, and wholesale only by L. FUNKE, No. 5 Astor Agent, No. 46 Liberty Street, New York.

HOMES FOR THE MILLION!

Woodward's Annual of Architecture, Landscape Gardening and Rural Art for 1866. Fifty original and practical designs and plans for low-priced Cottages, Barns, Ice-Houses, &c., with numerous plans for laying out small plots of ground. Illust'd. 120 pages. Paper cover, 25 cents; Cloth, $1.00. Postpaid. Now ready.

Woodward's Country Homes. Eighth Edition, revised and Enlarged. A new and original work, with 150 designs and plans for Country Houses of moderate cost, with a full description and estimate of the manner of constructing. Illust'd Cloth, Gilt Side and Back Frames.

12mo, 192 pages. Cloth, extra, postpaid, $1.50.

MANUAL OF THE HOUSE; or, HOW TO BUILD COUNTRY HOUSES AND OUT-BUILDINGS, with 125 designs and plans, by D. H. Jacques. 12mo, 176 pages. Cloth, extra, postpaid, $1 50.
Also, just published—

FULLER'S FOREST TREE CULTURIST. A new Work on the Propagation, Cultivation, and Management of Forest Trees. By ANDREW S. FULLER, Author of the "Grape Culturist." Fully Illustrated. $1 50 postpaid.
Also,

GRAPES AND WINE. A New and Practical Work on the Cultivation of the Native Grape and Manufacture of American Wine. By GEO. HUSMANN, of Missouri. Fully Illustrated. Cloth, extra, $1 50, postpaid.
Address
GEO. E. & F. W. WOODWARD, Publishers and Dealers in Architectural and Agricultural Books, 37 Park Row, New York.

WARD'S DERBY PAPER COLLARS "SOMETHING NEW"
TO BE HAD EVERYWHERE MANF'Y, 387 B'way, N.Y.

More Suffering, Sorrow, and Death are the results of Indigestion and Dyspepsia than from all other known diseases. COES DYSPEPTIC CURE is a sure and immediate remedy. It will stop distress after eating as soon as you take it.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL POMADE
The best hair restorer and dressing. Sold by druggists.

IMPROVED
STEREOPTION DISSOLVING VIEW
AND
Magic-Lantern Pictures and Apparatus.
Complete outfits and instructions furnished. Illustrated Catalogue and information address W. LANGENHEIM, Philadelphia, P. O. Box 1575.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR SEPTEMBER, 1866.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $4 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or Twenty for $30 00.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $8 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements for their Magazine, at the following low rates:

One Page $250 00
Half Page 150 00
Quarter Page 75 00

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average eight words to a line.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $4 00
One Copy for Three Months 1 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.
THE BOUND VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz:

Cloth Binding ..... $7 00 per Volume.
Half Morocco 10 00

Each Volume contains One Number for One Year.
TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for the inside, and Two Dollars for the outside Advertisements, each insertion.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—No. 507.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S RECEPTION IN NEW YORK—REVIEW OF TROOPS AT DELMONICO'S.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY HERRON, NEW YORK.—[SEE PAGE 581.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1866.

THE VITAL POINT.

THE Evening Post is of opinion that if the Union party does not nominate for Congress men who will vote for the immediate admission of representatives from all the late insurgent States it will inevitably be defeated, and ought to be. This is also the platform of the RANDALL Philadelphia Convention; and the Post, like the Convention, assumes that the mass of the people are of the same opinion.

The election will undersrve both. The people, who have been seeing and feeling for five years, who have endured, at such vast expense of every kind, so remendous a war, are not, as an energetic Yankee remarked, "a darned fool." They have the most earnest desire, undoubtedly, for reunion, and they have the most decided purpose of obtaining it. But they propose a real and not a sham union. They intend to have union upon principles which will make union permanent and peace secure. The defendant of the Post is, that States which, by the measures necessary to repress their rebellion, have gained twelve representatives shall be admitted to Congress before this injustice is adjusted, and that the country shall take the risk of their consenting to rectify it and limit their political power which they are beyond the national control in the matter.

We believe rather that the people who have required of these States, as conditions of their restoration, that they shall revoke their acts of Secession, repudiate their military debt, and accept the amendment of emancipation, will also require that they shall not have gained by political power by accepting it. It is a perfectly plain matter. There is no reason whatever why the States in question should be consulted about one article of the amendment, for in it really is, when they were not consulted about the other; and to suppose that the people do so: see that they spare themselves a most serious and perilous agitation by settling the question now, is to accuse the intelligence which they have constantly shown during the war. The Post should remember that the loyal population and representatives from the disturbed States are perfectly willing to await the proper adjustment of this difficulty, and that the eagerness of Mayor MOORE and his friends, and of the Democratic party and its adherents, that "loyal representatives" should be immediately admitted, does not proceed from a high determination to right this wrong when they are admitted, but from a desire to turn it to their own advantage.

Moreover, it seems to us hardly permissible for a supporter of the President's policy, like the Post, to speak of the "mixed, incongruous, absurd" projects of Congress. Congress has a perfectly intelligent principle of action and a defined policy. It holds that conditions may be required, and it states the conditions which it deems essential. The President holds that the insurgent States have never lost their equal rights in the Union, while he deliberately sets every one of them aside. A more utterly illogical and inconsistent position than the President's it is not possible to conceive. And the Post is curiously confused when it denies to the supporters of Congress the right to condemn the President's course in Louisiana. They cite it as a most melancholy and disastrous illustration of his totally "mixed, incongruous, absurd" view of the situation. They assert, and unanswerably, that on his own ground he had no right to interfere except upon the demand of the Governor; but if he had the right he had the power to save every drop of innocent blood that was shed, and declined to exercise it.

The leading minds of the Union party are, as the Post truly alleges, in favor of impartial suffrage in this country as the guarantee of permanent peace. And they are desirous of obtaining that guarantee in the most expeditious manner. Mr. SUMNER and Mr. STEVENS would impose it as a condition of readmission, and Mr. SUMNER's proposition obtained three votes besides his own in a radical Senate. That fact shows that Congress was not of the opinion that the mind of those gentlemen was the wisest method. It surely does not prove that Congress differs upon the importance of the end itself.

The Post further charges that the Union party is trying to carry the elections by force or excitement. Yet it is perfectly aware that Mr. MONTGOMERY BLAIR, and the World, and the late rabid press at the South, and the orators and papers of the Democratic party distinctly declare that if they do not succeed there will be a more terrible war, and a sea of negro blood; while the RANDALL Philadelphia Convention directly encourages the resistance of the late insurgent States to a popular verdict which should decide to require them to ratify the amendment equalizing representation. Does a party which does not hesitate to conduct the Congressional election this year, as it did the Presidential election of 1860, under an open threat of revolutionary resistance, appear to the Post innocent of using the "force of excitement" as compared with a party which points to the massacres of Memphis and New Orleans as proofs of the real condition of lately insurgent States that claim increased power in the Union?

The Post is certainly right in urging the necessity of the speediest reunion, but the method is the very vital question of the situation; and such, we believe, the people will prove to be the opinion of the people. From the West, in which the Post learns that Union candidates for Congress are being sobered for their readiness to conform to the President's present declarations, we hear very different accounts. Our friends are confident of carrying Missouri by 25,000 or 30,000 majority. Ohio will count upon 40,000 majority for LOGAN in Illinois. From the East we shall soon hear. In Pennsylvania the Philadelphia coalition is making the most strenuous efforts to defeat Mr. CLYMER, who belongs to the school of VALLANDIGHAM, PENDLETON, and WOOD; but the Union men are jubilant over their prospect of an increased majority. In NEW YORK the withdrawal of Mr. WEED's friends and of the Evening Post undoubtedly weakens us; but we must be sadly weakened if we are to lose our 30,000 majority of last year. The politicians had their way at the RANDALL Philadelphia Convention. But the people will have their way at the elections. Two years ago they decided to prevent the dissolution of the Union by force. This year they will decide to complete its restoration upon principles which will insure its peaceful permanence.

THE ERIE ELECTION.

IN less than a month the election of a Board of Directors of the Erie Railway Company will take place. The Erie Railway Company is the leading railway corporation of the country, and, under any circumstances, a canvass for the election of its managers would command public attention. At the present time the threatened contest derives additional importance from the generally accepted belief that a party of wealthy speculators propose to seize it. Mr. PERSHEL M. GREGORY, Mr. VANDERBILT, Mr. DANIEL DREW, and their friends, and replace them by men who have not as yet established a reputation as railway managers. We have no means of knowing whether the "generally accepted belief" is or is not well founded. It is said by men who profess to know that Mr. JAMES CRAWFORD, of the firm of CLARKE, DODGE, & Co., aspires to become President of the road, and to institute various improvements upon its past management. This may be true or it may be not. If Mr. DAVID CRAWFORD has undertaken anything of the kind, he is not likely either to let the public know his intentions prematurely, or to fail in his purposes for want of energy or capital. But the story may be a mere invention got up by Bull speculators in Erie in order to induce the public to buy the stock.

On the one hand, it is clear that, to secure the control of the Erie Railway Company, the possession of over $11,500,000 of stock, costing at present prices about $11,500,000, would be essential, and in the present condition of the concern it is questioned by sound men whether at any Wall Street quotation it would be much money as this, would be likely to possess so little prudence as to adventure their means to so rash a speculation. On the other hand, it is argued that the Erie Railway Company is an enterprise of the future; that its capacities have never been fairly tested; that in fact it have never been developed; that its interests have arisen from the inadequacy of its capital, and attempts—renewed under each successive direction—to supply the deficiency out of current earnings; and that if a new set of men, imbued with new ideas, and forecasting the true future of this great enterprise, were to lay the real state of the case before the public, and to announce their intention of increasing from time to time the capital in stock and bonds, if need be, to even $100,000,000, they would restore public confidence in the Erie, and the stock might be saved from the decline which has been so confidently predicted.

The contest, if contest there prove to be, will be one of financial giants. Mr. DAVID CRAWFORD is understood to wield his millions; Mr. DANIEL DREW has been known to raise ten millions in a single day—and repay every dollar. He and Mr. VANDERBILT could take and pay for the entire capital of the Erie Railway without hypothecating a share. If, therefore, they are turned out, it will be because they so choose.

So far as Mr. DREW is concerned, it is an open question whether his friends whether he should remain in the direction of the Erie. He has been for years the back-bone of the concern. He hardly ever fails to be present at one or two each day to the active management of the road. Fair weather and foul, his carriage is to be seen at the foot of Duane Street every morning. And there never has been a time these ten years that the Company has not owed him money. So utterly inadequate has been the capital of the concern to its actual wants, that even when it seemed most prosperous, it could not have paid its pay-rolls or its coupons—to say nothing of dividends—without borrowing money, and that money it has always borrowed of Mr. DREW—because no one else would lend it. To DANIEL DREW, in fact, is due the credit of having built up and supported this great enterprise; and hereafter, when the Erie emerges from its troubles, and takes its place among the established dividend-paying railways of the country, he will be recognized as its real founder. So far from receiving any credit for what he has done for the Company, the stock never fails but some of the papers accuse him of depressing it to serve his private purposes, and abuse him as though he had been the chief enemy instead of the staunchest friend of the concern. His friend naturally feel that it is time to do him justice. If Mr. DREW is to be set down as an enemy of the Erie Railway Company, that concern should stop borrowing money of him, and should pay him what they owe already. If he is a friend of the Company, his co-directors ought not, in common decency, to set the papers hounding after him with charges which they know to be as absurd as they are unjust. It is high time that the question were settled one way or the other. If Mr. DAN CRAWFORD will agree to do for the Erie Company what Mr. DREW has done, we have no doubt that Mr. DREW's friends will advise him to retire from the direction, and relieve himself of a thankless and most expensive duty.

Some of Mr. DREW's colleagues, it is said, are not quite willing to be turned out of office by brute violence. They are said to have sought a considerable amount of stock within a few days. In the hands of a judicious man a share in the management of the Erie Railway is valuable. No salary is attached to the office, but, strange to say, every smart man who has been a Director in the Erie for a few years has grown rich. The late President, Mr. NATHANIEL MARSH, was a newspaper reporter when he became Secretary of the Erie; he died worth half a million. And if the lists of stockholders in the Express Companies which pay dividends of 5 @ 20 per cent. a quarter could be published, a goodly proportion of the names would be found to be identical with those of Erie directors. On a road which is not completed, and on which from one to five millions should be spent each year; which employs 5000 men; whose losses in ordinary running expenses nearly ten millions a year, or $33,000 a day; it is a very comfortable thing to have a voice in the direction, to control contracts and bargains, and purchases of labor and supplies. A man of commanding mind, in the Presidency of the Erie, would be the leading railway official in the United States. We shall see, in the course of a month, upon whose shoulders the mantle will fall.

THE LABOR CONVENTION.

THE proceedings of the late Labor Convention in Baltimore were in many respects extremely wise. The delegates were all naturally in a hurry to get home, having a day's work for eight hours, and pledged themselves to an earnest and devoted agitation to that end. If such a law can be framed which shall be equitable in its operations for all concerned, it will be an admirable reform; and the discussion proposed will certainly test the feasibility of the proposition. The Convention favored the speedy restoration of the agricultural interests of the Southern States and wisely aiding and elevating the laboring classes of the negro equally and patriotic. The interests of labor every where are identical. Wherever and by whatever means labor is dishonored in the person of the laborer, that blow is struck at the national welfare. The expression of sympathy with the sewing women; the protest against the vile tenement houses of the cities; the recommendation for the formation of Mechanics' Institutes and Libraries; to demand that the public domain be disposed of to actual settlers only; the recommending men in want of work of employment settle upon the public lands; and the condemnation of "strikes" are all timely and judicious. All these resolutions show much thoughtfulness and the good sense of the delegates.

But there is a question which seems not to have occurred to the Convention which is well worthy of consideration. The tendency of the assembly, and of the third resolution, declaring it the imperative duty of every working man to organize himself with his labor association, is to the recognition and indeed creation of a special class known as working men. Is such a tendency in this country wise, or is it even practicable? Among the working men, as in all ranks are constantly accumulating and dispersing. The poor boy of to-day is the father of the capitalist of to-morrow, and the grandfather or great-grandfather of the poor boy again. Every career is open to every man and to every talent. ABRAHAM LINCOLN was a flatbottom and country shopkeeper. ANDREW JOHNSON was a tailor. The father of WILLIAM B. ASTOR came to seek his fortune from Germany, and JOHN JACOB ASTOR himself was a Staten Island skipper. Luck is equally distributed, sagacity and industry do the rest of the work. When then does a man among us, where there is no political or legal or social recognition of classes as in Europe, cease to be a working man? When is he to be denounced as a capitalist, and therefore opposed to labor and the laborer?

A man who lives by his daily wages often looks with bitter eyes upon another who lives in a spacious house and drives a handsome carriage. But let him reflect. What is he himself doing? He is claiming that all his faculties shall be left perfectly free, and he is trying, by turning them to the best account, to lay up a little part of his wages to get ahead. In other words, he is trying to do fairly and squarely what his neighbor has already fairly and squarely done. He is working for his own interest as zealously as he can, and his neighbor did and does no more. If the law hinders him and every other man he has an undoubted right to demand that the injustice be corrected. But if the superior sagacity and industry of his neighbor have advanced him more rapidly, then a law to prevent his neighbor's enjoyment of the fair results of that superior industry and skill is only the infliction of an injustice. If a man uses his capital selfishly and meanly, undoubtedly other men have a right to combine fairly to defeat his selfish and mean intentions. But that is not a class distinction between capitalists and laborers, it is only the just thwarting of selfish men by those who are not so. A farmer may be as mean to the hand he hires for a day's mowing as the wholesale grocer to the farmer whose produce he buys. The farmer is a capitalist in comparison with the mower, and the grocer compared with the farmer. But is the mower the only laborer? Are not the three? If the grocer be generous and the farmer mean, would not the mower be a very proper fellow to join the combination against the grocer because the latter had more money or capital?

To denounce capital, therefore, as naturally opposed to labor, or assume that, in a perfectly free country where every man must work for his living, there is a class which can be defined as the laboring class, seems to be a misapprehension. It is akin to the practical folly of speaking of certain persons among us as "our Irish fellow-citizens." The truth is, there are Americans or they are not fellow-citizens. All of us, either in our own persons or in those of our ancestors, came to the country within the last two hundred and fifty years. Shall we therefore speak of our Welsh fellow-citizens, our Scotch fellow-citizens, our German fellow-citizens, our Welsh, and French fellow-citizens? Certainly not. We are all Americans, and we are all working men. And as the term "Irish fellow-citizens" is always used with an ulterior motive, and necessarily tends to a dangerous political classification of the whole population by races; so the term "laboring man" or "working man," as the expression of a class, immediately excites suspicion. Against the rights of classes of every kind our whole system is a protest. For it is founded upon the equal rights of men, and not the conflicting claims of classes of men.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE NATIONAL UNION COMMITTEE.

MR. HENRY J. RAYMOND ought certainly to have resigned the Chairmanship of the National Union Committee appointed at Baltimore in June, 1864, when he united himself with the RANDALL Convention at Philadelphia. He has zealously striven to show that the latter was a Convention which the supporters of the Baltimore action might properly attend. But he forgets that in the call to appoint delegates to it from this State those who supported a Congress elected by the friends of the Baltimore Platform were to be chosen. He also forgets that the Philadelphia Convention was not favored by the Union press or by the co-operation of the regular organization of the Union party of the country. What is RAYMOND mean to be the twelfth juryman who complained of the obstinacy of the other eleven?

On the other hand, the Convention of Southern Unionists was heartily supported by the various State organizations of the Union party. The Union Governors generally requested the appointment of the States to attend as delegates. Large delegations of the most representative men in every State of the party which made the Baltimore Platform were elected in counties or otherwise accredited to the Convention. It was as formally and warmly recognized by the regular organization of the Union party as it possibly could be, yet Mr. RAYMOND as Chairman of the National Committee of the party calls a meeting of that body to assemble in NEW YORK at the very day and hour at which the Convention was to meet in Philadelphia; and he did this, moreover, after several members of the Committee had asked their brethren to meet in Philadelphia to fraternize with the Convention of Southern Unionists.

It seems to us that the proper course would have been for MR. RAYMOND, when he resolved to join the RANDALL movement, to have summoned the National Union Committee, and to have stated to the members his reasons for believing that the true policy of the party was to unite with Mr. RANDALL'S club. If the Committee agreed, it would have officially summoned the party to send delegates to the RANDALL Convention. If it did not agree, Mr. RAYMOND and those who sympathized with him should have resigned. That Mr. RAYMOND did not accept the Committee proves very strongly that he did not believe it would approve the RANDALL movement. That he did not assemble it, and did not resign but summoned a meeting in New York on the day when the regular organization of the party throughout the country had taken measures to have the party by every authoritative means represented in Philadelphia, proves very strongly that he was not unwilling to distract and perplex the party to which he owed his position.

THE END OF THE EMPIRE IN MEXICO.

THE departure of the Empress CARLOTTA from Mexico was a very suspicious sign for the empire of the Austrian Archduke in that country. Monarchs do not send their wives upon political missions thousands of miles over the ocean except in extreme emergencies, and emergencies which they fear may be fatal. There can be no doubt of the truth of the rumor that the Empress went to France to tell LOUIS NAPOLEON that the Mexican adventure must fail unless he came to the rescue, and as little doubt that she was told that MAXIMILIAN must now trust to his own resources. It is tolerably clear that the amiable young man has been duped. He was a pawn which can no longer be played with advantage, and he will be swept from the board.

Indeed, from the moment that our war ended it must have been evident to LOUIS NAPOLEON that unless he could satisfactorily explain to this country that MAXIMILIAN was the honest choice and an empire the sincere preference of the Mexican people, he could maintain himself in that country only at the risk of war. But while the French troops remained the proof could not be furnished. The fact was apparent that the so-called empire was merely a forcible French occupation, and the Emperor an Austrian archduke, supported not by the consent of the Mexicans, but by French bayonets. The aspect of the situation has never changed, and when LOUIS NAPOLEON, after dire delays and fine phrases, promised to withdraw his troops, MAXIMILIAN's throne began to totter. The Archduke himself can not be expected to remain after the departure of the French, and the painful course of Mexican history will be continued.

That it will seriously affect the policy of this country is not to be anticipated. Long and sad experience has taught American citizens the perils of all moneyed adventures in Mexico, and the permanence of the empire has never been supposed possible. The internal confusion of the country, however deplorable it may be, will therefore not directly affect us, unless a request for interference or aid should be made to our Government. But the demand for foreign interference is usually preceded from the Tory or Church party, not from the Liberals. The most the latter would ask of us would be a loan, the granting of which is not probable.

The fate of Mexico is most melancholy. Apparently destitute of native energy to establish order and peaceful industry, the government of the country has the form of a republic without the popular intelligence and moderation which make a republic possible or desirable. On the other hand, the monarchical traditions are destroyed. There is no royal family whose name and associations awaken sentiments of loyalty; and a monarchy must therefore be necessarily a pure military despotism. Neither has Mexico yet produced any leader of such force and intelligence as to rally the people to his standard, or command the confidence of the world, as the hope of order and progress in the country. And to complicate and prolong the tragical situation, the Tory Church party, seeing all efforts to be dispossessed of its property, maintains the baleful power of superstition amidst an ignorant population.

We can only await inevitable events in Mexico; therefore, with the conviction that the fall of the futile empire of MAXIMILIAN will not bring repose nor relief to the unhappy country, but at least we shall have the satisfaction of knowing that the action of our Government has not prevented the clear perception of the fact that the French Empire in Mexico was not the desire of the Mexican people.

A SERIOUS QUESTION.

A CONGRESS chosen by remarkable unanimity and by every Constitutional form, thoroughly representative of the intelligent patriotism which conducted the war to a successful issue, and which will wisely settle the questions it has left, is deliberately described by the President in these words: "We have seen hanging upon the verge of the Government, as it were, a body called, or which assumes to be, the Congress of the United States, but in fact a Congress of only part of the States."

If this be true, every measure of the present Congress is invalid, and the whole national legislation since the acts of secession five years ago is equally so, for the Congress of the war was, "in fact, a Congress of only part of the States." In the absence of a State, or of a combination of States, from Congress destroys the validity of its action, the Union is at the mercy of any State. But if the voluntary withdrawal of States from Congress does not make war upon the Union does not destroy its authority, the enforced absence of such States shall fulfil the authority is provided for can not affect that authority.

But if the President's assumption be correct he condemns himself mercilessly. For he has not hesitated to acknowledge this same Congress as lawful, and to co-operate with it for eight months. He now charges that "its every step and act tended to perpetuate division and make a disruption of the States inevitable." Yet on the 27th of March of this year he said to the upper branch of the body "assuming to be Congress" these words: "I return the bill to the Senate and regret that in considering the bills and joint resolutions—forty-two in number—which have been thus far submitted to my approval, I am compelled to withhold my assent from a second measure that has received the sanction of both Houses of Congress." If it was not a valid Congress why did he recognize it as such? If all its measures were revolutionary why did he congratulate himself upon differing upon only one out of forty-two? What has happened since the 27th of March to convert these Houses, whose authority the President gladly acknowledged, into a body hanging upon the verge of the Government and assuming to be a Congress?

Whatever the explanation may be, it is obvious that the President will find it very difficult for him to recognize the body to which he thus denies all validity as the Congress of the United States. If it is now merely hanging upon the verge of the Government and falsely assuming to be a lawful body, it will be in precisely the same condition next December. Will the President then follow the advice of the Chicago Times, which supported the late rebellion, and of the other organs of the late rebels, and sweep the assuming body out of the Capitol?

THE TWO EUROPEAN GAMESTERS.

LIBERALS of the school of M. THIERS in France are valuable for their shrewd opposition and remorseless exposure of the designs of LOUIS NAPOLEON; but their views are also scarcely less selfish and narrow than his. Before the late war M. THIERS made what he called a last effort for peace, in which he maintained the necessity of defending the treaties of 1815, to which LOUIS NAPOLEON has never conceded his hostility. These treaties were a reactionary settlement of Europe after the overthrowing of the century. They were founded neither upon reason nor justice, but simply upon the fact that European democracy was exhausted. They made the most forced and unnatural combinations and alliances, from which it was evident that Europe, with returning vigor, would revolt. How completely this has come so is shown by the astonishing results of a campaign of a fortnight which has remodeled Europe.

M. THIERS contended that these treaties divided the political power of Europe, and that "unification," or the restoration of nationalities would endanger France. The French French policy, in his view, was to hold Austria in Italy and to keep Germany divided. The liberal and national aspiration of Italy and Germany must be repressed in order to maintain the supremacy of France in Europe. M. THIERS was therefore in the extraordinary position of wishing LOUIS NAPOLEON and the Tory party to the treaties of 1815, which were made to humiliate LOUIS NAPOLEON's uncle and to circumscribe France. Fortunately that reactionary policy did not prevail, and by the victory of Prussia the cause of Constitutional liberty in Central Europe has made memorable progress.

It was not, however, under any such consideration that LOUIS NAPOLEON opposed M. THIERS's plan of maintaining the map as it was. His object was to establish a legitimate his dynasty by destroying the settlement which outlawed it, and to celebrate its vindication by an offering to "the glory" of France in an enlarged empire. It is therefore most probable that he did propose, as was reported by the ocean telegraph and is now confirmed by fuller information, to "rectify the frontiers of France." It is not less evident that his proposal was received with opposition by Prussia, and has been since withdrawn. His LOUIS NAPOLEON found his match in BISMARCK, or in this demand and surprise and withdrawal merely part of the understanding between them? These are questions that can not yet be answered. But we have little faith in any preconcerted arrangement by which LOUIS NAPOLEON is to appear to be humiliated. Indoubtedly if he has really made the demand he has done so at an unfortunate moment for himself, because Austria is prostrate. It may be true that before the war he held the balance, for Prussia might well have hesitated if she saw Austria and France allied. But after the terrible defeat Austria is, for the present, eliminated from the situation, and the question is simply between Prussia and France. Neither, probably, wishes to make war upon the other. But should LOUIS NAPOLEON take up arms it will be for conquest and dominion—a war with no reasonable pretense, and without the sympathy or approval of any other power. The question becomes very significant, has LOUIS NAPOLEON found his match in Count BISMARCK?

TWO TRAVELERS.

A MAN passed over the road
In the early days of spring,
When the grandest flower that ever bloomed
Was brightly blossoming.

And never a word he spoke,
And his face was marble-cold,
But millions of men above him wept,
And a million bells were toll'd.

And the cities were draped in black,
And the towns were wrapped in gloom,
"For he is dead," the people said,
"For he is dead, our hero is dead."

Down many a swarthy face
Unnumbered tear-drops flowed,
"For he is gone"—the boatman spoke—
"To the land of the silent dead."

And they builded him a tomb
Afar in the silent West,
And that beautiful flower which men call Peace
Spread its leaves above his breast.

II.

A man passed over the road
Ere the summer days were dead,
And the heart of the nation near that bloomed in spring
He trampled with ruthless tread.

And many a word he spoke,
And his arrogant face was flushed;
But all very low he said aloud with the noisy crowd
When the leaves of the flower were crushed.

But down many a swarthy face
Flowed tears of bitterest pain,
"For he is come"—the boatman spoke—
"To forge our chains again."

He must seek the tomb some time
Afar in the silent West,
But will very few there be which men call Peace
Spread its leaves above his breast!

NERVOUS DISEASES.

WHILE most men are hardly aware that they have any nerves—with so little of disturbance are their functions performed—nervous diseases form a large part of the complaints of females. So palpable is this difference, that it is very common to say of any man whose nervous system has become deranged that he is as nervous as a woman. There is one nervous malady—hysteria—in regard to which this difference is very strongly marked. It has been commonly supposed to belong exclusively to the female, but it sometimes, though very seldom, appears in the other sex.

What, now, is the reason of this difference? The nerves are precisely the same in the two sexes, and their functions are performed in the same manner. But there is a difference in general character. The nervous system of the female is more mobile or excitable, and is therefore more readily made the seat of morbid irritation by causes that tend to derange it. Here, then, we have one cause; but it obviously is not competent alone to produce the whole result. There must be some other causes, and these we will indicate.

The susceptible nervous system of the female is acted upon by some causes that do not act in the other sex, or at any thing like the same extent. There are influences in her case of a peculiar character, from the prevalent modes of training and habits of life, and especially in fashionable female life, to give passion and sense the supremacy over reason, and to produce a factitious and morbid sensibility. A constant and unnatural excitement fills up a large portion of the time, beginning even in the school-boy life, and continuing with augmentation when the period of full introduction into society comes. And the effect is enhanced by the unnecessarily wearisome and unprofitable exercises of the school-room; for the mind has failed to get wholesome food, and thus has lost its natural appetite, and is therefore ready for all the unnatural and unhealthy excitements which the fashionable world and its literary exponent, the trashy novel, can afford. The whole of the extensive exposition of the tendency of the common mode of female education that is found in the fact that in most cases, after schoollife is ended, the reading of novels furnishes the almost entire food for the mind, which is as irrational and injurious as it would be to feed the body with nothing but confectionary. Let education be made what it should be, and the gratification of the natural tastes of the mind will prevent its being driven to seek excitement in what is unnatural and artificial. Not to dwell on this interesting point, we simply remark that the grand desideratum in instruction is to convey into the mind such knowledge, and in such a manner, that the pupil will in after-life of choice continue to acquire from books and observation similar knowledge, thus throwing novel, exciting into the subordinate position in which it belongs.

The ideas which are instilled into the minds of daughters by most mothers in relation to the great objects of life, and the means to produce the moral tendencies which we have indicated. Even those who are in the main conscientious are often guilty in some measure of a conformity to the fashionable world in this particular. Getting admiration, catching a beau, and by-and-by getting a husband—are not these the objects practically set before daughters by the vast majority of mothers? And what surer way of making a young lady nervous than having the excitement of such objects continually at work in her mind, together with novel-reading and turning night into day with late parties? No wonder nervous ills can long bear out a unnatural mode of life without suffering more or less of derangement.

Hysteria—that hydra-headed nervous malady—exhibits generally in its very character the agency of the influences which we have noticed. It has often clamped upon it moral characteristics derived from these influences. These are selfish caprice, a disposition to exact undue attention and even to assert control over others, and sometimes a fondness for exciting wonder and sympathy. The education that enervates, and pets, and allows sense and passion to overslaugh reason, is very apt to stamp these bad moral qualities upon nervous diseases, and in some cases they stand out with such prominence that their origin is unmistakable. Of course it will be inferred from what has been said that the treatment of hysteria must generally be to a great extent moral. Often one of the most decided means of breaking up the malady is to go firmly counter to the unreasonable demands of the patient. She is to be made to know that her will is by no means to be the law. Many a case has been unnecessarily prolonged by the injudicious fondness of mothers and friends acting in opposition to the firm decision of the physician in this respect. But it is not our intention to enter into the treatment of hysteria, and what we have said in regard to it was for the purpose of enforcing our views in relation to some of its causes.

The hints which we have thus thrown out are enough to show that education—and we use this term in its widest sense, as including all influences outside as well as within the school-room—as it is commonly conducted, is chargeable largely to the production of nervous diseases, especially in females; and we hope that we shall not fail to waken up a proper attention to this subject in the minds of some mothers and teachers.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONVENTION OF LOYALISTS AT PHILADELPHIA.

THE Loyalist Convention met at Philadelphia September 3. A general procession was formed in the morning to escort the Southern delegates to the Union League House. A speech was made on the delegates' arrival by the chairman of the committee. Mr. Hamilton of Texas, answered in behalf of the visitors, and then the convention was called to order, the speaker using the identical gavel used in the South Carolina Convention when the ordinance of secession was passed.

There were only two or three colored delegates on the floor. Thomas J. Durant, of Louisiana, was elected Chairman. A committee on permanent organization was appointed, and the Convention adjourned until the 4th. A meeting of the Northern Loyalists was held simultaneously with the Southern meeting, at the Union League House. Resolutions were adopted endorsing the Convention. Six State Governor were made Vice-Presidents. Speeches were delivered in the evening by Henry Wilson, Horace Maynard, Colonel Stokes, and others.

A BRUTAL OUTRAGE.

A band of desperadoes attacked and routed a negro camp-meeting at Ship's Woods, near Baltimore, on the night of August 30. The negroes, it appears, had met in a camp-meeting under the auspices of white Methodist ministers, a white deacon presiding being in progress at the same time. During the day suspicious-looking young men were seen about the ground, and at night the attack was made by firing among the negroes while they were at their devotions. The blacks resisted, and the fight became general, the darkness of course increasing the confusion. The fight ended by the negroes, on the advice of the white preachers, rocking safety in flight. Many were wounded, and trunks belonging to them were then piled together and burned by the white assailants. One white man was killed and several negroes severely wounded.

FOREIGN NEWS.

BY TELEGRAPH.

August 29.

(LONDON.)—The Paris correspondent of the Morning Post says that the Emperor Napoleon will propose a reform in the mission to behalf of Maximilian as to obtain from the Mexican Congress the delegation of power to him to pay the French Government the ten millions of francs due by Mexico, and also a loan to Maximilian of millions of francs to pay for the equipment of troops in Mexico, but that the Mexican Congress will refuse to accede to either of the French magnates.

(LONDON.)—Intelligence received from Napoleon an extension of time, until next January, for the projected departure of the French troops from Mexico.

(VIENNA.)—The Austrian Government has paid the indemnity for the Austrian claims against Mexico, and the Emperor Maximilian has given his receipt in full.

(LIVERPOOL.)—The steamship Hermann sailed for New York to-day, taking $67,000 in specie.

(LIVERPOOL.)—The steamship City of Boston sailed today for New York, taking $50,000 in specie.

(CONSTANTINOPLE.)—Affairs in Turkey are in a very bad state. The revolt in Candia progresses. The insurgents have proclaimed the assembled independence of the Turkish Empire. Constantinople is announced in a state of siege.

August 31:

(LONDON.)—United States Five-Twenties are quoted at 73½.

(MUNICH.)—The motion to close the union of Bavaria with Prussia was lost. The Chambers then adjourned, to be called together next again in October.

September 1:

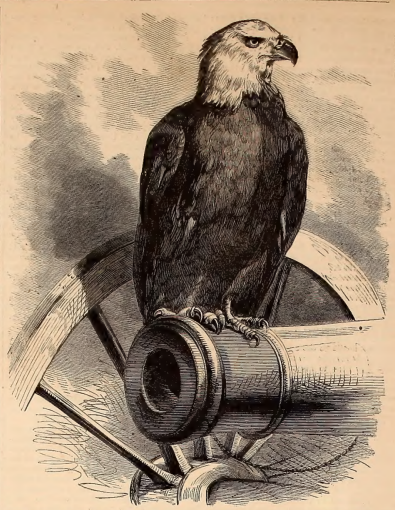
(LIVERPOOL.)—The Royal Mail Steamship China sailed to-day for Halifax and Boston, with $130,000 in gold for the United States.

September 3:

(HAMPTON COURT.)—The cable of last year was picked up on Monday morning at 4.40 o'clock. The 1865 balance of water, in latitude 51° 52', longitude 36° 03'. The splice was made and the cable buoyed between 2 and 3 A.M.

The Great Eastern is now 160 miles from here, paying out. Every thing is going on well, and they expect to reach here on Saturday next.

Signals are sent through the cable with perfect accuracy, and we are talking with the Great Eastern every moment, via Valentia, in Ireland.



(PARIS.)—M. DRUYN DE LHUYS, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, has resigned. The Marquis of Moustier (Moustier?) succeeds him.

September 4:

(VIENNA.)—The Austrian Government has given orders for a reduction of the army to a peace footing, and the work has already commenced.

INDIAN SQUAWS WEAVING A BLANKET.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

"OLD ABE"—EAGLE OF THE EIGHTH WISCONSIN VOLUNTEERS. [PHOTOGRAPHED BY F. R. CURTISS.]

SQUAWS WEAVING A BLANKET.

"MAXWELL, an old frontierman," says our artist, has a ranch which it is the work of many days to inspect. This farm consists of a grant of forty miles square. MAXWELL'S sheep reach the number of nearly 90,000; cattle and ponies he has without any knowledge himself of their number. A tribe of "Utes," numbering about 600, are his chosen defenders. The ranch proper, or house, is inhabited by the most miscellaneous collection of man and beast and fowl that one can imagine. The servants are mostly Navajo Indians. Two of the squaws of this tribe have been engaged for months in weaving in their own peculiar style a blanket that is to be presented to the Secretary of the Interior. The Navajo blanket is an article more sought after than one would suppose. It sells readily, if a good one, for from a hundred to a hundred and fifty dollars, according to its pattern or quality. They are so closely woven that water can be carried in them; and as a protection against the chill winds of the plains they are equal to the best fur robe."

"OLD ABE."

Our engraving represents the standard borne in more than a score of battles by the Eighth Wisconsin regiment. Let not our readers imagine that this standard was simply the device for a flag, or a mere material image. "OLD ABE" was a genuine live eagle, which the standard-bearer of the regiment carried aloft, chained to his perch, into the hottest of the fight. When the battle raged most fiercely, and the enthusiasm of the soldiers was at its highest, then it was that "OLD ABE" seemed to be in his own element. He flapped his wings in the midst of the furious storm, and, with head erect, faced the flying bullets and the crashing shells with no signs of fear. "OLD ABE" triumphs with the triumph of the flag, and seems in some measure conscious of his relationship to the emblem of a victorious Republic. Long may he live!—the favorite of his regiment. We hope "OLD ABE" is as intelligent as he looks to be—and if he is, we can wish him no brighter fortune than that he may survive the present disorganization of the republic, and see the return of a real and permanent Union.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH—GATHERING MOSS ON BERWICK BAY, LOUISIANA.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 581.]

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

MOSS GATHERERS ON BERWICK BAY.

THE Spanish moss, whose gray drapery hangs in heavy folds from all the trees in this section, is not without its uses. Floating in the shadows, as our sketch was made, some negroes were while away the noon hour and presenting a scene picturesque and peculiar as they loaded their out-rigger-boats with the luxuriant parasite.—When gathered, it is dried in the sun, the negroes—and whites also, for that matter—using it for beds. When cured by immersion in boiling water it becomes an article of export to the North, where it is used to stuff cheap mattresses, being for a time almost as soft and springy as horse-hair. After it is cured and dried it loses its soft shadowy gray and becomes a dark brown.

JEFF DAVIS'S PLANTATION.

Of this plantation, which is located in Mississippi, I have made two sketches, one representing the Mansion, and the other the Negro Quarters on the grounds. The Mansion is now used as a school-house by the freedmen.

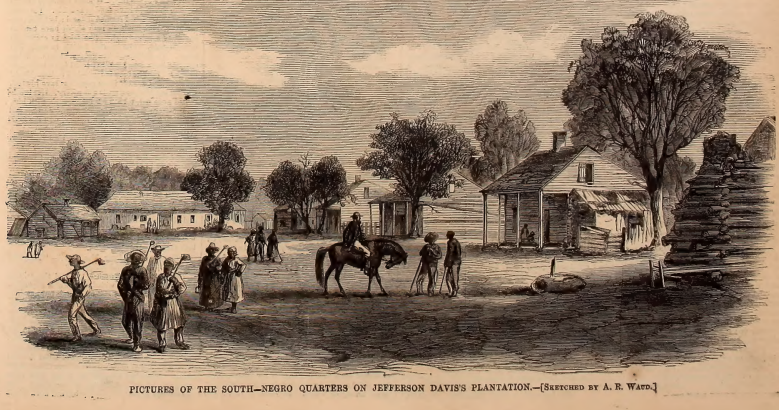
A. R. W.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH—JEFFERSON DAVIS'S MANSION IN MISSISSIPPI.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WARD.]

LAUNCH OF THE "MANITON" AT BOSTON.

THE United States gun-boat Manitou, which we illustrate on page 588, is rated as a second-class gun-boat. She was commenced two years ago from the designs of JOHN LENTHALL, Esq., Chief of the Bureau of Construction, under the superintendence of WILLIAM H. HANSCOM, late constructor at the Boston Navy-yard, and was finished under the superintendence of EDWARD HARTT, Esq. Her dimensions are: Length between perpendiculars, 230 feet; extreme length, 301 feet; breadth moulded, 40 feet 1 inch; extreme breadth, 41 feet; depth of hold, 20 feet 10 inches; tonnage, 2348 tons old, and 1448 new measurement. She will be bark rigged, and will have four MARTIN'S boilers 24 feet 4 inches long, two 60-inch cylinders, and be propelled by a 16 feet diameter four-bladed screw. Her armament, incorrectly stated in the Navy Register and copied from that into the daily journals, will consist of eight 9-inch guns broadside, and one 60-pound pivot rifled, mounted on the top-gallant forecastle.

THE PRESIDENT'S TOUR.



We give on our first page and on pages 584 and 585 illustrations of President JOHNSON'S reception in this city and in Philadelphia.

In a speech made in this city Secretary SEWARD alludes humorously to the situation in which the President's party found Philadelphia. He says: "When we came to Philadelphia, the only city that had not tendered to the President of the United States its hospitalities in the expectation of his coming, we found a city that was disorganized and ungoverned. No Government there; no Common Council, no city authorities, and no police. We found a city so loyal, so peaceable, so earnest, so zealous for the cause of the national restoration and reconciliation, that every man was a law unto himself, and I said to myself, 'Blessed is that city that can dispense with a ruler.'" But notwithstanding the Mayor's absence and the dissolution of the Common Council, the people of Philadelphia gave the President and his party an enthusiastic welcome. We illustrate on page 584 the scene upon the arrival of the President in front of the Continental Hotel.

It was in New York city, however, that the President received the most demonstrative ovation both from the city authorities and the people.

The party arrived in the city shortly after noon, August 29. The streets from the Battery were lined with an immense throng all along the route which the President was to take. His formal reception took place in the Governor's Room at the City Hall. Of this we give an illustration on page 585. From the City Hall the party proceeded to DELMONICO'S, where the military passed in review before the President. Of this review an illustration is given on our first page. The following description of this affair is given in the New York Times:

> President JOHNSON soon appeared upon the platform and occupied the seat prepared for him. He was quickly surrounded by his friends, both military and civil. Generals GRANT, MEADE, BUTTERFIELD, HAWLINS, Admiral FARRAGUT, Secretaries SEWARD and WELLES, Mayor HOFFMAN, Collector SWITZER, and numerous other distinguished persons were present. The members of the Common Council and the heads of departments occupied the space in the rear of the Presidential party.
>
> The head of the First Division soon entered the avenue from Thirteenth Street, and approached the reviewing stand. Major-General SLOCUM, accompanied by his staff and mounted escort, led the column. He was immediately followed by General SICKLES, commanding the First Brigade. After paying the customary salute to the President, General SICKLES dismounted, and ascending the platform, took his position beside the reviewing personage. The first regiment which passed the stand was the Second New York, commanded by Colonel RIPA. There were about 400 men in the ranks. They marched with platoon front, and made a most creditable appearance. The old Seventy-first Regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel CLARK, followed, winning applause from the spectators, both at and off the platform, by its soldierly appearance and steady marching. The Seventy-first had 450 men not. Colonel THOMAS LEWIS followed with the Seventy-seventh Regiment, numbering 300 men. Colonel WILLIAM LYMAN brought up the rear of the brigade with 400 men of the Ninety-ninth Regiment. There were two or three good bands of music with the brigade, each one of which turned out opposite the President and played martial airs until the regiment to which it belonged had passed. The Second Brigade, commanded by General HOWARD, was the next in order. The General led the way with his staff, closely followed by the Third Regiment (HENRY SHAW'S), numbering 400 men. This regiment looked and marched remarkably well, winning a complimentary remark from General GRANT. The Fifth Regiment, Lieutenant-Colonel MAYER commanding, also looked well. Its ranks were more than usually full, there being nearly 600 men under arms. The Sixth, Colonel MARON, 590 men; the Twelfth, Colonel WARD, 800 men; the Eighty-fourth, Colonel CONKLING, 400 men; and the Nineteenth, Colonel MORRIS, 400 men, completed this brigade. The First Artillery is attached to the Second Brigade, but portions of it were on detached service, firing salutes and performing escort duty. The brigade appeared in excellent condition, and was greeted with many applause. General HALL'S brigade, comprising the First, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Thirty-seventh, and Fifty-first Regiments, was unquestionably the favorite one of the four. The Seventh, Col. CLARK, paraded about 700 men, and sustained its well-earned reputation for marching and soldierly appearance. The Fifty-fifth, Colonel LE GAL, also did well, and attracted much attention. Of the other regiments the only noticeable one was the Seventy-ninth Highlanders. This is a fine hardy body of men, who marched with the instinct of old soldiers, and looked well.
>
> In the evening the party with invited guests sat down to one of the most sumptuous banquets ever provided on this continent. The expense of the dinner has been estimated at $25,000, the burden of which, we understand, was borne by A. T. STEWART, Esq. About 250 persons sat down to the table. After dinner the President made a long speech in support of his policy. After expressing his gratitude for the reception which had been given him, he alluded to the part taken by the several departments of the Government in the restoration of the Union. He paid a passing tribute to GRANT and FARRAGUT for their victories by land and sea. He spoke of what he had himself done in the work of restoring the Union. He then charged Congress with being in favor
>
> ..... said the President, "a department of your Government which has practically assumed and declared, and up to the present time carried out, that the Government was dissolved and the States were out of the Union. We, he added, "who contend for the opposite doctrine, years ago contended that States had not the right even peaceably to secede; and one means of peaceable secession was by a State withdrawing its representatives from the Congress of the United States, and that would be practical dissolution of the Union. We denied that a State had any such right, and when, subsequently, they attempted to withdraw, we again asserted that they had no such right; and now, when the doctrine has been forcibly established, that a State has no right to leave the Union, and when the States are again resuming their relations with the Federal Government, as far as in them lies, we find that when they seek to have their representatives admitted to Congress there are men in that body, who, in violation of our great charter of liberty, deny their right to be represented, and refuse to admit their representatives into the Congress of the United States.
>
> .....
>
> .....Are we prepared to renew those scenes through which we have just passed? Are we prepared again to see one portion of this country arrayed in deadly conflict against another portion, as we have just seen them arrayed? Or, shall we not make every effort to have all the parts and all the people of the country again united in harmony and brotherly affection?" He said he did not want to let the Southern States back into the Union degraded and debased. They would not be fit to form a part of this great American family.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH—NEGRO QUARTERS ON JEFFERSON DAVIS'S PLANTATION.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WARD.]

THE RIVER.

THE river flows through the populous town,
Where the sombre houses look silently down,
Like sentinels standing on either side,
And frowning there on the sullen tide,
As the blackened waters pass on their way
In the silent night and the busy day.

From mountain torrents it takes its birth,
Where the cool spring bubbles from out the earth;
And on through the valley it winding flows
By banks where the silvery willow grows;
And wandering down to its seedy brink
The thirsty cattle come there to drink.

On and on in its course it glides,
Bearing along on its restless tides
A thousand sails with their precious weight
Of human souls and of costly freight,
And feeding, high up amid heated glooms,
A hundred factories' hungry looms.

On past village and hill and field,
Rich with the wealth of earth's broad yield,
It flows till it reaches the busy town,
Where the sombre houses look silently down,
And a shadow comes over its waters there
Till they gather dark that had flowed so fair.

Often I stand on the lonely pier,
As the silent hours of the night draw near,
And hush in the voice of the murmuring tide
As the blackened waters beneath me glide;
And watch the lights as they gleam and glow
In the office depths of the ship below.

And I think, as I stand in silence there,
Of the poor souls, mad with a wild despair,
Who have sought to drown where the waters flow
Their broken hearts and want and woe;
And I think, as its currents onward glide,
Of the guilt and sin that those cold waves hide.

Oh, winding river that takes its birth
From springs that bubble from out the earth,
And on through the bright vale, smiling, goes
Past village and hill and waving field,
Made rich by the wealth of the broad earth's yield!

To me you seem like a life begun
In sweet fields warm with the summer sun,
That on by pleasant and flowering ways
Passes through childhood's innocent days,
Till at last, where thy dark waves wander down
It is lost in the sin of the shameless town.

And I think on my own life once so bright,
Of the joy that rendered my young heart light,
Of the dreams and hopes that I nurtured there,
Making the future seem all so fair;
And I grieve as I think how those years are fled,
Of the golden hopes that have long been dead.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XVII.

It was gardening time now in earnest. The soft April sunshine began to warm the earth and to stir the heart of every leaf-bud on the trees; and the gentle showers that came dropping down every now and then seemed almost to have more power yet. The birds were all a-flutter with eagerness and expectation, peering among the bare branches of some of the trees, and then betaking themselves to the well-clothed evergreens for house-room and shelter. The grass grew in the most wonderful way; and the blue violets stood with their eyes wide open, full of sweetness and content. In the garden—the large one which was under Sukie's care—many things were already planted; peas, and such common things, as Lily said; and even the three little gardens looked pretty with their pretty promise of labels, and labels, for some of the hardy seeds were already in the ground. "Argemone" was marked upon one label. "Hollyhock" upon another; and Prim had planted her sweet-peas. Planted them with much fear and hesitation too; for when with a good deal of trouble she had dug a trench for them four inches deep, Prim thought they might as well be buried in the centre of the earth at once.

"I'll never get a sight out of that baby, Sam!

"Four inches deep is what Mr. Vick says," answered Sam, who knew the words in the Vick catalogue. "The plants will bear the least so much better."

"Hear it! I should think they would—and be glad to get it, too, way down there," said Prim. "I wonder if they'll be prettier planted so, in a circle, than they would in a straight line?"

"Plant some of them both ways and then you can judge."

"So I will!" said Prim, carefully sowing the seeds "pretty thick" in her dug-out circle. "Now I s'pose the straight one must be just as deep."

"Of course. But cover these first," said her brother.

Prim carefully folded down the open end of her seed-bag but the peas should take the matter into their own hands and sow themselves on the surface of the ground; and then she gently threw in the earth with her trowel, looking up at Sam every now and then as the trench grew full to see if that depth would not do. But Sam showed no signs of relenting until all the earth was filled in smooth and even.

"Now you can go on to your straight line," he said, "and I will go and help Lily a while."

"What are you doing?" said Lily, coming up. "Oh, how pretty every thing looks!"

"Sowing my sweet-peas," said Prim. "That's a circle, and this is a straight line."

"Is it?" said Lily; "I should have said it was a crooked line if you'd asked me."

"But it's so hard to draw it straight!" said Prim, standing up to look at her line, which was indeed extremely wavy, to say the least.

"Never mind—I dare say it's as good as the circle," said Lily, consolingly.

"The circle's perfect," said Prim. "Sam drew it for me himself. He set a stick in the middle and tied a string to it, and tied another stick to the other end of the string, and just drew it all round—so."

"For the straight line," said Sam, "you can stretch a cord between two sticks; or you can lay your rake handle down for the bed and measure by that. Now, Lily, what are you about?"

"I don't know how thick to sow these seeds," said Lily. "I sowed all there were in the paper first, and then the holes looked so close together I picked up a good many of 'em."

"Picked them up—the seeds, I suppose!" said Sam. "That's a losing business. And what are those baby-rows at the end?"

"Why, the holes I made for the seeds," said Lily, leading the way down the hill to her garden. "What are those, Sukie?"

"Only my dwarf convolvulus. Oh, I didn't lose any of 'em—I know exactly how many there were."

Sam thought to himself that it was a very loving sort of gardening in which the seeds were all counted; but he said nothing except to give Lily her directions, and then walked up the hill again and toward the fence to look at Clover. Lily's arrangement was nothing to Sukie's care. She smoothed and resmoothed the little spot where the seeds were to go; dug it lightly up with her trowel, and then smoothed it again, and sowed every smallest lump of earth. Then carefully opening her seed-bag, Clover took out a little pinch of seed between her finger and thumb, and slowly, cautiously sprinkled it over the prepared bit of ground. Then making some more earth ready, Clover sprinkled that over the seeds, pausing once or twice to consider whether that was deep enough; then patted the whole softly down as Sukie had done, and looked at one side, and the work was done. With a little sigh of great satisfaction Clover looked up at her brother.

"Will it do, Sam?"

"Exceedingly well," said her brother, smiling. "But where are your sticks?"

"What sticks?"

"Sticks to mark the boundary line of each patch of seeds, so that you may not plant one kind on top of another."

"Oh, I never thought about that; I haven't got any," said Clover.

Sam took up a tree branch which the wind had blown off, and cut three or four little sticks—six inches long or so—with which Clover at once fenced in her seeds.

"How pretty it looks!" she said, slipping her hand into Sukie's confidingly. "And how wonderful it is, Sam! Just to think what my little seeds will be next time I see them!"

"Ay," said Sam, clapping the little hand tight, but speaking in a musing way, as if hardly thinking of her: "it's a glorious resurrection—that is it, dear. And the earth seems but a soft, quiet bed in the sunshine of such a promise."

Clover looked at him earnestly, and then her eyes flushed, and she looked down on her garden again quite silently, for she was a little body of few words. Or perhaps I should say, of fewer words than Sukie. "Why, that's what it tells us. For it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know—we who love Jesus—that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."

One little word among all these sweet straight to Clover's heart, and she looked up at Sam. "Who love Jesus," her brother had said; oh, did she?

I can not tell you what joy it was, when the plants began to come up in the little garden-beds. I think the very first of all was the crumpled pink leaf of an abronia, "as pretty as a flower," Prim declared, "and I'm glad it hasn't any thorns." Then in Lily's box appeared a quite different beauty—small, compact, and round; a cauna shoot, with its little tip above the level earth. "Oh, look here what Jack called 'frantic,' in her delight. Nothing quite equal to these in beauty was seen in Clover's box at first; but the pacinth beans soon got their broad seed leaves, which Sam called "cotyledons," and Jack declared to be only the first parts of the bean itself. Then the cucumbers followed, large and strong; and the stocks—little tiny flat seeds that they were—burst out with a pair of large, light cotyledons, that Clover wondered over them. Clover did a great deal of thinking in those days, and never could go near the garden without a meditation, remembering the words Sam had spoken down by the fence. Jack declared that gardening had spoiled all his three sisters, for Lily was crazy, and Prim in a dream, and Clover in such a brown study that you could get nothing out of her. "Except moral lectures," Jack would add, by way of explanation.

By-and-by the earth which covered Prim's ipomœa seeds began to rise up in a most remarkable manner; a little heap here, and another there, not quite smooth but inclined to crack open at the top.

"It's just like what mamma said!" exclaimed Prim, in her excitement. "Oh, do you think it can be the seeds?"

"Not a doubt of it," replied Sam, to whom this appeal was made. And from that time, whoever wanted Prim was sure to find her at the window, gazing down upon the pot that held her ipomœa seeds.

Lily, too, made a great discovery. A similar disturbance of the earth in one of her flower-pots had been followed by the sudden appearance of two little green leaves on a very long stalk; so long indeed that it could hardly hold itself up. Lily thought it must be the newest and rarest of plants, there was but one in the pot, and that grew so fast.

"Just look, Sam!" she said, "is that one of my asters?"

"Aster, indeed!" said Sam, with an expression of great contempt. And before Lily well knew what he was about, Sam had raised the pane of glass, pulled up the rare plant, and flung it out of the window.

"Oh, Sam, Sam!" was all Lily could say, "what did you do that for?"

"What did I do it for? why you do not want to grow weeds, I suppose, of 'em?"

"Was that a weed?"

"That was a weed."

"Well, I'll never trust any thing again," said Lily. And to be sure she did not; for when a few days after one of the nasturtiums suddenly full of green leaves upon long stalks, Lily began to root them out with an unsparing hand; but this time it was Sam who said, "stop!"

"They're only weeds," said Lily.

"They're only your scarlet flax," said Sam. "Never mind, you have lost but a few."

"Oh dear! oh dear!" said poor Lily, "what am I to do! I thought weeds and flowers were different—each by itself."

"No, they are not," said Sam; "but that is one of the things you have got to learn. A gardener knows a weed by sight, and he did it bravely, even when it first comes up; though it is such a little bit of a thing, and may be of a kind he has never seen before. He will recognize one weed in a whole tuft of flowers, or one flower in a whole tuft of weeds."

"But how?" said Lily. "Tell me how?"

"Ah, that I can not do; that you must learn," said Sam: "I could as soon give you directions for making cats a nd dogs gentleman. It's not because of their dress, it's not because of their place —you just feel the difference. And so it is with weeds."

LOVE'S LIGHT.

LAST year she wandered through the wood,
The Spring was on the trees,
And everywhere among the tree,
The building cushats coood and cooed;
And all around a thousand birds
Poured fresh and sweet from warbling throats;
And she was gay with Earth's glad mood.

With girlish laughing glee she strayed
Amid the primrose pale,
And from the hawthorn shook in showers
The fragrant blossoms—wanton maid—
And making merry with the flowers.
Her merry voice glad snatches sent
Of song and carol through the glade.

Again the Spring was in the grove,
Blithe carolled warbler, cushat dove,
And overhead again were heard
The plaintive cushats crooning love;
Again along the primrose glade,
Beneath the thorns the maiden strayed,
And felt the Spring her pulses move.

But not again she shook the sprays
With glad, girlish, careless rude,
To scatter in her careless mood
Their blooms along the forest ways;
But violet and primrose fair
She gathered in a garland rare,
And lily bells and fragrant may.

And strange and thoughtful mood on she moved,
Until she reached the stile,
And resting there, saw many a mile
Of field and hedge and grassy vale;
The homestead and the cottage small,
Her eye dwelt lovingly on all—
The Sea! Yes—there, the sea she loved.

Last year she was a wayward child,
A merry madcap thing,
And frolic as the birds that wing
Their rounds, and love to be wild:
But Love has come, and every where,
In blooming earth, in balmy air,
It seems as though all things smiled.

And what is Love? A sympathy,
An intuition rare,
A sense that need hath ne'er
Of words to define the intricacy
Of thought and feeling's maze,
A foretaste of the eternal days,
When God shall lighten every care.

MARGARET.

MARGARET GLINT was very busy. The clergyman of New St. Simon's Church—good, abstracted Mr. Glint, who was famous among dead languages until his own seemed a very small absurdity to him, and who was so absorbed in the roots of Greek and Latin words that but for the joint efforts of his young sister and old servant he would probably have preached in his night-gown, gone abroad on one side of his face, and retired in his best coat—was hard at work at a fearfully learned and woefully dull volume fast approaching the epoch of publication, and by way of variety a press of editorial duties rendered the engagement of an amanuensis positively necessary. Such a one had been engaged—a gentleman recently arrived from England—an intelligent man of education, who seemed glad enough to occupy the position, and agreeable enough to prove a pleasant companion to the Doctor in his leisure hours; and having forgotten to mention that he was expected, the stranger arrived without the least warning this Monday morning, baggage and all—what there was of it—and was now shut up with Mr. Glint in his library, while Miss Glint and Nancy bustled about the "blue bedroom" arranging it for the new-comer. Both highly provoked by the Doctor's forgetfulness to give them warning; and Miss Margaret, in a naturally mood, saying so many absurd things that Nancy declared she would be "the death of her." "Two looking-glasses, Nancy," said Miss Margaret. "Mind that. He surely must want them to make that nice, straight part at the back of his head; and be careful of the carpet-bag, or you might spill the rouge and lily-white."

"As if he had any, Miss," said Nancy.

"He's like a china doll," said Margaret. "I hope he's not a girl in male attire. There would be a scandal. Now we're all ready, I think. Remember to put out plenty of jam and cake for tea. I'm sure he likes them. I hope I shan't forget and call him Baby."

"You'll kill me, Miss," said Nancy, leaning against the wall. "How you do make fun of 'em, to be sure!"

By them Nancy meant the sterner sex. It was a way Margaret Glint had. She was always laughing at some one. Perhaps her brother more than a quietly happy person would have done. She had had what in common parlance is called a "disappointment." At twenty she had been engaged to a certain Roger Ackland—a man ten years her senior—one to be both proud and fond of. Her very wedding-dress had been ready, when some one, in no kindly spirit, had brought the girl a tale of her lover's past life which he had hidden from her.

He did not deny it, and she would not listen to no excuse. She gave him back letter and ring and lock of hair, and bade him leave her. It was like the parting of friends at last, but she did it bravely. Since then she had been mistress of her brother's house, and had never once fallen into low spirits as far as any one could judge. Yet she was referred only the pitying angels knew who comforted her—and she did not repent. "Better any fate," she had said, "than to be the wife of a bad man," and she meant it. Many a one had wooed her since, but she cared for none. Roger was not a handsome man, but she could see no beauty in any other face, and the men she met all seemed so small and petty in comparison with him.

Least of all did she like purposeless, helpless men, like this amanuensis of her brother's. It would bore her woefully, she knew, to have him about the house. Yet when he made his appearance at table she was very courteous to him—more so than to most strangers.

He was small and very fair. His hands were gift's hands. He was not decided even about the matter of cream and sugar in his tea. He took what was handed him, and refrained from helping himself to the butter at his very plate, until some one discovered that he was nibbling dry bread; but he was no mild withal—so sweet-voiced and amiable that he won on her. After a few days she felt much as she might toward some timid child, and was very anxious to please and make him comfortable. And this rôle of protector suited Margaret well. It came in a week or two to keeping a seat beside her for him, to making much of him in a motherly sort of way. He was three years her senior, but she always felt as though he was much younger, and, to tell the truth, made a sort of pet of him, as she might of some young brother home for the holidays.

And Charles Lawton was immensely grateful in his mild way. Nothing was too much to do for Miss Glint. He walked miles in the roadway out to the circulating library for a book she wanted. He found, in some mysterious manner, a rare plant she coveted for her garden. He covered the country for her lost canary-bird, and rescued it from the hands of a dishonest boy in a way that excited the astonishment of all those who knew of adventure, and made himself useful in a thousand little ways, morning, noon, and night. But whatever he did, wherever he was, the young man never seemed quite happy. He was always sighing, always looking downcast. Always being found in a brown study on the sofa with his eyes fixed on vacancy, and two great tears in them. It troubled Margaret Glint sorely to see this. It made her more sympathy than she had even fancied possible. For some men to be wretched seemed natural; but this gentle, innocent, effeminate man should be as happy as a school-girl. She tried to cheer him up—in vain. She exerted herself to make him laugh. Did nothing, and gave it up. What could he have done? What could have been done to him? Had he been in love—had he been jilted? No one could answer these questions to herself. Until at last Margaret made a discovery. Her brother had gone out, taking his amanuensis with him. To rummage in his own work, and dusting and sweeping and purifying the library, was the business of the day. It was necessary to do it secretly, for brown and brush were sharp and destructive: though, if papers were not moved, the Doctor would never notice the difference on his return; and old Nancy was in select terror until the work was accomplished. Then, in an idle mood, Miss Glint sat down at the desk of the amanuensis and began to look over the papers. The former was gone, and had been copied in a fair hand, neatly ruled, artful flourishes, and exact margins, all fresh and nice, and pleasant to look at. Margaret Glint sighed, blotted there, as it seemed, in a hurry, for the upper edge was crumpled, lay a sheet of foolscap covered on both sides, thus:

"Margaret"—"Dear Margaret!"—"Margaret my love!"—"Beautiful Margaret!"

The same name written a hundred times in as many different styles with loving words appended. No one who has the habit of writing can deny the same thing some time. We all know why, though it would be hard to explain the reason. Margaret knew. She had discovered Charles Lawton's secret. She stood holding the paper in her large white hand, check and brow flushed hotly. Then the sheet began to tremble and was crushed in the round finger-tips, and Margaret Glint fled the library with that mute witness of love like a guilty thing. Why had he scrapped her with those papers which did not interest her one whit? The manuscript of that dry, deeply-learned work which was so much pure stupidity to her, as to most people? Was it fate? It seemed so, for thus had she learned what else she might never have learned in all her life, for she knew now that her great wealth —she was a very rich woman—kept her gentle lover from telling her of his love. "Margaret—Margaret!" Ah, did he love her as she had loved Roger Ackland, when it was her wont to scribble his name over and over again? Could it be? Had he the strength of heart to feel so? In her own room Margaret knelt down upon the cushion at her bedside, and, hiding her face upon her pillow, with both her arms above her head, thought. She must needs think it all out for herself. There was no one to go to for advice. Had it been the root of a Crown Prince, her brother could have helped her. Any thing a dictionary or a treatise could have availed her in the need not have puzzled over, but this involved only the heart and conscience—the heart and conscience of a woman, and her brother, the clergyman, could not advise—could she ask him.

"What shall I do?" she asked herself. "What does I done? I have been kind to him. I have been very kind to him, but I never thought of this. And he is so good. Could I come to liking him enough? Perhaps.

The face of Charles Lawton arose before her. The pale face, with its light, cool-tinted hair and hapless-looking, girlish mouth. A face sweet and pure but without strength in it, and her moral gaze was fixed upon it.

"Perhaps," she said again. And her eyes looked tender. She felt a man have looked, thinking of some girl who loved him. She was a little like a man, this Margaret Glint. Large and dark and brilliant. Looking at her you might sometimes think of some poet's young hero. In her soul, too, dwelt a high-toned sense of honor which was manlike: though all men—more is the pity—do not have it. And this it was which moved within her now.

Unconsciously she had won a heart. It was a little her fault, a very little, and she dared not trample on it. She could not.

From her knees she arose, convinced of her duty, and stood before the window looking out upon the road—a pleasant country road, burnished by the setting sun.

"I must love him if I can," she said. "Poor child—poor boy! This is what his sadness means. This is his secret. I am so very rich—he knows. He is afraid to speak. I wish he were not. I could love him more."

She went at the mirror to bind up her hair—that glorious hair, ink-black and glossy as polished jet. The great waves were pinioned in a golden net. From her hearty ears hung glowing rubies. Her mates glittered on her bosom, no redder than her lips. Such a face might a Madonna have worn. It was gorgeous; gorgeous things became it; rich colors set it off. Margaret knew that it was beautiful. When a few long years—years more than dead Roger Ackland back his letters, and seen that face of his, rugged as the granite hills where he was born, have partly pallid to the hue—her mirror should had put her own heart beneath her feet and trampled on it—she had never dreamed the dreams of other girls, never hoped as other women hoped. She was five-and-twenty now. Should she begin to dream again?

"Love is worth much," said Margaret, "and I could comfort him and care for him—I could make him rich. Better mend my life than that let it go to waste. Better make another happy than I can not be quite happy myself." And she turned from the mirror with a sigh.

Ten minutes after her laugh rang merrily through the great rooms below, and Charles Lawton was listening to it.

He sat beside the clergyman and opposite her as she poured tea. There was grace in her every motion, fascination in her every glance. He looked at him as she had never looked before; for she knew now that he loved her. That knowledge alters a man at once to any woman. Before, he had been only a gentle, pleasant-faced man, to whom she could be kind. Now he was much more. She exerted herself to please him. She hoped he like to do so. She could not quite meet his eye. She blushed when, by accident, he touched her hand in passing his cup. Before her now she required knowledge she could have held it in her own like a little child's.

When the meal and the long, quiet evening chat were over, she sought her pillow, confident that she had chosen well. A good if not a great man loved her; and she could be his wife. Only for a little pain remained when, in some day-dream, she saw again the glorious, rugged face of Roger Ackland, and looking into her heart saw there a mighty idol—a shrine cast down—a something vanished from her soul forever, which had been very sweet to it.

Yes, Margaret was on the whole happier. Hour by hour in the days which followed she found it a sweeter task to give her timid lover hope. But in vain follow, no conceited "pretty man," was this. Less confident of his own powers of fascination, less hopeful, more humble-hearted he could not have been. That dainty care of person and attire was natural to him. Looking foplish, he was not—for what sin is there? Teaching him what he might hope, she began to feel a strange fondness for him, such as few women ever experience. A protecting feeling, as though he had been a girl and she a man. This strange, peculiar Margaret Glint absolutely began to love him the day which saw her heart the right to pillow his head upon her bosom, to endow him with her worldly goods, to shelter him with the great mantle of her love, and care for him in sickness or in sorrow. Oftener and oftener at this time her face and form reminded one of some young cavalier.

In the great bow-window, looking out upon the grounds, they used to sit together for hours, when the amanuensis was free from his daily task. She at her work, he idle. Sometimes they talked. Sometimes he gave her a half-glimpse of his life. Hinted at a sorrow, at a hopeless future. Seemed half inclined to tell her what he felt, then sunk into shy silence.

"And all because I am rich," thought Margaret. "Can he not see, when I should not say I am not plain enough in my manner? I have gone as far as woman can.

Yet she pitied him instead of feeling wroth.

The great book toiled on toward its end and was haply finished. Proof-sheets were revised, columns of fairy words were shut up between covers of substantial leather. The amanuensis was needed no longer. In a day or two he would be gone. Could it be that he would go without telling her all? It came to this. Margaret had taught herself to love him. To be so fond of him that hot tears welled up to her eyes at the thought of parting. She saw how sad he was, and she vowed that woman's fear should not stand between them. That if he dared not speak she would.

The last night had fallen. They were alone together. Alone by the open fire, kindled for the first time that season on the hearth. She sat near a low lounge, he stood with his arm upon the mantle-piece and his head bent. To-day the tastable the Doctor had gone to his own room to luxuriate in the sight of those hob-pressed volumes. The servants were far away in kitchen and in cellar. The rain forbade all fear of intruders from without. If ever time were favorable for her purpose that was the hour. Margaret knew it. She felt in her say something to her, sit beside her, take her hand? Surely never was man's heart as faint as his.

Thinking of this, she saw in the fire—something glitter in the fire-light—something that smote her heart. It was a tear. This mute lover of her was suffering.

Margaret sprang from her seat and crossed the space between them. She put her hand upon Charles Lawton's shoulder. "You are unhappy?" she said. "Have you no confidence in me? Come, sit beside me; tell me all."

He sat down as she bade him. She kept her hand upon his arm. Had he met her eyes he must have known the truth. But he never lifted his.

"I can not, I can not," he said again. "Can I help you? Can I advise you? Believe me, if I can I will. Whatever it is, if I can I will."

He shook his head.

"God bless you!" he said. "I fear there is no advice I can give you—no help to come, save that which Time may bring. You would despise me should I tell you all."

"Coward!"

He heard the word and looked at her. She smiled.

"Faint heart. I know what troubles you. Why should you fear to tell a woman of your love because she is rich? Have you no trust in me? See, look at me all."

From her bosom she drew the paper she had kept there so long and laid it on his knee.

He looked, glazed upon it, and the next instant was kneeling at her feet. Not to woo.

How he told it, how she heard it, Margaret never could remember but as a dream. Both too poor to woo. His health had failed him.

Years might pass before he might dare even hope, or the time might never come. And his grief was for this, that in honor he must give her up lest all this weary waiting might cheat her of her spring-time, and leave her only a hopeless, loveless home.

Margaret heard it all, crushed by her great shame. Had he known the actual truth? He would not have been so bad; but that might never be. What must he think of her? For a while she was wroth with him. For a moment she could have killed him. Then she relented.

Like a queen she arose.

"I tell you I would help you if I could. I think I can," she said, and gave him her hand; and swept from the room stately until the door had closed upon him. Then, alone in the darkness, she bowed down her proud head as it never had been bowed before. She had taught herself to love this man, who after all might never care for her. He was dead—died of it. But Margaret was noble. One day there came to Charles Lawton a letter from that other Margaret in far-off England, telling him of her new love. A mysterious legacy had come to her from an unknown friend. A legacy conditional upon her union with him to whom she wrote. They need not fear poverty henceforth; and she was coming to him.

She did not, so she wrote, believe that the donor had left this wealth to her as a bribe. Only that the business had been placed had been forbidden to say more than that the money was bestowed "by Margaret on Margaret's child."

These words told Charles Lawton all. One day he shared the secret with his wife.

But long ere that Margaret sat one day before the fire—the first fire of the season, as it had been on that eventful night, the first since the marriage of Charles Lawton and Margaret sat one day before the fire—the first fire of the season, as it had been on that eventful night, the first since the marriage of Charles Lawton and Margaret, and the servant announced "A gentleman." Rising, she turned toward him, and stood transfixed. There was the tall and rugged face; the grand figure, in its half careless dress; the eye like steel in fire-light, were before her once again—Roger Ackland returned at last.

He looked at her in silence; then he said, softly:

"You bade me leave you once, Margaret. Are you sure you will me for seeking you again? I could not help it."

And she had given him her hand. Holding it still he had drawn his place beside her. He had looked into her eyes.

"You would not hear me years ago," he said. "Will you listen now?" If I have erred, I have done penance, Heaven knows! God forgives all sinners. May not a mortal woman forgive one who has repented?

And then he told her all—the evil that had been done and sorrowed over even before they met; the excuse for it; the spiteful tattling which had warped for her ear that which he would have laid before her in plain, unvarnished truth—and she listened, believing.

"You took hope and life from me when we parted," he said. "I have suffered for my wild madness years; but when, returning to my native land, I found Margaret, whom so many sought, yet free, I began to hope again. Will you give me something to live for—will you forget the past, and be mine, Margaret?"

And he drew her toward him, and her head dropped upon his breast and rested there. A very woman she seemed now, confiding, clinging, trusting; and as she felt his arms about her the olden joy returned, and Margaret was happy.

So happy that she could have knelt down to thank Heaven for the bitterness mortification of her life, for any woe or any pain which had kept her free to give herself to Roger Ackland.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

We have had in our political history four eminently critical Presidential administrations: WASHINGTON'S, in the adoption of the Constitution, established in 1787, was first tested in practice; JACKSON'S, in which this Constitution was for the first time seriously threatened by CALHOUN'S adherents in South Carolina; LINCOLN'S, in which CALHOUN'S doctrines, finding support in eleven Southern States, culminated in open rebellion against the Constitution; and JOHNSON'S, in which the rebellion, having been suppressed by military force, and the Constitution and over its armed opponents (or misinterpreters, if they prefer that designation), it became necessary for the Government to restore the Union, and, under the Constitution, to guarantee to disorganized States "a republican form of government," and to secure the peace of the country by the perfect allegiance of all its citizens, which had been obtained by military conquest. The first three of these administrations were successful. Under WASHINGTON, for the Constitution, then for the first time put into operation, fully justified the hopes of its distinguished founders, which, in view of the jealousies and often-baffled attempts, had finally secured its adoption by the people. JACKSON, with characteristic promptness, crushed the Nullification of 1832. LINCOLN, with a fidelity to the Constitution and an honesty of purpose to which the Rebellion, in part, was characteristic, suppressed the rebellion of 1860-61. The issue of JOHNSON'S administration remains yet to be decided.

ANDREW JOHNSON, the seventeenth President of the United States, is probably as remarkable a man as our country has produced. His career is a remarkable one. He was born in Raleigh, North Carolina, December 29, 1808. At the age of 10 years he was apprenticed to a tailor in his native city. The circumstances of his early life were calculated to give him an appreciation of many of the worst evils of the Slave system which existed in the South. The disadvantages under which he, as a poor boy, labored as contrasted to the advantages of the privileged few, were a constant incentive to him at every step. No institution of learning opened its doors to him. During the seven years of his apprenticeship he learned to read, but nothing else, in part, we suspect but still more to his own ingenuity and untiring perseverance. His first reading-book—and that was a book of power—was a volume of speeches, chiefly those of BRITISH statesmen. In 1826, at the age of 18, he removed to Greenville, in East Tennessee, where he was so fortunate as to marry a young lady who was competent to teach him writing and to give a first rudiment of grammar. This was the completion of ANDY'S schooling; the refinements of a college education were beyond his reach; the knowledge which he had gained was only among the seeds of a higher and more scholastic culture, fitted him for the uses of life.

As might be supposed, when we find him at the age of twenty entering upon the arena of political conflict, his instincts and opinions are emphatically democratic. His first political success was against the aristocratic element in Greenville, his own town, where for three years he held the office of Alderman, and was elected to the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, from that State; in 1843 was sent to the State Senate, in which he served for four years, and re-elected in 1845 and 1847; in 1853 was elected Governor of Tennessee, being re-elected in 1855; was elected United States Senator in 1857 for the full term of six years; and in 1862 was appointed by President LINCOLN Military Governor of Tennessee.

Such was the curriculum of official life run by ANDREW JOHNSON before he was, in 1864, elected Vice-President of the United States. His political record during all these years has been well defined, and, in the main, consistent. He maiden speech in Congress was in favor of the reduction of the ratio to restore the fine imposed upon General JACKSON for having placed New Orleans under martial law. Judging from his Congressional record, we should set him down as a stiff Democrat of the ANDREW JACKSON school. He warmly advocated the annexation of Texas, as he thought that State would "prove to be the gateway out of which the sable sons of Africa are to pass from bondage to freedom, and become merged in a population congenial with themselves"—a prophecy which had no basis and no verification. He was a strong and able advocate for the Presidency a somewhat liberal use of the veto power; but we find that in 1847 he made a very eloquent argument in favor of the exercise of this power, in the course of which he said that JACKSON had exercised this power nine times. In this respect JOHNSON may certainly claim to have successfully imitated his prototype. He was a strong advocate of the Mexican war, and he opened the agitation of the Homestead bill, of which he was an ardent supporter until its passage.

But it is in ANDREW JOHNSON'S Senatorial career, and especially in his denunciation of the Secession movement of 1860, that the strong points of his statesmanship are most apparent. He can justly claim the rare merit, which few will eventually accord him, of having been the only Southern representative in Congress who stood firm to the Union in its greatest peril. Of course this destroyed his popularity at the South. In his own State he was burned in effigy. Passing through Lynchburg at the height of this Secession excitement, in the winter of 1860, he was grossed and hissed by a mob, who threatened to take him from the cars to hang him. But the bold, undaunted of 1861, 1861, exultantly described his having his nose pulled by a mob at Liberty, in Virginia. It was this noble stand taken by ANDREW JOHNSON for the enforcement of the Constitution which insured him the Vice-Presidency.

In the special session called by President LINCOLN in the summer of 1861 we find Mr. JOHNSON the ablest supporter of the apparently arbitrary acts of the President in increasing the army, claiming that Mr. LINCOLN had only anticipated Congressional legislation. Yet Mr. JOHNSON regarded the Constitution even in making war upon its enemies. It was he who introduced into the Senate, July 26, the following resolution (previously adopted in the House), and which passed by a vote of 80 against 5:

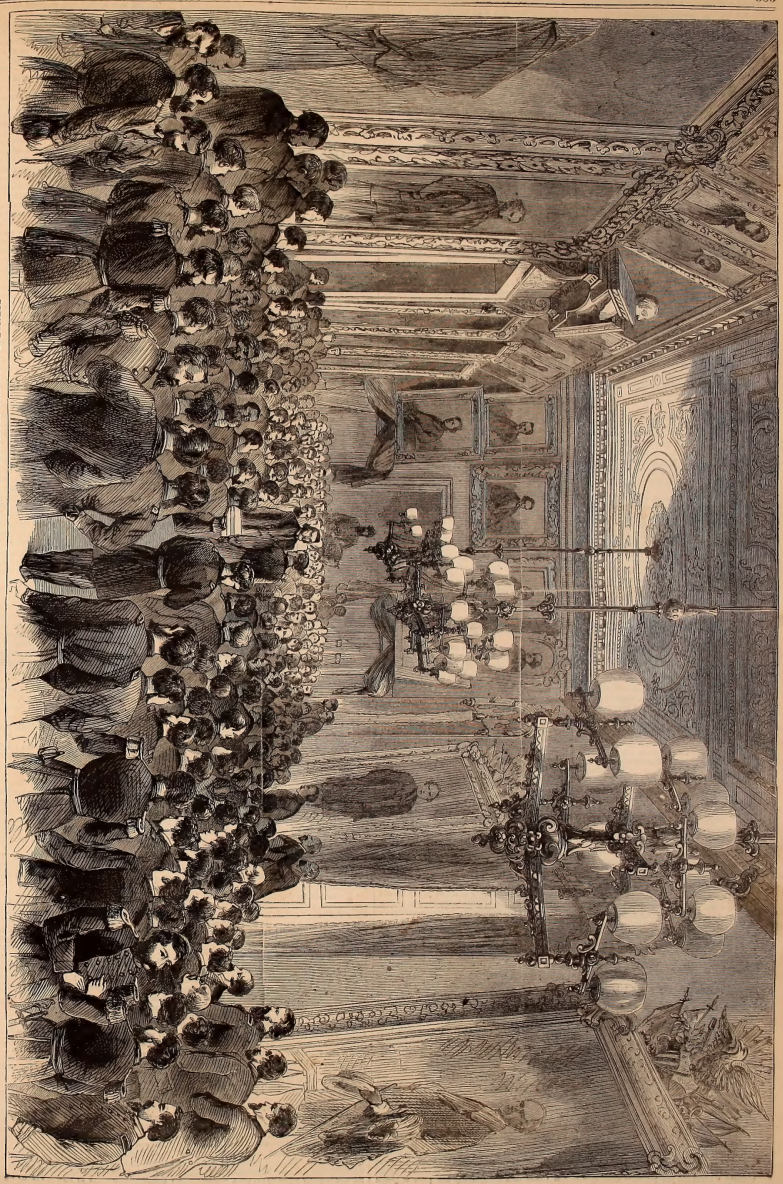
"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the Southern States now in revolt against the Constitutional Government, and in arms around the Capitol; that, in this national emergency, Congress, banishing all party feeling, more passion or resentment, will resolutely unite by duty to support the Government and the Constitution, and discharge our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease.

The principle involved in this resolution is the key-note of ANDREW JOHNSON'S policy during 1862, and this brings us down to the immediate present. We pass over Mr. JOHNSON'S career as Military Governor of Tennessee, which was eminently consistent with his Congressional record. He was, without parade, inaugurated President of the United States upon the death of Mr. LINCOLN'S death. We shall not here quote what he had previously said about hanging conscious traitors, nor, as is the habit of many, shall we denounce him for not having made the unsparing use of the halter which he once threatened. This journal has never advocated the execution of these traitors, which was first advocated recommended any vindictive policy as against the persons of the leaders in the rebellion. For our words or while to inquire what has turned Mr. JOHNSON toward a more lenient policy—the policy of pardoning rebels instead of hanging them. The chief reason that a deep sense of his responsibility upon the assumption of the Presidential office led him to engage his whole heart in the consideration of such measures as he had formerly proposed, or it may have been the example of his predecessor which allowed his generous nature to have full sway, he have no fault to find with him in this regard.

The main objection presented against Mr. JOHNSON'S conduct is that of the Radical Republicans by those who were formerly his supporters arises from a divergence of views between him and them as to the proper measures and necessities of Reconstruction. They wish to secure the results of the war, and they go somewhat further than he does in the guarantees against the lack of the late rebels. The case stands simply thus: The rebels in arms were disarmed by our soldiers; submission to the enforcement of war laws was the least that could be expected of them—this was simply the recognition of defeat, and by no means involved a necessity to a return to their allegiance. But they claimed that they not only recognized their defeat, but were willing also to carry their allegiance to the Government, and to unite with their victors in such a restoration of peace and union as was dictated by the necessities of the situation, and the situation of the war had left the country. They accordingly nullified secession, repudiated the rebel debt, and ratified the Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery. President JOHNSON accepted these acts as satisfactory evidences of the good faith and loyalty of Southern citizens. They recognized the right of each re-entered to their normal relations with the General Government, except in a few very important cases, which were left to which he must leave to Congress. Well, Congress, upon its assembling, claimed that the Legislative Department was beginning to determine in this matter of restoration—something more than was involved in the mere examination of the credentials of Southern Congressmen. In short, Congress was not satisfied with the guaranties which the President had secured: these were only of all citizens to the extent to race, color; and still further, the States ought, by an amendment of the Constitution, to be put upon an equal footing of basis of representation.

Congress decided, therefore, that these two things must be secured, precedent to its recognition of States as restored. Here, in few words, is the difference between the President and the Thirty-ninth Congress. Between them the gulf is wide indeed. We have, in this place, no arguments to offer in support or opposition of either side. Arguments of both sides are presented every week in our editorial columns. One thing, however, seems certain. The difference between the President and Congress must result in a deplorable situation in the South. It seems to be taken for granted there that the late rebels will be sustained in their proscription of Union men and their infuriated animosity against the freedmen; and it is to be feared that a popular victory on the side of the President will tend to confirm this assumption. This is a conception eminently worthy the attention of all whose in favor of equal rights, and who are not willing to forget those in the South who have been faithful adherents of the Union cause during the war.

President JOHNSON has been sketched by Senator DOOLITTLE as "a man of medium stature, compact and strong built, of dark complexion, and deep-set black eyes. He is of bilious temperament, of strong intellect, indomitable energy, and iron will, in whose character, I should say, the strongest feature of all is that of stern justice, mingled with a genuine hatred of all forms of aristocracy and oppression, and a patriotism so ardent that it amounts to a passion, almost a religion." We mean nothing disrespectful when we add that ANDREW JOHNSON does not belong to that high order of American statesmen where stand such men as ALEXANDER HAMILTON and WM. H. SEWARD. While he undoubtedly possesses a remarkable tenacity of purpose, and is to be accorded perfect honesty in his political views, it is impossible for him to command that kind of popular confidence which was given to Mr. LINCOLN. Unlike the latter, Mr. JOHNSON possesses a mind rather impressional than argumentative. His exhibition of temper, his intemperate, and often indecent, denunciation of his political opponents remind us rather of the demagogue than of the unimpassioned and well-balanced statesman. Whether we deem him right or wrong, his speeches before the people always have had essentially the same characteristics—the same strength and the same weakness. He never forgets, or lets you forget, that he is "the humble individual who is now addressing you;" he seems always apprehensive lest we shall lose sight of the sacrifices which he has borne or the service which he has done; if we do not agree with him politically we may expect to be called "traitors;" if any opponent has denounced him, we may be sure that he will return the blow with interest, thus putting himself upon the level of his intemperate and it may be vulgar antagonist. These characteristics are the result, in part, of his peculiar temperament, and, in still greater part, of his political education. The strongest speeches he has ever made—and those most free of the characteristic weakness to which we have alluded—were those made by him in the Senate in the winter of 1860 and the following summer. Indeed when speaking before the Senate he appeared as a very different style of orator than when addressing the people. Before the latter his speeches are disconnected, full of repetitions, and not even his official position as Chief Magistrate of the United States is sufficient to keep him within the limits of good sense and decorum.



These weaknesses are no arguments against his policy, any more than the same sort of weaknesses displayed by THADDEUS STEVENS are arguments against the policy of Congress. We have always spoken freely of this sort of rhetoric, on whichever side it has been used. Neither Mr. STEVENS's denunciations of the President and his supporters, nor the indecorous epithets applied by President JOHNSON to his opponents, will weigh much with the people. They will dodge this rhetoric of thunder, and decide the great issue which is now before them according to their appreciation of the questions involved, and we feel sure that their verdict will accord with reason and with their patriotic instincts.

ANDREW JOHNSON, THE SEVENTEENTH PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. GARDNER, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S RECEPTION AT THE CONTINENTAL HOTEL, PHILADELPHIA.—SKETCHED BY E. P. FRAZER.—[SEE PAGE 581.]

PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S RECEPTION AT THE CITY HALL, NEW YORK, AUGUST 29, 1866.—SKETCHED BY C. H. WELLS.—[SEE PAGE 581.]

SEPTEMBER.

GENTLE September, thou art here;
The Graces follow in thy train,
The shimmer of the bounteous year,
And scatter gifts of golden grain.

September, e'en thy very name
Is syllabled unto the ear
In liquid sweetness; and the same
Sweet promise ripens in thy cheer.

We see thee in thy drop-hued dress,
We hear thee in thy plaintive breeze,
We taste thee in the mellowness
That drops from thy rich-burdened trees.

We know thee by the tempered heat
That lingers in the sun's spent rays,
And by the passing hours more fleet
That fill thy Indian Summer days.

And by the faint-hued haze which veils
The vista seen through branches bare;
But we feel thee most when language fails,
By other signs and scenes than these.

Thou hast a token in the sky,
A music in the wandering winds,
A strength in thy maturity,
In which the soul a solace finds.

We hail thee, harvest month—and more,
Thou art the heart's month—and we gain
Of calm content a plenteous store,
As well as gifts of golden grain.

THE TALE OF AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE.

In Six Weekly Portions.—Third Portion.

CHAPTER VI.

ONLY a short time intervened between that evening when Anna sang so wonderfully, and quitted the room so strangely, and the period fixed for Miss Wokenham's marriage. The approaching departure of our good friend naturally occupied our thoughts very much. It was a great event and excitement in the even tenor of our lives; and going to America was a much more serious matter in those days than it is now.

Miss Wokenham, however, was as brave and bright as possible: it was not until the very night before she went away that she broke down, or lost the cheerful face we were familiar with.

"It isn't that I'm at all afraid, my dears," she sobbed out, "or that I have the least distrust of Lewis; but I am so fond of you all, and home is very dear, and every thing is strange before me, and, of course, one must be a callous brute—and I hope I'm not quite that—to be able to take it all composedly, and—and I can't find my pocket-hand kerchief!"

My heart warmed to Monsieur De Beaugué when I saw him draw a bright-colored bandanna from his pocket and gently wipe the little woman's streaming eyes as if she had been a child: could have hugged him when he afterward applied the handkerchief to his own eyes with the utmost simplicity. Somehow I felt then that our dear little governess was safe with him.

They had at first intended to be married in Liverpool, and to spend a few days there before leaving England. But the merchantman they were going out in was to sail sooner than had been expected, and they would have no time to spare. So Miss Wokenham bade us good-by in her modest character that last evening, and was married early the following morning. Dear uncle gave the bride away. He and my aunt were the only guests present in the church, by Miss Wokenham's expressed desire.

She had some relatives—second cousins, I believe —who lived in a tall brick house just outside the town, and were very stiff and stately. Not the less so, I fancy, that they had no particular reason for stiffness and stateliness. They were a chilly, less old couple, sufficiently well-to-do in the world, and were very decidedly agrieved by the fact of their relative's keeping a school. This injury, however, they kindly condoned, finding, possibly, some consolation in the reflection that her keeping a school relieved her friends from the necessity of keeping her. But the announcement of Miss Wokenham's intended marriage had shocked them—Mrs. Parker especially—to a frightful extent.

"You would have thought I had confessed to some awful crime, to hear cousin Sarah," said Miss Wokenham to my aunt. "She talked to me more like a jail chaplain than any thing else. And after all, I should like to know what difference it can make to them? They insinuated that I must not expect to inherit any of their money—just as if I ever had expected it! and they talked vaguely of ruin and disgrace in store for the family. However, I kept my temper pretty well till the hint as to be impertinent about Lewis, when I fired up, and told them he was a Gentleman whose shoes none of the Parkers were worthy to unloose. Then, when you see, it would have been of no use asking cousin Sarah and her husband to my wedding. And indeed they shouldn't have come if they had been asked to, unless they made a handsome apology to M'sieu'."

So our little schoolmistress became a wife, unlamented by the haters of the Parkers' presence or patronage. The breakfast was given at the Gable House, and, at the last moment, when it was time for the travelers to depart, Horace Lee came hurrying in, flushed and panting, with a great nosegay of hot-house flowers in his hand, which he presented to the bride. The poor little soul was in a sad state of agitation by this time, and was clinging to my aunt as if she could never part from her, but she smiled through her tears when she saw Horace. He was always a great favorite of hers. "My goodness!" said she, with a spark of her old vivacity, "where did you get those glorious flowers? But your face is as bright as they are. I scarcely hoped to see you again. I thought you were at your father's for the week."

"Did you suppose I would let you leave Willborough without saying good-by?" returned Horace. "I was up at six o'clock this morning, now sacking the green-houses at the Hall. When I told the head gardener that I wanted some flowers to give to a bride, he took quite an interest in their selection, and said I was to gather what I chose. I galloped the new mare nearly all the way into Willborough. And now you must pay me for my pop," Madame de Beaugué."

To see the start the little woman gave when he called her by her new name! She put her hands in his, and stood on tip-toe to be kissed, saying, "God bless you, my dear boy! I shall always like you, and keep you in remembrance by side with our beloved friends at the Gable House. You know I can not express a higher regard than that for any one."

More kisses and embraces, confused farewells, promises to write, thanks, tears, blessings, and our dear old friend was gone. The last glimpse I had of her showed me her small form being lifted into the fly by my uncle's strong arms. Good, true friend! As large of heart as she was tiny of stature. What a giantess would Miss Wokenham have been if her soul and body had borne proportion to one another!

For some days after the marriage the whole household seemed unsettled and out of joint, and even about from the house to the gardens, and from the gardens to the orchard, and about and about, in a most desultory manner.

Old Stock had been forced so far to yield to age and rheumatism as to accept the assistance of a permanent under-gardener. And to him we turn our directions, and spare him the hardest part of the outdoor work. It was a rare trial to him, until he discovered a mine of comfort in the clogged and unnamed total incapacity of his assistant. This inexhaustible theme for grumbling seemed to afford him more enjoyment than any he could find in his pipe. "Good-morning, Stock," said I to him, a few days after Miss Wokenham's wedding. "What sort of a spring are we likely to have, do you think, judging by looking with you here?" He was standing in the kitchen garden—leaning on a great brown knotted stick, scarcely browner or more knotted than his hands—inspecting the labors of his subordinate, who was digging up a great potato-bed. It was one of Stock's characteristic mornings, and he was unable to candle a spade himself.

"Spring, Miss Margit," growled the old man; "The spring'll be likely to be sure. The Lord'll look after that. But as to how things is looking here, why however is things like to look, when the master's away, and there's no sight of Bill Green? In course I knows my duety:" Stock was always comfortably satisfied on that point: "I does my'n's create out plain. I've been hard out on a man as has served the master forty year, fur to see the soil turned up in that there bed as it ought to be turned up; it's a liable bit if the master ordains as Bill Green is to spoon the herth instead of digging it, why, so spooned the herth must be."

"Don't be hard on Green, Stock," said I; "he'll improve, no doubt, with all the pains you will take to teach him."

"Pains! Ah, great pains an' little gains. Jist look at him now, Miss Margrit, a-standin' gapin' like a stuck pig, instead of a-hoeing of the weeds. Didn't ye never see a young lady afore, ye great gaby?"

"I've see'd lots on 'em," returned Bill Green: a blue-eyed stolid young fellow, upon whom Stock's sarcasm and scolding appeared equally powerless to produce impression.

"Oh, ye have, have ye? Then what are you standin' starin' at? Why don't ye try to do sum'at to turn your dull face to sum'at like common?"

"I've digged this here bed, an' I dunno what's to do next," said Green.

Stock turned to me humbly for instruction.

"Ye see, ye see, Miss Margrit! That's the way: He ain't got no more notion of his dueties nor a baby. It's a mercy that they had no notion at all, or he'd be about to look after him. Come here along wi' me, Bill Green, and I'll pint out what mischief you and your spoon is to do next. Bring your spoon along with you. Not as the Lord wills that the article should ever be missing where you are!" And the old man hobbled away to another part of his domains, followed by Bill Green, who confidentially believed himself a great deal more ill-used.

Horace greatly relished Stock's eccentricities and I got into the habit of treasuring up his odd sayings and doings, to amuse the invalid on her return. Horace was really witty. I have never known a more amusing companion than he could be when once he knew you well enough to care for you for a time. He sometimes had fits of wild spirits that kept uncle Gough in roars of laughter. But then, too, he was always well enough to care sympathy with any thing sad. The tears would spring to his eyes in a moment at hearing a plaintive tune or a pathetic story. He really could relate to give to a beggar, and was as tender as a woman with aged people and little children. Uncle Gough used to say of Horace Lee that he was "a trump," and not a bad No. "Wants ballast a bit, does the laddie," said uncle. "But, Lord help us! We all grow hard soon enough; and it's a pity a young person is worse than an old head upon young shoulders."

CHAPTER VII.

GRADUALLY I grew to join the thought of Horace with every incident in my life. When the lilies of the valley first peeped up under the shady side of the moss-grown orchard wall, I said to myself: "How Horace will like to see them!"—for he loved flowers dearly. When old Dran, the watch-dog, crawled feebly into the parlor, one day for the first and last time in his life, and died with his faithful head on my uncle's feet, I thought, amidst my tears: "How Horace will grieve for Bran." If I wore a brighter ribbon than usual, or any new piece of girlish finery, I secretly wondered, "How will Horace like it?" I suppose this was "falling in love," but I did not know it. It was rather growing into love, gradually and gently, as the love of kindred—father, mother, brothers, sisters—grows up in our hearts, until it becomes a part of our nature, and we can no more remember when it was not there, than we can recall the days of our earliest infancy. Mine was not a passionate nature, but it was a clinging one. Love, with me, was not the fierce devouring overmastering feeling that I had seen it in others. It grew to be a part of me: an ever-present, steady, strong affection, that claimed no passionate expression nor violent outbursts, but that lived in my life, and entwined itself in my being. It took root in my permanent and deepest heart of hearts. Yes, it was love that I felt for Horace Lee; a real, true, undying love, and one which has lasted long life has known those youthful days and this present time in which I write, and oh, my Lucy, for whom I write, I love him to this hour!

Although I can now, on looking back, clearly understand my own feelings, you must therefore not suppose that I did so at nineteen. I never thought of "questioning my heart," or "analyzing my love consciousness," or attempting any of the profound metaphysical problems which—the circulating library informs us—the girls of this generation are occupied with. Innocent, that sometimes I feel almost afraid lest they should "analyze" all their emotions away, or lose the sweet unconsciousness that is their charm, and leave only a little earthy deposit at the bottom of the crucible. But when I look around me and see eyes as bright and faces as fresh as those other eyes and faces, and cheeks I saw so long ago, I believe that fresh, unsophisticated hearts come, according to the goodness of God, as much in each naturally as the sad diseases; and I revert to my old comforting conviction, that when youth and love quite go out of the world the world itself will have got too.

I look back on that girl at the Gable House as on another creature. I smile at her follies and simplicities, and, now and then, shed a tear over some of the bitter days that lie before her. Ah, how young she seems with her nineteen years, and how old am I, Aunt Margaret!

Well! As I have said, Horace Lee became the central figure in my life, his presence made me quietly glad, and my uncle and dear guardians and benefactors the better that they also loved him. "But it was all unconscious, or at least without thought, in my girlish, ignorant way. I was not of the house, and uncle used to call him and Anna his two spoiled bairns. Anna had given way to no outbursts of temper since that stormy night of her willfulness about the singing, and we hoped that, as she grew older, she was gaining self-control and gentleness. My thoughts did not proceed to what Miss Wokenham had said to me on that same evening, and I remained blissfully unconscious of the future, unforeseen, or fancied she foresaw. I came at last to the conclusion that she dreaded trouble for us all from Anna's unpromising disposition, as she well had, how unchecked by firm opposition that fiery spirit had been from babyhood. I wished that our good friend could have known how pleasant a change had come over my sister within the last two months. I mentally resolved to give her a glowing account of Anna's improvement in my next letter to Canada, so as to convey to her that I understood what she had meant by her warning, and to assure her that her anxiety was quite unwarranted and needless. Altogether, that winter evening was frequently in my mind, for from it I dated the loss of my little hair chain. The chain was made for it on the following morning, but vainly; and then the preparations for our old schoolmistress's wedding left no leisure for regrets at all, from the kitchen-maid up to dear Aunt Gough.

Old Mr. Lee came occasionally to see us, and to express in his courtly way his sense of their kindness and hospitality toward his son.

"Horace is doing well at Rotherwood," said the old gentleman to me, one day, so they tell me. Sir Robert"—this was the great baronet, Mr. Lee's employer—"Sir Robert sent for Horace to the Hall about some little matter of horse-breeding, I believe, the draining of Meadow Leas, and Sir Robert had him into the drawing-room—into the drawing-room, my lady was sitting—and made him stop to luncheon."

We were all uncomfortably dumb in a moment, and I felt my face crimsoning at him, that Horace was crimson. But Mr. Lee went on in his usual self-satisfied way, in happy ignorance of the misery we were feeling.

"He staid in the drawing-room, where my lady was, full twenty minutes—from that to half an hour, so they tell me, I believe—and shook hands with him when he came away. Very gratifying. But they always have been pleased to entertain a great deal more than ordinary civility for him."

Somehow or other the fonder I grew of Horace the more I shrank from Mr. Lee. I must have appeared a perfect fool at times, or a perfect pail of silence and shyness seemed to envelop me from head to foot when I was in his presence. Anna, on the contrary, who always felt less diffident than I—and with good reason, for she was a bright, winning creature, with the lively, frank manner that had never known a chill or a cold—Anna would laugh and chat and play off her pretty airs on the old gentleman with astonishing vivacity. He admired her vastly, and called her a "charmer" and a "sylph," and "nymph," and "cruel charmers," and fair "endeavors" compliments over which Anna used to go into fits of laughter when we got home, and which I considered to be ridiculous. But she seemed determined to fascinate Mr. Lee, and she certainly succeeded.

One day, when the spring was pretty far advanced, and the young leaves and the tender grass had put forth their first fresh delicious green, Mr. Lee appeared at the Gable House early in the forenoon. He had his chaise at the door, he said, and was come to ask my aunt to do him the honor of taking a drive. She had been ailing somewhat during the last week, and he thought that the bright sun and fresh air would do her good.

"Do go, dear aunty," said we; and my uncle joined us in urging her.

"I will take you to a farm of one of Sir Robert's tenants, where I have business," said Mr. Lee, "and the good people of the house will be proud to offer you some homely refreshment, as a friend of mine. I am to sleep in Willborough to-night, and will drive you back before it grows dark. There is—when I there is a third seat behind, and if one of the young ladies would accompany us—"

It was comical to see the look he gave me. It said "don't accompany us," so plainly. I involuntarily answered the look, by exclaiming: "Oh no, of course Anna will go." But Anna wished me to have the pleasure of the drive, and protested that she never cared to go and leave me at home. "That is nonsense, dear," said I. "Do you go, and take care of aunty, and make her wrap up. I'll stay with Lee, he will take me some other day." A proposal to which Mr. Lee, in his gladness at escaping my companionship for the present, politely and even cordially assented. So it was settled that Anna should go; and I helped to put warm wraps into the little chaise, in case the spring evening should turn chilly as they came home; and I stood watching them as they drove away—Anna's dark ringlets waving about her pretty face, and her mouth pursed up into a ridiculous grimace in imitation of the unconscious Mr. Lee, who sat upright and stately before her.

There was never lack of occupation at the Gable House. Aunt Gough had made us familiar with all housewifely lore, and both my sister and I were proud of our skill as housekeepers. My morning, therefore, passed busily away. After giving my uncle his early dinner and seeing him satisfied with his pipe and the London newspaper in the dining-room, I took my knitting and went into the garden to enjoy the brightness of the afternoon. soon. I wandered all over the grounds, through the shrubbery, into the orchard where the happy child birds were chirping and twittering in the gnarled old fruit-trees. I marked the early flowers dotting the borders with brilliant spots of color; and I peered with keen interest at the promise of a great plenty of roses displayed by the standard trees upon the lawn. It was all so dear and so familiar to me! I knew every nook in the grass, every time-tinted patch in the old brick walls, every shrub, every bough, nay, almost every leaf. As I came slowly from the orchard, I stopped to pick a bunch of broad-faced daisies that grew luxuriantly on a tiny green mound in a sunny corner of the shrubbery. It was a little mound, with a white upright stone at one end of it, whereon the goodwife Stock had engraven, "Little Vixen lies beneath it, her fiery barkings and quaint gambols stilled forever. "Vic," said I, half aloud, "I am glad to know you were once very happy little dog." And then I began to think of our childish days when Anna and Vic were such fast friends and playmates. I remembered the great battle outside of the porch and Stock's signal defeat, and then I thought of my discomfitures and poor Dolly's deadly attack. Dolly! I said to the said poor Dolly's ornament. I went inside it and sat down. Though it was yet early in the year, the afternoon sun falling on that side of the house and beating in the open space of gravel—still the pride of Stock's heart—made the shade pleasant. The click of my knitting-needles grew slower and slower, and at last ceased. And I had fallen into a drowsy kind of reverie. I was given to day-dreams then. All sorts of pictures of my childhood's days, and of the places and places I knew, came into my head and passed away to be succeeded by other pictures. I was conscious of a very kind of curiosity as to what I should see next, when I heard a step on the gravel-path. It was not old Stock's heavy tread this time, but a light young footfall. And I will know whose.

"I thought I should find you here," said Horace, coming out of the sunlight to my side.

"Did you?" I said, rising. As the porch before, this year; but this lovely afternoon tempted me. Aunty and Anna are gone to drive with your father."

"Yes, I know it. I am glad Mrs. Gough consented to go. I believe the air will do her good."

He had come very eagerly for me, I thought he had been seeking me, wishing to say something; but now he sat silent, trifling with the ball of knitting-worsted that had fallen on my lap. I was ashamed that he had an absent trick of turning and twisting things in his fingers.

"What have you been doing new reminds me," I told him, "of my hair chain. Do you know I have never been able to find it since that night when you made Anna nervous by playing with it? Isn't it strange?"

He put his hand into his breast and turned his eyes upon me with a look that made my color rise and my heart beat faster.

"Margaret"—oh the tenderness in his voice! how sweet it sounded!—"Margaret, shall I tell you something? Here is your chain. I have had it next my heart ever since that night." He drew it from his breast as he spoke. A great joy began to flood my soul, but it was my nature to distrust such happiness. I could not accept it all at once: it seemed too great, too unreal to me. So I tremblingly held out my hand for the chain, with a slight exclamation of surprise.

"No," said Horace, drawing nearer to me, "not till you have heard why I took it. You have not asked me that, Margaret. Do you know?"

I shook my head. I was speaking.

"Can you guess?"

My tears began to blind me, and I could not keep down a sob. He threw his arms around me and held me to his breast.

"Because I had been yours; because it had clasped your throat; because the poorest ribbon you could wear, the glove that had touched your hand, the flower you had gathered and thrown away, would be dear and precious to me; because I love you, Margaret!"

Oh those words, those dear, dear words! Oh that happy time, that happy, happy time!

"Horace," I whispered, after a while, "Prince and Goldenheart is come at last." For he knew the story of my childish play, and had often laughed over it with me.

"Is it Prince Goldenheart?" he said. "Well; he should have a heart of gold who woos my Margaret. Thank God, at all events, there is no wicked fairy to blight my gentle Princess, or to stand between her and her love."

As he spoke a shadow blotted out the evening light, and when it had passed the sun had set.

"What was that?" I asked, looking up.

"Why, they have come home! Is it so late? It was your sister Anna."

"They have come home? Then they must have driven round into the stable-yard, and come into the house by the back way. I dare say Anna was looking for me. I must go now, Horace. Please let me."

I felt much as the child of twelve years before had felt, when my books, personifying the work-a-day world of reality, broke in upon her fairy story. We had been dreaming such a beautiful dream, Horace and I, all to ourselves, that for the moment it seemed a hardship to come out of that enchanted realm and face the common aspect of accustomed things. "Let me one instant, Margaret?" He held both my hands clasped in one of his, and stood with his other hand laid softly on my head, looking down upon me.

Aunty will wonder what has become of me."

"Answer me this one question. Do you really, really love me?"

"Oh, Horace! have I not said so?"

"Say it again! Once more—only once more."

"May I go if I say it again? Do you promise?"

I promise, darling."

I released myself from his hold, and drew down the hand that rested on my head; then, leaning my two hands upon his shoulders, I raised my face to his and kissed him; darting away next moment at full speed, and never stopping until I had flown across the hall, and through the stone-flagged passage that led to the morning-room. I paused outside the door, suddenly conscious of flushed cheeks and dishevelled hair, and waiting from my self-possession, I heard voices laughing and talking within, and, reassured by the conviction that they were not thinking of me, I stole up to my own chamber to bathe my face and smooth my hair. When I came down again and entered the morning-room the tea-table was spread and Horace was seated beside my aunt, who was leaning back in her large arm-chair with an air of weariness. Anna was there, and my uncle was there, and Mr. Lee.

"Dear aunty, are you tired? Have you had a pleasant day?" said I, hastening to her.

"Where have you been, Madge, my love? Anna was looking for you. Will you make the tea, and offer Mr. Lee some cold meat? I had a very agreeable drive, but I am thought tired now, my dear."

So the business of the tea-table came opportunely to cover my confusion. After I had attended to our guest I found courage to glance at Horace. He had been waiting on my aunt, holding her tea-cup, drawing forward a folding cushion beneath her feet, now he sat beside her, with his handsome head bent down to listen to her soft, slow speech. How I loved him! How beautiful the gentle deference of his youth and strength to her weakness and age appeared in my eyes! Anna was chatting gayly with Uncle Gough and Mr. Lee; but she kept looking across at my aunt and Horace, as if she too thought the picture they presented a pleasant one.

"We have been to such a dear old farm-house, Madge," said Anna. "Such a quaint, queer, uncomfortable, picturesque old place! Meadow Leas it is called. The drive there is pretty too. I did so enjoy it."

"The good farmer and his dame were truly proud and delighted to entertain Mrs. Gough and your sister," said Mr. Lee. "Hospitable, kind souls, poor things!"

"Hospitable! Yes, indeed, Madge. I never saw such heaps of food as they spread on the table. Pies, and cheese, and cream, and ham, and butter, and ale, and bread. I was frightened when I saw the piled up platter of rabbit pasty they put before me. And they expected me to eat it all!"

"You must go some day, Margaret dear," said my aunt. "I'm sure you would enjoy it. Farmer Gibson and his wife have all manner of pets that you would delight in."

Old Mr. Lee was to sleep at the Blue Bell, where he always put up when he came to Willborough; and he withdrew early.

"I have business to attend to to-morrow that will cause me to be up betimes, my good madam," he said to aunt in his tiresome way. "I will therefore excuse me if I take my leave now. Late hours do not suit me. They interfere with that clearness of brain which is essential to the transaction of important business."

I was very glad to see him rise to depart, for late hours did not agree with Aunt Gough any more than they did with him, and she had been looking very weary for some time past. "Horace," Mr. Lee continued, "I shall see you in the morning. Our ways lie in different directions to-night. I shall have a message to deliver to you from Sir Robert. Good-night, my dear madam. Nay, nay," in reply to some murmured thanks from my aunt, "only too glad to have afforded you a day's pleasure. Farewell, miss Anna. I am sure you will not soon be forgotten at Meadow Leas. A vision of youth and beauty bursting on the—hem! What is the word? No matter, you understand me. Good-night, Mrs. Gough. And good-night to you, Miss Selby." He had very nearly omitted his parting salutation to me altogether; but I could not let Horace's father go without a farewell, that night of all nights; so I had emerged from my nook behind the tea-table. Mr. Lee tried to look as if he had been purposely reserving the pleasure of shaking hands with me to the last, and had meant to come round to my side of the room if I would but have awaited him patiently. But I am afraid I must make the humiliating confession that I believe he had quite forgotten I was present.

My aunt rose as soon as Mr. Lee had departed, and said she would go to bed. She seemed very feeble when she got upon her feet, and I began to fear that the day's exertion had been too much for her. Horace gave her his arm to the room door, and then I think my uncle observed her more than with some anxiety. "Shall I carry you up stairs, my dear?" he said. "It wouldn't be for the first time."

"No, love, no; I'm not so dead tired as that. Madge will come with you. Good-night, all. I shall be strong again to-morrow after a night's rest."

So I went up the wide old-fashioned staircase with my aunt, my uncle having gone on to make the journey slowly, though the ascent was far from being a steep one.

Anna had seemed inclined to linger a little; but Horace was preoccupied, and did not talk; and my uncle's dear face had a rather troubled look as his eyes followed his wife's slow steps out of the room. Anna, to whom silence and dullness were always intolerable, forthwith began to yawn, and followed us up stairs almost immediately. Horace remained in the morning-room, and I saw in his eyes, and I felt in the parting pressure of his hand that he would speak in the fulness of his heart to my uncle before he went away that night. The thought made me a little nervous and agitated, though Heaven knows I had never had cause to dread my dear guardian and benefactor. I longed to speak to Aunt Gough, and tell her of my great happiness, and receive the sweet motherly sympathy that she had ever been ready to lavish on me from my childish days; but she seemed so fatigued and unstrung that I dared not venture to excite her that night for my selfish pleasure. I remained with her until her eyes closed and her head lay placidly on the pillow; then, lamp in hand, I crossed the broad landing to my bedchamber.

Anna and I shared a large, low, oak-panelled room with three deep windows looking on to the lawn. Our white-curtained beds stood side by side on an island of common carpet relieved against the darkness of the polished floor. I found that my sister was already in bed and apparently asleep; shading the lamp with my hand, I walked softly to the dressing-table and looked in the glass. It was a large old-fashioned oval mirror set in a black carved ebony frame. How plainly it all comes back to me! I can see the blue gleam of moonlight that darted in at the many-paned windows, and threw a lattice pattern on the oaken boards; I can see the wide stretch of garden and shrubbery and flowering glass-like out of a silver void at night. I can see the long shadows of the trees rocking and swaying noiselessly on the lawn, as the trees themselves moved with a soft voluptuous languid in the night breeze; I can smell the fragrance of a bunch of rich brown wall-flowers that stood in a china vase on the window-sill. I can smell it now in my mind during the moment in which I set my lamp upon the dressing-table, and tilted down the glass to an angle at which I could see the face of the fair Rose which looked at me out of the dark sea-green depths of the mirror. I knew very well that it was not a pretty face, but it was very well to look at, especially in even pretty. But it was irradiated now with a light that transfigured it. I am sure of it. And I remember how I stopped in my blissful tears. "I almost believe that being so dearly loved, and loving so dearly, will make me beautiful!" Then I bent forward and put my lips to the cold surface of the glass, and said, "That means good-night for Horace!"

I turned away from the glass with a heart full of happy thoughts, and yet my tears fell fast. Anna was lying asleep on her white bed, and, as I looked at her lovely fresh face in its nest of rippling hair, I yearned to tell my joy to any thing so sweet and young and beautiful, to receive her sisterly kiss, and to feel the clasp of her arms around my neck, as I had felt it many a time when she had come to me to be soothed in some baby sorrow, and we had fallen asleep together. I thought I could tell her better if I put out the light; therefore, when I was undressed, I extinguished the lamp and kneeled down by her bedside. The moonlight shone into the chamber, and her hand and arm, tossed carelessly outside the coverlet, were bathed in a flood of pale brightness; but her face was in shadow.

"Anna," I said in a low voice, putting my cheek down on hers—"Anna, I have something to tell you."

She did not answer me.

"Anna, darling!" It is something that makes me very, very happy, and I can not sleep without telling you."

She breathed quicker, and the white hand that lay in the moonlight clenched itself.

"Don't be frightened, dear. It is good, good news I have to tell you.

No reply. The cheek on which mine rested turned a little away, but she did not speak.

"Anna, Horace Lee loves me. He has told me so!"

She dashed herself out of my arms, turning so as to bury her face in the pillow, and the moonlit hand went up into the black shadow around her head, and staid there.

"Why did you wake me, Margaret? I was asleep. I was dreaming. I was so happy, and now you have awakened me, and I shall never, never dream that dream again."

"Anna, my pet, my child, I did not know you were sleeping so soundly. I did not mean to disturb you. Don't cry, my dear, don't cry!" For she was sobbing and moaning fretfully.

"Don't speak to me, Margaret. Get to rest. Say what you have to say to-morrow. I—I can't understand you now. I am tired, and you have awakened me, and I was dreaming pleasantly, and now my dream is gone!"

She pushed me irritably from her. My heart felt very heavy. It was such a sudden chill after my glow of joy and tenderness! But with the habitual yielding to her, which was common to us all, I rose up from my knees and went to my own bed. "I ought not to have roused her," I said to myself as I lay down. "She was tired and sleepy, and she is such a child!" Once I stretched out my hand to touch her, and as she remained perfectly still I hoped she was sleeping. Gradually I grew drowsy, and my eyes closed, and my ears lost their vigilance, and the sweetness of Horace's smile, as he held him in his arm that day, with the dancing shadows of the leaves upon his head, faded and faded, and melted away. But all night long, at intervals, I had an uneasy sense of disquietude and restlessness, and a fancy that some one was moving about the room. Once I dreamed that Anna was pacing up and down, her bare feet pattering lightly but distinctly on the polished floor. But when I started, sat up and looked around, every thing was still, and I could hear no footstep, and the moon had set, and it was very dark.

TO THE BABY.

Funny thing a baby is,
Curious little creature;
Tears, in the little plight,
Come every feature.

Helpless thing a baby is;
Tiny hands uplifting
O'er the troubled tide of life
Into which 'tis drifting.

Mystery a baby is—
Memories of heaven
Still must hover in the soul
Such a short time given.

Solemn thing a baby is,
Since it must inherit
All the loss and gain of life,
All the sin and merit.

Funny, helpless, mystic, sad,
Let me tell you, Freddy,
Half the good and sweet of life,
Is the getting ready.

Yours the sunshine—take it all
While you're weak and tiny,
By-and-by the days that come
May not be so shiny.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

COMMON-SENSE.—The difference between the cables of 1865 and 1866 is but slight. The latter has been successfully laid by per-severance—the former was per-severe-ance.

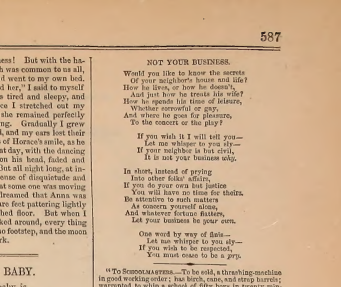
RIFLED NAVIES EXECUTED.—The performances of the seven-gun-ning machines into the shade when we hear Austrian are men-dead by means of it.

A SPARK OF INTELLIGENCE.—It is proposed to give a banquet to those who have so admirably managed the Atlantic Cable. Of course they will have electric surnaps for their deserts.

As Sayer, whose cup will governy was dash'd,
Lay long in bed, while his one shirt was wash'd,
The dame appear'd, and, holding it to view,
Said: "It is ready again 'twill wash in two."
"Indeed," cries Sayer; "then wash it, pray, good cousin,
And wash it well, for I've no more to dozen."

The man in jail who looked out of the window of his cell and exclaimed, "This is a grate country!" is now generally admitted to have spoken within bounds.

"Molly," said Jos Kelly's ghost to his wife, "I'm in purgatory at this present moment," says he. "And what sort of a place is it?" says she. "Faith," says he, "it's a sort of a half-way house between you and heaven, and I stand it mighty well after leaving you."



A leather medal having been offered for the worst pun in creation, the following was unhesitatingly awarded to the following from several hundred: Why is insanity like a hound of a fowl?—Because it is a piece of chowder.

A little boy some six years old was using his slate and pencil on a Sunday when his father, who was a minister, entered and said: "My son, I prefer that you should not use your slate on the Lord's day." "I am drawing meeting-house, father," was the prompt reply.

"Why will you persist in wearing another woman's hair on your head?" asked Aunt Gough of her wife—she retorted: "Why will you persist in wearing other sheep's wool on your back?"

"Rose, my dear," said a mother to her daughter, "if you are so stiff and reserved you will be an old maid, I'm afraid." "Ma," retorted the young lady, "unless the poets tell lies, a primrose is not without attractions."

A new stove has been invented for the comfort of travelers. It is to be put under the seat with a mustard plaster on the back which draws the heat through the whole system.

"TO SCHOOLMASTERS.—To be sold, a thrashing-machine in good working order; has birch, cane, and strap newly warranted to whip a school of fifty boys in twenty minutes, distinguishing their offences into literary, moral, and impertinent. Only parted with because the owner has flogged all his school away, and his sons are too big to beat."

"I will never marry a woman who can't carve," said Jones. "Why not?" was asked. "Because she would not be a help-meet for me.

Like crazy like. Sulphur comes from Vesuvius; therefore it is good for eruptions.

"Bob," said a young fellow at a fancy fair, "you are minding all the sights on this side." "Never mind, Bill," retorted Bob, "I'm righting all the misses on the other."

Jack his own month rose; this gives him pride,
For he can more than all the world beside.

EVIDENT.—With what material ought the Needle Effect to be loaded?—Gun-cotton, of course.

WANTED—A HEART!
I want, ah, me! I want a heart,
But not a heart for love,
To feel the smart of Cupid's dart
And also throw off glove.
I do not want a manly heart
With high desires to glow,
Or feel what friendship can impart,
And sympathy bestow.
The heart for which I long is none
Of mart—for yet of mart's.
I only want a little one
To trump that trick in spades.

The latest bon mot about Bismarck is, that his fate depended not upon a thread, but upon a needle.

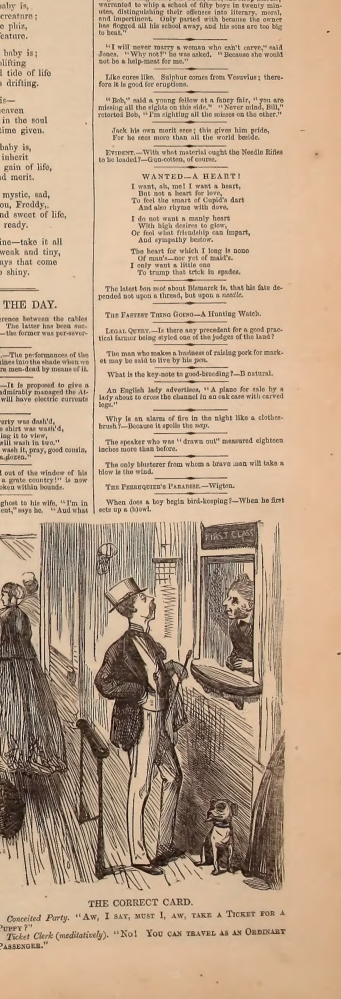
THE FASTEST THING GOING.—A Hunting Watch.

LEGAL QUERY.—Is there any precedent for a good practical farmer being styled one of the judges of the land?

The man who makes a business of raising pork for market may be said to live by his pen.

What is the key-note to good-breeding?—B natural.

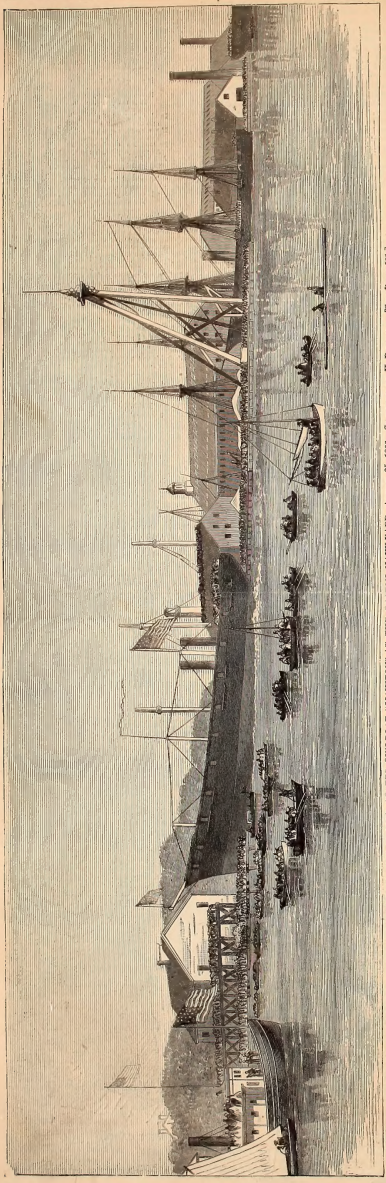
An English lady advertises, "A piano for sale by a lady about to cross the channel in an oak case with carved legs."



Why is an alarm of fire in the night like a clothes-brush?—Because it spells the sash.

The speaker who was "drawn out" measured eighteen inches more than before.

The only bluesterer from whom a brave man will take a blow is the wind.



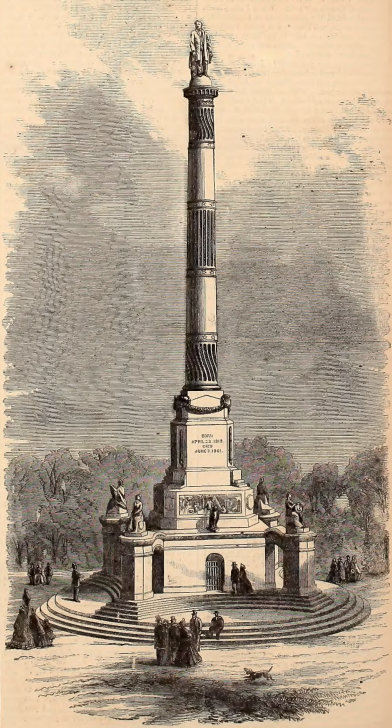
THE FEREDGUEEN'S PARADISE.—Wigton.

When does a boy begin bird-keeping?—When he first sets up a (s)oul.

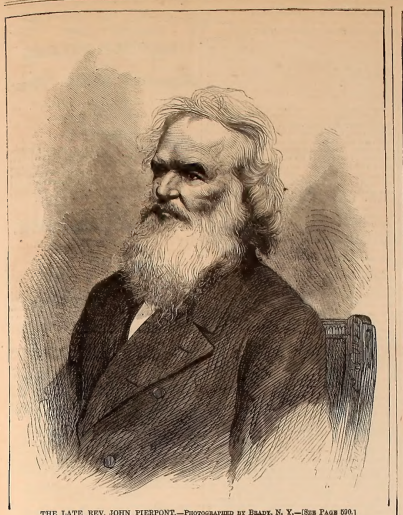
Conceited Party. "AW, I SAY, MUST I, AW, TAKE A TICKET FOR A PUPPY?"

Ticket Clerk (meditatively). "NO! YOU CAN TRAVEL AS AN ORDINARY PASSENGER."

LAUNCH OF THE UNITED STATES GUN-BOAT "MANITOU" AT THE BOSTON NAVY-YARD, AUGUST 25, 1866.—SKETCHED BY H. BILLINGS.—[SEE PAGE 581.]



GENERAL GRANT'S HEAD-QUARTERS AT WASHINGTON, D. C.



THE DOUGLAS MONUMENT.

THE President's tour, which we have illustrated on other pages, was undertaken for the purpose of a participation in the dedication of the Monument to STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, erected at Chicago, under the superintendence of L. W. VOLK, and the dedicatory address will be delivered by Mr. SEWARD.

The monument will be one hundred feet high, wrought in marble on a granite base. Through the arched and grated bronze door seen in the engraving will be visible the sarcophagus containing the remains of the departed Senator. Directly over it an eagle with drooped wings is sitting, a sublime emblem of mourning for a dead statesman. The four seated statues upon the pedestals at the corners of the base are designed to represent: 1st, Illinois, at the right, holding a medallion portrait of DOUGLAS; 2d, America, at the left, supporting a wheat-sheaf; 3d, History, at the left in the rear, with tablet and pencil; and 4th, Fame, holding a wreath and a trumpet.

MONUMENT TO STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS.

THE LATE REV. JOHN PIERPONT.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY, N. Y.—[SEE PAGE 590.]

THE LATE DEAN RICHMOND.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY E. & H. T. ANTHONY.—[SEE PAGE 590.]

The bas-reliefs upon the sides of the column-supporting pedestal base are designed to represent in panorama the progress of American civilization—more especially in the Western States—with which Mr. DOUGLAS was so peculiarly identified.

Wreaths, scrolls, etc., adorn the pedestal above, while higher towers the marble composite column, forty-two feet in height, and bearing stars, indicative of the States of the Union. The whole is surmounted by a colossal statue of DOUGLAS, standing upon a bronze globe, with his right hand upon the fasces—symbolical of the Union—and his left holding the Constitution.

SIDE-SHOWS OF THE JOHNSON RECEPTION.

BY OUR INVISIBLE PENCILIST.

IS a mixed assemblage—and there never, surely, was a more mixed one than the crowd that gathered to greet President ANDY JOHNSON on his arrival in New York, on the 29th of August—I find it a mighty convenient thing to be invisible. One advantage of it is that the police can't interfere with me, not even if I "hooray!" before a speaker comes to a scrimmage. Another is that I can get a good position in his speech. Then, some of the Presidential supporters are not of a very mild type of character, and look as if they could make pigeon's meat of a fellow if he sat himself down visibly before them to take their portraits. In fact, as they "wouldn't see me," probably, if they could, I am just as well satisfied that they don't.

On that Wednesday, forever now to be associated with the name of JOHNSON, I am convinced that every inhabitant of New York over the age of four years was actuated by one impulse, and that was to see the President. There was a very general burnishing up of eyeballs and spectacles. At early dawn I saw an elderly gentleman, of apparently regular habits and not much given to excitability, poising and flourishing an enormous telescope, such as might once have belonged to PAUL JONES or some other buccaneer of old. He had green goggles on, and I can fancy that glimpses of the moving panorama of the day, seen through such a telescope and such a medium of color, must have had a very novel and characteristic effect.

Just as the Presidential cortège arrived in the City Hall Park, and halted nearly opposite the statue of WASHINGTON, a very singular incident occurred, and one which, I think, has escaped the notice of the reporters. People sometimes dream when they are awake, I believe, and perhaps I might have been dreaming. I had glanced for a moment from the face of Mr. JOHNSON to that of the Father of his Country, near whose statue I was standing, when, as sure as I live, I saw a sudden change come over the stone effigy. The pillar with the ball upon the toy of it, on which WASHINGTON rests his left hand, became transformed into the semblance of a small negro, who, hat in hand, grinned impudently, after the manner of his kind, in the direction of the President. At the same moment I saw the stone figure of the great Chief relax from its rigidity and bend slightly to Mr. JOHNSON, waving gracefully its right hand, while it patted playfully the head of the little darkey with its left. Then it uttered, in a deep, sepulchral voice, such as once heard can never be forgotten, the words which I have written at the bottom of the sketch: "I want this fellow-citizen to have a vote." I could see that Mr. JOHNSON was visibly moved at this incident; his lip blanched slightly, and the steel-gray of his hair seemed to assume a more silvery hue.

There was much political discussion in the crowd that surged to and fro on this memorable occasion. Lovely woman was out in all her variety, and the influence exercised by her upon the political feeling of the day must have been obvious to the least observant. It seems about time that lovely woman participated in the right of suffrage. She rules the voter as it is, and she might just as well cast the vote herself. Near me, on one of the ragged selvages of the crowd, there stood a portly lady from Baxter Street, or Mott, balancing a basket upon her head as she held persistently on to the iron railing. The general expression of her face was Fenian, and yet she was gifted with that peculiar style of beauty so much prized by the upper-tendom of our time, namely, black eyes and very red hair. One of her eyes, at least, was very black indeed, suggesting that contact with a skilled set of knuckles must have been the cosmetic by which the hue was obtained. "And that's Andy, then, is it?" said she, in a thick, treacly voice. "Musha, then, bad scran to him, that wouldn't let the b'ys have their fling over in Cannady, when it's meself gev tin dollars to help 'em to b'ist the green above the red!" Some conversation with this interesting person developed the fact that she places the African very low down upon the list of the human family, and does not consider him competent to enjoy the right of suffrage.

Some speculators along Broadway did a little business by setting planks upon the tops of the numerous stacks of bricks by which that thoroughfare is now encumbered. The seats looked very rickety, and were the cause of many inquiries by irreverent persons as to whether they were meant to represent the Copperhead platform. The boys, as usual, were out in great force; and it is a significant fact, foreshadowing, perhaps, the future of these precocious politicians, that there was hardly a post in the city but was occupied by them.

THIS IS THE OLD GENT WHO WAS DETERMINED TO SEE ANDY JOHNSON.

"I WANT THIS FELLOW-CITIZEN TO HAVE A VOTE."

THIS IS THE LADY WHO DOESN'T THINK THE "NATIVE INTELLIGENCE KNOWER TO VOTE."

THIS YOUNG GENTLEMAN IS INTERESTED IN SEEING THE PRESIDENT, CHIEFLY BECAUSE HE THINKS THAT, SOME DAY, HE MAY BE CHIEF MAGISTRATE OF THE UNITED STATES HIMSELF.

HABIT.

HABIT at first is but a silken thread,
Fine as the light-winged gossamers and wavy
In the warm sunbeams of a summer's day;
A shallow streamlet, rippling o'er its bed;
A tiny sapling, ere its roots are spread;
A yet unbarbarized thorn upon the spray;
A thief's whelp that hath not shunned prey;
A little smiling child, obedient led.
Beware! that thread may bind thee as a chain;
That streamlet gather to a fatal sea;
That sapling spread into a guarled tree;
That thorn, grown hard, may wound and give thee pain;
That playful whelp his murderous fangs reveal;
That child, a giant, crush thee 'neath his heel.

THE REV. JOHN PIERPONT.

THE Rev. JOHN PIERPONT, whose death we regret to announce, was born April 6, 1785, in Litchfield, Connecticut. His education was completed in 1804, at Yale College, and in 1805 he became a tutor in the family of Colonel WILLIAM ALLSTON, of South Carolina. In 1809 he returned to Connecticut, where he studied law, and settled at Newburyport, Massachusetts. He did not succeed as a lawyer, and his mercantile enterprises in Baltimore and Boston were also unfortunate. In 1816 he published "Airs of Palestine," one of his first poems, and subsequently studied in the Harvard Theological School. In 1819 he was ordained minister of the Hollis Street Unitarian Church in Boston. In 1835-36 he visited Europe, and published in 1840 an edition of his poems. His persistent advocacy in favor of the temperance reform caused trouble with his congregation, which resulted in a seven years' controversy, when he resigned. In 1845 he accepted the charge of the Unitarian Church in Troy, New York, where he remained four years, and then took charge of the First Congregational Church in Medford, Massachusetts, where he continued to reside till the beginning of the war. Of late Mr. PIERPONT probably omitted preaching for the active duties of a clergyman, was obliged to accept a clerkship in the Treasury Department, and holding that position died.

JOHN PIERPONT was a good man, and an earnest reformer. He labored actively in behalf of temperance, anti-slavery, the melioration of prison discipline, and other reforms. But as a poet he will be chiefly remembered. His most important poems were the inspiration of special occasions. One of the longest was read in honor of the centennial celebration at Litchfield, and even a "Class Ode" was the work which first gave him reputation, was written for recitation at a charity concert. The idea of this poem is the exhibition of the power of music in conjunction with local scenery and national character, mainly referring to the sacred history. His temperance songs, religious and patriotic pieces, are numerous, and probably the majority have never been collected. During the war he wrote several ballads, inspired with passion and energy, and remarkable for one almost an octogenarian. Mr. PIERPONT, who was always strong and healthy, retained much of his power almost up to his death. As an American poet he can not be ranked with the best; the highest imagination was denied him, but some of his religious poetry has rarely been excelled for strength and simplicity.

THE LATE DEAN RICHMOND.

THE Democratic organization of this State lost its leader by the death of DEAN RICHMOND on the 27th ultimo; and it will with great difficulty find another man to take his place.

DEAN RICHMOND, whose portrait is given on page 585, was born at Woodstock, Vermont, March 31, 1804. At fourteen years of age he was left an orphan; and the first steps taken by him in a career which has secured for him great wealth and unusual influence were assisted by no friendly support. The only legacy he received from his parents was one of pecuniary obligation, and we find him at first a clerk, setting apart his savings to cancel his father's debts. Soon after he removed to Syracuse, where he engaged in the salt-boiling business, and in a few years became very successful. His next step was to engage in the commission and forwarding business, by which he gained a fortune, which he invested in the purchase of railroad securities, becoming largely interested in several important roads. Western New York was in 1836 a grand field for such energy and foresight as his, and about the time he was made a Director of the Buffalo and State Line Railroad. Upon its consolidation with the Central Road, in 1853, Mr. RICHMOND was elected Vice-President of the Company, and in 1864 succeeded Mr. ERASTUS CORNING as President. His connection with other railroads, though not official, was influential. For many years he had lived in Batavia and acquired great wealth. There are the main facts of his career in life, as far as he was a politician that he became one of the powers of the State.

In his youth DEAN RICHMOND was a Free-Soil Democrat. In 1844 he opposed the annexation of Texas, and in 1846 he denounced the Nebraska bill. He was always a Democrat, but always inclined to the most liberal phase of Democratic principles. Whatever compromises he made was for the purpose of reconciling the several factions of the Democratic Committee. Since the Charleston Convention he has never seen his party overpowered with defeat. At that Convention he tried hard, but failed, to unite the two sections of the party. At the Chicago Convention of 1864 Mr. RICHMOND was very active, and ardently promoted the nomination of Mr. CLELLAN. His political course of late is well known. He was one of the three or four men who shaped the action of the Saratoga Convention, and at Philadelphia was consulted equally by the seceders from the Republican party, the Southern delegates, and the Democrats.

DEAN RICHMOND loved politics. He seemed to enjoy the subtle ways of partisan diplomacy. He had no ambition for office; he preferred control over the organization of his party to leadership in the political arena. He was a shrewd political manager, and if the Democratic party had listened to his advice in 1860 it would not have succumbed to the perils which threatened it.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A NEW era has dawned. The days have passed when it was sufficient for the young girl to spend a few years in a fashionable boarding-school, in a smattering of French and a flourish of music as a "finishing" before putting her into the matrimonial market. It has been discovered that women have minds capable of close application and high training. Moreover, it has been discovered that they have physical systems which may be healthily developed by proper culture. And the days have passed when a walk, or even a ride, on horseback, or a daily walk of half an hour daily was regarded as ample outdoor exercise for the school-girl.

It is a significant fact that the Vassar Female College, recently opened at Poughkeepsie, not only affords excellent facilities for a thorough, systematic course of instruction, including the various accomplishments of music, painting, etc., but also that there is in connection with the college a riding-school and skating-rink for out-door lessons; thus giving to the young ladies unusual opportunity for exercising in the open air. There is a gymnasium conducted on the system of DIO LEWIS; and it is projected to have a swimming-school at one end of a lake in the vicinity. All over the country gymnasia are being introduced into young ladies' schools, and various means are adopted to secure their physical development.

There certainly is no reason why American girls should not follow the example of their "Transatlantic cousins," and possess a fair, if not an extensive degree of skill in sports and recreations of their brothers. Nor is there any thing "masculine" in a woman's being physically as well as mentally educated, and knowing how to ride, and row, and swim, and play croquet with skill and activity.

Just now croquet is the great sensation as a health-giving game. Its principal good point seems to be that it keeps the players in the open air. It is a recreation that affords but not enough to result, and it involves a good deal of stooping which can not be advantageous. Very few women know how to row, and considering how much the art is acquired, and how useful it may be in practice, it is surprising that it is not more frequently taught. It may be said that the sexes are not equal, and not always easy of access; but these could be often provided if it were made a fashion; swimming would be a valuable addition to any system of physical education. Boxing is an excellent recreation, though as yet but little practiced among ladies. Fencing is also a very graceful and healthful exercise. How beautiful is the picture Scott gives of Ellen Douglas as she,

> "Alarm'd, with hasty oar, > Paid'd her light boat to land from Brianchoir;"

or, when springing up at the sound of her father's bugle,

> "Be sure, she cried, 'the skiff to guide,
> And swift take down my shafts and bow.'
> Then, like a sunbeam, swift and bright,
> She darted to her father's height."

And, eagerly while Roderick scann'd,
For her love the maiden handed.
The ideal tar behind her lay,
And she had landed by his bay."

Archery has been introduced somewhat into our gymnasiums; but, to be fully advantageous, should be practiced out of doors; and as it possesses the advantage of the ground, and rather expensive appliances, these are not always at command. Boating is a healthful, and always a great skill and exercises. Horseback riding, of course, stands pre-eminent among the physical recreations pleasant and suitable for ladies. Long pedestrian tours are the necessary facilities. And simple walking is usually neglected as a kind of exercise unworthy. A walk to some a definite and interesting object in view, is seldom beneficial. Young ladies should be especially encouraged to shoulder their girlish pride and take up enthusiastically some cheerful exercise in the open air.

The rebuilding of the Academy of Music is steadily progressing; and it is said will be ready for occupancy about the first of February next. The plan followed in the new house is the same substantially as that in the old house, but more attention will be paid to the acoustic qualities, and the seats will be so arranged as to offer a full view of the stage from all parts of the house. The amphitheatre will be partly removed, and the entire house will be made much more solid than the old one.

It is time we had a Commission to visit our gas-pot and to the perpetual and disgraceful difficulties arising in connection with our city railroad cars? Must the public be served in such mean, contemptible and dangerous ways? Why must an entire community be thus constantly annoyed? There is a great deal of complaint that horses are allowed to go on for a single day as they have been for weeks. Would such management be suffered for an hour in Paris? It makes us almost ready to pray, as did the Children of Israel, "Give us a King!"

A new kind of pavement, called the "Nicholson," is to be laid down in Broadway, from Fulton to Canal, in a few days. This pavement has been used in some of the large Western cities with great success. The solid properties of this pavement, it is claimed, are, that it furnishes a road like one of gravel; that the passage of vehicles over it makes very little noise, and that it is not easily destroyed or injured.

A little boy living in Orleans, New York, recently threw up, while coughing, the pupper-head of a doll, an inch in length, which had been in the lungs of the child for seven years. He had been sitting all the time, and was considered as a victim of consumption. All along the lad said he felt something in his lungs that ought to come up. Now that it has been thrown up, he declares he is thought that he will get well. Parents would do well to provide instantly dispatch for their children!

At one hotel in Newport—at one, we mean, and as we do not wish any landlord to sue us for spreading such a report—there is a waiter who prides himself on the convenient "they say"—they say the regular charges are ten dollars a day. We wonder in what the extras consist. When Joseph Bonaparte first visited America, he stopped on one occasion at a hotel where he was well entertained. But when the landlord made out his bill, he put in every item he could think of; yet he did not think that the total was large enough for an ex-monarch to pay. So he reviewed the bill, and added a few more items. Yet still it did not seem enough. Then he added one more—"To kicking up an infernal fuss generally, fifty dollars." It must be that landlords nowadays add similar items, under cover, of course) to make the grand total of their bills.

An "old salt," who has finished his voyages, and is resting upon his oars" at one of our most fashionable watering-places, recently invaded the bail-room and got a peep at the belle of the evening. He afterward gave the following characteristic description of her:

"She was crowding all sail across the room; couldn't see whether she was a good-looking craft or not, she was so covered up by her canvas and things. She had a spot on her port-side and another on her starboard-side, and looked as if she had not her head into a fine-breeze, and carried away as much as would make biscuit for all hands. She had a cable-chain with a figure-head over her neck, was chocked to her earrings, came down over her outriggers and laid at anchor."

Every few weeks the newspapers report some singular and fearful injury inflicted by rats upon sleeping children, recently occurred in Albany. A lady who had two infants, twins, a few months old, put one into the crib at her side, and the other in a cradle. When she arose, she took into her own bed. About two o'clock in the morning she was awakened by the cries of the child in the crib, and in a hurry in the look it into her arms, at the same time changing the other to the crib. About half an hour after she was again awakened by the cries of the child, and on going to it felt that its night-clothes, about one of the sleeves, were wet. Proceeding further she discovered that the sleeve was saturated with blood, and on further investigation found that its little arm had been lacerated and gnawed in a shocking manner. Turning to the cradle, the child, whose cries, while he was lying in the crib, had first awakened her, she saw that it, too, had suffered about the two arms in a similar manner. Neither can not look too carefully after their little ones if rats infest the house.

A singular story is reported in a Southern paper respecting a discovery made on Pike County, Missouri. According to this scientific story, five, of unknown and mysterious origin, fell upon the premises of Squire, in his dwelling. Numerous individuals, eager to investigate the cause, have kept careful watch in the building, but as yet no one has discovered the mysterious fire. If discovered on fire, but the flame is no sooner quenched than a fresh one of the same description among the wearing apparel. Extinguish the fire in the chamber, and an alarm is given in another part of the house where least expected. Every part of the house, the building, outside, dresser, etc., during the day, but at night there are no fires. Some of the citizens of the neighborhood have committee marked a match, placed it into the box securely covered, placed the box on the table and guarded it closely for a few minutes, when the alarm was raised, and, as they found, to their utter amusement, a portion of the identical match which they had marked lying near a burning garment in another part of the house. This is the report, which we give for what it is worth.

"The Queen," under the heading, "Influence of Moulin and Flesh on Longevity," has the following item:

"The influence of costume on mortality is shown in a very interesting manner in the Registrar-General's last reports. Thus, from 1 to 5 years there is an equality of deaths by cold and heat, and from 5 to 10 years, that is, from 5 to 10 double the number of girls to that of boy die from heat. From 10 to 15 the ratio is 10 to 20 three for men, and only 71 men—and from 20 and upward, 71 women and 37 men—showing the influence of muslin and flounce in producing death notwithstanding the greater duration of life found in females."

We should think that "Influence of Occupation on Mortality," would be an equally appropriate heading to the above paragraph. Of course, in these days of inventive avocations, are exposed to accidents from fire so much more than the other sex are, that no correct comparison in regard to the mortality arising from this cause can be made simply on the ground of dress.

Mr. Sala, writing from Vienna, gives an incident which can not but delight the hearts of abolitionists. He says:

"Alongside of that proditious new Opera House they are excavating the foundations of another, and ever so many are excavated. Peeping into a huge trench lately I counted a hundred and fifty skeletons. Out of there—decently buried ones who had not all the softness and suppleness of their days, were coarse of features and mustached of wits, and piled the pick and shovel and flung the dirt about with a will, and shouted to each other in harsh tones and with violent gesture. Clad in unwomanly gear, slouched hats tied on to their heads, their arms and necks bare, their skirts little better than aprons, their legs cased in huge buckskin boots, their faces brown, sunburnt, and begrimed—these poor creatures filled me with a sickening horror."

A philanthropic gentleman recently attempted to remove a bee hive from the tenement of a lady who not near him on a public concert. The result was he unrooted the whole of her back hair. Deeply chagrined he hastily apologized, and was about to retire, when the lady, with presence, and was employed to hold the head and hair together.

"Important auxiliary to a lady's toilet."—BENNETT'S Toilet Sets, for sale by all druggists.—Washington Chronicle.

MOTH AND FRECKLES.—Ladies afflicted with discolorations on the face, known as moth-patches or freckles, should use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is highly recommended and used by DR. E. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, No. 49 Bond Street, New York. Sold by all druggists.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Stereopticons and Magic Lanterns,

With the Improved LIME LIGHT, illuminating brilliantly 100 yards. Views, and magnifying the size thirty to that size, at an expense of less than $1 for an evening's exhibition; easily managed, and very well. Illustrated Priced Catalogue of Apparatus, and list of over 2000 artistically colored Photographic Views, sent by mail. Forsale Lamps, Moral Subjects, Paintings by the Old Masters, Choice Stationery, &c., &c. Forwarded on application. T. H. McALLISTER, Optician of the late firm of McAllister & Bro., Philadelphia, No. 49 Nassau Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have Just Published:

BATTLE PIECES
AND
Aspects of the War.
BY HERMAN MELVILLE,
Author of "Omoo," "Typee," &c.
12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

These poems are a succession of lyrics, many of them vivid battle-pictures, which were dashed off from time to time during the war. They all display marked poetic ability. They make all the more pleasant a contribution to the literature of the war, because they are not marked by those extravagances in which nearly all our boisterous poets have so freely indulged.—New York Times.

THE HIDDEN SIN.
A NOVEL.
WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.
8vo, Cloth, $1 50; Paper, $1 00.

"The Hidden Sin" has a touch of originality, and shows an ingenuity of invention which distinguishes it from the ordinary run of sensation novels. The author also shows a facility for drawing character, making his personages both human beings, and not mere stage actors in theatrical properties.—Athenæum.

Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

$10. Gold and Silver Watches. $10.

We are retailing watches at wholesale rates. Every one can obtain a valuable and reliable timekeeper; patent lever movement and coin silver hunting-cases, by sending us $10 00. Send stamp for list. HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman Street, New York.

Of all Collections of Piano Music,

The "HOME CIRCLE" is the best that can be obtained. It includes every variety, from the simplest to the most difficult, and contains the choicest pieces of the best authors of every player. Two Vols. Price of each, in Boards, $2 50; Cloth, $3; Cloth, gilt, $4. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

DEMOREST'S
Kradle, Krib, or Bedd Klose KLASPS.

Children cry for them, or, rather, will often suffer and sob for the want of them. Indispensable to every well-regulated family. Sold at 472 Broadway, N. Y., and all the principal Hosiery Establishments. Sent by mail free on receipt of the price, 25 cents each. Either two or four are required to a bed.

SECURITY, BEAUTY, and CONVENIENCE. Fick's Pockets Defied! DEMOREST'S INFALLIBLE WATCH GUARD. DEMOREST'S Draw the chain on the edge of the pocket, and then the hanker you pull the tighter it fastens. Can be worn by any one, from the lady to the groom in the dress. Price, 25 and 50 cents each. Mailed free on receipt of price. 473 Broadway, New York.

MME. DEMOREST'S New Patent READY DRESS LOOPERS—the most convenient and efficient method for raising the dress in graceful folds. Price, 50 cents per set. Sold every where, or mailed free on receipt of the price. 473 Broadway, New York.

THE GRAND SECRET.

"The grand secret in medication is to help Nature, SUSTAIN and REGULATE—these are the Alpha and Omega of the cure for every form of Debility and Despondency in the basis. If the nervous system is shattered, the muscles weak, and the mind, like the body, in a state of partial collapse, what is best to do? Reason teaches us the answer:

BUILD UP YOUR MAN.

Brace him up as you would brace a tottering edifice. The pabulum he needs is a Tonic Alterative. Bring him up out of the slough of Debility and Despondency

WITH HOSTETTER'S BITTERS.

They can not injure. A child may take them in doses suited to its years, without the possibility of harm. The enfeebled vital powers are sure to respond especially to their action as the gentle grass is to corn: its blades under the vivifying and refreshing rain. In all cases of debility the Bitters are absolutely required. There is no substitute or combination that will do their place. Resort to this most wonderful of Molex Tonics,

AND ALL WILL BE WELL.

Bear in mind that in Dyspepsia, Intermittent Fever, Bilious Disorders, and Affections of the Nerves, no elixir or medicine will produce one tithe of the good effect that invariably follows the use of this excellent Invigorant and Corrective. Sold every where.—New York Tribune, October 27, 1866.

THE
GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
Have selected the following Kinds from their Stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show. All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

PRICE LIST.

YOUNG HYSON, 80c., 90c., $1; best, $1 25 ℔ lb.
GREEN TEAS, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 ℔ lb.
MIXED, 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 ℔ lb.
JAPAN, $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 ℔ lb.
OOLONG, 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 ℔ lb.
IMPERIAL and GUNPOWDER, best, $1 25 ℔ lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best $1 20 ℔ lb.

All towns, villages, or manufactories where a large number of men are engaged, by CLUBBING together, can reduce the price of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to the

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
(Post-Office Box 5643.) 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church, New York.

For further particulars, getting up Clubs, &c., see Harper's Weekly, June 23, 1866.

$5 SEWING MACHINE. $5

FIRST PREMIUM and IMPROVED, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented March 13, 1852; Improvement patented June 9, 1863. The only licensed FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with reversing attachment, is noiseless in operation, sews with precision of sewing-thread of all kinds with unexampled rapidity, making SIXTEEN STITCHES to each revolution of the wheel. HEMS, FELLS, BRAIDS, GATHERS, and SEWS on the BRAIDER, &c., &c. Strongest machine manufactured. Warranted the best out of order in 5 years. It has received the approval of all the principal journals, and of those who have used it.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly does the strictly elastic like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

Single machines, ALL COMPLETE, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Self-delivery encouraged. Agents wanted every where. Address all orders,

GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY,
Office 102 Nassau Street, New York.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.—Agents are now wanted to canvass for the best work ever published in the United States. THE ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE BIBLE, by JOHN KITTO, D.D., F.S.A., Edited by ALVAH HOVEY, D.D., of Newton, Connecticut.

No work in the world ever took more rapidly. Agents clear from $100 to $200 per month, and say "they never know a book to sell so well." For further information apply immediately to the publisher,

HENRY BILL, Norwich, Conn.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c. 10 cts. ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 24 Ann Street, New York, and 35 Lincoln Street, Boston.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS.

SELPHO'S PATENT.

Are pronounced by all the most eminent surgeons and upwards of ten thousand patients to be the most valuable and only reliable substitutes for lost limbs ever produced, comprising all that is desirable in Artificial Limbs, viz., ease, comfort, beauty, durability, and simplicity. Send for Pamphlet, WILLIAM SELPHO & SON, Patentees and Manufacturers, No. 516 Broadway, New York.

$1500 PER YEAR paid by SHAW & CLARK Manufacturers, Biddeford, Maine, or Chicago, Ill. ones.

$150 A MONTH! NEW DEVICES FOR AGENTS. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

[From the Rev. J. W. Poland's Autobiography.]

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1858 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a distressible cough. I had for some months previously been thoughtful in preparation, having for its basis the inside bark of white pine, which I had found to be a remedy for a very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in diseases alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the Medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was astonishing and gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough relieved, and a healthy action was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering from a severe cough, and who was considered by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood, was soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1858, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

The Great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years to be the best in the United States, where its merits have so well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and all pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for diabetes, healing from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel or stone in the kidneys will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

GILES W. SWETT, M.D., PROPRIETOR,
Boston, Mass.

BURNHAMS & VAN SCHAAK, Chicago, Ill.,
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio,
GENERAL AGENTS FOR THE WEST.

TRADE MARK OF THE
MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,

To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods, of whatever name, are but imitations, with more or less limitations and infringements on the patents of the Magic Ruffle Company. The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE has full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction in consumers. Office of the Company No. 95 Chambers Street, New York.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what article it entitles you to, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, and judge for yourself before sending your Dollar. No county. J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y.

£150,000,000 STERLING,

In Money and Estates, remain unclaimed in Great Britain and Ireland, in many cases set for back as £100. Fee to search for any name, $3 00 in U. S. Funds. All letters must be prepaid. ADAMS & CO., Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

BOYS' single Guns, $5; mens do., $3 20; double Guns, $8; Rifles, $6 50; Patent Breech do., $10 50 and $12; real Twist do., $11 50, $15, and $14 56; Bar Lock Twist do., $18 50, $20, up to $200. Rifles, Pistols, Percussion Caps, Powder, Shot, Gunsmith's materials, fishing rods, everything in fact, everything advertised in sel ves lelaneis rates. Send for a circular or a sample lot.

CHARLES EGLOM, 38 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

MERWIN & BRAY,

262 BROADWAY,

MANUFACTURERS OF THE CELEBRATED BALLARD BREECH-LOADING RIFLES, MILITARY AND SPORTING GUNS.

These Rifles carry a ball varying from one half ounce each to 120 to the pound. Material and workmanship of the best quality. They are warranted in every respect.

Send for circular.

For the well-known Eagle Arms Co.'s Cartridges Revolvers, Belts and Caps, we have on hand six months in advance, and can supply them at short notice. Also Agents for the Colt's Navy and Army Colt's model Revolvers, and the New York Metallic Ammunition Co.'s Copper Cartridges, of every style and size.

Dealers in Arms and Ammunition of all kinds. Illustrated Circulars sent free by mail.

262 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE.

Superior advantages in English, Classics, Sciences, Commercial, French, German, Piano Music, and Painting. Terms moderate. Spring Term opens April 11th. Summer Term opens Sept. 16th.

Rev. CLEVELAND COXE, A. M., PRINCIPAL.
Claverack, Columbia Co., N. Y.

100,000 AGENTS

wanted to sell six new inventions, of great value to families; all pay great profits; 10 cts. and get 80 pages, or 25 cts. and get 96 pages and a sample article. Ephraim Brown, Lowell, Mass.

"How 'tis Done." Wholesale in 6 wks. Gambling exposed. Fortune-telling. Ventriloquism, &c. 100 great secrets. Free for 5c. Address Hunter & Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR SEPTEMBER, 1866.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $4 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $8 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements for their Magazine, at the following low rates:

One Page	$200 00
Half Page	125 00
Quarter Page	75 00

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $4 00
One Copy for Three Months 1 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Postage prepaid by the Publishers.

THE BOUND VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent by express, free of expense, to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Cloth Binding . . . . . $7 00 per Volume.
Half Morocco 10 00

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

A Table of Contents and Index to each Volume is furnished gratis.

The Bound Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent by express, free of expense, to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Cloth Binding . . . . . $6 00 per Volume
Half Morocco 8 00

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

A Table of Contents and Index to each Volume is furnished gratis.

Two Cents must be remitted by the Quarter for every Number sent to Canada, as the Postage is to be collected at the Office where the Paper is received.

Fifteen Cents per line for inside, and Twenty Cents per line for outside Advertisements, each insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

PIKE'S NEW YORK OPERA-HOUSE ASSOCIATION.

Capital . . . . . $1,500,000.

THIS ASSOCIATION has been organized for the purpose of encouraging one of the most entertaining of American citizens in his laudable ambition and efforts in the cause of ART, and the development of a correct and classic taste. Some years since, SAMUEL N. PIKE, Esq., of Cincinnati, Ohio, conceived the idea of erecting

A MAGNIFICENT LYRIC TEMPLE

In that city, which, in design, ornamentation, and grand proportion, should excel any similar edifice in the country, and should at once advance a taste in the West to the most humanizing of arts.

How, unaided and alone, he carried out to a successful issue this stupendous scheme, is now a matter of history. While the lyric temples of the great cities of the East were each represented by five or six thousand shareholders, Mr. PIKE constituted the one-man power in giving the city of his adoption a temple devoted to HIGH ART, superior to any upon the continent; and the experience of Italian Opera-Houses, and the requirements of the most fastidious, convinces that from five to six hundred of the most eligible seats were nightly occupied by "dead-heads."

Extending his business connection with the great metropolises of the East, Mr. PIKE found himself prepared to carry out another gigantic plan, in the construction of an Opera-House which, in architectural beauty and grandeur of design, will eclipse every similar edifice in the world, and which, in point of location, will be unsurpassed by any, being on the CORNER OF TWENTY-THIRD STREET AND THE EIGHTH AVENUE, one of the best and most available sites in the city of New York.

In the month of March, 1866, the magnificent edifice in Cincinnati fell a prey to the devouring fire-fiend, while the indomitable proprietor looked on and calmly remarked that his insurance of one million dollars would pay him while there was but a trifle of insurance, was wrested from his grasp. Undismayed by this terrible financial disaster, Mr. PIKE, with the celerity which has ever marked the carrying out of his plans, has secured the site of the Stock and Exchange upon the ruins of the Opera-House, reserving for New York the benefit of his great musical enterprise. In a spirit of true patriotism of his unconquerable will, he has determined to rebuild in New York.

Pike's New York Opera-House Association for the Encouragement of Art.

With this view, the Association proposes (among other objects) to give a series of

MAGNIFICENT ENTERTAINMENTS IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRINCIPAL CITIES,

For which they will lease tickets at the uniform price of THREE DOLLARS each, which will admit the holder to any one of the series of Entertainments, and also entitle him to a participation in the Gift Enterprise, which will distribute, as a special gift, Three Grand Operatic Scenes by the entire management of the celebrated Italian Impresario, whose great reputation as a Musical Virtuoso and Operatic Manager is a sufficient guarantee of the high-toned order of the Entertainments. The highest lyric talent of Europe and America has been secured, consisting of the following distinguished artists: Mademoiselle PAULINE PICCOLOMINI, the great favorite of the celebrated La Scala, Milan, and of the principal European opera houses—her first appearance in America. Mademoiselle FRIDA DE GEBELE, the brilliant Italian Cantatrice, late Prima Donna of the Imperial Opera, Vienna. Herr KARL FORMES, the world-renowned Basso Profundo, and magnificent lyric dramatic artist. GUISEPPE LIMBERTI, principal Tenor from the most grand opera of Milan. SIGNOR PERELLI, Primo Basso. J. W. WEILL, the famous Pianist, and successor of Thalberg. CARLO FATTI, the eminent and incomparable Violinist. Mons. BERBERICH, the distinguished and accomplished Maestro Concertatore.

MAX STRAKOSCH,

The inauguration of the Grand Series of Operatic Entertainments will take place in New York, at the

Cooper Institute, on Monday, October 1, 1866,

And will be continued as follows, the Halls, Institutes, and Academies of the various cities to be specified in future advertisements:

NEWARK, N. J., Tuesday, October 2.
BALTIMORE, Wednesday and Thursday, October 3, 4.
PHILADELPHIA, Friday and Saturday, October, 5, 6.
PITTSBURGH, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, October 8, 9, 10.
WHEELING, Thursday, October 11.
ZANESVILLE, Friday, October 12.
COLUMBUS, Ohio, Saturday, October 13.
CINCINNATI, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, October 15, 16, 17.
DAYTON, Thursday, October 18.
INDIANAPOLIS, Friday, October 19.
LOUISVILLE, Saturday, October 20.
ST. LOUIS, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, October 22, 23, 24.
SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Thursday, October 25.
CHICAGO, Friday and Saturday, October 26, 27.
DETROIT, Monday, October 29.

Which will conclude the Grand Tour; after which the Troupe will return to NEW YORK, and give their Grand Final Performances on the Evenings of December 28th, 29th, and 31st.

And at the close of the Entertainments in each of the above-named cities, the Agents of the Pike Association holders, will distribute to the subscribers throughout the entire country the Awards—the large number of which are unprecedented in the annals of such distributions—of the extraordinary proportion of ONE PREMIUM FOR TWO TICKETS, which will include the following gigantic scheme:

200,000 Tickets of Admission to Pike's New York Opera-House,

Which will be received at any time after the completion.

$350,000 IN CASH!

And a further distribution of $500,000 in MAGNIFICENT PAINTINGS AND CHOICE ENGRAVINGS, which, it will be seen by the Schedule, are the works of the most eminent EUROPEAN and AMERICAN ARTISTS.

The number of tickets has been limited to 500,000, and every ticket-holder will receive some article as a Premium, varying in value from $3 to $50,000. In this connection, the Managers have arranged to present to each purchaser of a ticket a FINE STEEL ENGRAVING, which can not be obtained at retail at less than $5—the following plates and copyrights having been secured for the exclusive use of this Association:

WASHINGTON'S FIRST INTERVIEW WITH HIS WIFE, from the original painting by Ehninger. Engraved by G. R. Hall. Size, 24 by 32.

SIGNING OF THE COMPACT IN THE CABIN OF THE MAYFLOWER, from the original painting in the possession of the late Congressional Phil. Kearney. Engraved by G. R. Fenne. Size, 24 by 30.

WASHINGTON'S LAST INTERVIEW WITH HIS MOTHER, a beautiful engraving by Dubin, from the original painting.

BABY, a magnificent steel engraving, by Samuel Holyer, from the original painting by Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A. Cost $10.

THE CHRISTIAN MARTYRS' LAST PRAYER, from the celebrated painting by Gerome. Engraved by Jacque. Size, 24 by 30.

A Fac-simile Certificate of Purchase will accompany each ticket, which will inform the purchaser to which of the following Engravings he is entitled:

THE DEATH OF GENERAL WARREN AT BUNKER HILL, from the original painting by Trumbull. Engraved by Burt. Size, 24 by 30.

THE DEATH OF GENERAL MONTGOMERY AT QUEBEC, from the original painting by Trumbull. Engraved by Burt. Size, 24 by 30.

THE DEATH OF GENERAL WOLFE, from the original painting by Benjamin West. Engraved by Burt. Size, 24 by 30.

THE DEATH OF GENERAL MERCER AT THE BATTLE OF PRINCETON, from the original painting by Trumbull. Engraved by Burt. Size, 24 by 30.

THE DEATH OF GENERAL MONTGOMERY, from the original painting by Vanderlyn. Engraved by Burt. Size, 24 by 30.

THE DEATH OF GENERAL MONTGOMERY, from the original painting by Trumbull

DIFFICULT TO PLEASE.

MRS. PARTINGTON. "Them's Fashions, I Suppose! One all Hair before, t'other all Hair behind!"

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our PERSONAL attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

BILLON & FOGGAN, Nassau St., N. Y., Inventors, Painters, and Manufacturers of the American "Snow-White" Steel Stiletto Corset, $1; Tea, $1; Cuffs, $2; Bosom, $5. Ladies' net, $3. Agts realize from $100 to $200 per day in cities, or traveling through any part of the civilized world. Samples by mail. Send price.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Revolver excels all others for compactness, effectiveness, durability, power, and safety in carrying. Is light (14 oz.), small (only 7 in.), with larger metallic water-proof cartridge (32-100 ball) than any Revolver made of same size and weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. HICKOX, 76 Beekman Street, New York.

50 PER-CENT SAVED By Using
B. T. BABBITT'S STAR YEAST POWDER. Light Biscuit or any kind of Cake may be made with this Yeast Powder in 15 minutes. No shortening is required when sweet milk is used. No. 64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

To All who Want to Know.
IF YOU WANT TO KNOW how to restore your gray hair, and grow up ringlets, without the aid of Doctor or Medicine, address Dr. E. B. FOOTE, 1130 Broadway, New York. Pamphlets sent free.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW how uncomfortable trusses may be thrown aside, and comfort and cure effected by the truss, address Dr. E. B. FOOTE, 1130 Broadway, New York. Pamphlet mailed free.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW valuable information, suited to the married, address Dr. E. B. FOOTE, 1130 Broadway, New York. Pamphlet sent free.

PEABODY'S BREECH-LOADING.
MUSKETS, CARBINES, AND SPORTING RIFLES,
FOR METALLIC CARTRIDGES,
MANUFACTURED BY THE
PROVIDENCE TOOL CO. ARMORY,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

These arms are made in the most perfect manner, are interchangeable in all their parts, and are unequaled for symmetrical appearance, simplicity, accuracy of fire, and strength. They have been received with remarkable favor in our own and several other countries, and can now be supplied in large numbers. Send for descriptive pamphlets and illustrated price-lists, printed in English, French, German, or Spanish.

PILE INSTRUMENT.

Dr. Gilbert's Pile Instrument for the radical cure of piles, prolapsus, &c., without an operation or medicine, relieves the worst case in 5 minutes, and has never failed to effect a permanent cure. Send circular. Sold by druggists generally. Discount to Dealers. Sent by mail to any part of the U. S. on receipt of $3. J. B. Lomaine, Prop'r, 695 B'way, N.Y.

BOKER'S BITTERS,
For sale by all prominent Grocers, Wine-Merchants, and Druggists, and wholesale only by I. FUNKE, JR., 540 Agents, No. 66 Liberty Street, New York.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

50 MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP PER-CENT SAVED BY
USING B. T. BABBITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH, or READY SOAP-MAKER. Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or lye in the market. Put up in cans of 1 pound, 3 pounds, 6 pounds, and 12 pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making hard and soft Soap. One pound will make 15 gallons of Soft Soap. No time is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.
B. T. BABBITT, 64, 66, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

Economy is Wealth.
If you want the best-fitting, strongest, and most serviceable Paper Collar ever offered to the Public, don't fail to purchase the
PATENT REVERSIBLE
PAPER COLLAR
MADE BY
MARCH BROS., PIERCE & CO.,
AGENTS,
WINTHROP SQUARE, BOSTON.

Agents Wanted.—$2000 a Year and expenses to male or Female Agents, to introduce a new and useful invention absolutely needed in every household. Agents preferring to work on commission can earn from $30 to $50 per day. For particulars address
W. G. WILSON, Cleveland, Ohio.

BE SENSIBLE now, and send 3 cents, for circulars, to P. O. Box 488, Hillsdale, Mich.

WARD'S DERBY
PAPER COLLARS
"SOMETHING NEW"
TO BE HAD EVERYWHERE
MANF'Y 387 B'way. N.Y.

IMPROVED
STEREOPTICON, DISSOLVING VIEW,
AND
Magic-Lantern Pictures and Apparatus.
Complete outfits and instruction furnished. For illustrated Catalogue and information address W. LANGENHEIM, Philadelphia, P. O. Box 1879.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL POMADE
The best hair restorer and dressing. Sold by druggists.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 66 Broadway.

Drawing-Room Curtain Decorations. Designs and Estimates Furnished Gratis.

I. E. WALRAVEN, Importer of Upholstery Goods and Lace Curtains, 686 Broadway, New York. 719 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT!
Capital Prize, $30,000.
We have the pleasure to announce to the citizens of the United States that the
NORTH AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT
Will positively take place at the WABASH AVENUE RINK, CHICAGO, Illinois, on Friday, September 28, 1866, or your money will be refunded. On which time HALF A MILLION DOLLARS in Prizes, including $100,000 in Greenbacks, will be presented to ticket-holders.
SPECIAL CARD.—We take pleasure in announcing that we have met with unparalleled success, in spite of the many swindling schemes that have been presented to the people by irresponsible parties. The last consideration has, however, operated to delay our sales, and prevent our agents from prosperly reporting; until we were fully able to satisfy them that our enterprise is what it has been represented to be. In consequence we are compelled to extend the time of drawing until the 28th of September, at which time the Illinois State Fair will be held, when it will positively occur. Arrangements are now made for the drawing. The checks, 600,000 in number, are nearly ready. The plan of drawing adopted is the following: Duplicate numbers from 1 to 600,000 are placed in a wheel; the first number drawn out takes the highest prize, the next the second highest prize, and so on until the whole 250,000 prizes are drawn: the whole drawing to be superintended by a Committee appointed by the audience. The Wabash Avenue Rink has been engaged, as will be seen by the following: "Chicago, August 21, 1866: This is to certify that Messrs. A. A. Kelley & Co. have this day leased the Wabash Avenue Rink for the evening of the 28th day of September, and paid for the same the sum of three hundred dollars ($300). — H. Jounson & Co., Lessee of the Rink."
We advise all parties wanting tickets to send for them at once, as the books will be closed on Friday evening, September 28, and the drawing will then commence. All orders for tickets will promptly be filled.
No. of Tickets issued, 500,000. Price, $1. This is the greatest inducement ever offered to the people of the United States.

EVERY OTHER TICKET DRAWS A PRIZE.

1 Gift in Greenbacks	$30,000		40 Gifts in Pianos, $250 each	$20,000
1 do. do.	10,000		20 do. Melodeons, $150 each	3,000
1 do. do.	5,000	100	do. Bibles, $30 each	2,000
1 do. do.	4,000	200	do. Gold Watches, $100 each	20,000
1 do. do.	3,000	200	do. do. 150 each	30,000
1 do. do.	2,000	200	do. Silver Watches, $60 each	11,000
20 do. do.	$1000 each.	200	do. do. do. 40 each	12,000
20 do. do.	500 each	10,000	3000 Plated Tea Spoons, $3 each	9,000
20 do. do.	300 each	9,000	3000 Call Bells, $3 each	9,000
20 do. do.	100 each	2,000	1000 Plated Fruit-Knives, $3 each	3,000
500 do. do.	10 each	5,000	3000 Gold Pens in Holders, $3 each	9,000
1000 do. do.	5 each	5,000	3000 Gold Pens-Holders, $5 each	15,000
19 do.	Bronze in Chromo, $50 each	950	230 Gold Rings, $25 each	$238,043
19 do.	Lots in Chicago, $500 each	9,500

EVERY OTHER TICKET DRAWS A PRIZE.
The drawing will take place, after the concert, where 30,000 persons can witness it. A Committee will be appointed by the audience to take charge of the same. All agents and purchasers will be supplied with a correct list of the drawing, as soon as published. Tickets are for sale at 719 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, and Book Stores, and at our office, 105 Randolph Street. Price of tickets, $1 each. Sent by mail on receipt of price and 3-cent stamp for return postage. Great inducements are offered to agents, who are wanted every where.
Write for our terms at once. Send reference with application.
SPECIAL TERMS OF CLUB RATES.—Tickets to one address for $150; 10 tickets, $9 00; 20 tickets, $17 50; 30 tickets, $25 25; 40 tickets, $35 00; 50 tickets, $43 50. In every case send the name of each subscriber and their post-office address. Money by drafts, P. O. orders, express, or in registered letters, may be sent at our risk.

EVERY OTHER TICKET DRAWS A PRIZE.
REFERENCES.—Tappin, M'Kellop & Co., Commercial Agency, Chicago; Lot C. Whitford, Wholesale Paper Dealer, Chicago; J. B. Lippincott & Co., Publishers, Philadelphia; M. T. Quimby & Co., Wholesale Jewelers, Chicago; John E. Potter & Co., Publishers, Philadelphia; James L. Harison & Co., Importers, New York; Van Valkenburgh & Co., Importers, New York; S. B. Cobb, Chicago; Crosby & Ainsworth, Publishers, Boston.
Send what the Chicago Press say:
KELLEY & CO.'S GIFT ENTERPRISE.—The first to embark in the Gift Enterprise business in Chicago was the firm of A. A. Keller & Co., located at 105 Randolph St. Who does not remember their cries, which opened two or three years ago, where many purchased books and other articles, and were so lucky as to find with their purchase tickets which entitled them to valuable gifts in jewelry or other prizes. Thousands of our citizens were thus fortunate, and these have the best evidences that Messrs. Kelley & Co. always perform all they promise; that they are honorable, and do business honestly and on the square. Another Gift Concert, which they now advertise, promises to be one of the most successful of the series of Gift Concerts that have taken place in Chicago. The 736 gifts to be distributed are all that they are represented to be. All the prizes will positively be distributed to those holding the lucky tickets after the drawing. There is such a very large number of prizes that every one is almost certainly in favor of drawing something. Mr. Kelley, of Chicago, was known as A. Keller & Co., have confidence in their honor and integrity, and are highly favorably in their enterprise. These are reasons why we believe the forthcoming Kelley & Co.'s Gift Concert to the public. Let the people come up and buy the tickets still remaining unsold. The drawing will positively take place on the 28th instant. Money sent by mail will be promptly responded to.—Chicago Journal.
All communications should be addressed to A. A. KELLEY & CO., 105 Randolph St., Chicago, Ill. P. O. Box 1424.

HOMES FOR THE MILLION!

WOODWARD'S ANNUAL OF ARCHITECTURE, LANDSCAPE GARDENING, AND RURAL ART for 1867. 176 Designs and Plans for Cottages, Outbuildings, and Grounds. Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 00, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.
Eighth Edition. 150 Designs and Plans for Country Houses, &c. Paper, 50 cents; postpaid, $1 50.

MANUAL OF THE HOUSE.
126 Designs and Plans for Country Houses, Outbuildings, &c., by D. J. Lesquin. Cloth, extra, postpaid, $1 00.
Also,
THE FOREST TREE CULTURIST, by A. S. Fuller, postpaid, $1 50.
GRAPES AND WINE, by Geo. Husmann, postpaid, $1 50.
WOODWARD'S GRAPERIES, &c., postpaid, $1 00.
MANUAL OF BULBOUS ROOTS, postpaid, $1 00.
MANUAL OF THE APIARY, postpaid, $1 00.
MANUAL OF THE BEE, by A. J. Cook, postpaid, $1 00.
GEO. E. & F. W. WOODWARD, Publishers,
37 Park Row, New York.

TARRANT'S
SELTZER APERIENT
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

THE HOWE Sewing Machine, look-stitch, for Families and Manufacturers. They are world renowned. THE HOWE MACHINE CO., 699 Broadway, N. Y.

CURE YOUR COUGHS AND COLDS.
COE'S COUGH BALSAM will be found a ready and efficient remedy for hard Colds, Croup, Coughs, and all lung difficulties. It is sold by all Druggists. The cheapest and best medicine in the world.

STEREOPTICONS
AND
MAGIC LANTERNS
For Public Exhibitions. Illustrated and Illustrated Catalogue of Stereopticons, Oxy-Calcium Lanterns; Dissolving Views, Magic Lanterns, Chromatropes, Slides for the same, will be sent free by mail on application.
WILLIAM K. McALLISTER,
728 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

AT REDUCED RATES.

PELLEGA & SON, Meerschaum Manufacturers, 692 Broadway, near 4th St., N.Y. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail Circular. Pipes from $5 upward.

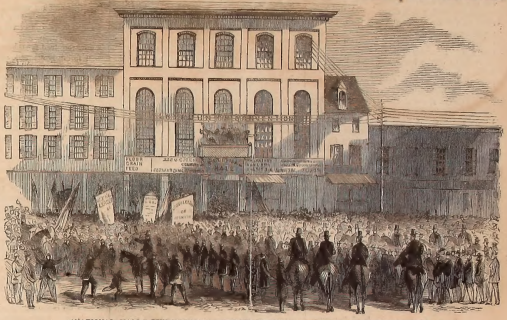
THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE.
Magnifying nearly 40,000 times. MAILED FREE everywhere for 50 CENTS, OR THREE for $1 00.
ERNEST C. BOWEN, Box 2285, Boston, MASS.

WANTED Agents, $150 per month; everywhere, male and female, to sell GENUINE COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. The greatest inventions of the age. Price only $18. Every machine warranted 3 years. Address for particulars HOUSE & CO., Cleveland, Ohio.

"KA-FOOZLE-UM."
DAUGHTER OF THE BARAK, Comic Song..... 35c.
"SHE SLEEPS, TIS' NOT A STAR," Serenade..... 35c.
THE CUCKOO'S NOTE, Rondo Brilliante, 7th, 8va; piano. 30c.
"NELLIE'S GONE HOMEWEN," for violin, 12c.; piano. 30c.
"OMAN GRINDER POLKA," for violin, 12c.; piano.. 30c.
Mailed postpaid. FREDERICK BLUME, 209 Bowery, New York, Publisher.

Stammering
Cured by Bates' Patent Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, &c., address Simpson & Co., 277 W. 23d St., N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.



A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—No. 508.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

HON. JAMES SPEED, OF KENTUCKY,
PRESIDENT OF THE SOUTHERN LOYALISTS' CONVENTION.

"NATIONAL HALL," PHILADELPHIA—MEETING OF THE SOUTHERN LOYALISTS' CONVENTION.

THE SOUTHERN LOYALISTS' CONVENTION AT PHILADELPHIA—"PARSON BROWNLOW" PASSING THROUGH THE RANKS OF THE NORTHERN DELEGATION, IN INDEPENDENCE SQUARE.—[SEE PAGE 508.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1866.

THE PRESIDENT'S TOUR.

SO melancholy a spectacle as that of the President of the United States passing through the country and passionately denouncing Congress and some of his fellow-citizens by name, was never before known in our history. Invited as President to participate in a public ceremony, he surrounds himself with the chief civil officers of the Government, and the two great heroes of the war, and then insists that he may stump the country as he goes, in his private capacity. We defy any man to read the speeches uttered by the President without wincing with mortification. The whole thing would be inexpressibly comical if it were not too painful. The inanity, the vanity, the incredible balderdash of these performances would set the whole country shaking with laughter, except for the fact that the speaker is the President of the United States, and the man who gravely expresses his profound admiration and delight in the spectacle is WILLIAM HENRY SEWARD. The story of this progress reads like an incident of the lower empire in its lowest days. A man might justly tremble for his country, if he did not feel the deep disgust and unutterable indignation of the honest people all around him. If the elections had been held on the day the President reached Chicago the Union ticket would have swept every State. As it is, this Presidential progress has unquestionably carried the autumn elections for the Union party. For there is not a thoughtful man who does not ask himself, with startling emphasis, how any policy could be safe in such hands?

We have but incidentally mentioned the saddest part of the whole, and that is the part played by MR. SEWARD. It is not anger, nor disgust, with which these words are read and his conduct in this extraordinary performance contemplated, by those to whom in other years his name was a pride and his abilities were an inspiration. Such men—and they are the only true friends he has ever had or will have in the country—have looked on in irrepressible sorrow and consternation. What must MR. SEWARD feel, what more they are justified by the truth in feeling, there is no occasion to express in words.

It is the fate of SEWARD'S hard fortune—cruel for himself, mournful for those who honored him as political chiefs are always honored—to be tried beyond his power. We are not of those who are willfully treacherous to humanity and liberty; for it is easy to believe in ourselves and to count all who differ as faithless. Nor do we explain his course by any motive so poor as desire of revenge upon the party which did not make him President in 1860. Men act from mixed motives, and the blindness of moral perception once disturbed, ever so slightly, is not readily recovered.

MR. SEWARD was made for calmer times and a purely political arena. He neither believed in the war before it came, nor understood it when it burst. "The Union saved by the sword is a Union I can not comprehend," he said, in his last important speech in the Senate. He did not understand it then. He understands it still less now. At once a doctrinaire and an empiric, he accepts a form for it will and refuses to believe in an actual event which seems to him illogical, however it may burn and bruise the country.

At the close of the great campaign of 1860 MR. SEWARD, who had laid aside his natural and bitter dispassionment to work for the success of MR. LINCOLN, passed through the West making a series of speeches, so varied, so powerful, and so persuasive that they will endure among the purest illustrations of American eloquence. Crossing the line of the Free States, he carried the banner of Republican equality of rights up to the very citadel of the enemy; and at St. Josephs, upon slave soil in Missouri, he made as masterly and lofty a plea as ever fell from his lips. Returning to the North he addressed audiences of ten thousand people, regard facts and proceed upon a pleasing theory? "The freedmen will never be well treated until the South is prosperous," says Mr. BEECHER. Shall we therefore say, in order that the South may be prosperous, she may do what she chooses with the freedmen?

The situation is obscure. There may be, as Mr. BEECHER suggests, vast perils at hand. But in a dark night we must use what light we have. It is not the part of wisdom to fill into a pit that we see, because there may possibly be a deeper one a few steps ahead. Let us restore the Union at the very earliest moment which is consistent with a reasonable promise of justice and safety. But do not let us abandon a reasonable promise of justice and safety in order to restore the Union, for we should discover that we had lost a substance for a shadow. Two years ago the men who, as a party, are now shouting for restoration anyhow, and rights and honor and justice afterward, told us at Chicago that the war was a failure, that the South was invincible, and that we ought to surrender, and then see what we could do. But the people were of another opinion, and the South yielded. The same moral unanimity swung us to-day will work the same miracle.

JUDGE ADVOCATE GEN. HOLT.

THERE is an attempt, properly described as atrocious, to make it appear that Judge Advocate General HOLT was in league with base men to injure Professor DAVIS by obtaining which he knew to be false. So foul a charge upon so fair a fame as General HOLT's would not be worthy even of refutation were the effort now plainly making to poison the public mind. With perfect propriety, therefore, General HOLT has himself called attention to an article in the Washington Republican of the 6th September as a truthful and complete vindication.

The few facts are, that a person called SAYRE upon CONOVER was brought to the notice of the Government as a competent witness in the trial of the assassination conspiracy. His testimony was such, that, when he offered to furnish General HOLT with important evidence of the complicity of DAVIS and CLAY in the great crime, General HOLT could not with fidelity to his duty and the opportunity, refuse a conference with the Secretary of War, therefore, CONOVER was engaged to collect the testimony of which he claimed to have knowledge. For some months he was in various parts of the country with this object and corresponding with General HOLT.

This testimony the General wished, of course, to try by every possible test. When the Committee of the House was appointed he stated to it all the circumstances of the case, and laid before it all the correspondence; and he urged that such witnesses as were accessible should be examined by the Committee. He was authorized to summon some of them, and sent an officer to New York for that purpose. This officer saw one of the chief witnesses, and he declared that his previous deposition was false, and made out the fabrication of CONOVER. He affirmed that this was also true of other witnesses. This witness was brought to Washington and confronted with CONOVER. The witness still persisted that his deposition was wholly the fabrication of CONOVER, who denied it, and went in charge of the officer of the Committee to the City to summon the other witnesses, but escaping from the officer CONOVER has not since appeared, although the letters to various parts of the country superscribed by General HOLT are evidently written with his connivance.

General HOLT immediately advised that the depositions of CONOVER's witnesses should be withdrawn from the evidence before the Committee. This was done, and the Committee gave to its consideration whatever, but upon the unimpeached testimony in their possession the Committee, in their Report, declared that there is probable reason to believe that DAVIS may privy to the measures which led to the commission of the crime.

So plain a statement of the truth confounds calumny. But General HOLT's fidelity was shown so early in the war, and has been so lofty and persistent, that the friends of the rebels could not spare him, and they have not ceased to follow him with their envenomed slanders. From the moment he raised his voice against the rebellion until now it has given no uncertain sound. President LINCOLN had no truer friend or more frequent counselor than General HOLT, and it does not harm him with good citizens that those who called LINCOLN an ape denounce his friend as a false witness. His character is his sufficient panoply.

THE LAST PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.

THE Convention of loyal Southern Unionists at Philadelphia was the most memorable political event of many years. The HANDALL Convention was substantially a repetition of the old Democratic assemblies in which the Southern delegates appeared to announce the policy of the party. So under the auspices of Mr. DOOLITTLE and MONTGOMERY BLAIR the Democracies met, with some recruits from the Union ranks, and laid down as their platform for the campaign the continuing right of States to enjoy all their privileges in the Union at the same time that they are trying to destroy it, as expounded by Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, ex-Vice-President of the ex-Confederacy.

But the Convention of original Union men did not get their instructions from the late insurgents. They were men taught by tremendous experience that inequality of rights before the law leads to bloody feud, and were not to be set forth with the baited and again be victorious." He referred to the glorious victories in the Valley and the battle-fields. These victories it was our duty now to secure by loyal constitutional amendments to restore the South to her former rights. He reviewed the President's action, he referred to the cordial sympathy from the South by Johnson, Yet when Congress exerted its constitutional authority such as suspension and impeachment, they found President with assumptions, that he thought we had not read aright the Constitution. We must secure our conditions by Constitutional amendments. He expressed his disapprobation of the President's course in regard to the Freedmen.

Hon. Lyman Trumbull was elected President of the Convention, amid great applause.

The following telegram was read, being frequently interrupted by applause:

"CONVENTIONAL HOTEL, PHILADELPHIA.

"The New York State Delegation at Philadelphia, to New York city and Syracuse, greeting:

"We have met our brethren from the South and mingled them with the friends of the Union who are loyal to the Union and to the great party that saved the Union. Between the Confederation of the United States to representation on the simplest condition compatible with the existence of the Union, there are political rights of the loyal people of those States. They declare that the policy of the President has been proved in their own persons to be unjust, cruel, and intolerable. They ask for the reconstruction of the Union on the basis of the Constitution, with protection which a returned President, once a Southern loyalist, cannot give. Southern loyalists, Northern hearts beat with a noble sympathy for universal liberty and the equal rights of all men, and for a true American citizenship.

"HIRAM WALSBURG, Chairman."

The President also read a telegram from D. D. Denton, informing the Convention that the National Republican Committee had promptly cast out that very unworthy member, and A. J. Raymond, and put in his place one who means "danger will never deter, nor threats appall."

Mr. Ballard moved that the proceedings of the National Committee be cordially ratified by the Convention. Carried without dissent.

The following letter was read under the instruction of this Convention, to the Philadelphia State Convention:

"By resolution of the Republican Union State Committee of the State of New York, now in session at Syracuse, I am directed to send greetings to the loyal men of the State in their convention at Philadelphia, and to assure them that the great heart of the people of New York is with them in the hour of their trial, and increased persecution by the substitution of the policy of Andrew Johnson for that of Abraham Lincoln. You were more determined than now in the supreme peril of the nation. We are sure that your sympathizers, come whence and from where they may, will be rebuked by every loyal man who possesses a manly appreciation of your present trials. You labored on a year ago under the same discouragements, and the giddiness stared you in the face, and the loyal people will never forget your courage and justice in overthrowing, and the freedom bought by blood shall be permanently established by the Constitution.

"C. H. VAN WYCK,

"Temporary Chairman, Republican State Committee.

"To the Hon. THOMAS J. DURANT, Philadelphia Convention."

The Convention being full, Mr. Durant made a speech of the same general tenor with General VAN WYCK's, to which we have already referred.

Reuben E. Fenton was renominated for Governor, and Stevens for Lieutenant-Governor by acclamation.

The following platform of resolutions were reported by the Committee on Resolutions—George W. Curtis, Chairman—and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That by the grace of God, and the valor and intelligence of the people, the Constitution has been maintained and the supreme law of the land, and that every political, social, and industrial interest of the country is to-day under the most solemn and urgent generous and patriotic heart, imperatively demand the speediest restoration of the Union which is consistent with constitutional justice and national safety.

Resolved, That the United States is a perpetual Union, and that no power exists either in the Federal Government or in the several States rightly to destroy it. Neither by the act of rebellion can the States of the Union or withdraw any of their rights or powers under the Constitution, nor by any process of secession or ordinance can the jurisdiction or the rightful authority of the United States over any citizen or any State be ousted or impaired, nor any law of the United States be rendered inoperative, or any portion of the public property, real or personal, be withdrawn from the possession of the United States.

Resolved, That the United States have the right and power to suppress rebellion and treason, and to punish the authors of a State, or of the people of a State, who have violated the constitutional authority of the Federal Government can be sustained by rebellion and war against the people, a State may by rebellion and war put to the abrogation of its loyal State Government, and the exercise of its constitutional powers in the Union, and as a State, so far as fact ceases its relations to the Union and to the privileges which it possessed under the Constitution, and the Federal Government may wage war for its subjugation, precisely as it may wage war upon the forces of the law of a foreign nation. The powers of the law of war are recognized by the laws of Nations; and when that war is waged by the people of a State, the relations of the Government to determine at what time the State by the abandonment of a government for the political form under the Constitution and the consequent abandonment of rebellion and the return to loyalty of its inhabitants may safely resume the exercise of its rights and powers under the Constitution, which have been lost and suspended by its own wrong, and the duty of the United States has been to act and unimpaired all its rights and privileges while its inhabitants have been in revolt as its agents, and to hold to judge when it is in proper condition to resume those rights and privileges. It is essential, and the other doctrine, that the President is alone sole judge of the period when any such suspension shall be at an end and the State permitted to resume its power in the Union, is monstrous.

Resolved, That the pending amendment to the Constitution proposed by Congress, which denies citizenship in the United States and the civil rights of citizenship to the late insurrectional representative among several States, which disables from national or local office the great body of the people represented in Congress—those who have taking an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, which have engaged in rebellion against the same, and which declares the validity of the public debt of the United States, and invalidates every debt incurred by any attempt to overthrow the Union, is essential to engraft upon the organic law the legitimate results of the war, consecrated by the glorious, humanity, and moderation to every patriotic heart, and that when any of the late insurgent States refuses to ratify the amendment a State should at once, by its loyal Representatives, be permitted to resume its place in Congress.

Resolved, That in pursuance of these principles the late insurgent States required by the Federal Union subject to the approval of Congress, to accede to certain conditions including the ratification of the Constitutional amendment of each of the late insurgent States in Congress is due solely to their refusal to recognize this change, and that their claim to enter Congress before that change is achieved, is a demand that is bloody attempt to dissolve the Union shall be rewarded with increased representation of political power.

Resolved, That inequalities of guarantees of person and political liberties are dangerous to the peace of States and the welfare of freemen, and that we shall sincerely endorse if the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment which tends to that guarantee of political rights among citizens of the Union upon which the future prosperity, and power of the United States must depend.

Resolved, That the President of the United States, in denouncing as unconstitutionally incompetent the Congress whose legislative authority he has otherwise recognized, cowers himself of usurpation of power, and that the frequent avowals of faithful citizens in Members and New Orleans should admonish him that his policy encourages a spirit hostile to constitutional liberty, and which indefinitely delays the restoration of the Union.

Resolved, That Reuben E. Fenton, by his able, faithful, and vigilant discharge of his duties as Governor, has deserved and secured the confidence and gratitude of the people of our State, and we present him as a candidate for re-election in the assured trust that his re-election will be ratified by an increased and commanding majority.

Resolved, That we recognize in the other candidates on our ticket men who have proved in the field and elsewhere the patriotic debts and generous capacity which command them to the hearty support of the people of New York.

Resolved, That alike as to our own and other lands we take our stand on the glorious platform of the precedents and positive our fathers' Declaration of Independence, wherein Human Government not as the prerogative of a superior race or caste, but as the natural birthright of all men inalienable by crime. We rejoice to witness the progress which other nations are making in the practical assertion of this indestructible truth, and we confidently trust that the day is not distant when throughout the civilized world there shall no more be found a despot, a vassal, or a slave.

Resolved, That the Republic is grateful and commemorance the brave soldiers and sailors who, through the price of their shed blood, have saved to the Union to glorious victory, and that we hold in undying honor the brave men of our race in the insurgent race, who, during the late war, and under the most trying circumstances, heroically maintained their faith in the Union, and succored its imprisoned soldiers; and that we pledge to them in every citizen every where in the land who is now sincerely faithful to the Union, our profoundest sympathy and support, praying them to close up the mighty line, and hand in hand and heart to heart, marching on to universal liberty, in the words of our beloved and immortal leader, Abraham Lincoln, though dead, yet speaketh, "The Government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

CONDITION OF THE TREASURY.

The receipts of gold into the Treasury continue to be very large, and the amount in the sub-treasury of over five millions since the statement of September 1, four and a half of which was for interest on the Ten-Forty bonds, the amount now held exceeds that on hand at that time, reaching nearly $89,000,000; of this amount $63,000,00 actually belong to the Government, the balance being represented by gold certificates.

The total receipts from customs, internal revenue, etc. are larger than at any previous time, and notwithstanding the rapid reduction of the currency debt, the balances in favor of the Government are again rapidly accumulating at all points.

FOREIGN NEWS.

BY TELEGRAPH.

September 5:

(VIENNA.)—Affairs in Saxony remain in a state of unrest. The Hungarian troops have been withdrawn from the Hungarian frontier, and the army is being provisioned. The Viceroy of peace with Prussia Baden Austria not to interfere.

September 6:

(BERLIN.)—The armistice between Saxony and Prussia has expired, but it is believed that a treaty is concluded between the two countries, and hostilities, it is thought, may possibly cease.

The Prussian Chamber of Deputies has passed the Indemnity Bill by a majority of 230 votes to 75.

A treaty of peace between Prussia and Hesse-Darmstadt was concluded on the 13th.

It is said that King William, of Prussia, will visit Austria.

September 8:

(BERLIN.)—Darmstadt has complied with the demands of Prussia, and will pay the latter three millions of florins, besides ceding to Prussia some territory.

Russia is treating for the purchase of the iron-clad Invincible.

Now the expiration of the armistice between Prussia and Saxony the Plenipotentiaries of the two Governments have met, and peace negotiations have been formally opened by the representative of Saxony.

September 9:

(BERLIN.)—It is said that the King of Saxony will be deposed in order to refuse to accept Bismarck's terms—and that he will be succeeded on the throne by a member of the younger branch of his family.

(FLORENCE.)—The cholera is making sad ravages in Italy.

September 11:

(BERLIN.)—The Prussian Chamber of Deputies has passed the bill for the annexation of Hanover, Hesse-Cassel, Nassau, and Frankfort. It is said that a reconciliation of Schleswig and Holstein has been sent in to the Danish Diet.

September 8:

(LONDON.)—Right Honorable W. E. Gladstone, in a speech delivered at Salisbury last evening, urged upon the Liberals to support up good Reform Bill which should be brought forward in Parliament by the Derby Government.

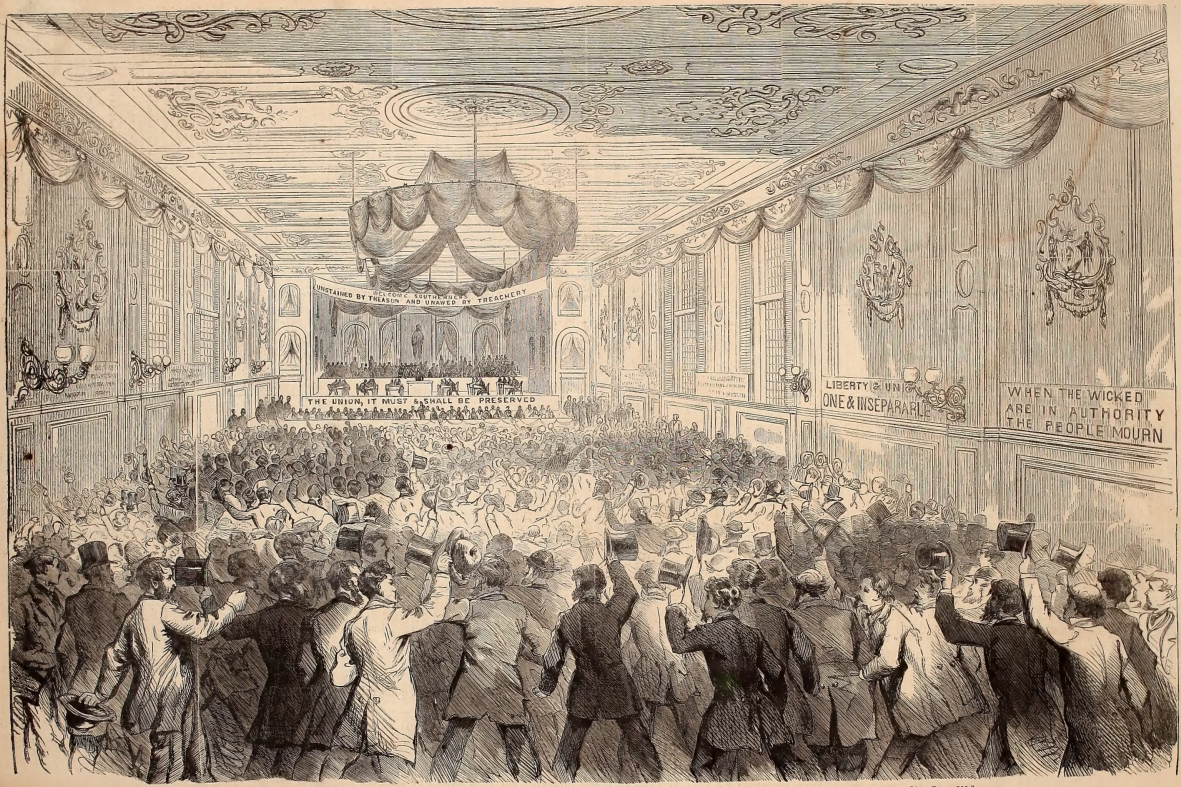
(HAYTI'S CONVENT.)—Since Sunday morning unlimited terror has prevailed throughout the capital, and she laid the shore end of the cable of 1858 on Saturday evening at 6 o'clock. Advices from Europe by the arrival of Schleswig and Holstein has been sent in to the Grand Duke.

September 8:

(LONDON.)—Right Honorable W. E. Gladstone, in a speech delivered at Salisbury last evening, urged upon the Liberals to support up good Reform Bill which should be brought forward in Parliament by the Derby Government.

(HAYTI'S CONVENT.)—Since Sunday morning unlimited terror has prevailed throughout the capital, and she laid the shore end of the cable of 1858 on Saturday evening at 6 o'clock. Advices from Europe by the arrival of Schleswig and Holstein has been sent in to the Grand Duke.

September 9:



(LONDON.)—It is said the cable fills are soon to be replaced on deck.

(BERLIN.)—The Upper House of the Prussian Diet has passed the bill to indemnify the King for acting without the assent of the Diet in the matter of the budget and army supplies previous to the war with Austria. The bill has been unanimously.

The number of troops in the Duchies have been ordered to be immediately reduced to the footing.

(ANCONA.)—The Cretans have rejected the terms offered them by the Turkish Commissioner, and continue their revolt.

The Epirotes (inhabitants of Epirus) also claim their freedom from Turkey, and have abandoned their habitations and taken to the hills.

SCENE UPON THE ASSEMBLING OF THE SOUTHERN LOYALISTS' CONVENTION AT THE "NATIONAL HALL" IN PHILADELPHIA, SEPTEMBER 3, 1866.—[SEE PAGE 598.]

THE UNION LEAGUE PROCESSION PASSING INDEPENDENCE HALL, PHILADELPHIA, AND CHEERING THE FLAG RAISED BY ABRAHAM LINCOLN IN 1861.—[See Page 596.]

THE UNIONIST CONVENTION.

IT is the day of popular Conventions. Setting aside the State Convention which usually recur at this season, there will have been held before the close of this month, and following fast upon each other's heels, three general Conventions, called together by the pressing questions which are to be, in a great measure, decided by the Fall elections. The National Union party held its Convention at Philadelphia in the middle of August, and it had scarcely left the Quaker City before the leaders from the Southern States entered it to hold their Convention. On the 17th instant the Soldiers' and Sailors' Convention will be held at Cleveland. So absorbing is the popular interest in the great national question of the day, that even in our State Conventions local interests seem to have been entirely forgotten. And in addition to the meeting of Conventions there is the President's grand political tour through the several States; and the people with intense interest are following their Chief Magistrate, weighing carefully his every word and thought, now on both sides glorying in his mistakes, while others either seek to hide their blushes of shame, or indignantly spurn out their rebuke.

It is well that our people are thus alive to the present emergency; and it is well that the problem of restoration is thus being brought before them in all its manifold phases. The Conventions of the period are an expression of something more than the members that compose them; they represent most faithfully both the principles and the temper of the parties for which they speak. And the Presidential tour, in demonstrating to the people the policy and his temper, neither of which the people will forget. The American people never forget any thing.

But our present business is with the Southern Loyalists' Convention, which met on September 3 in Philadelphia, and to the illustration of which we have devoted several pages of this Number of our paper.

What is the composition of this Convention? whom does it represent? and what is the policy which it advocates? These are the questions the work which we purpose to answer.

THE CONVENTION.

The Convention was made up of Southern men, almost entirely of men from the eleven States lately in rebellion—of men who were faithful to the Union when all others in their several States were faithless, and who suffered ever-instant and long-continued perils for their fidelity—of men who are now bitterly hated, proscribed, and sometimes murdered, for no other reason than that they have been always Unionists, by those who still glory in the shame of their treason, even while they profess repentance, and claim the nation's pardon, and insist upon the restoration of their ancient privileges The men of this Convention were such as Governor BROWNLOW of Tennessee, ex-Governors HAMILTON and PARSON of Texas, the Hon. THOMAS DURANT of Louisiana, Hon. SIMON BOLIVAR BUCKNER of Virginia. If they speak bitterly and strongly of those who rebelled, it must be remembered that they speak from a nearer and more intimate knowledge of the real spirit and meaning of rebellion than we of the North, or even our loyal soldiers have had.

They represent very many who have been at the same time Southern loyalists and Union soldiers. And all whom they represent have been faithful to the National flag, excepting only those who were as loyal in sentiment as ABRAHAM LINCOLN, but who, by a very common frailty of our nature, have been forced to choose between death and the sacrifice of sentiment, accepted the latter, and thousands of whom found death by it, and now fill rebel soldiers' graves. They represent those stanch Unionists of the South who are not willing that the Freedom should be forgotten, and who insist upon the equality of all men before the law, irrespective of color, and look forward to the time when a large portion of the rebellious shall participate in the duties and privileges of the Government of which they are citizens.

THE WELCOME.

The members of the Convention, upon their arrival in Philadelphia, received an enthusiastic welcome from the Union League Club, the citizens, and the delegates from the North who had come on to meet them. On behalf of all these, Judge GEORGE, Esq., Chairman of the Committee of Reception, made a brief but eloquent address to the Convention. There was, he said, no hypocrisy on their hands, and their souls were free from the guilt of treason. They had held fast to their integrity, although their homes had been desolated, their nearest places laid waste, and themselves and their wives and children driven into exile. The sympathy which the men of the North felt for them and all those who flashed from a million Northern bayonets, and pronounced by the mouths of Northern cannon. He proclaimed it as the honest sentiment of the North, that when the South returned to her duty she must come in new robes, with new covenants for liberty, equality, and justice, led by her own loyal Unionists who are free from the guilt of treason. What hope had they in the future, or what right to demand it, if unpunished and impenitent traitors were to be reinstated in power by the arbitrary and besotted will of one man, under a Constitution that was deliberately overturn? The sense was already written in the blood of the murdered loyalists of New Orleans. They, the men of the South, were for the high and solemn mission of re-establishing the American Union on the broad and sure foundation of equal and exact justice to all men. It could stand upon no other. They could not be so unmindful of all the lessons of the past as to be led by vagrant politicians into another compromise with crime, instead of lifting up from degradation those who had been its victims.

On the part of the Convention Governor HAMILTON responded to the greeting. He said the spirit which animated the rebellion was as rampant to-day as on the day when the rebel first drew the sword. The projection of all who aided the Government was as rampant and incorrigible as ever. Bloody, fanatical, or treacherous, as vindictive, and as cruel as it was at any period during the rebellion. Seeing this, and realizing that so far from being remitted to their homes, they were remitted to the same element which has sought their destruction and the destruction of the Government, none of them who happened to be at the national capital deemed it time propitious to call on the Unionists of the South to send delegates to meet and consult together as to their true condition and their duty. They believed that they saw not only danger to themselves, but a cloud, though as yet small, upon the horizon, which might ultimately spread over the entire country. This Convention had been called because they realized the fact that a practical principle of administration had been settled by the late contest. They had hoped that hereafter all the States would be held to such a Government as the fathers had intended it to be —one giving freedom to every human being within its limits by placing on a sure foundation the rights of every citizen. But they found that they were only to be remitted to the tender mercies of States, which might, either will and discretion, thrust down the dearest human rights, while no protecting power was to be found in the Government. They therefore deemed the time auspicious to call back the people to the primitive ideas of republican liberty, to organize a party, or rather to improve the organization of a party devoted to republican liberty, and to bring it back to the simple platform of the constitutional rights of every citizen. They looked to the Convention for aid. They wished the assistance and counsel of all their brethren everywhere throughout the United States. They asked the loyal Administration that came here from the loyal States to give them the hand of welcome, to help them to renew their faith in the principles of a pure spirit than before, and to prove to all Presidents, Cabinets, and Councils, North and South, who were loyal to the Government, and who were to be satisfied with nothing less than actual security or individual equality under the Constitution to all men.

A RELIC OF SECESSION.

CHARLES GIBBONS, Chairman of the Reception Committee, then came forward with a small gavel in his hand, and said:

"I hold in my hand the identical gavel used in Charleston, South Carolina, when the Convention assembled in 1860 to dissolve the Union of the American Union. This is the gavel that called together that Convention which declared the Union dissolved. Sir" (turning to Governor HAMILTON), "I have the pleasure of tendering it to you for the purpose of calling together that loyal Convention which is to lay the foundations for the restoration of the Union."

Governor HAMILTON accepted the gift, and then the presentation ceremonies were declared ended.

The next business of the Convention: "This mallet was used by the first Convention of Southern Independence, at the Charleston Theatre, in 1860, by old Daniel of Delaware. E. P. OUTLER, of Charleston, S. C."

THE "NATIONAL HALL."

The procession, after much confusion, was remounted, and took up the line of march for the music playing, banners waving, and the bells of the fire-engines ringing, to National Hall.

This large and commodious hall, located on Market Street, near Twelfth, was beautifully decorated for the occasion. At the rear of the large platform, where were seated the officers of the meeting and desks for the reporters, was a large, life-like portrait of President LINCOLN, the frame of the picture wreathed with flags and mourning. Above this was a large canvas scroll bearing the words, "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." Beneath the picture were the lines:

"Pure was thy life: its bloody close
Has placed thee with the sons of light,
Among the noble host of martyrs
Who perished in the cause of right."

At the front of the platform was a small table, pendent from the ceiling and reaching across the hall, on which was inscribed:

"Welcome to Southerners,
Untained by Rebellion, unawed by Treachery."

From the centre of the ceiling there depended two large American flags, and around the walls, amid folds, the ends being caught upon the circular gas fixtures by means of which the hall is lighted. Flags were also displayed in front of the hall for the whole circuit of the rooms, forming a very handsome border for the paneling on the walls.

WHAT THE CONVENTION DID.

About 250 delegates were assembled in the hall. The Northern delegates were mostly from the Union League Club-house, a motion was made, and supported by Generals BUTLER and BURNSIDE, that the Northern men should constitute a committee to confer with the one appointed by the Southern delegates as to the drafting of resolutions. The motion was lost.

Upon the reassembling of the Convention on the 4th Texas reported 35 delegates, Louisiana 34, Tennessee 81, Virginia 13, North Carolina 9, Georgia 8, Alabama 4, Kentucky 13, Mississippi 5, Missouri 10, Arkansas 21, North Carolina 9, Maryland 18, Delaware 6, Florida 1, District of Columbia 27, Total 292.

JAMES SPEED, of Kentucky, was chosen President. In thanking the Convention for their choice he alluded to the Convention which had lately met in that city.

"It was here in part, he said, because a great cry came up from the white men of the South, 'My Constitutional rights,' that your natural rights were lost, a great cry came up from the black man of the South, 'My Constitutional rights and my natural rights are denied me.' This was a great complaint, a complaint founded on truth, and made manifest, on both sides, and directly antagonistic, the one to the other. He said that the Republican party had declared for that the National Union party in the matter of emancipation. At the meeting of the Baltimore in 1864, which nominated Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. JOHNSON, it was announced that slavery was forever destroyed, had abolished nearly—extirpated, taken out of our institutions root and branch, body and soul, every element and every fibre of it. Mark, gentlemen, the difference between the two words: one to extirpate, not simply to cast off this or the other limb of the horrible monster, but to take out not only slavery, but all the incongruous unrighteousness and unequal consequences and incidents that resulted from slavery. What are they? In the first place, unequal representation. Does not slavery remain so long as there is a man, no matter what his color, so long as there is a man unrepresented in the Government? Does not slavery remain so long as you can, because of color, say to a man that he may or may not associate with his fellow-men in courts of justice? All these incidents the great Republican party of the country, and the Baltimore platform is a man, are to be extirpated. And you, Southern men, who were at least, on the very first horizon, which might ultimately spread over the entire country. This Convention had been called because they realized the fact that a practical principle of administration had been settled by the late contest. They had hoped that hereafter all the States would be held to such a Government as the fathers had intended it to be —one giving freedom to every human being within its limits by placing on a sure foundation the rights of every citizen. But they found that they were only to be remitted to the tender mercies of States, which might, either will and discretion, thrust down the dearest human rights, while no protecting power was to be found in the Government. They therefore deemed the time auspicious to call back the people to the primitive ideas of republican liberty, to organize a party, or rather to improve the organization of a party devoted to republican liberty, and to bring it back to the simple platform of the constitutional rights of every citizen. They looked to the Convention for aid. They wished the assistance and counsel of all their brethren everywhere throughout the United States. They asked the loyal Administration that came here from the loyal States to give them the hand of welcome, to help them to renew their faith in the principles of a pure spirit than before, and to prove to all Presidents, Cabinets, and Councils, North and South, who were loyal to the Government, and who were to be satisfied with nothing less than actual security or individual equality under the Constitution to all men.

A RELIC OF SECESSION.

CHARLES GIBBONS, Chairman of the Reception Committee, then came forward with a small gavel in his hand, and said:

"I hold in my hand the identical gavel used in Charleston, South Carolina, when the Convention assembled in 1860 to dissolve the Union of the American Union. This is the gavel that called together that Convention which declared the Union dissolved. Sir" (turning to Governor HAMILTON), "I have the pleasure of tendering it to you for the purpose of calling together that loyal Convention which is to lay the foundations for the restoration of the Union."

Governor HAMILTON accepted the gift, and then the presentation ceremonies were declared ended.

The next business of the Convention: "This mallet was used by the first Convention of Southern Independence, at the Charleston Theatre, in 1860, by old Daniel of Delaware. E. P. OUTLER, of Charleston, S. C."

THE "NATIONAL HALL."

The procession, after much confusion, was remounted, and took up the line of march for the music playing, banners waving, and the bells of the fire-engines ringing, to National Hall.

This large and commodious hall, located on Market Street, near Twelfth, was beautifully decorated for the occasion. At the rear of the large platform, where were seated the officers of the meeting and desks for the reporters, was a large, life-like portrait of President LINCOLN, the frame of the picture wreathed with flags and mourning. Above this was a large canvas scroll bearing the words, "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." Beneath the picture were the lines:

"Pure was thy life: its bloody close
Has placed thee with the sons of light,
Among the noble host of martyrs
Who perished in the cause of right."

At the front of the platform was a small table, pendent from the ceiling and reaching across the hall, on which was inscribed:

"Welcome to Southerners,
Untained by Rebellion, unawed by Treachery."

From the centre of the ceiling there depended two large American flags, and around the walls, amid folds, the ends being caught upon the circular gas fixtures by means of which the hall is lighted. Flags were also displayed in front of the hall for the whole circuit of the rooms, forming a very handsome border for the paneling on the walls.

WHAT THE CONVENTION DID.

About 250 delegates were assembled in the hall. The Northern delegates were mostly from the Union League Club-house, a motion was made, and supported by Generals BUTLER and BURNSIDE, that the Northern men should constitute a committee to confer with the one appointed by the Southern delegates as to the drafting of resolutions. The motion was lost.

Upon the reassembling of the Convention on the 4th Texas reported 35 delegates, Louisiana 34, Tennessee 81, Virginia 13, North Carolina 9, Georgia 8, Alabama 4, Kentucky 13, Mississippi 5, Missouri 10, Arkansas 21, North Carolina 9, Maryland 18, Delaware 6, Florida 1, District of Columbia 27, Total 292.

JAMES SPEED, of Kentucky, was chosen President. In thanking the Convention for their choice he alluded to the Convention which had lately met in that city.

"It was here in part, he said, because a great cry came up from the white men of the South, 'My Constitutional rights,' that your natural rights were lost, a great cry came up from the black man of the South, 'My Constitutional rights and my natural rights are denied me.' This was a great complaint, a complaint founded on truth, and made manifest, on both sides, and directly antagonistic, the one to the other. He said that the Republican party had declared for that the National Union party in the matter of emancipation. At the meeting of the Baltimore in 1864, which nominated Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. JOHNSON, it was announced that slavery was forever destroyed, had abolished nearly—extirpated, taken out of our institutions root and branch, body and soul, every element and every fibre of it. Mark, gentlemen, the difference between the two words: one to extirpate, not simply to cast off this or the other limb of the horrible monster, but to take out not only slavery, but all the incongruous unrighteousness and unequal consequences and incidents that resulted from slavery. What are they? In the first place, unequal representation. Does not slavery remain so long as there is a man, no matter what his color, so long as there is a man unrepresented in the Government? Does not slavery remain so long as you can, because of color, say to a man that he may or may not associate with his fellow-men in courts of justice? All these incidents the great Republican party of the country, and the Baltimore platform is a man, are to be extirpated. And you, Southern men, who were at least, on the very first horizon, which might ultimately spread over the entire country. This Convention had been called because they realized the fact that a practical principle of administration had been settled by the late contest. They had hoped that hereafter all the States would be held to such a Government as the fathers had intended it to be —one giving freedom to every human being within its limits by placing on a sure foundation the rights of every citizen. But they found that they were only to be remitted to the tender mercies of States, which might, either will and discretion, thrust down the dearest human rights, while no protecting power was to be found in the Government. They therefore deemed the time auspicious to call back the people to the primitive ideas of republican liberty, to organize a party, or rather to improve the organization of a party devoted to republican liberty, and to bring it back to the simple platform of the constitutional rights of every citizen. They looked to the Convention for aid. They wished the assistance and counsel of all their brethren everywhere throughout the United States. They asked the loyal Administration that came here from the loyal States to give them the hand of welcome, to help them to renew their faith in the principles of a pure spirit than before, and to prove to all Presidents, Cabinets, and Councils, North and South, who were loyal to the Government, and who were to be satisfied with nothing less than actual security or individual equality under the Constitution to all men.

A RELIC OF SECESSION.

CHARLES GIBBONS, Chairman of the Reception Committee, then came forward with a small gavel in his hand, and said:

"I hold in my hand the identical gavel used in Charleston, South Carolina, when the Convention assembled in 1860 to dissolve the Union of the American Union. This is the gavel that called together that Convention which declared the Union dissolved. Sir" (turning to Governor HAMILTON), "I have the pleasure of tendering it to you for the purpose of calling together that loyal Convention which is to lay the foundations for the restoration of the Union."

Governor HAMILTON accepted the gift, and then the presentation ceremonies were declared ended.

The next business of the Convention: "This mallet was used by the first Convention of Southern Independence, at the Charleston Theatre, in 1860, by old Daniel of Delaware. E. P. OUTLER, of Charleston, S. C."

THE "NATIONAL HALL."

The procession, after much confusion, was remounted, and took up the line of march for the music playing, banners waving, and the bells of the fire-engines ringing, to National Hall.

This large and commodious hall, located on Market Street, near Twelfth, was beautifully decorated for the occasion. At the rear of the large platform, where were seated the officers of the meeting and desks for the reporters, was a large, life-like portrait of President LINCOLN, the frame of the picture wreathed with flags and mourning. Above this was a large canvas scroll bearing the words, "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." Beneath the picture were the lines:

"Pure was thy life: its bloody close
Has placed thee with the sons of light,
Among the noble host of martyrs
Who perished in the cause of right."

At the front of the platform was a small table, pendent from the ceiling and reaching across the hall, on which was inscribed:

"Welcome to Southerners,
Untained by Rebellion, unawed by Treachery."

From the centre of the ceiling there depended two large American flags, and around the walls, amid folds, the ends being caught upon the circular gas fixtures by means of which the hall is lighted. Flags were also displayed in front of the hall for the whole circuit of the rooms, forming a very handsome border for the paneling on the walls.

WHAT THE CONVENTION DID.

About 250 delegates were assembled in the hall. The Northern delegates were mostly from the Union League Club-house, a motion was made, and supported by Generals BUTLER and BURNSIDE, that the Northern men should constitute a committee to confer with the one appointed by the Southern delegates as to the drafting of resolutions. The motion was lost.

Upon the reassembling of the Convention on the 4th Texas reported 35 delegates, Louisiana 34, Tennessee 81, Virginia 13, North Carolina 9, Georgia 8, Alabama 4, Kentucky 13, Mississippi 5, Missouri 10, Arkansas 21, North Carolina 9, Maryland 18, Delaware 6, Florida 1, District of Columbia 27, Total 292.

JAMES SPEED, of Kentucky, was chosen President. In thanking the Convention for their choice he alluded to the Convention which had lately met in that city.

"It was here in part, he said, because a great cry came up from the white men of the South, 'My Constitutional rights,' that your natural rights were lost, a great cry came up from the black man of the South, 'My Constitutional rights and my natural rights are denied me.' This was a great complaint, a complaint founded on truth, and made manifest, on both sides, and directly antagonistic, the one to the other. He said that the Republican party had declared for that the National Union party in the matter of emancipation. At the meeting of the Baltimore in 1864, which nominated Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. JOHNSON, it was announced that slavery was forever destroyed, had abolished nearly—extirpated, taken out of our institutions root and branch, body and soul, every element

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1866.

THE UNIONIST CONVENTION.

IT is the day of popular Conventions. Setting aside the State Convention which usually recur at this season, there will have been held before the close of this month, and following fast upon each other's heels, three general Conventions, called together by the pressing questions which are to be, in a great measure, decided by the Fall elections. The National Union party held its Convention at Philadelphia in the middle of August, and it had scarcely left the Quaker City before the leaders from the Southern States entered it to hold their Convention. On the 17th instant the Soldiers' and Sailors' Convention will be held at Cleveland. So absorbing is the popular interest in the great national question of the day, that even in our State Conventional local interests seem to have been entirely forgotten. And in addition to the meeting of Conventions there is the President's grand political tour through the several States; and the people with intense interest are following their Chief Magistrate, weighing carefully his every word and thought, now on both sides glorying in his mistakes, while others either seek to hide their blushes of shame, or indignantly spurn out their rebuke.

It is well that our people are thus alive to the present emergency; and it is well that the problem of restoration is thus being brought before them in all its manifold phases. The Conventions of the period are an expression of something more than the members that compose them; they represent most faithfully both the principles and the temper of the parties for which they speak. And the Presidential tour, in demonstrating to the people the policy and his temper, neither of which the people will forget. The American people never forget any thing.

But our present business is with the Southern Loyalists' Convention, which met on September 3 in Philadelphia, and to the illustration of which we have devoted several pages of this Number of our paper.

What is the composition of this Convention? whom does it represent? and what is the policy which it advocates? These are the questions the work which we purpose to answer.

THE CONVENTION.

The Convention was made up of Southern men, almost entirely of men from the eleven States lately in rebellion—of men who were faithful to the Union when all others in their several States were faithless, and who suffered ever-instant and long-continued perils for their fidelity—of men who are now bitterly hated, proscribed, and sometimes murdered, for no other reason than that they have been always Unionists, by those who still glory in the shame of their treason, even while they profess repentance, and claim the nation's pardon, and insist upon the restoration of their ancient privileges The men of this Convention were such as Governor BROWNLOW of Tennessee, ex-Governors HAMILTON and PARSON of Texas, the Hon. THOMAS DURANT of Louisiana, Hon. SIMON BOLIVAR BUCKNER of Virginia. If they speak bitterly and strongly of those who rebelled, it must be remembered that they speak from a nearer and more intimate knowledge of the real spirit and meaning of rebellion than we of the North, or even our loyal soldiers have had.

They represent very many who have been at the same time Southern loyalists and Union soldiers. And all whom they represent have been faithful to the National flag, excepting only those who were as loyal in sentiment as ABRAHAM LINCOLN, but who, by a very common frailty of our nature, have been forced to choose between death and the sacrifice of sentiment, accepted the latter, and thousands of whom found death by it, and now fill rebel soldiers' graves. They represent those stanch Unionists of the South who are not willing that the Freedom should be forgotten, and who insist upon the equality of all men before the law, irrespective of color, and look forward to the time when a large portion of the rebellious shall participate in the duties and privileges of the Government of which they are citizens.

THE WELCOME.

The members of the Convention, upon their arrival in Philadelphia, received an enthusiastic welcome from the Union League Club, the citizens, and the delegates from the North who had come on to meet them. On behalf of all these, Judge GEORGE, Esq., Chairman of the Committee of Reception, made a brief but eloquent address to the Convention. There was, he said, no hypocrisy on their hands, and their souls were free from the guilt of treason. They had held fast to their integrity, although their homes had been desolated, their nearest places laid waste, and themselves and their wives and children driven into exile. The sympathy which the men of the North felt for them and all those who flashed from a million Northern bayonets, and pronounced by the mouths of Northern cannon. He proclaimed it as the honest sentiment of the North, that when the South returned to her duty she must come in new robes, with new covenants for liberty, equality, and justice, led by her own loyal Unionists who are free from the guilt of treason. What hope had they in the future, or what right to demand it, if unpunished and impenitent traitors were to be reinstated in power by the arbitrary and besotted will of one man, under a Constitution that was deliberately overturn? The sense was already written in the blood of the murdered loyalists of New Orleans. They, the men of the South, were for the high and solemn mission of re-establishing the American Union on the broad and sure foundation of equal and exact justice to all men. It could stand upon no other. They could not be so unmindful of all the lessons of the past as to be led by vagrant politicians into another compromise with crime, instead of lifting up from degradation those who had been its victims.

On the part of the Convention Governor HAMILTON responded to the greeting. He said the spirit which animated the rebellion was as rampant to-day as on the day when the rebel first drew the sword. The projection of all who aided the Government was as rampant and incorrigible as ever. Bloody, fanatical, or treacherous, as vindictive, and as cruel as it was at any period during the rebellion. Seeing this, and realizing that so far from being remitted to their homes, they were remitted to the same element which has sought their destruction and the destruction of the Government, none of them who happened to be at the national capital deemed it time propitious to call on the Unionists of the South to send delegates to meet and consult together as to their true condition and their duty. They believed that they saw not only danger to themselves, but a cloud, though as yet small, upon the horizon, which might ultimately spread over the entire country. This Convention had been called because they realized the fact that a practical principle of administration had been settled by the late contest. They had hoped that hereafter all the States would be held to such a Government as the fathers had intended it to be —one giving freedom to every human being within its limits by placing on a sure foundation the rights of every citizen. But they found that they were only to be remitted to the tender mercies of States, which might, either will and discretion, thrust down the dearest human rights, while no protecting power was to be found in the Government. They therefore deemed the time auspicious to call back the people to the primitive ideas of republican liberty, to organize a party, or rather to improve the organization of a party devoted to republican liberty, and to bring it back to the simple platform of the constitutional rights of every citizen. They looked to the Convention for aid. They wished the assistance and counsel of all their brethren everywhere throughout the United States. They asked the loyal Administration that came here from the loyal States to give them the hand of welcome, to help them to renew their faith in the principles of a pure spirit than before, and to prove to all Presidents, Cabinets, and Councils, North and South, who were loyal to the Government, and who were to be satisfied with nothing less than actual security or individual equality under the Constitution to all men.

A RELIC OF SECESSION.

CHARLES GIBBONS, Chairman of the Reception Committee, then came forward with a small gavel in his hand, and said:

"I hold in my hand the identical gavel used in Charleston, South Carolina, when the Convention assembled in 1860 to dissolve the Union of the American Union. This is the gavel that called together that Convention which declared the Union dissolved. Sir" (turning to Governor HAMILTON), "I have the pleasure of tendering it to you for the purpose of calling together that loyal Convention which is to lay the foundations for the restoration of the Union."

Governor HAMILTON accepted the gift, and then the presentation ceremonies were declared ended.

The next business of the Convention: "This mallet was used by the first Convention of Southern Independence, at the Charleston Theatre, in 1860, by old Daniel of Delaware. E. P. OUTLER, of Charleston, S. C."

THE "NATIONAL HALL."

The procession, after much confusion, was remounted, and took up the line of march for the music playing, banners waving, and the bells of the fire-engines ringing, to National Hall.

This large and commodious hall, located on Market Street, near Twelfth, was beautifully decorated for the occasion. At the rear of the large platform, where were seated the officers of the meeting and desks for the reporters, was a large, life-like portrait of President LINCOLN, the frame of the picture wreathed with flags and mourning. Above this was a large canvas scroll bearing the words, "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." Beneath the picture were the lines:

"Pure was thy life: its bloody close
Has placed thee with the sons of light,
Among the noble host of martyrs
Who perished in the cause of right."

At the front of the platform was a small table, pendent from the ceiling and reaching across the hall, on which was inscribed:

"Welcome to Southerners,
Untained by Rebellion, unawed by Treachery."

From the centre of the ceiling there depended two large American flags, and around the walls, amid folds, the ends being caught upon the circular gas fixtures by means of which the hall is lighted. Flags were also displayed in front of the hall for the whole circuit of the rooms, forming a very handsome border for the paneling on the walls.

WHAT THE CONVENTION DID.

About 250 delegates were assembled in the hall. The Northern delegates were mostly from the Union League Club-house, a motion was made, and supported by Generals BUTLER and BURNSIDE, that the Northern men should constitute a committee to confer with the one appointed by the Southern delegates as to the drafting of resolutions. The motion was lost.

Upon the reassembling of the Convention on the 4th Texas reported 35 delegates, Louisiana 34, Tennessee 81, Virginia 13, North Carolina 9, Georgia 8, Alabama 4, Kentucky 13, Mississippi 5, Missouri 10, Arkansas 21, North Carolina 9, Maryland 18, Delaware 6, Florida 1, District of Columbia 27, Total 292.

JAMES SPEED, of Kentucky, was chosen President. In thanking the Convention for their choice he alluded to the Convention which had lately met in that city.

"It was here in part, he said, because a great cry came up from the white men of the South, 'My Constitutional rights,' that your natural rights were lost, a great cry came up from the black man of the South, 'My Constitutional rights and my natural rights are denied me.' This was a great complaint, a complaint founded on truth, and made manifest, on both sides, and directly antagonistic, the one to the other. He said that the Republican party had declared for that the National Union party in the matter of emancipation. At the meeting of the Baltimore in 1864, which nominated Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. JOHNSON, it was announced that slavery was forever destroyed, had abolished nearly—extirpated, taken out of our institutions root and branch, body and soul, every element

SPARKS FROM THE FORGE.

"YES, yes, Miss Miller; it's tryin', as you say, after I've brung up the boy, to have him turn against me now!" and old Mrs. Ripley sipped her tea sorrowfully.

Mrs. Miller sighed from the other side of the little black tea-pot on the tea-table between them, for the gentle woman was giving a dish of their favorite beverage, with sage remarks and bitter herbs of consolation thrown in. Then she handed over the great chamber, with a sea of water and islands of radishes floating therein, under the vague impression that they would do the sorrowful good in a world of good. Perhaps they did, for there was, first, the wholesome exercise of chasing the round ones and the long ones and the triangular ones through the native obstinacy of the long ones, which leaned about at various angles.

"Yes," said Mrs. Ripley took the top of one off with a snap, and held the remainder over the salt ready for another attack,—

"Your rabbles is splendid; if Lizzy had been worth a cent we might ha' had a garden worth somethin' too. I told John how it would be, more than a year ago. I told him bass and catches—more'n a batch of bread in her life, nor milked a cow, nor nothin'."

"Well, I s'pose, of she was a manty-maker in the city, she couldn't have a chance to learn sich things, you know," said Mrs. Miller, pouring out a fresh cup of tea in a convivial way, as though she expected to get up a head on the harmless infusion.

"No, no more she couldn't—and that's what I say." And Mrs. Ripley rounded her period with a goblet that threatened her only reliable tooth with instant destruction. "No more she couldn't, and so I told John, but he was the obstinatest creature I ever see. Says he, 'I don't want her to be another;' I am strong and well, and am a-goin' to work for her.' John is a good boy, but when his mind is set it's set. I tell you, Miss Miller, when your children is little they tromple on yer toes, but when they get growed they tromple on yer heart!—No, no more they shouldn't—I must be a-settin' along. I promised John that I wouldn't leave Lizzy and the hours very long. She's no more 'count than a child, never even made a stitch of clothes for John yet. There's Melissee Aspelt now—why she's ha' made him a suit of clothes as quick as wink. Well, well! Come over soon and see me. I must go back to Lizzie."

"I'm here, mother" and a young girl rose up from the flower-bed outside the door, over which she had been bending, and so heard the last words. "I was lonesome, and I came over to walk back with you."

There was a pitiful accent in her voice as she spoke. The clear blue eyes were a trifle dim as she walked slowly home by the old woman's side, and the little hands, already roughened by her new life, laid somewhat wearily together. "John's late to-night, isn't he, mother?" and the looked anxiously over toward the rolling-mill, not far away, that flung out its great pillar of smoke from a crown of fire.

"La! yes, child. You can't expect a man as has his livin' to make to be remmin' home all times of day and night. There's extra work to do in a fur nace, I s'pose."

"Oh, there's John!" and the girl's pale cheeks, that had given no hint of dimples, flushed and made rosy nests of themselves as she sprung eagerly forward. "Will Ned, I declare!—Cousin Ned! Oh, I'm so glad!"

The two men came forward, almost counterparts in figure—the same stalwart shoulders and splendid stature, but their faces were of opposite types. John with a square chin and somewhat heavy brow, indorsed by a will that refused to tell fibs even in the shadow; while Ned Hammersly wore the fair Saxon color and golden hair that was softened into beauty at a face.

"I'm glad to see you, Lize!" and his great rough hand was outstretched for the little one, which met it frankly.

"Does Lize behave herself?" turning to John, who slid his arm about her, and looked down on her head with a strong man's tenderness as he answered: "Pretty well, pretty well."

Then came the explanation of Ned's presence: that a proposal for preparing coal was in the act of operation, and carried out under his skillful direction, at the rolling-mill; that he had come to stay for the summer at the little hotel among the hamlets about them.

Old Mrs. Ripley had stood somewhat aloof, but John now touched her sleeve, and, turning to Ned, said: "My mother; Liza's cousin, Edward Hammersly. Thereupon the old, sharp eyes took an inventory of all his qualities and quantities of manner and person.

"You never told me about Mr. Hammerlee, Lizee," and she looked at John's wife in such a dreadful way over her iron-rimmed glasses that Liza drew back a step, and only said: "Didn't I?"

"Liza never put a family, Mr. Hammerlee?" she added, turning the glasses on him.

Ned grew as red as a great cabbage-rose, and answered, awkwardly: "No, ma'am, I'm a bachelor, and don't think of getting married now."

The sharp eyes took a look between the cousins as he spoke which she never forgot, and thereon built up a theory of possibilities and probabilities. From that day she never wavered from the belief, long bright summer, her watchfulness never flagged, her innuendoes never ceased, until John grew pale and silent, and sometimes rose by fits to the little wife, who was a riddle to him yet. Ned, with his frank, cheery ways and pleasant laugh, smoked many a pipe in his company by their outdoor doors, and then Liza seemed happiest and most loving toward him. And so gilded by the days of harvest and its lingering moons, and the hours of daylight grew fewer and the night-watch longer.

II.

JOHN sat just by the outer rim of the circle shining from the mouth of the great furnace, and that must be undying now. There was to be a great casting on the morrow, and it was his turn to watch. Above him great wheels and bands turned on their edges to the faint red light, and hopeful spiders tried again their hopeless work that never would be finished. Lengths of trusty iron, to be welded by-and-by, lay biding their time of trial and destiny, fatefilled in honest grim or faithful anchor. The great trip-hammer, which had pounded again the anvil and whatever lay thereon, like a vindictive demon, all day, was at rest a while, and there was no sound except the moaning roar of the furnace.

In this light John looked pale and worn; perhaps he felt as he rose and held his hands to the thick locks, under the pump and deluged it, shaking the drops out like a great water-dog. Then he moved toward the open door and looked out at the stars so thick above him.

"True as the stars"—ay, they are true, sure enough; one can depend on them all the year round and afterward—for, never mind how many graves there are, there is a star for each, I know, 'that will never waver.' I almost wish sometimes that all this worry of life was over for me!" And he passed his hand over his wet hair again, and looked out on the open night. Crickets sang their little songs in the tall weeds by the pile of lumber near; now and then a frog croaked hoarse contentment from the stone below the dam; and a distant dog barked defiance to outlaws and marauders. As he listened he looked toward the white cottage, not very far away, with its colored shutters, like blind eyes, showing in the setting moonlight. He looked long and fixedly, and when he turned away it was with a sudden wrench as of one in pain, and he sighed heavily. Just then something white came through the grass and almost startled him, until he saw that it was Liza's cat, with a bit of ribbon all draggled and wet with the dew.

"Oh! pussy, is it you?" and he sat down on one of the oaken benches near the great creature as he put his arms, as though glad of her company in his silent loneliness.

"Good little pussy loves me, I know," and he laid his rough red hand tenderly over her fur. "I wonder if your little mistress does? I don't know. I thought she did; but I ought to have waited a little longer before I brought her home to my poor lonely place. So young and so fair, and I am ten years older than she, and grave and quiet in my ways—ain't I, puss?"

For answer, to be sure, the creature said "Mew!" and nothing more; but it made no difference to the lonely hearer, which was glad to-night of the dumb beast's sympathy. So he laid down her head, I'd sit, you see, pussy; and he is gay, and young, and handsome." He rose abruptly as he spoke, and the cat rolled over and over with fill, feeling her fur she ran frightened away, and between his heavy heard escaped the words: "I wish Ned Hammersly were dead—at the bottom of the sea!"

The furnace fire was a shade less bright, and he replenished it not sat with his head in his hands a long, long while, while the night looked over the hills and thrust her busy fingers even through the crevices and crannies of the door-way, where Liza stood with John's cap in her hand, and her arm. He knew the cat even so far away by its bright buttons, and Ned had evidently been trying to, or by what deceit or cajolery he could not know.

John Ripley grasped the lintel and never moved until the figure had disappeared on the road leading to the town, and she turned toward the shut. Then limbs trembled and shook as he staggered back to the oaken settle by the fire, and he shivered with the cold. So he sat when the mother brought him a can of coffee and eaten cake.

"I thought I would just run over, John, with a bit of sustain' for ye. You look awful pale of nights." She didn't come down out of her room till just afore I came out. What's the matter? I didn't hurt ye, no? If I'd look after him, I'd a-got the ager."

"No, no, mother, I'm all right, said he, precisely. "Set the coffee down, and I'll take it by-and-by."

Just then the great bell rang, and the hands came trooping in for supper, and the bell of tell. Wheel and band were thrown in gear, and the trip-hammer became a busy, relentless demon again.

III.

EVENTS o'clock, the time for casting, has come. Seething and boiling the great furnace waits its change. Once more the workman stoops to see the mould, that spot or mar shall not be found therein. Men and assistants hurry backward and forward and thither that all may go well. From a timber cross borne on strong shoulders hung a kettle suspended from two hooks, and this at the hour was filled and borne beside the mould to fill defects that might occur. From the molten mass, as the great clock struck, a ruddy stream poured slowly down to consult to the mould. The four men held steady by braces the great kettle, and the ladler waited for commands. John Ripley was one of these. All day his hand was scarcely steady, and when he heard Ned's voice behind him speaking to the men he turned away his head and held out his hand to the other on its brace. Just then the ladler dipped from out the mass, and in his agitation dipped the hot drop upon John's hand. It was a slight injury of pain escaped him, and he would have shrunk, and so let burning death upon him in its forthcoming torment, if, like a tiger, he had not sprung, and cried, "For God's sake, men, hold on!"

That cry and that quick grasp saved them all. The red iron had crept up to the very edge of the kettle with John's failing grasp, and one quiver more would have sent it over. It was a narrow escape.

The men knew well enough the danger. Round the forge-fires had gone many a tale of horror and disaster when a failing hand had left a moment free to scorch and burn and kill and fetter in the flying fugitives, until its hot breath did its work.

John knew the chief danger of his rival had saved him, and remembered it even through the fearful anguish of his maimed and blistered arm. And yet he would have given worlds to have cool the life he held to any other man.

"Here, Joe Hill; take my horse, tied outside, and ride for the doctor, and tell him, John Ripley has on here while I go home with John. He isn't fit to go alone."

Ned's orders were carried out, and the two men walked slowly toward the cottage.

"Let me go in first, John, and tell Lize."

Even in his anguish and suffering of body the injured man turned and answered fiercely, with an oath.

"No you don't, Ned Hammersly. I go first. I can take care of my wife—ay, and my own cut too. I don't want your help."

"Are you crazy, John?" and Ned stood across his path.

"No. Stand aside, will you?"

The man's strong will carried him past his companion and by the little door, where he fell fainting like one dead.

IV.

DAYS of pain and nights of unrest had followed the fearful burning. At one time it seemed hardly possible to save his arm; but now he hoped to wield it by-and-by. A long while, perchance, it might be before it could give the thunderous blows of its olden might; but he was thankful for its partial restoration. For his fierce and bitter words when coming home Ned bore no grudge; but ever since John had turned away with steady coldness from his friendly offers, Liza, too, had come to be afraid of his petulant replies, and went about her round of duties pale and silent. Mrs. Ripley, as was her wont, went out to gossip and drink tea with the neighbors. She did not grieve, I am sure, at the estrangement, for did it not prove her prophetic croakings true?

So it was timidly and half afraid that Liza sat down beside him in the September sunshine, which flooded the open door and the chair where he sat wearily thinking, about a month after the accident.

"John, dear, I'm afraid you find something sad she laid her hand on his knee, but he did not take it. "I s'pose you won't care, but I thought I would tell you that my sister's married and coming here to live. She was a long while making up her mind too, and she said No once or twice, but she meant Yes all the time, and so they are married, and—and her husband is Ned Hammersly. I thought we should go to the wedding, but you won't mind about it, will you, and so we couldn't be there. And see, John"—she pulled out from behind her, where she had held it all the while, a new cloth coat—"I made it for the wedding, John, all myself. I cut it and sewed it, and Ned got the cloth for me, and I tried it on him when you were out of sight—you won't mind, will you, John—and I just got it done the morning you were burned." And stopped and held it up for him to look at your coat, and it fitted so nicely! Now mother won't say I am good for nothing any more, will she? Why, John, what's the matter? are you crying about? I thought you would like it. Don't you?"

"Come here, little one!" The arms were open wide. "Darling, darling little lamb!" And so he held her golden head a while, and vowed anew to trust her for evermore. And so Ned and his new bride found their way to the cottage at last.

"I've been a fool, Ned; forget it if you can;" and that was all.

If ever a man was proud, John Ripley was in that beloved coat, that had cost him such sorrow in its building. If ever a wife was happy, it was when John wore that coat for the first time.

And when Mrs. Ripley took tea with Mrs. Miller, she was forced to confess that "she thought she might make somethin' out of Lizee after all."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

PLEASURE-SEEKERS are returning from various quarters to the city. It is the fashion to inaugurate the city season time in September; and so, even though September is the most rainy days may be expected, a people generally follow the fashion. Houses, long silent and deserted, are resonant with voices, blinds are thrown open, churches are opened, and business receives a general impetus. The hotels report a large increase in fall. Many who usually pass most of the summer in the city thought it expedient to retreat this year; but now that all fear of cholera is past, they begin to leave the retreats, the hotels and the chilly comforts of the country. The fall has been a very bright season of the kind, and weather known within the memory of the "oldest inhabitants," there has seldom been an August so unseasonably and so continuously cold.

The sojourners at the White Mountains have found themselves sadly incommoded. Rain has fallen almost incessant, and the roads, never good, have been, in consequence, nearly impassable. Shut up inside of a hazy, prejudicial atmosphere, it is hard for people of it to keep one self from being tossed into the muddy abyss beneath, and to appreciate any of wonderful for the picturesque; but we have no taste for such exceedingly romantic excursions. A bridal-party from one of the hotels, driving to Crawford's or three weeks ago, followed the fashion and went to the White Mountains. The bridegroom, in order to secure a measure of comfortable quarters by securing rooms in advance. But on arriving there the hotel was found to be overflowed, and, instead of the usual accommodation, a small, uncomfortable attic room was given up to the bridal party. Consequent of the party's arriving at they could without rooms. Nothing daunted, the next day they commenced the ascent of Mount Washington. Before the snow-storm met them, they had half-conquered with the cold, they beat a hasty retreat, resolving to seek some more genial climate in which to spend the honey-moon.

Undoubtedly September will be more agreeable to those who will not scorn the mountains than August was. There is usually a sort of compensation in regard to the weather, and those in the country will have complainingly shrugged their shoulders at the chilly breezes of August may calmly hang, under a sunny September sky, their refreshing boards.

It is said that a new sect has been formed among the women of St. Petersburg, and that they have already taken the name of "Nihilists." They are called "Nihilists," and their distinguishing peculiarities are that they repudiate all religious belief, all assurances and responsibilities of men; work at all kinds of manual labor, and transact every sort of mercantile business. The following is a description of the costume of two "Nihilists," who recently rode their appearance at a ball given in St. Petersburg: "The two fair heads were cropped close, and their attire a sort of compromise between the coat and trousers of the male sex, with the more convenient portions of the male costume. A jacket descending low over the hips, and closed over a waistcoat by a row of large buttons; a short, very full petticoat of the same, and beneath, just apparent above the high boots of black, shining leather, full inexpressibles, and gathered in, but reaching just above the knee, and displaying about an inch of the same material, formed their novel and singular attire. Each held in her hand a low, flat hat, with a large brim adorned with a cord and tassel.

A curious marriage ceremony took place in the mulberry-tree. A. M. Brunet affirms that he has succeeded in reducing the textile substances which are found in the bark of the mulberry to the fineness, durability, and general appearance of silk by chemical and mechanical processes, and affirms his faith in the discovery by buying up large quantities of the bark for the purpose of manufacture of silk. If this be true, mulberry-trees will be all the fashion wherever they can be cultivated, and the invention will be a very profitable one.

There is an old story to the effect that a solitary bachelor, having suddenly resolved to commit matrimony, rang the bell, and pronounced to his cook. She, in a state of indecision, hesitated; so he rung the bell again, and proposed to the house-maid, who accepted him on the spot. And—as the story goes—they were happily ever afterward, as a just reward of her prompt decision. The tale is not cited as a precedent for young ladies to take such a dangerously short time in making a decision as is required in the acceptance of a lifetime. But we often see such a ridiculous hesitation in trivial matters that it is a relief to meet a woman who knows how to self-possessed. Many a lady has no confidence in her own taste or skill in dressing herself. "Would you wear my bat silk, or my blue muslin?" "Which looks the best, a linen collar or a lace one?" "Does this ribbon look prettiest in a single or double bow?" And a multitude of similar questions are constantly heard in the dressing-room. Some are perpetually disturbed between having to fixed principles themselves, they try to please those with whom they chance to be, and are like the "waves of the sea, driven of the wind and tossed." We often see gentlemen who are singularly undecided in minor matters—as, say, for example, require an immense time to decide what they will have for dinner—although they may decide in momentous questions with comparative promptness. It is worth a good deal to cultivate a know what questions should be quickly and promptly decided, and what should be carefully considered—and to be able to do it.

Apropos to this subject, is what Sydney Smith says: "I will not be the person to prejudge questions, and adjusting nice chances: it did all very well before the flood, when the race could consult Methuselah upon an intended publication for 150 years, and live to see the success for it when completed; but now that we all present a man waits and doubts, and consults his partner, and his friends, and his grandmother, till one day he finds that he is 65 years of age, and that he has lived to consult, and has consulted to little purpose. A particular froude that he has so more time to follow his advice."

Every body has read or heard of the great meteoric shower of November 13, 1833. On that occasion the whole heavens were more illuminated with fiery fireworks from about two o'clock until daybreak. Professor Olmsted, of Yale College, announces that a similar display of meteors will probably occur on the morning of the 13th or 14th of November next. Such a display undoubtedly produces a deep interest among all classes of persons. Preparations to observe this phenomenon have been already made, and are already commenced in Europe. And all, who in any country are fortunate enough to be witnesses of such an extraordinary affair, may well consider themselves favored.

Tomatoes are considered as among the healthiest of all our vegetables. Every housekeeper who has the opportunity should endeavor to keep up some for winter use. It is a very simple matter to do this. They should not be allowed to get over-ripening, and put them into bat into wide-mouthed jugs or tin cans. The jugs or cans should be entirely filled, and securely covered or closed. Preserved in this manner they keep almost as fresh as when first picked from the vine.

A Southern paper records the trial of a man charged with stealing corn from a neighbor's crib. The evidence went to show that the man had been found with his hat in an aperture in the crib, which appeared to be a stout trap, cut for the purpose of catching the thief as he was due to evidence that two empty corn sacks were found lying at the feet of the entrapped individual. The decision of the magistrate, however, was, that there was no proof that the prisoner put the sacks any corn, and as to being caught in a steel trap, any gentleman had a perfect right to stick his hand in one if he felt inclined to do so.

A humorous writer says:

"We have yet an aperture in the vocabulary in which a word has been turned inside out to find the origin of crochet, little whimsies of the female sex. The word is not a corruption of crochet, which means a hook, and a whimsy was a cross-grained word used by those who threw it out as a back to catch husbands with. Crochet is a little bit of everything, and has been in this, more especially when we remember that crochet silks are made in the form of balls, and crochet needles like skewers. The writer has at this moment hanging on his study-chair a pair of crochet slippers, which were made for him by fair hands several years ago, and thrown by as useless when finished. On the back of the shoe he saw the hook and declined to bite. On the whole, he thinks that crochet is one of the most worthless terms, inasmuch as the hook is to be discovered at the end of it."

It is suggested that instead of the phrase "shaven lawn," which the manuals use to designate the croquet ground, the words "mown lawn" be used, as the latter word so pretty to hear the accents of a silvery voice saying, "Suppose we have a game of croquet upon the upper close?"

An exchange gives the following remarkable statements:

"We have a compositor in this office the friction of whose movements over the type in his stick fixes them with such electricity that he can't drop it. The current this is to have his case submerged in water, and the type will then drop out. A friend of ours who has been subbing so that eggs have frequently been boiled in the pockets of his coat. Pipes from his head boiled in the pockets of his coat. Pipes from his head connected to a boiler in the press-room, and the steam generated by the heat of his brain is sufficient to drive the press. In one day he 'set' so much type that he could sit on his hands, from collected heat, and not feel the proof, and it wasn't his good day for setting type either."

How long ago a party who were sight-seeing in New York went on board a Liverpool packet—their first acquaintance with a ship—and were examining every corner the vessel; and when they entered the luxurious cabin a young lady of the party, delighted with what she saw, exclaimed, "Oh, how I should like to go to Europe in such a ship!" "You can," spoke the captain, in a deep voice, who had overheard the remark unobserved. "You can if you will." "As your wishes, I suppose, Sir," replied the young lady, pertly. "No: as my wife," returned the captain. "As your wife, Sir!" exclaimed she, in undisguised astonishment, "you must be jesting." "No, I am not," replied the captain; "I mean every word of it."

The young woman was flattered and faltered. She stood for a few to be consulted on the unexpected proposition. At the expiration of the time she gave the captain a favorable answer, and in three days she was married.

SOUTHERN LOYALISTS' CONVENTION IN PHILADELPHIA—MASS MEETING OF SOUTHER

ORTHERN DELEGATES IN FRONT OF THE UNION LEAGUE BUILDING.—[See Page 598.]

LIFE AND DEATH.

Lire is not sweet. One day it will be sweet
To shut our eyes and die:
Nor feel the wild-flower's breath, nor birds dart by
With flitting butterfly.

Nor grass grow long above our heads and feet,
Nor hear the happy lark that soars sky high,
Nor sigh that spring is fleet and summer fleet,
Nor mark the waxing wheat,
Nor know who sits in our accustomed seat.

Life is not good. One day it will be good
To die, then live again;
To sleep meanwhile: so not to feel the wane
Of shrunk leaves dropping in the wood,
Nor hear the weary lashing of the main,
Nor marked the blackened bean-fields, nor where stood
Rich ranks of golden grain,
Only the dead stubble cleft by the plain:
Asleep from risk, asleep from pain.

THE TALE OF AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE

In Six Weekly Portions.—Fourth Portion.

CHAPTER VIII.

"I never saw a piece of knitting in such a mess in all my life! What were you thinking of, Madge?"

Aunt Gough uttered this mild pleasantry in the fullness of satisfaction some days after that happy evening on which Horace had told me that he loved me. They all knew it now. Dear uncle had kissed and blessed me, mingling with his tender words some prudent cautions as to the necessity of waiting, and as to our youth and inexperience. But he very kindly, I knew that, and the knowledge made me inexpressibly happy. As for waiting, that was not hard to my mind. Of course we were young. Of course we were inexperienced and without settled prospects in the world. But we loved each other, and our love was approved by those whose love most honored and regarded. Surely that was happiness enough to fill years of waiting, should years be necessary. Horace was not quite so contented. I accept Uncle Gough's words of wisdom. He chafed a little, in his impetuous way, at being told of his youth and inexperience.

"Young!" he said to me, when we were walking alone together. "Does your uncle know that I am turned three-and-twenty?" Horace looked very solemn as he announced his attainment of this venerable age. "If he had said that I'm not good enough, there might have been some reason in it. But if you'll be content to take me only because I love her better than all the world beside—"

"No; because I love you, Horace."

"My own Margaret! If you are content, angel that you are, I don't see who need object."

"But there is, reasonable. Can any thing be more kind and generous than Uncle Gough's behavior? Of course he is right when he says that our youth—"

"There it is. Our youth! The fact is, fifty-five is getting to be thought the right age for love and marriage. I wish I was as old as De Beaugiet. Upon my soul I do!"

"Perhaps, Horace, in that case the objection might come from me, and not from uncle."

"I always say absurd things when I'm angry," said Horace, wiping his eyes after an outbreak of laughter. "I'm very badly done."

I don't know whether every body does, but I know Horace did. And what could be more absurd than the idea of his ever being fifty-five? But then impulsive Horace!

All this brings me back to Aunt Gough and my tangled knitting. One of the servants had found it in the porch and taken it to my aunt, and she, divining the circumstances under which it had got into such a terrible state, resolved to have her small joke at my expense. Horace and I were sitting with her now, having come in from the walk in which we had had the foregoing discussion as to the necessity for patient waiting.

"What have you been doing with your knitting?" I said.

"Knitting!" Horace who is expected to wear a stocking like that!"

"Oh, aunty, it was Horace. He was twisting it about in his fingers."

"And, pray, how came Horace to get hold of your knitting? I hope you don't mean to make stockings in that way, or he will think I have made but a poor housewife of you, after all my pains."

"Pray, enter a chance of testing her sons, Mrs. Gough," cried Horace, eagerly, improving the occasion. "We have been having quite a dispute, Margaret and I, and I am afraid Mr. Cornish will be on her side. To throw in your influence on mine! Do take my view of the case."

Horace went over all his arguments to prove that we were both rather elderly, and to show that in three months at the utmost his prospects would be sufficiently assured to justify him in taking a wife. He was very eloquent in his pleadings. At least I thought so, and so, I suspect, did Aunt Gough. The truth is, Horace could be much more eloquent in speaking to her than he could be in speaking to my uncle. I have said that Aunt Gough was highly sympathetic. And sympathy was to Horace the atmosphere in which he lived and breathed easily. There are strong militant natures to whom strife and the hope of victory are bracing and pleasant, but his was never one of them.

My aunt had been ailing ever since the visit to Meadow Leas. We could not trace any signs of positive disorder, but she got no stronger, had no appetite, and was incapable of active exertion. This was the only cloud in our Heaven. This and Anna.

My sister had been so variable and uncertain in her humor since that evening I have spoken of, when I spoke to her in her bed, as to try aunt sorely. Aunt's own temper was the sweetest and most placid in the world, but her nerves were unstrung, and she was liable to swoon on unusual excitement. Anna was not always angry, not always sullen, not always tearful, not always unaccountably gay and boisterous, but all these moods chased each other across her mind with startling rapidity. She was surprise she was soft and humble in a moment, coming and kneeling by me with her face hidden in my lap.

"Margaret, I love you," she said, in so low a voice that I, with my head bent down to hers, could hardly hear it.

"My dear love, I know you do. But, Anna, because you love me you should be good to Horace." The dark clustering curls on my sister's shook themselves petulantly from side to side. "Yes, Anna. I am sure he is very good to you. He has chosen to be to be your brother. Come! Give him your hand and be friends." With her face still hidden, she suffered me to take her hand and to put it into Horace's outstretched palm; and so there was peace again for a time. But all this, as I have said, was trying to my aunt. She looked pale now less of it than she did; but even he saw enough to distress him.

"I tell you what, my bairn," he said to Anna, "in little change will do you good. I am thinking you're not quite well, Nancy. I shall pack you off to Meadow Leas by the train that will bring Farmer Gibson to feed you entirely on strong ale and rabbit pasty. You're growing as slender as a hazel-twig, my honest woman."

"I'm not a bit ill," returned Anna, decisively. "But I think I should like to go to Meadow Leas."

The plan was accepted at once. I had not already occurred to me that Anna's excessive irritability might be owing to incipient illness; and, indeed, she was looking well enough. So it was decided that she should go to Meadow Leas for a week or two.

I have not yet said any thing as to the manner in which old Mr. Lee received the announcement of my engagement to his son. In truth, it is not a topic on which I can dwell very much, for I have never never exactly tell me what his father's words had been; but I gathered that he had expressed himself unfavorably enough. I must have been the been on the score of my personal demerits, for I knew that an alliance with the family of James Lee, and of the Lady Lee, was a social move the best he could have expected for his son. However, the old gentleman was all cordiality to my self, and was profuse in offers of. And I am afraid I liked those times best. He readily undertook to make the necessary arrangements for Anna's visit to the good people at Meadow Leas. But before she went away we had two pleasant surprises. One was a letter from Mr. Rotherwood to Horace; the other, which concerned Horace, I shall come to presently.

Dear little Madame de Beaugiet wrote most cheerfully, and there was no mistaking the fact that she was a perfectly happy woman. They had not long arrived and were still in the bustle of settling ten, but she had a great deal to say about her new home already, and about her "good-man."

"Do you remember my calling him a little?" she wrote. Her letter was addressed to my aunt. "I do. And nothing ever was more appropriate. Put the strongest possible accent on the first syllable, or on the second syllable, or on both syllables, and you will be perfectly right all ways. He is the best creature in the world. Am I not a fortunate woman?"

Then our old governess sent kind love to Philosophy and Will—the latter of whom many years ago she about Horace—"that most charming and civil of young civil engineers," as she called him. "Tell him that I have his portrait in my drawing-book, and his picture in a book, and prize them above every thing; and that my good-man says he hopes no young lady will be jealous when she knows it."

This set us wondering whether M'sieu' had discovered Horace's secret—our secret—and then they all laughed, and we laughed with them at the happy foolish talk about ourselves. Madame de Beaugiet's pleasant letter having been read and re-read and discussed in full privy council, the great wife then Horace brought forth his news. And this was the second surprise.

"I have had a letter from Mr. Topps, of Birmingham, Sir," he said, addressing my uncle.

"From Mr. Topps, eh? I didn't know you kept up any correspondence with Mr. Topps."

"No, not exactly correspondence; but this is a business letter."

There was a flock of triumph in Horace's eyes as he handed it to my uncle: though he assumed a sober unconcerned manner, as who should say that to a man of his present position business letters from Mr. Topps was an everyday kind of matter.

"Am I to read it?"

"If you please, Sir."

"What is it, Horace?" I asked, eagerly. But he handed me the letter with his own hand, and we all waited silently until my uncle had finished reading the letter.

"Well, my boy, I am very much pleased with this. Indeed I am." My uncle took off his spectacles, and held out his strong right hand to Horace, giving him a hearty grip. "It does you credit, and you may justly be proud of it."

"I am proud of it, Sir," answered Horace, with ingenuous glee. "I think you will now allow me—see—that you should have this opportunity of convincing yourself—that is, I mean, that my prospects—"

"Yes, yes, I know. You are proud and glad that I should be made to understand on such excellent authority what a trust-worthy, responsible, rising gentleman I am to have for a nephew, and what a very slow old coach I must be to think it well for him to wait one single day before taking all the cares of the world on his shoulders. That's it, isn't it, laddie?"

Horace colored, but answered with a smile: "Well, you have put it in your own words, Sir, but I suppose that is it."

"And now, mayn't We know something of this great business?" said my aunt, from among the cushions in her arm-chair.

Then Uncle Gough, with Horace's full consent, told us what were the contents of Mr. Topps's letter. That distinguished engineer retained a kindly remembrance and a high opinion of his former pupil, and was willing to avail himself thing in his way when the occasion presented itself. There were some new waterworks to be erected in a small northern town just on this side of the Scottish Border, and Mr. Topps had been applied to to find some competent person to design and superintend their erection. He himself was much too "eminent and expensive," as Mr. Lee would have said, to be asked to undertake the business. But the chairman of the waterworks company, being acquainted with the great Birmingham engineer, had written to ask his advice. "And my advice is that they should employ you, Lee," wrote Mr. Topps in his letter. "I have every confidence in you, and, if you will undertake it, it may be the best letter things."

Better things! What could be better? So I thought. But to Mr. Topps, from his eminence, probably the business looked small enough.

"What does Rotherwood say to it?" asked my uncle.

"Well, Sir, he sees no objection to my taking it. Clinch, his articled pupil, can do all such work as I have been doing during the last half year."

The only drawback to my happiness was, that Horace would have to go to the north, and remain there some time. But that would not be just yet. Some six months at least must elapse before the arrangements could be so far advanced as to necessitate his presence. And six months seemed quite a long time to look forward to when I was nineteen.

CHAPTER IX.

It was once told, when I was a very little girl—too little to be taught, I should find good and evil, joy and sorrow, succeed each other throughout my life, with the regularity of the checkers on a chess-board. And I found it true in the main—true in the sense in which it was intended to be understood; but I have never found it to be an accurate illustration of the succession of bright and dark in our daily existence. The dark spots have come to me—and, thank God! the bright spots too—when we were not in the right—if I may continue and regularity of succession suggested by the chess-board similie. Absolute blackness has been rare—rarer, perhaps, than absolute whiteness. I have known both. But they were divided from each other by infinite gradations more or less pronounced tints, and not by sharp, well-defined lines, where the black ceased and the white began. In truth, I said, and still say, that blackness and white are not common, either in nature or human nature.

I am led to remember the "chess-board," by the shading of the last few days over us soon after our pride and triumph in Horace's good fortune. Dear Aunt Gough grew very ill. Still without any special illness having been discovered, except that the family doctor chose to define to us; but very weak and very ill. She seldom left her chamber now, and was very, very, very much out of spirits have known this. If he did not, I could not make him know it by any words of protestation. I have said that it was my weakness to be too keenly sensitive to reproof, especially where my affections were concerned. I always saw that other side of things too plainly. What he thought and felt was almost as vividly within my perception as were my own thoughts and feelings; but though I knew he was wrong, I could not plead my cause. It would have been better if we had spoken frankly and fearlessly, setting forth the strength of my love; it would have been better, even, to have grown angry, and flashed at him as my mood might have done. But, no! I was only withdraw into myself and bear my hurt in silence.

We walked to the end of the path without speaking, and when we turned to go back toward the house he suddenly took me in his arms, upsetting the flower-basket and scattering its contents upon the gravel. "No, my darling!" he said. "Don't mind me. I don't believe it."

"Believe what, Horace?"

"That you are any thing but the sweetest, dearest, truest, most unselfish girl in the world."

"I am not that, Horace; but do me justice. At least I am not indifferent."

"No, no, my own love! I am sure you are not. Forgive me."

We kissed each other with wet cheeks, like two children, as we were.

"Look at my poor flowers, you bad boy. There! Put them all in the basket. I would not have old Stock see one blossom lying trampled on the ground, for more than I can tell. I must not keep Dr. Dixon any longer. You will come to aunt's room when she sends for you; and tell us all about Anna? Or course you see her constantly?"

"Yes; I—have seen her. Most you go now?"

I only shook my head in answer, and left me the house. Uncle Gough was in my aunt's room when I reached it, and Dr. Dixon. The doctor was a mild middle-aged man, well known and much respected in Wilborough. He was brother of that Mr. Dixon, the organist, of whom I said in my childhood that he "played so kindly."

"Good-evening, Miss Sedley. The doctor stretched out his right hand, which held a leather driving-glove. I had never seen Dr. Dixon with that glove on in my life, but he always carried it.

"How do you like my aunt, Sir?"

"Mrs. Gough is better, decidedly better. If we can get a little strength, a little tone, we shall do very well."

"I am so glad!"

"Yes; a little tone. Do you know what I have been proposing to your uncle, Miss Sedley?"

"Proposing! Nay, it's all fixed and settled, Iassie," put in my uncle, who was sitting by his wife's chair, gently smoothing her frail hand with his broad heavy one.

"I have been proposing," continued the doctor, "who had a mildly obstinate way of sticking to his own form of words, "that Mrs. Gough should go for some months to the sea-side. To get tone; to little tone, you know."

"I believe it would do her great good, Dr. Dixon."

"Yes, yes; that's the thing, Madge," said my uncle. "She shall go next week to Beachington. I wonder we didn't think of it before."

"It would have been before, my good friend," said Dr. Dixon, "It is early in the season even yet. But I have been proposing something else, Miss Sedley."

"No, no," interrupted my aunt, faintly. "I won't allow it."

"Pardon me, my dear Madam. I have also been proposing, Miss Sedley, that you should accompany her."

Accompany her! Go away from Horace during the short time he had yet to stay in Willborough! I felt ashamed of my selfishness even as I thought this.

"Of course I will go with her, Dr. Dixon, if she will let me."

"It is too hot to ask the dear child," said Aunt Gough. My uncle looked at me wistfully. "I'm left to part with him from her sweet comfort," said he. "But yet I know she'd wish to do whatever she could for her good aunt. She's the best lassie in the world, Rector."

"My kind, darling uncle," said I, "pray, pray, don't speak in that way, as if you were asking any favor of me. I am thankful and rejoiced to be of use."

"Of the very greatest use, Miss Sedley," said Dr. Dixon, taking up his hat. "You are very patient, very gentle, and very pleasant to look at—three inestimable qualities in a nurse." And with those words the doctor betook himself down stairs.

"Bless thee, my bairn," said my uncle.

"Horace will never forgive me," said my aunt, "but he'll have Madge to himself all his life, and perhaps I may not be here to trouble him much longer."

CHAPTER X.

SEA and sky, sky and sea, sea and sky! Deep blue, pale green, lucid under the clouds, dazzling up in the sunshine, sleeping with a slow, long-drawn respiration beneath the moonlight, dashing yeasty foam mast high over slanting sails reddened by the dawn; beautiful, terrible, wonderful always; the great waters lay stretched out before my eyes for many, many weeks. From my chamber window at Beachington I looked forth upon them every night and morning. There was nothing to interrupt my gaze as I strained it to the far horizon. I have stood looking, looking, looking, until all the life within me seemed to concentrate itself in my eyes, and I felt as though I were floating poised like a sea-gull in mid-air, with the fathomless heavens above me, and the fathomless ocean beneath me. Oh, sea and sky! Oh, sky and sea! Oh, the small throbbing human heart within, and the vast heaving waves without! Oh, the old, old story!

My aunt had borne the journey from Willborough—it was not a long one—better than we had thought she would; and for the first fortnight of our stay at Beachington her improvement was most rapid and encouraging. After that she sank again a little; but they told us these fluctuations were to be expected, and we were hopeful. My uncle remained at the Gable House. He had come with us to Beachington, and had seen us settled in our new abode; then he returned to Willborough; and Anna came back from Meadow Leas and kept house for him. I had left behind me a heavy heart—heavier than the mere temporary separation from Horace should have made it; for he had parted from me almost in anger, and I knew that he absolutely thought I ought to have refused to accompany my aunt, but he seemed to think that I ought to have made it very clear where much the going cost me. And how could I do that without wounding my beloved benefactors!

"Horace," I said, "think, pray think, what they have been to us two sisters. It seems to me that love you could not be calm and cold at parting."

I assigned what excuses I could for him, but I came away with a heavy heart. His first letters, after my departure, were cold and constrained. They were so full of love and sympathy, of kindly inquiries for my aunt, and affectionate solicitude for me, that I recognized the generosity of my count, but was apparently gaining strength, so the first days of our stay at Beachington were bright. We had brought a letter from Dr. Dixon to another practitioner at Beachington, one Mr. Betram Norcliffe. This gentleman, besides being skilful in his profession, was an accomplished man, and soon renewed for his acquaintance with Greek and Latin and the modern tongues. When Dr. Dixon told us about him before we left home, I thought he should be frightened to speak to so awful a personage. But we found ourselves quite able to speak to him, and we soon came to like him very much. He was not young—nearly as old as Dr. Dixon, I dare say; but he was unmarried, and lived alone in a beautiful house some three miles from the fashionable Beachington. He took an interest in my aunt's case, and, as he said it was essential that she should be kept cheerful and amused, he would come and sit with us, evening after evening, talking so unaffectedly and pleasantly that we entirely forgot all about his learning.

Of course we mention Mr. Norcliffe frequently in our letters home. Uncle Gough, while there, she was able to write; and she generally added a few lines with her own hand to my weekly report to my uncle. I had left Anna in a happy heart—as so frequent an apparition at every body's door as he is now. A letter was a serious matter, either to send or receive. And Mr. Norcliffe, who knew Willborough there was an awkward cross-country post, so that I seldom dispatched a packet to the Gable House oftener than twice a week. Horace's movements were very uncertain, as he flitted about between Willborough and Meadow Leas and the Hall. He even made a flying visit to the north, to consult with the chairman of the water-works company, and to reconnoitre his ground; and he accomplished the double journey there and back again, and transacted his business, all within the space of five days. We thought this a very wonderful achievement. (I forget how much time was requisite to do it in now.) As Horace seemed to have no settled abode, I generally sent my letters to him under cover to Uncle Gough or to Anna at the Gable House, and I frequently received his, through their hands, in the same way.

Gradually, by slow degrees degrees it was as impossible for me to trace as the shifting hues of sunset on the western waves, which began with rosy hues, and left the sky at last colorless—I found a change in my lover's letters. It seemed as if some spell were cast over him—as if a shadow had interposed itself between him and me—and at length one dreary fortnight passed and he did not write at all. But I fought against the fear that lay coiled up cold at the bottom of my heart, and I endeavored to be cheerful. How good my aunt was! How patient, how unselfish! I have never seen recorded the story of a purer, sweeter life than Lucy Gough's. You, my goldchild, are named after her. Hers was that large benevolence, clearly strongly to its own, yet could embrace all suffering souls in a divine rapture of charity. As you go through life you will meet devoted wives who grudge hard-earned fame and fortune to their husbands' peers: admiring sisters who delight to jeer at their brothers' rivals in the race of life; doting mothers who, wrapping their own little ones warmly in the soft shelter of maternal love, will yet bring themselves to turn a cold stern front on the forlorn defenseless infancy that peeps in, shivering, from the hard outer world, at the bright flame burning on the hearth of home. But of these was my aunt. Perhaps my own trouble taught me to understand and value her better than I had ever done before. Sorrow comes to teach such lessons. The worst was, I could not quite keep it to myself, "Has Horace written this week? What does he say?" She would question me thus, and I could not always keep back tears, though I tried hard. Though I tried very hard.

He was now drawing near the time at which I understood Horace was to take his departure for the north—within a day or two, as I remember. I was feverishly hoping for a letter. A packet had come from the Gable House one morning, directed in Anna's hand, and containing a long letter from my uncle, and a short note from Anna for my aunt. But nothing from Horace; not one word. There was an unsupportable weight upon me by indolence as a letter-writer made by my uncle. "Madge is a good correspondent to me, my love," he said, writing to my aunt, "but urge her not to let us old folks engross all her pretty letters. I think Horace feels hurt." What did this mean? I could not understand it.

The day had been oppressively hot, and the noonless night came down from a brooding sultry sky. We sat with open windows, listening to the plash, plash, of the waves upon the shingle, and catching now and again, through the gathering darkness, the distant flash of some white-crested wave leaping high above its fellows. Mr. Norcliffe was with us, and we had all been sitting silent for some minutes.

"How the sea booms to-night!" I said. "It is not a lullaby, threatening voice?"

"Yes," he answered, "I know the sound well. We shall have a storm."

While he was yet speaking, rapid wheels and hoofs grated on the road beneath the windows, and a post-chaise stopped before the door.

I held—I was now telling the postillion to stop. "Why, it is uncle."

I started up breathless.

"James!" cried my aunt, with a scared look, "what can have brought him here?"

"Oh, I know, I know!" I exclaimed. "Horace must be with him—he has come to say good-by, he has come to see me before he goes!"

I was rushing to the room door, when it opened, and my uncle stood before me, alone. I know not what wild thoughts whirled through my brain. I turned pale, I saw his pale, rigid face, and my heart stood still.

"Horace!" I gasped out. "He is dead!"

"My baim!" he said, "my lassie!"

"He is dead, and you have kept me from him!" My own voice sounded hoarse and strange in my own ears.

"Margaret! My beloved child! Be strong, be brave!"

"Tell me the truth. He is mine. I have a right to know. Is he dead?"

I clutched my uncle's arm. At the touch of my hand his locked mouth broke from its fixed lines with the terrible convulsion that comes upon a strong man when he weeps.

"No, Margaret, he is not dead. But he is gone—fled—fled away with Anna—and he is a damned black villain!"

The boom of the sea grew into a great roar, thick darkness came over me, and I fell down senseless.

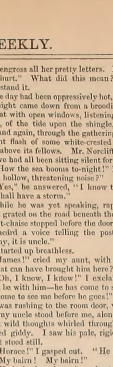
HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE HEIGHT OF INDELICACY.—We know a girl so indelicate that when she has nothing else to do she knits her brows.

LOUIS XIV., playing at backgammon, had a doubtful throw. A dispute arose, and the surrounding courtiers all sustained the throw. The Comte de Grammont, happening to come in at that instant, "Decide the matter," said the King. "Sire," said the Count, "your Majesty is in the wrong." "How can you thus decide," asked the King, "without knowing the question?" "Because," said the Count, "had the matter been doubtful, all these gentlemen present would have given it for your Majesty."

HORACE WALPOLE records in his "Walpoliana" an Irish bull, which he pronounces to be the best he ever met with. "I hate that woman," said a gentleman, looking at a person who had been his nurse—"I hate her, for when I was a child she changed me at nurse." This was indeed a perplexing assertion: but we have a similar instance recorded in the autobiography of an Irishman, who gravely informs us that he "ran away early in life from his father on discovering he was only his uncle!"

A VERY PROPER HEARER.—"So it seems," as the young lady observed to the sewing-machine when she put the work before it.



When is old cheese like the American dollar?—When it is all-satiny.

HINT TO HOUSEMAIDS.—How to destroy flies.—Encourage spiders.

"IF all the world were blind, what a melancholy sight it would be!" said an Irish clergyman.

A Missouri farmer being asked if raising hemp was a good business, answered, "I can't certin say; but it is surely better than being raised by it."

THE MONEY MARKET.—We understand that a great deal of capital is still "locked up." This might be expected, considering how frequently money has been "tight" of late.

THE NICEST KIND OF "CROQUET."

The evening was bright with the moon of May,
And the lawn was light as though lit by day—
From the windows I looked—to see Croquet.

Of mallets and balls the usual display:
The hoops all stood in arch array,
And I said to myself, "Soon we'll see Croquet."

But the mallets and balls unheeded lay,
And the maid and the youth I side by side sat they,
And I thought to myself, "Is that Croquet?"

I saw the exam—it was light as day—
Put his arm round her waist in a loving way,
And he squeezed her hand. Was that Croquet?

While the red rover rolled forgotten away,
He whispered all that a lover should say,
And he kissed her lips—that a queer Croquet!

Silent they sat beath the moon of May—
But I knew by her blushes she said not nay,
And I thought in my heart, "Now that's Croquet."

LOVERS' LOGIC.

EDWIN. "You see, dearest, a fellow can't exist without his heart, and, as you happen to have mine, of course I can't exist without you."

ANGELINA. "Oh you absurd creature!"

Why were the Greeks like the Scotch people who refused to allow a young lady to look out of window on a Sunday?—Because they'd no Jet her see.

An Irish editor in speaking of the miseries of Ireland says: "Her cup of misery has been for ages overflowing, and now it is running over."

One of the richest specimens of a real Irish bull which has ever fallen under our notice, was perpetrated by the modest and witty, but blunderer Irish knight, Sir Richard Steel, when inviting a certain English nobleman to visit him. "If, Sir," said he, "you ever come within a mile of my house I hope you will stop there!"

How does the hairdresser end his days?—He curls up and dyes.

An apprentice sailor-boy fell from the "round top" to the deck, severely, but little hurt. The captain exclaimed in surprise: "Why, where did you come from?" "From the main mast, you Honor!" was the prompt reply, as the poor fellow gathered himself up.

MRS. JENKINS complained in the evening that the turkey she had eaten at Thanksgiving did not set well. "Indeed, Madam," said Mrs. Potts, "I was not a hen-turkey."

An Irishman, having challenged a gentleman to fight a duel, who somehow found to attend the appointment, accidentally fell upon the ground in falling party, and thus addressed him: "Well, Sir, I met you this morning, but you did not meet, however, I am determined to meet you to-morrow morning whether you like or not."

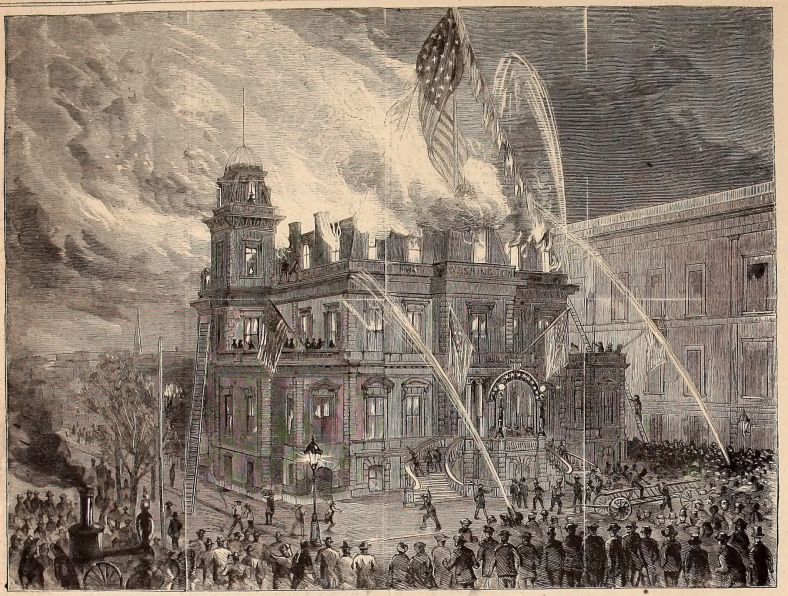
THE SOAKER'S PARADISE.—Dropmore.

"AS I was going over the bridge the other day," said a native of Erin, "I met Pat Hewins. 'Hewins,' says I, 'how are you?' 'Pretty well, thank you, Donnelly,' says he, 'Donnelly!' says I; 'that's not my name.' 'Faith, then, no more is mine either,' says he, with that we looked at each other agin, an' sure enough it was aayther of us."

Be tempered in diet. Our first parents ate themselves out of house and home.

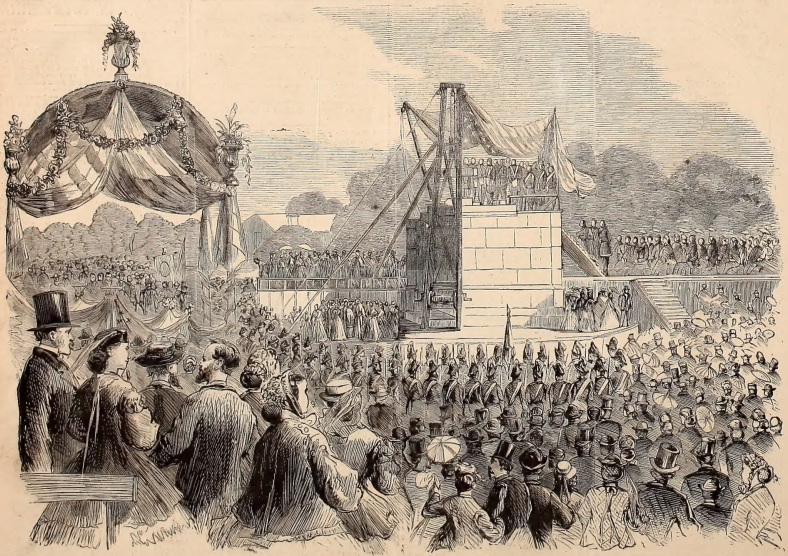
It was in Dublin city that a good-humored maid-of-all-work, Molly, once related to her young mistress a most marvelous dream she had had one night. "Dear me, Poor, sooh!" cries the latter, at its conclusion; "you don't believe such nonsense, Molly, when you answer such nonsense." "Indeed I was not, then," replies the indignant Molly; "I was just as wide awake as I am this minute."

"WILL you run away with me to-morrow night, Kate, dear?" said Phil to his charming rustic belle, who had just arrived at the years of discretion. "Ah, no, my dear Phil," replied the young lady, with great sense of prudence and decorum; "I could do no such an action as that; but I'll tell you what I will do—I'll run away without you, and then you can run after me, and so we will have the fun of the thing, and none evenin'."



Among mere blunders we believe we have met with no richer specimen than this one, perpetrated by a bull-pup of a Cork. "Oh yis! oh yis! Last summer when between twelve o'clock and M'Kinney's store in Market Street a horse broke loy." "Broke loy, you tellin' yees what it is, but it's the key of the bank, sure."

A friend once visiting an unworldly philosopher, whose mind was his kingdom, expressed surprise at the smallness of his apartment. "Why, you have not room to swing a cat!" "My friend," was the serene, unapprehensive reply, "I do not want to swing a cat."



MERRY loves company, and so has a marriageable young lady.

A SHOCK.

SCIENTIFIC PARTY (with whom our friend Jones has been having an interesting conversation). "And speaking of Torpedoes, I have a Little Thing of my own Invention here, which I think you will Like. No Light required; the slightest Touch and you're Blown to Atoms!"

BURNING OF THE UNION LEAGUE BUILDING IN PHILADELPHIA—RESCUE OF THE FLAG BY FIREMEN.—[SEE PAGE 598.]

LAYING THE CORNER-STONE OF THE DOUGLAS MONUMENT AT CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 6, 1866.—SKETCHED BY T. WILLIAMS.—[SEE PAGE 606.]

GRAND BILLIARD TOURNAMENT IN NEW YORK CITY.—[See Page 606.]

DEDICATION OF THE DOUGLAS MONUMENT.

THE Monument to Senator DOUGLAS, of which we gave an illustration last week, was dedicated on the 6th of September. Twenty-five thousand people participated in the ceremonies, which were interesting and imposing.

The procession started for the grounds where the Monument had been erected at ten o'clock A.M., and was two hours in reaching its destination. The Masonic Fraternity took the lead, followed by Major RICE and the orator of the day, Major-General JOHN A. DIX. Then, entering the grounds on foot, came President JOHNSON and Secretary SEWARD, arm in arm, followed by General GRANT and Admiral FARRAGUT. Then followed Postmaster-General RANDALL, Governor WILLARD, General COOPER, ROSEBEAU, MEADE, STEEDMAN, and others, distinguished guests, military and civilian.

LAYING THE CORNER-STONE.

After prayer by the Grand Chaplain of the Masonic Order the Right Worshipful Grand Treasurer of the Order, M. M. NOSE, proceeded to deposit in the cavity of the stone soft for this purpose the customary articles, documents, and other mementoes a copy of Harper's Weekly containing an illustration of the Monument.

At this stage of the proceedings a salute was fired from the guns of the United States revenue cutter Andy Johnson, which was lying at anchor in the lake, a short distance from the grounds. After the memorials had been placed in their proper place one of the bands played a solemn dirge, and while the strains of sacred music were floating on the air the corner-stone was lowered into its future resting-place.

The Dedicatory Address was then delivered by Major-General JOHN A. DIX, and was followed by brief remarks from the President and Secretary SEWARD.

THE BILLIARD TOURNAMENT.

THE Tournament of the State and Provincial Billiard Association opened on the evening of the 3d instant, at the Hippotheatron in this city, in the presence of a select audience, of which a respectable proportion were ladies.

The opening game was between EDWARD S. PEASLEE, champion of Pennsylvania, and J. B. CUTLER Jr., champion of Canada, and looked to the player who holds the champion cue of America. This game, as all others of the tournament proper, consisted of 500 points, canons, and winning by DIOX, who made 502 points against 359, and who made 93 points in a single run. The game lasted three hours. A short but fine game of 100 points was played the same evening between MICHAEL PHELAN and JAMES PALMER, President of the Young Men's Billiard Congress, PALMER winning by one point; also a game of 250 points between FRANCIS THOMAS, of Cincinnati, and JOHN M'DEVITT, the former winning by 175 points.

At the afternoon session on the 4th, the playing was even superior to that on the opening night. Especially brilliant were the games between MICHAEL PHELAN and JOHN M'DEVITT, and PHILIP THOMAS and MR. H. ISLAM WARE, the latter one of the most expert amateur players in the States.

The trial of skill between champions T. MCARTHUR and D. DANIELS, the former of Fort Wayne, Indiana, and the latter of Boston, Massachusetts, was first on the programme. It proved a very exciting contest. The players exercising their judgment quite as effectively as their hands, in their attempts to place the balls as unfavorably as possible for each other's game, which fluctuated considerably, one player being now ahead, and in the next moment the other, lasted 1 hour and 43 minutes, and the score of the winner was recorded 9 points to a run. DANIELS won by 500 points against 434; he made the highest run, of 80 points.

In the game between TUTHILL and WICKS which followed, TUTHILL made the handsome run, unusually large for a full-sized four-pocket table, of 379, and scored 1,000 in a string of 2 50 points, winning by 189. The game between M'DEVITT and PHELAN was a fitting finale to the afternoon's entertainment, M'DEVITT making as his best a run of 181, and as average of 28½, and beating his opponent 202 points.

In the evening the great attraction was the game between JOHN FRAWLEY, champion of Ohio, and THOMAS FOLEY, champion of Illinois. Up to the last hundred these players ran along at equal pace, the calls of the marker seldom announcing a difference of more than eight or ten points in their score. When the relative positions were: FRAWLEY 372, FOLEY 360, the latter made his largest count, 65. This gave him an advantage that he never lost, and in his 58th inning he was declared victor.

The games on the afternoon of the 6th were a delightful improvement on those previously played, except that by MR. DION and MR. PLUNKETT the first night. The first game was between MR. HARRISON, champion of Massachusetts, and MR. HERBERT, champion of Connecticut. This was a close, spirited, and well-contested game, MR. HERBERT winning by eight points only. At the close the score stood: HERBERT, 500, HARRISON 492. The second game in the afternoon was between MR. DION, of Canada, and MR. DANIELS, of Massachusetts. Neither of the players displayed particular skill, the "misses" being frequent throughout the game. It was, nevertheless, easily won by MR. DION, the score standing at the close: DION 500, DANIELS 310. In the evening one "champion's" game of five hundred points was played between MR. FRAWLEY and MR. PLUNKETT. At the start MR. FRAWLEY exhibited the same carelessness noticed the evening previous, but at the ninth round he nursed his balls carefully, and made a run of 102, following it the sixth round after with a run of 82. He was, however, beaten by MR. PLUNKETT, who played steadily and excellently throughout the game, making runs of 52, 40, 50, 64, 50, and 50 points. At the close the score stood: FRAWLEY 415, PLUNKETT 500. The average of the winner was 16⅔, and of the loser 13⅓.

On the afternoon of the 6th, CYRILLE DION, champion of Canada, defeated T. M'CARTHY, champion of Indiana, and THOMAS FOLEY, champion of Illinois, was beaten by A. H. HARRISON, champion of Missouri. In the evening the opening game—the ninth of the tournament proper—was between T. M'CARTHY, champion of Indiana, and THOMAS FOLEY, champion of Illinois. The latter was defeated.

On the 7th, a rather weak game was played between G. B. HERBERT, champion of CONNECTICUT, the latter winning. The closing contest of the afternoon was between JOHN FRAWLEY and A. H. HARRISON, which lasted over two hours, the run of 140 points. In the evening E. DANIELS won a game against G. B. HERBERT.

Up to Saturday evening (the 8th instant) fifteen games had been played, MR. DION having won four, the largest number. Throughout the course of the Tournament we marred at this point by charges of collusion which have been made against MESSRS. FRAWLEY and HARRISON. On the 10th these charges were investigated, and it was decided that game No. 11, played on the 7th, should be considered null and void.

The Tournament was a splendid affair throughout, and is illustrated on page 605. Our illustrations include likenesses of the players, gold watch, billiard table, cues, etc., which are to be distributed as prizes to the most successful champions.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XVIII.

IN the very crisis of the work Sam went away; just, as Lily said, when every thing wanted him. There were more seeds to sow, and there were young plants to weed out. Both were very needful, and must not be put out. For even in those little flowerpots in the boxes weeds grew, fast and thick, and must be constantly pulled up. This was easy enough when the flower plants were there too, and the children soon learned to know many of the pretty young plants of Canada, and how their seeds sprang first, before the flowers, there was great need of care. And there was nobody to consult with now, as to what was and what was not in the window-seat! As, whether it was yet too cold to plant out the little seedlings which were already well started in the box. Mrs. May told them she had always heard that most young plants should not be transplanted until they had leaves enough of their leaves, she seemed as if these never would come, and, besides, who could tell whether this precious selection of the first leaves would not be one of "most young plants?" So the discussions were endless.

Then Mr. May, looking over the boxes one morning, affirmed that they had too much heat, and that Lily's fine box and other things were running up as tall and thin as she was herself, instead of being stout, thrifty plants.

"But what shall we do with 'em, papa?" said Lily.

"Take them out of the boxes and set them on a table, / should," said Mr. May. "They want air, my chings."

Now it was not endurable to have such plants called "your things;" so at once the pots were taken out, and the boxes carried down. Sam's mind was not at all at rest on the subject. Primrose had been quite uneasy about her ipomœas, which after their first entrance into the world above ground had made little progress; and she had (quite privately) given that particular flower-pot more than one decided watering or soaking; and still the plants did not come.

But the work out of doors began to be the most interesting part of the whole story; almost it is so entirely after her own fashion that the gardens were, as Mr. May had said, a study. Clover, as usual, was perfectly happy. Wherever she could dig holes anywhere all she touched fell into order, as if under the wand of the old fairy herself. She had found a spade and basket in the barn, and a hoe long, without a cover and with a handle; and this basket being the desire of nobody else, Clover straightway set about making it hers. She dusted it, and washed it, and rubbed it up; tying some of her own odds and ends of ribbon at the handle. Both on cover up some breaks and damages, and to take off the look of a common basket, which it undeniably had, Clover tied a bunch of scarlet seeds at one end, and her little trowel in the other. Clover went to her garden in full contempt of heart, and vowed and declared that no weeding of her people ever attempted before. True, Sam had told her that it was best to sow the seeds rather thicker than the plants were to grow, and gently rake and pat, and some young plants might die—they could be thinned out afterward to the proper distance. But still Clover believed in her heart that it was best to sow with the utmost regularity, putting seeds at precisely six inches from each other, if the plants were to stand precisely one foot, and apply how old had peeped into her basket would have seen several small neat measuring sticks, of different lengths. Of course no very small seeds could be planted in this way, and such gave Clover an amount of thought and consideration that was quite equaled by her enjoyment. In the basket, too, lay a neat list of all the kinds she had, each one marked "two feet," or "six inches apart," or "one foot," and with the sundry calculable sign, that the flower would be blue, white, or yellow. Some were in the pots at the house, some here in the basket; and the arranging of colors, and the placing of tall plants in the centre, and of vines by the fence; of single plants here, and of masses there, gave Clover's patient imagination more work than I can tell you.

Nothing of this sort went on in Lily's sphere. Lily stuffed her pocket with seed-bags, caught up her trowel in one hand and bonnet in the other, rushed down to her garden as if the whole springwork rested on her little shoulders, and then moved and labeled with infinite zeal indeed, but without a particle of consideration. She would finish off a whole garden in less time than Clover in a whole morning's work; and her seeds had all been planted some days before Clover intrusted the last of her treasures to the brown earth, "in hope of a glorious resurrection."

Little Primrose, on her part, managed her garden as she did every thing else, in a sort of a rosy dream—it was all poetry to Primrose, though she did not know it. No common questions about color and height troubled her head. She had studied the Catalogue descriptions until each flower was personified to her thoughts; and the point was not at all whether Aurora and Southern would contrast well if planted near together but, each must be placed for its own sake: the emotions must show their wonderful flowers here, close by the green grass border, and a little withdrawn from public observation; and the pansies must stand here, where nobody could see them from the bowwindow. So Pinn planted and mused, and mused and planted, and had a garden life that was about half dream and half sunlight.

Great was the joy when Sam came home, bringing with him the promised boxes—white, a-white, a-brim, and a blush. Each was leading a rather weary existence in a flower-pot just then, and looked faintly flattered contented at the change. Sam said they were good, strong plants, and would grow well as soon as they had a chance.

"I shall put mine in the very middle of my garden—the beauty!" said Lily.

"I shall put mine close to the walk, so that I can smell the roses," said Primrose.

Clover said nothing, but she thought of a place between her sweet alyssum and mignonette—the very place of places for a rose:—and her cheeks glowed with pleasure.

"Now we can use our spades," said Lily, "to dig the holes."

Sam and nothing to dispute that; but when they all went out next morning, carrying the roses, he took his spade, and his hand-barrow, and when Lily had dug a hole about the size of the flower-pot that held her rose Sam fell to work, nor ever stopped till he had made the hole at least a foot deep and more than that across.

"If you think I'm going to plant my rose down there," said Lily, "you've just mistaken. I know better."

"It's worse than my sweet-peas," said Primrose.

Sam laughed. "Have a little more patience: and then be threw in a quantity of black stuff from his wheel-barrow, filling the hole half full. Upon this again he threw a quantity of earth that lay round the edge of the hole, and then mixed the whole well together, digging it up again and again.

"Now you may plant your rose," he said to Lily.

"Sam, what was all that for?" said Clover.

"For roses and sweet-peas—they want a very rich soil, well prepared. Lily, don't pull your rose out of the pot—you'll break off all the roots."

There seemed some danger of that, indeed, for Lily had taken her rose by the stem and was trying to shake the pot off.

"How am I to get it out, then?" she said, setting down the obstinate flower. "It sticks."

"Sticks!" said Sam; "of course it does; the earth is full of little roots, all matted and twined together. Here, Lily, take this old knife and dig round the edge—so—as close to the pot as possible. Now lay your hand close on the top of the pot, with the rose stem between your fingers—. Hold it tight, and with your other hand gently turn the pot upside down. Now you have the rose with its earth all round it in your left hand, and the pot is loose and can be taken away."

"Why, how nice!" said Lily. "But the ball of earth looks all loose to me—it crumbles all to pieces."

"That is because you shook it so unceremoniously in the first place. Never mind—you'll know better next time. But don't let it crumble any more—put it in the hole, and gently down in the middle of your hole, and hold the stem up quite straight. No, not so deep: throw in a little more earth, that will do—now press the stem gently to the root—the crown it is called—must be just at the surface of the earth. Now cover the roots closely, and press the earth well smooth, and then you will want to take your rake and rake out our footsteps, and put things in neat order again."

"I should think so!" said Lily. "What a muss!"

"What have you been planting here?" said Sam, looking down into the hole and picking out some tiny green things that stood hanging their heads sadly.

"Oh, flax, and things," said Lily. "Those are pinks."

"But what makes them droop so?—Did you treat them as you did your rose?"

"I pulled them out, of course," said Lily. "There was nothing else I could do. They had to be separated."

"But pulling them up breaks off the little precious roots. How did you do with yours, Clover?"

"I tried a tea-spoon first," said Clover, blushing, "and that left the plant was too large, and I got a little, little flat stick, and stuck that down into the pot like a spade."

"Very good," said Sam. "Lily, did you water your plants?"

"Oh yes, the minute I'd set 'em out," said Lily. "And shaded them?"

"No, I didn't know any thing about that," said Lily, "but I did. I held a good shaking at the time, and then every morning since."

"Ah!" said Sam, "they look like it. Flowers, like some other people, often need less defense from their enemies than their friends. Now take a lesson for next time. Take up each little plant very carefully—Clover has told you how—with as much earth as possible about its roots. Then dig a hole, a little larger than the plant, and set it in, spreading out the roots, or arranging them as naturally as possible; hold up the plant quite straight, and throw the earth in very gently, and press it lightly down. Then water it gently and thoroughly, and if it is a sunny day shade it with an old flower-pot, or a bit of shingle, or even a hood of paper held in a split stick. Shade it for several days, and then uncover it by night, that the plant may have dew and fresh air. Set out your plants, if you can, just before a rain; if you have need further watering, give it to them always just at evening, after the sun is off."

"Well!" said Lily, "I suppose Clover will put all that in her head, but it's by no means certain that I shall in mine. Now let's go and plant the other roses."

"Sam," said Clover as they walked off, "I what made you cut off that piece of Lily's rose-root?"

"It was broken," said Sam, "and a broken root does only harm. Any broken or bruised root should be cut smoothly off before planting."

"Of approved usefulness; all that they profess to be."—Shakspeare's Character for the Fair, and his other Toilet Preparations.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

MOTH AND FRECKLES.—Ladies afflicted with discolorations on the face, called moth-patches or freckles, should use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Its infallible. Prepared and sold by DR. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, No. 49 Bond Street, New York. Sold by all druggists.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A Splendid Present.

Harper's Illuminated and Pictorial BIBLE

Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely engraved by ADAMS, and Designs by CHAPMAN, exclusively A Series of Rich Illuminations in Colors, comprising Frontispiece, Title-pages, Maps, Tables, Initials, Borders, etc. The whole forming a sumptuous Folio Volume.

FACTS.—Morocco, gilt edges, beveled and paneled sides $75 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $80 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. WILLIAMS & CO., Boston: SMITH, ENGLISH & CO., Philadelphia: CRISWELL & HARRIS, Baltimore; FRANCK TAYLOR, Washington, J. B. CONN & CO., Cincinnati; LEAVITT, CLARK & CO., Chicago; GEORGE WOODS, St. Louis; S. C. GRIGGS & CO., Chicago; A. ROMAN & CO. and H. H. BANCROFT & CO., San Francisco; DAWSON & BROTHERS, Montreal.

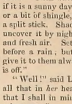
DISTINGUISHED CHARACTERS.—Bismarck, Archduke Albert, Queen Emma, Joseph Sturge, Horace Vernet, F. N. Gisborne, Cyrus W. Field; a Group of Native African; Anthropology, Physiology, Psychology, Pneumatology, and Physiognomy; Beaming Eyes, Impressible Lines, Passive Portrait Influences; Whom to Wed; Debating Societies; Phrenology, by John Neal; "Out of Place," by Mrs. Wilkins; "Quack Medicines," Pugilism and Flogging, Foreign Notes, &c., in June. No. 20 PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 20 cents, or $2 a Year. FOWLER & WELLS, New York.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, CARD CASES, KNIVES, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get the most liberal inducements ever offered to canvassers. Terms to Agents, which we want in every town and county. J. D. BUTLER & CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y.



$1500 PER YEAR paid by SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine, or Chicago, Ill.

$150 A MONTH! NEW DESIGNS FOR AGENTS. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

MERWIN & BRAY,

262 BROADWAY,

MANUFACTURERS OF THE CELEBRATED BALLARD BREECH-LOADING RIFLES, MILITARY AND SPORTING RIFLES.

These Rifles and Carbines are a ball vurying from one ball per shot to 120 to the pound. Mathematical and workmanship of the best quality. They are warranted in every respect. SOLE AGENTS for the well-known Eagle Arms Co.'s Cartridge Revolvers. Bolt and Pocket Rifle. These Pistols contain but four motions to load and discharge, a degree of perfection never before attained. They are also making a some what larger ball than any other revolver of the same weight and size before in use for the Whitney and Eagle Arms Co.'s model Revolvers, and the New York Metallic Ammunition Co.'s Copper Cartridges, and Ball and Primers.

Dealers in Arms and Ammunition of all kinds. Illustrated Circulars furnished when desired.

262 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.—Agents are now wanted to solicit orders in each town in the United States for THE ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE BIBLE, by JOHN KITTO, D.D., F.S.A., Edited by AYTON BOND, D.D., of Edinburgh. Liberal terms.

This is the best selling book now published. Agents make from $100 to $200 per month, and we never know a book to sell so well. For further information apply immediately to the publisher,

HENRY BILL, Norwich, Conn.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent Free. Manufactory of Type, Cuts, Etc. Old Type taken in exchange. 26 ANN STREET, New York, and 25 LINCOLN STREET, Boston.

THE EXTRA TRIBUNE

FOR THE

POLITICAL CAMPAIGN.

A political struggle, rarely surpassed in importance or interest, has been precipitated on the country by the treachery of Andrew Johnson and some of his official or political associates. The great and patriotic party by which they were intrusted with power.

The object of the party in power is to put the steadfast Loyalists of the South under the feet of the "whipped but not subdued" Rebels, and to enable the latter to glut their vengeance on the former, whom they hate and curse as the authors of the most unexpected overthrow of their rebellious "Confederacy."

The recent bloody massacres at Memphis and New Orleans were but conspicuous manifestations of the spirit that now animates the South, wherever the Rebel element exists in Kentucky, in a more recent example. The soldiers of Tennessee, Missouri, Kentucky, and Illinois are now the dominant power from the Potomac to the Rio Grande; the sole object of their efforts is preference over the disarmed Rebels; they have supplanted nearly all officers as policemen of Southern cities; they are organized and armed as State militia; and they ruthlessly crush every manifestation of loyal White or loyal Black sentiment. The action of the EQUAL RIGHTS OF AMERICAN FREEMEN. The school-houses of the Blacks are burned, and their white teachers subjected to violence and outrage by mobs; and every one who believes the work of reconstruction by cheers for Andy Johnson and executions of negroes.

The purpose of forcing Representatives of the Rebel States into Congress, in defiance of the loyal calls, the Presidential fiat and Military power, in openly avowed, with threats of violence and bloodshed, it shall be true to its pledges, and a civil war thus kindled throughout the North and West.

It has thus become imperative that those who stand for LIBERTY and LOYALTY—the Right of the UNION to exist and of MAN to be FREE—should organize and work together on the basis of CONGRESS for the impending contest before us.

We must convince the SOUTH and the COPPERHEADS that resolutions go not backward—that Emancipation is an irrepealable fact—that the glorious LIVIL RIGHTS ACT can never be repealed—that the rights of the humblest AMERICAN are henceforth guaranteed and shielded by the FEDERAL CONSTITUTION, and must be maintained against all gainsayers—that the days wherein Rebels could trample on rights which WILL'D to be bound to respect have passed away forever.

We must, in short, restore to all the Free States of 1860, in West Virginia, and in Missouri beside. We must hold those States, Kentucky, Louisiana, and add to them Maryland and Delaware—the former lost to us through treachery, the latter disloyal. We must submit to the foretish Congress an overwhelming majority devoted to Loyalty, Liberty, and the Indissoluble Rights of Man.

To this end let Light and Truth be systematically diffused to the remotest hamlet, every Rivulet, Brook, and Creek our broad country.

To this end we propose an extra issue of THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE (identical in size and contents with the regular edition), which will supply to all Subscriptions in arrears) prior to September 12, on the following terms, the paper to be sent and subscriptions to commence on receipt of the money:

3 copies for three months		$1
12	" "	5
26	" "	10
60	" "	20
100	" "	30

PAYABLE ALWAYS IN ADVANCE.

The papers to be sent to one address.

All friends of the cause are invited to form clubs.

Address THE TRIBUNE, No. 154 Nassau Street, New York.

TO ADVERTISERS.

Merchants, Manufacturers, Inventors, Real Estate Owners, Schools, and all others who desire to reach customers in all parts of the country, as well as in the city, will find it to their advantage to advertise in the New York TRIBUNE.

The circulation of THE TRIBUNE is larger than that of any other newspaper, and it is read by the most enterprising, intelligent, and well-to-do classes. Advertisements inserted in each of the editions of THE TRIBUNE—Daily, Semi-Weekly, and Weekly—cannot be read by nearly a million of people, and no investment pays a business man so well as that of money he spends in judicious advertising. The investigation by the Mayor and Comptroller of the City revealed the naming of the DAILY TRIBUNE as being one of the two papers having the largest daily circulation, and its superiority is acknowledged to be far greater than that of any other newspaper. The DAILY TRIBUNE is read by enterprising and intelligent business men and their families, and those who make known their wants through its columns will reach the very best class of buyers.

Rates of Advertising in THE NEW YORK DAILY TRIBUNE: Ordinary Advertisements, classified under appropriate heads, Fifty Cents per line each insertion (about eight words average a line.) THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE: One Dollar per line each insertion. SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE: Twenty-five Cents per line each insertion.

All business men seek investments that will pay. The Political Campaign, now fairly inaugurated, is increasing the circulation of THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE immensely, making it more than usually desirable as an advertising medium. Prices $1 per line. No advertisements taken for less than $5 00.

Address THE TRIBUNE, No. 154 Nassau Street, New York.

Real Estate Dealers both in City and Country will find THE TRIBUNE a very valuable medium through which to reach parties wishing to buy or sell.

Brandreth's Pills.

These Pills are safe and sure. They are prepared by a process which secures all the best qualities of the herbs of which they are composed, without any of their bad. They benefit in all cases, and do harm in none.

See B. Brandreth is in white letters on the Government stamp.

Washes Well! Wears Well!

TRADE MARK

The Genuine Magic Ruffle!

These goods, having the above trade-mark on the Box and Card, are warranted to measure six full yards in each piece, and to Wash and Wear as well as any made by hand.

THE GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES, still manufactured by the original inventors and patentees, on superior machinery, from the best materials, and under careful supervision, have withstood the tests of six years' constant use, giving invariable satisfaction.

Manufactured by THE MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY, No. 29 Chambers Street, New York. Also Manufacturers of RUFFLE PLUTING IRONS. HOME-MADE RUFFLES.

$5 SEWING $5 MACHINE.

FIRST PREMIUM and IMPROVED, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented May 15, 1862; Improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with CRIMPING ATTACHMENT, is SURE AND IN OPERATION, sews with cotton or silk, makes the LOCK STITCH with extraordinary rapidity, making SIXTEEN STITCHES to each evolution of the WHEEL. With HEMMER, FELLER, GAUGE, SCREW, SCREW DRIVERS, &c., &c. Strongest machine manufactured. Warranted to last a great number of years. It has now received the approval of all the principal journals, and of thousands of purchasers.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly does the clothing greatly in demand."—New York Tribune.

Agents wanted, ALL COMPLETE, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted every where. Address all orders,

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY, Office 102 Nassau Street, New York.

Allcock's Porous Plasters.

ALLENTOWN, PENN., April 4, 1865.

MESSRS. T. ALLCOCK & SON, Gentlemen:

DEAR SIRS,—My daughter used one of your Porous Plasters. She had a very bad pain in her side; and it cured her in one week. Yours, truly,

JOHN V. N. HEYDER.

We refer to the

Forty Thousand Druggists

who sell our Plasters, and to their thirty sterling characters.

ALLCOCK & CO., Agency, Brandreth House, N. Y.

Sold by all Druggists.

AGENTS WANTED.

THE COMPLETE HERBALIST; or, THE PEOPLE THEIR OWN PHYSICIANS by the use of Herbal Remedies, is the title of one of the best family medical books that has ever been offered to the public. The rapid sale of this book, and the large commission allowed, enables a good agent to make easily from $20 to $30 per day. Address, for full particulars, the author and publisher, Dr. O. PHELPS BROWN, No. 19 Grand St., Jersey City, N. J.

1866 Fall Fashions.

J. W. BRADLEY'S DUPLEX ELLIPTIC or Double Spring SKIRTS. The LATEST STYLES are made VERY LIGHT. They combine Comfort, Durability, and Economy with that ELEGANCE of SHAPE which has made the "DUPLEX ELLIPTIC" the STANDARD SKIRT of the Fashionable World.

AT WHOLESALE by the EXCLUSIVE MANUFACTURERS and SOLE OWNERS of PATENT,

WESTS, BRADLEY, & CARY,

97 Chambers and 79 and 81 Reade Streets, NEW YORK.

ALSO AT WHOLESALE by the LEADING JOBBERS.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS.

SELPHO'S PATENT.

Are pronounced by the most eminent Surgeons and sufferers to be the most perfect yet in use. Send paper, circle, and only reliable substitutes for lost limbs ever invented, comprising all that is desirable in Artificial Limbs, viz.: ease, comfort, lightness, durability, and simplicity. Send for Pamphlet. WILLIAM SELPHO & SON, Patentees and Manufacturers, No. 516 Broadway, New York.

West Point Life.

A Poem, Illustrated with 72 Pen-and-Ink Sketches, By A. Cadet. To which is added the song "BENNY HAVENS, OH!" One vol., octavo, fine tinted paper, cloth, $7 50. D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, 192 Broadway.

 Copies sent free by mail on receipt of the price.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $10, $18, $25, and $35. Price of an office, with Press, $15, $25, $40, $48, and $75. Send for a circular to the LOVEJOY PRESS COMPANY, 23 Water Street, Boston.

STANDARD AMERICAN

BILLIARD TABLES.

Approved and adopted by the Billiard Congress of 1865. The best and only reliable Billiard Tables manufactured. Balls, Cues, and every article relating to Billiards, for sale by PHELAN & COLLENDER, Nos. 63, 65, 67, and 69 Crosby Street, New York City.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

Have selected the following kinds from their Stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show. All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

PRICE LIST.

YOUNG HYSON, 50c., 60c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 P lb.
GREEN TEAS, 50c., 60c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 P lb.
MIXED, 50c., 60c., 90c., $1; best, $1 2 lb.
JAPAN, $1, 3-10; best, $1 25 P lb.
OOLONG, 75c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 P lb.
IMPERIAL and GUNPOWDER, best, $1 25 P lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 50c., 60c., $1, $1 10; best $1 20 P lb.

All teams, villages, or manufactories where a large number of men are engaged, by clubbing together, can reduce the price of their Tea and Coffee one third by sending directly to the

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

(Post-Office Box 5643.) 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church, New York.

For further particulars, getting up Clubs, &c., see Harper's Weekly, June 23, 1866.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have Recently Published:

BATTLE PIECES AND ASPECTS OF THE WAR. By HERMAN MELVILLE, Author of "Typee," "Redburn," "White Jacket," "Mardi," "Moby Dick," "Whitejacket," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

THE HIDDEN SIN. A Novel. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00; Paper, $1 00.

ENGLISH TRAVELLERS AND ITALIAN BRIGANDS. A Narrative of Capture and Captivity. By W. J. C. Moens. With a Map and several Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

INSIDE: A Chronicle of Secession. A Novel. By GEORGE H. HEPWORTH. With Illustrations by THOMAS NAST. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75; Paper, $1 25.

HARPER'S HANDBOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to July, 1866, and a Map containing Colored Routes of Travel in the above Countries. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Fifth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7 50.

FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," "Scenes of Clerical Life," "Romola," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. An Elegant Library Edition will be Published Shortly.

HOMES WITHOUT HANDS; Being a Description of the Habitations of Animals, classed according to their Principle of Construction. By J. G. WOOD, M.A., F.L.S., Author of "Illustrated Natural History." With about 140 Illustrations engraved on Wood by G. PEARSON, from Original Designs made by F. W. KEYL and A. E. BARTH, under the Author's Superintendence. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50. Sheep, $4 50. Half Calf, $5 75.

LAND AT LAST. A Novel in Three Books. By THOMAS YATES, Author of "Rissing the Rod," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ANDERSONVILLE PRISON. A Narrative of Andersonville, drawn from the Evidence elicited on the Trial of Henry Wirz, the Jailer. With the Arguments of Col. N. P. CHIPMAN, Judge-Advocate. By ARMAND SPRING. 12mo, Cloth, beveled Edges, $1 75.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. By ARTHUR H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN. Part I.: From the Beginning of the Conspiracy to the Capture of the Peninsular Campaign of 1862. With more than Five Hundred Illustrations. [This volume consists of nearly 400 pages in large folio, each equivalent to six octavo pages: the volume thus containing as much matter as for ordinary octavo publications.] Price $6 00, in Cloth, Gilt, with Beveled Edges.

☞ Libral Terms to Agents.

NAPOLEON'S CÆSAR. The History of Julius Cæsar. By His Imperial Majesty NAPOLEON III. Vol. II. Second Edition. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

$3000 YEARLY INCOME. Selling the $3000. COFFEE EGGS, warranted for 1000 gallons. 1,000,000 sold in 3 months. $15 per hundred. Samples by mail, 50c. Small one free. Postage 6c. Address Mathew Weathbrook & Co., 8th St., N.Y. Good lots of agents paid for.

A PERFECT AGENCY for sale at a great bargain. Address Box 1,000, Post Office, Philadelphia.

Window Shades,

NEW STYLES WITH PATENT FIXTURES,

Sold only by G. L. & J. B. KELTY,

447 Broadway, above Canal Street.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE.

Superior Advantages in English, Classics, Sciences, Commercial Studies, German, Piano Music, and Painting. Lewis's Gymnasium for Ladies, and Military Drill for Gentlemen. Thirty-first Term opens Sept. 18th.

Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Principal.

Claverack, Columbia Co., N. Y.

CURTAINS.

Lace, Brocatelle, Damask, Reps, &c.

A complete assortment of styles and prices.

G. L. & J. B. KELTY, 447 Broadway.

Spread the Truth.

Some medical men insist that it is undignified to advertise a remedy, however valuable it may be. Queer reasoning this. It is like saying that an article which the world needs should be hid in a corner.—But benefits and blessings may be too widely diffused—that the means of protecting and restoring health should be a close monopoly, and not accessible to all. The argument is best. It is worse than that: it is inhuman. Suppose HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS—an absolute specific for dyspepsia, biliousness, and nervous debility—had never been known beyond the repertoire of the faculty, what would have been the consequence? Instead of curing and invigorating millions, the good effects of the remedies would have been confined to a comparative few. There is no more philanthropy for saying that light should not be hid under a bushel; that whatever is excellent must be placed on a city on a hill, where all men can take cognizance of it. It is upon this principle that the BITTERS have been advertised and continue to be advertised in every country and any pretensions in the Western Hemisphere, and that the spontaneous testimonials in favor have been translated into all written languages. Thousands who are living health to-day owe much to thanksgiving on beds of sickness if the newspapers had not spread the truth with a view to his unequaled curipower and corrective for and wide. Suppose that he had refrained from this publicity. Is that any argument against it? If the public had not been protected, if it had not been saved; if the feeble have been strengthened, and the sick and dying restored, who has been wronged, and who so mean as to grudge to exertions thus directed their fair reward?

"The Mammoth Informer" gives away 10 cents' worth of reading for 3c. Quarterly mail subscription, 15 cents. Bridal etiquette, 15 cents. Laws of love, 50 cents. Ball-room guide, 50 cents. Address as above, box 2,927.

6000 AGENTS wanted to sell six new inventions, of great value to families; all pay great profits. Send 25 cents and get 3 samples, 25 cts. each, 100 pages and a sample gratis. Ephraim Brown, Lowell, Mass.

"How 'tis Done." Whiskers in 6 weeks. Gambling exposed. Fortune-telling. Ventriloquism. 100 pieces sorts. Free for 25c. Address Hunter & Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

THE "THUNDERBOLT," Howard's new Breech-loading Rifle, warranted to kill at 1,000 yards, only $25 50. FOWLER & WILLIS, Agents, 289 Broadway, New York. Circulars on receipt of stamp.

Agents wanted. Extraordinary inducements. The only bona fide household article for agents to sell. Send for circulars. J. F. Ellsworth & Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR OCTOBER, 1866.

CONTENTS:

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.—(Fourth Paper.)

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Mrs. Bell's, Darnestown.—Topographical Engineers' Camp, Darnestown.—Battle-field of Monocacy County.—Encampment of Signal Party, Darnestown, Maryland.—The old Governor.—Sketches for Field Reconnoissance.—Camp Summary.—Winter Camp.—Battle-field at Fourth Ave. Cemetery.—Sunday Parade.—Bulletin.

WOODPECKERS.

With an illustration.

CRUISE OF THE ROB ROY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Rob Roy in the Rollers.—Esquimaux Village.—Encampment.—Shooting the Rapids.—The choked Channel.—The Rob Roy on Wheels.—Cattle swimming the Nerbudda.—Passing Wagga-wa in the Night-Fields.—Accommodations Wanted.—Morning Visitors.—The Rob Roy in a Crowd.—Shirking a Watch-fall.—Sailing on Lake Zug.—Passing the Inside of Lucerne.—The Rob Roy Aground.—Head on a Watercraft.—Chain Barrier.—French Fishers.

HIPPOLYTE THE HEROIC MEN.—XIV. THE WILDS OF ARKANSAS.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Samuel R. Curtis.—Battle of Pea Ridge.—Battle of Prairie Grove.—Battle of Helena.—Battery.—Nineteenth Iowa and Twentieth Wisconsin.—Pursuing Price.

SHELBY GABDIL.

THE TRIUMPHANT TUNE

SLEEP.

THE PAINTED CHALET.

LADY GODIVA AT HOME.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Coventry Procession, 1866.—Peeping Tom of Coventry.

SEPTEMBER WOODS.

BORDER RAIDS AT A MILLION.

THE BURNING OF COLUMBIA AGAIN.

THE FREEDMAN'S STORY.

THE GOLD MINES.

COST OF A HOME.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $4 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $8 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements for their Magazine, at the following low rates:

One Page	$250 00
Half Page	125 00
Quarter Page	60 00

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $4 00
One Copy for Three Months 1 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.

The Bound Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Cloth Binding . . . . . $2 25 per Volume.
Half Morocco 3 00

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

Terms for Advertising in HARPER'S WEEKLY: Fifty Cents per line for inside, and Two Dollars per line for outside Advertisements, each insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

JOHN BULL AT SARATOGA.

YANKEE. "Beg your pardon! Thought it was my friend JONES."
JOHN BULL. "Humph! And does your friend JONES fancy that sort of thing, you know?"

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York.
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our personal attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

THE
CAMPAIGN TRIBUNE.
Read Prospectus and Terms to Clubs on Page 607.

50 PER-CENT SAVED By USING
B. T. BABBITT'S BEST MEDICINAL SALERATUS, "made from common salt." Bread made with this Saleratus contains whole bodied, melting but common salt, water, and flour. Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72 and 74 Wash ington Street, New York.

PEABODY'S BREECH-LOADING MUSKETS, CARBINES, AND SPORTING RIFLES,
FOR METALLIC CARTRIDGES,
MANUFACTURED BY THE
PROVIDENCE TOOL CO. ARMORY,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
These arms are made in the most perfect manner, are interchangeable in all their parts, and are unequaled for symmetry, elegance, simplicity, accuracy of fire and strength. They have been received with remarkable favor in nearly all civilized countries, and are now in use in large numbers. Send for descriptive pamphlets and illustrated price-lists, printed in English, French, German, or Spanish.

PILE INSTRUMENT.
Dr. Gilbert's Pile Instrument for the radical cure of piles, prolapsus, &c., without operation or confinement, relieves the worst case in 5 minutes, and has never failed to effect a permanent cure. Send for circular, sold by druggists generally. Discount to dealers. Sent by mail to any part of the U. S. on receipt of $5. J. B. ROMAINE, Prop'r, 575 B'way, N. Y.

50 MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP PER-CENT SAVED BY
USING B. T. BABBITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH, or LEAST 50 PER CENT. SAL-SODA. Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other ingredient for lye in the market. Put up in cans of 3 pounds, 7 pounds, 8 pounds, and 14 pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making hard and soft Soap. One pound will make 10 pounds of soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.
B. T. BABBITT, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

PARLOR ORGANS.
Our new Illustrated Catalogue is now ready, giving a full description of all the late important improvements and additions to our Church Organs, Harmoniums, Parlor Organs, and Melodeons. These improvements render our instruments the most desirable made, and they are guaranteed unequaled by leading organists.
Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-List.
CARHART & NEEDHAM,
(Late Treadwell Street, N. Y.
Manufactory, Cabinet Ware-Rooms,
Cor. 14th Street and 4th Avenue.

HOMES FOR THE MILLION!
WOODWARD'S ANNUAL OF ARCHITECTURE AND BUILDING. Art-ptd 1867. 175 Designs and Plans. Paper, 75 cents; Cloth $1 00
WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES. 150 Plans. $1 50.
MANUAL OF THE HOUSE. 130 Plans. $1 50.
TILLEY'S SHORT TALK CHIMNEY. Illustrated. $1.50.
HERMAN'S GRAPES AND WINE. Illustrated. $1 50.
All prepaid
GEO. E. & F. W. WOODWARD, Publishers,
37 Park Row, New York.

BOKER'S BITTERS,
For sale by all prominent Grocers, Wine-Merchants, and Druggists and wholesale only by I. FUNKE, JR., Sole Agent, No. 66 Liberty Street, New York.

JOHN BONNER,
Stock Broker,
22 BROAD STREET.
Government Securities of all kinds. Railway Stocks and Bonds. Petroleum and Mining Stocks, and Gold, bought and sold on commission.

Agents Wanted.—$2000 a Year and expenses to make or male Agents, to introduce a new and useful invention to the trade. Address Factory Inventor, Agents preferring to work on commission can earn from $20 to $50 per day. For particulars address
W. G. WILSON, Cleveland, Ohio.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

IMPROVED
STEREOPTICON, DISSOLVING VIEW,
AND
Magic-Lantern Pictures and Apparatus.
Complete outfits and instructions furnished. Five illustrated catalogue and information sent. W. LANGENHEIM, Philadelphia, P. O. Box 3579.

AGENTS WANTED
FOR THE
NEW UNITED S. MAP.
A Copper-plate, County, Railroad, and Battle-Field Map, showing every thing from the Atlantic to the Pacific; 35 by 50 inches; on fan the REBELLION BATTLE-BOOK,
A profusely-illustrated, 760 page, Royal Octavo, One Volume History of the Civil War, with 383 distinct battle descriptions. The best book for agents extant.
H. H. LLOYD & CO.,
No. 11 John Street, N. Y. and No. 9 S. N. Y.

$25, Average per Day, $25,
Is made by selling and putting up Tucker's Patent
DOOR BELLS.
ONE AGENT in every County wanted.
A. E. TAYLOR, New Britain, Conn.

MADAME JUMEL'S Renowned Balm and Patent Breast Elevator, by drawing the natural beauty of the form on physiological principles. Depot, 263 Canal St., N. Y. Send stamp for circulars. Madame Jumel's Wrinkle Obliterator. Sold by Druggists.

AT REDUCED RATES.
POLLAK & SON, Meerschaum Manufacturers, 402 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Pipes from $5 upward.

NATIONAL BENEVOLENCE FOR THE PURPOSE OF BUILDING IN THE NORTHWEST THE SOLDIERS' ORPHANS' AND WIDOWS' HOME!

MUNIFICENT DONATIONS!
10,000 Acres of Splendid Farm Lands! and 1157 Building Lots!
Are to be Disposed of on the 30th Day of November, 1866, to Subscribers, for the Benefit of the SOLDIERS' ORPHANS' AND WIDOWS' HOME, OF ST. JOSEPH, MO.

This Item, which is fully equal to any on the grade, lies in the Counties of Atchison, Gentry, Holt, Harrison, Bates, Nodaway and Vernon, and has been generously donated to this Charity by the noble patriots of our country. The donors have divided the same into 10 CLASSES, as follows:

ONE PRIZE Farm of 640 acres in Atchison Co., valued at	$10,000
THREE PRIZES, Farms each 320 acres—aggregate value	10,000
TEN PRIZES, Farms each 160 acres—aggregate value	25,000
TWENTY-SEVEN PRIZES Farms each 80 acres—aggregate value	21,750
ONE HUNDRED PRIZES, Farms each 40 acres—aggregate value	6,750
1157 PRIZES OF BUILDING LOTS, and one-half acre lots, in the town of Craig, in the county of Holt, adjoining the city of St. Joseph and Council Bluffs Railroad, and within one mile of Atchison Co., directly on the St. Joseph and Council Bluffs Railroad, and within three miles of the Missouri River	10,723
Forming a Total of 1298 Prizes of Real Estate—Amounting to $267,470!

Which, together with Pianos, Melodeons, Sewing Machines, Wagons, Agricultural Implements, &c., comprising many ornamental, useful, and substantial articles of manufacture, will form a grand total of 2000 PRIZES, VALUED IN THE AGGREGATE AT OVER $300,000!

Will be distributed among Subscribers (drawn by lot allotments) on the 24th of December next, under the direction of the Board of Trustees, and a clear deed given to the real estate, to and under authority of an Act of the Legislature, CERTIFICATES OF TICKETS, $5 EACH! For sale throughout the United States by authorized Agents, who will give the precise location of each parcel of land or building lot.—$2?" Certificates may also be had by addressing the Trustees of SOLDIERS' ORPHANS' AND WIDOWS' HOME, Lock Box 1170, St. Joseph, Mo. Other notice than Bank of Missouri, on Feb. 5th, where the community are most respectfully invited, at their convenience, to call and examine the Bonds and vested contributions from the State.

President of the Board, Hon. WILLARD P. HALL Ex-Gov. of Mo.; Vice-President, Hon. GEO. SMITH, Lieut.-Gov. of Mo.; C. H. MESSMORE, Genl. Western Agent; ROSCOE CONKLING City Agent; JOHN B. CHEGARAY, Register.

LAST ANNOUNCEMENT!
Capital Prize, $30,000.
We have the pleasure to announce to the citizens of the United States that KELLEY'S GRAND
NORTH AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT
WILL POSITIVELY TAKE PLACE AT THE
Wabash Avenue Rink, Chicago, Illinois,
FRIDAY, SEPT. 28, 1866, or Money Refunded, on which time
Half a Million Dollars in Prizes, including $100,000 in Greenbacks, will be Presented to the Ticket-Holders.

Unabated rush for Tickets—the demand continually increasing—28,000 Tickets sold in a single day—the whole country on the qui vive—Orders constantly arriving from all parts—Agents in the Atlantic and Pacific States—Space. The North American Prize Concert in the van; its wonderful circle distanced; the public with one accord leaving their patronage upon the Wabash—Kelley & Co.'s North American Prize Concert, the model of faith in the principles of the Proprietors of Money. A. A. Kelley & Co.'s North American Prize Concert, they respond liberally, and the indications are that on Oct. 24th of November ten thousand persons will remain unpaid.

SPECIAL CARD.—We take pleasure in announcing that we have not only unparalled success, in spite of the many swindling schemes that have been presented to the public by irresponsible parties. Our consideration has, however, operated to delay our sales, and prevent our agents from properly reporting until we were fully able to satisfy them in our responsibility, and that we have represented it. We have, therefore, concluded to extend the time of drawing until the 28th of Sep ember, at which time the Illinois State Fair will be held, when it will positively occur. Arrangements have been made for the use of the Rink, which is 200 ft. in length by 100 ft. in width, for the purpose of drawing. The plan of drawing adopted is the following: Duplicate numbers from 1 to 100,000 are placed in a wheel; the first number drawn out shall draw the first prize, the next the second prize, and so on, until the whole $30,000 in prizes are drawn: the whole drawing to be superintended by a committee appointed by the audience. The Wabash avenue Rink has been engaged, as will be seen by the following

"CHICAGO, August 21, 1866.
"This is to certify that Messrs. A. A. Kelley & Co. have this day leased the Wabash Avenue Rink for the evening of the 28th day of September, and paid for the same the sum of three hundred dollars ($300).
"C. H. JOHNSON & CO., Lessees of the Rink."

We advise all parties wanting tickets to send for them at once, as the books will be closed on Friday evening, September 28, and no tickets will be sold after that time. All orders for tickets will promptly receive attention.

NUMBER OF TICKETS ISSUED, 500,000. PRICE, $1 00.

THIS IS THE GREATEST INDUCEMENT EVER OFFERED TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

EVERY OTHER TICKET DRAWS A PRIZE.

1 Gift in Greenbacks	$30,000	40 Gifts in Pianos, $600 each	$30,000
1 do. do.	10,000	20 do. Melodeons, $150 each	3,000
1 do. do.	5,000	100 do. Bibles, $10 each	1,000
1 do. do.	4,000	200 do. Gold Watches, $150 each	30,000
1 do. do.	3,000	300 do. do. do.	30,000
1 do. do.	2,000	200 do. Silver Watches, $50 each	10,000
20 do. do.	$1000 each	5,000	40 each	12,000
50 do. do.	500 each	10,000	1000 Sets Plated Teaspoons, $3 each	3,000
50 do. do.	200 each	10,000	1000 Gold Pens, $3 each	3,000
50 do. do.	50 each	1,000	1000 United Fruit-Knives, $2 each	2,000
500 do. do.	10 each	5,000	1000 Gold Lockets or Rings, $4 each	4,000
1000 do. do.	5 each	5,000	2000 Photograph Albums, $5 each	10,000
5 do. Residence in Chicago	5,000	25,000
10 do. Lots in Chicago, $500 each	5,000	238,043 Gifts, worth	$238,043

EVERY OTHER TICKET DRAWS A PRIZE.

The drawing will take place, after the concert, where 20,000 persons can witness it. A Committee will be appointed by the audience to take charge of the same.

All agents and purchasers will be supplied with a correct list of the drawing as soon as published.

Tickets will be for sale at the principal News Agencies, Hotels, and Book Stores, and at our office, 105 Randolph Street. Price of tickets, $1 each, sent by mail on receipt of price and 3 cent stamp for return postage.

Or an independent city offered to any person who will secure 50 tickets. Write for our terms at once. Send reference with application.

SPECIAL TERMS OR CLUB RATES.

5 tickets to one address for..$4 50 | 20 tickets to one address.....$17 50 | 40 tickets to one address.....$35 00
10 do. do. do. ..9 00 | 30 do. do. ..26 25 | 50 do. do. ..42 50.

In every case send the name of each subscriber and their post-office address. Money by draft, P. O. order, express, or in registered letters, may be sent at our risk.

EVERY OTHER TICKET DRAWS A PRIZE.

REFERENCES.—Tappin, McKelley & Co., Commercial Agency, Chicago; Lee C. Whitford, Wholesale Paper Dealer, Chicago; J. B. Ingalls and Co., Publishers, Philadelphia; M. T. Quimby & Co., Wholesale Jewelers, Chicago; John E. Potter & Co., Publishers, Philadelphia; James L. Hatch & Co., Bankers, New York; A. G. Sampson, Importer, N. Y.; S. B. Cobb, Chicago; Crosby & Ainsworth, Publishers, Boston; Sheldon & Co., Publishers, N. Y.

Read what the Chicago Press says:

KELLEY & CO.'S GIFT ENTERPRISE.—The first to embark in the Gift Enterprise business in Chicago was the firm of A. A. KELLEY & CO., whose office is at 105 Randolph street. In the present or their once, which opened two or three years ago, where many purchased books and other articles, and were so fortunate as to draw a gift, which entitled them to a choice in jewelry or other articles. Many are now in possession of our citizens were thus fortunate, and there can be no doubt but their experience with Messrs. Kelley & Co. once so perfected as to be entirely satisfactory, and that they will do business honorably and to the country. Kelley & Co. Concert, which they now advertise, promises to be one of the most successful of the kind ever given in Chicago. The first ticket drawn will entitle the holder to a prize of $30,000, and they are represented to be. In all the prizes will positively be distributed to those holding the lucky tickets after the drawing. There is not a single humbug connected with the whole affair, and the public may rest assured that everything is fair and honorable.—The Chicago Republican.

4. The citizens of Chicago, who know A. A. Kelley & Co., have confidence in their honor and integrity, and are therefore ready to purchase tickets in their Grand Concert. Persons who have not yet seen Kelley & Co.'s Gift Concert is the public. Let the people come up and buy tin, tickets still remaining unsold. The advertising of Kelley & Co. is the best guarantee that they will do as they promise.—Chicago Evening Journal.

All communications should be addressed to A. A. KELLEY & CO., 105 Randolph St., Chicago, Ill. P. O. Box 1424.
Headquarters for New York—Merchants' and Manufacturers' Stock Co., 576 Broadway (up stairs).
Ticket for sale at 576 Broadway, Room 3, entrance to Room 3 on 4th st. 464 Broadway, New York.

STEREOPTICONS
AND
MAGIC LANTERNS
For Public Exhibitions. A Priced and Illustrated Catalogue of Stereopticons, Dissolving Lanterns, Dissolving Lanterns, Magic Lanterns, &c., with views for the same, will be sent free by mail to applicants.
WILLIAM Y. McALLISTER,
728 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

EAT HEARTILY.
There are hundreds of people who do not dare to eat a hearty meal of victuals for fear of the distressing effects that follow. Ayer's Cathartic Pills will stop it instantaneously. It has cured more cases of Dyspepsia than all other medicines combined. Take it freely, and you will be satisfied of its merits.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 60 Broadway.

"KA-FOOZLE-UM."
DAUGHTER OF THE BAYADE, Comic Song.....35
"SWEET SPRING, THOU ART A-WOO," Song.....35
THE CUCKOO'S NOTES, Ballad, for violin; 11st pieces..35
THE CUCKOO'S NOTES, Ballad, for violin; 13st pieces..35
"ORGAN GRINDER POLKA," for violin; 11st pieces...35
Sealed packages, FREE BY MAIL, for 35 cents.
New York, Publ her.

THE Howe Sewing Machine, lock-stitch, for Families and Manufacturers. A new machine at a low price. THE HOWE MACHINE CO., 699 Broadway, N. Y.

SNELL'S CORN CURE.
No knife, or poison used; it gives immediate relief, and permanently destroys the callous. Sent by mail for 50 cts. Address N. S. SNELL, Watertown, N. Y.

CARPENTERS AND BUILDERS.
CUMMINGS & MOORE'S Practical Treatise on ARCHITECTURE IN DETAIL, showing how to construct your own dwelling, with 75 plates, containing 324 designs and 24 Title Pages. Sent prepaid on receipt of $10. A. J. CUMMINGS, Troy, N. Y.

Silver Steel.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—No. 509.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ADELAIDE RISTORI.

THE popular enthusiasm which has been excited by the arrival of RISTORI in New York—an enthusiasm which has a most worthy motive and occasion—leads us to produce for our readers a portrait of this celebrated tragedienne, the successful rival of her French contemporary, RACHEL, the only great Italian tragic actress, one who holds upon the Italian stage that place which upon the English has been conceded to MRS. SIDDONS alone.

ADELAIDE RISTORI, Marchioness CAPRANICA DEL GRILLO, was born at Civita di Friuli in 1830. Her parents were poor, and belonged to the CAVICCHI troupe—a company of traveling comedians. Her first years were passed "the other side of the foot-lights." She made her first appearance upon the stage at the early age of two months, when she was introduced in a basket in a play called "New-Year's Gifts." At her fourth year she commenced to play children's parts, which she continued to do until she was twelve years old. When only fourteen she appeared as Francisca di Rimini, and the impression which she made in that character decided her future life. She then abandoned her wandering life, and joined the company of the King of Sardinia, under the directorship of GAETANO BAZZI.

It was at the theatre of Livourne, and twenty years ago, that RISTORI made her first creations and established her position as an accomplished comédienne. It was at this time that she, the daughter of obscure comedians, became the wife of the heir of one of the noblest Roman ducal families—the Marquis CAPRANICA DEL GRILLO. It was a romantic marriage, contracted against the wishes of her husband's parents. For a time RISTORI withdrew from the stage, to which, however, she soon returned as a tragic actress. At first her impersonations in this new rôle appear not to have been very successful; but she studied to overcome the obstacles in her way, and was rewarded with a complete triumph, which may be said to have been pronounced for the first time on the occasion of her appearance in Paris in 1855, at the opening of the Exposition Universelle.

ADELAIDE RISTORI.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

RISTORI made her first appearance in Paris on the 22d of May, at the Italian Opera House, in the character of "Francisca di Rimini." The audience that greeted the débutante was not a very large one, as but few persons had the idea that so brilliant an artistic luminary was to take its place in the theatrical firmament. By chance only ALEXANDRE DUMAS, EUGENE SCRIBE, and JULES JANIN were present. On the next day the former wrote: "Last night I was at the representation of 'Francisca di Rimini' at the Salle Ventadour. I looked around the theatre, but did not see RACHEL. I beg that she will go and see how the death-scene is performed." M. SCRIBE called immediately on RISTORI, and, in her absence, left his card, on which he inscribed: "EUGENE SCRIBE, in acknowledgment of his admiration for Madame RISTORI, and with thanks for the great pleasure he experienced last night." JULES JANIN was the most enthusiastic in her favor. "RISTORI, RISTORI!" he wrote, "she is the rage of the day! She is tragedy itself. She is comedy itself. She is the drama. She reigns—she governs—she commands, and the crowd obeys."

She could scarcely have attempted a more difficult part than that of Myrrah, in which she achieved her first success before a Parisian audience—a part in which the actress, as the impersonation of unnatural crime, has very little of the sympathy of the audience. But RISTORI, true to the Grecian ideal, represented the guilty heroine as beautiful with a dignity and grandeur almost divine, though the victim of unalterable Fate. The situation which she represented was that one which is so common in all the great Grecian tragedies—in which is portrayed the conflict between the heart as moved by human impulses, and the will as subject to Destiny.

RISTORI was no less successful as Mary Stuart, where she was subject to comparison with other artists who had made the part peculiarly their own. But she created a new Mary Stuart. Her identity with the character was most complete.

The first season ended on the 10th of September. She gave thirty-six performances, the gross receipts of which amounted to half a million of francs. This success was so gratifying that RISTORI secured the theatre for the three following years. During her residence in Paris she was the recipient of many generous testimonials of the estimation in which she was held by the most enlightened artists and literati of the country.

SCENE AFTER THE DISASTER ON THE NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD, SEPTEMBER 7, 1866.—SKETCHED BY A. PARKER.—[SEE PAGE 614.]

The character of Medea, in which RISTORI makes her first appearance in this city, was a part refused by RACHEL; but RISTORI was so successful in this part that the author of the play, M. LEGOUVE, wrote in her album, "RACHEL killed me; you have restored me to life."

RISTORI has had great success in England, Spain, Germany, and Russia. Her arrival in this country has excited great expectations, and will give an opportunity to those who have seen and heard RACHEL of comparing style and of measuring the powers of tragic impersonation as between these two celebrated tragédiennes. RISTORI has left an unblemished private life. Not even the breath of scandal has ever been raised against her. She is the mother of two interesting children, and is universally esteemed as a woman of piety and of generous instincts.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1866.

THE GREAT CAMPAIGN OF '66.

THE President has returned from the stump. The Congressional and State nominations are generally made. The platforms are built, and the great political campaign of 1866 has fairly opened. The issue is plainly presented, and most unfortunately it is an issue between the President and the Congress, which will both elected by the Union party. But it is a difference which we must accept, for we can neither arbitrate nor avoid it.

At the ensuing elections we must choose between two parties. One, under the plea of the equality of States, asserts that a State or a combination of States may renounce its compulsory powers in the Union, may withdraw from Congress, wage war upon the Union, and then at its own pleasure, and in absolute disregard of the fundamental changes wrought in the Constitution by the war, may, of "continuing right," resume all its national relations without any other than a technical inquiry upon the part of faithful States and citizens. This is the full form of the JOHNSON Philadelphia Convention. It is a principle which totally invalidates every step toward restoration which has been or shall be taken, and holds no security for the future. Upon such a theory the Emancipation Amendment may be repudiated, the Confederate debt resumed, and the Acts of Secession restored to the State statute-books as merely inoperative laws. The party of this policy is a coalition composed chiefly of the Democratic party, upon the 4th of September, 1864, at Auburn, Mr. SEWARD charged the calamity of attempted disunion; of those whose conspiracy against the Union was defeated after a terrible war; and of a large body of office-holders under the Administration.

To this coalition stands opposed the Union party. It has vindicated popular government without vengeance. It has abolished slavery; and it demands that the change wrought in the Constitution by emancipation proclaimed by the equality of the loyal States in Congress shall be acknowledged by the late insurgent States before they resume their full national relations. This party is composed of the vast bulk of those at the North who sincerely supported the war, and of all those at the South, of every color, voters or not voters, who stood true to the Union with ANDREW JOHNSON through fire and flood, whose hearts have not changed, and whom the late rebels at the South and the new friends of the President at the North now denounce in words, sneaks, and traitors.

If this party, with its record, its principles, and the character of its adherents, seems to any honest man inimical to the authority of the State, the maintenance of order, he will, in seeking order and law, vote to intrust the Government to those who took up arms to accept the constitutional debate at the polls and to those who sympathized with them. But if he believes that the speedy, prosperous, and permanent restoration of the Union will be defeated if the lately insurgent States, in their present inflamed condition, are restored with increased power, he will vote to confide the Government of the State and the country to those who will patiently and firmly require the adoption of the Constitutional amendment.

The defeated States accepted the President's terms because of the moral weight of the united opinion of the loyal States that supported them. They will accept the honorable and legitimate completion of those terms if we remain united. The whole country has seen with how instant and sincere and universal a welcome Tennessee was received. But they seem to us strangely to misunderstand the character or purpose of the American people who fought the war to its end, who suppose that, profound and earnest as is their desire of restoration of the Union, they will buy it at the cost of plain injustice to patriotic States and utter betrayal of faithful citizens. They stood fast under the most appalling pressure of '64; they are not less clear-sighted and stout-hearted in the angry storm of '66.

A NEW GOLD EXCHANGE.

It is understood that a movement is on foot for the establishment of a new Gold Exchange. Various motives have prompted the enterprise. For some weeks the existing Gold-Room has been practically closed against new members. Men of unquestionable character, adequate capital, and fair business standing have been steadily refused admission. The fact has been explained by the most influential members of the Room, but they have been powerless to alter it. Having at the start borrowed from the Stock Exchange the most absurd of its rules, namely, Exchange the most absurd of its rules, namely, the rule requiring applicants for admission to be balloted for, and excluding all parties against whom six black balls are cast, the Gold Room appears unable to overcome the vice of its origin, and is likely to perish in consequence. It is hardly necessary to remind the general public that the secret black ball system is eminently suitable for social clubs, from which it may be desirable to exclude objectionable persons for reasons that can not conveniently be avowed, but is absurd and preposterous when applied to mercantile exchanges. It is proper that the members of the Union Club should be enabled to exclude from their society a man who is known as a seducer, or a cheat at cards, or a foul-mouthed talker, without placing themselves in a position which might entitle the party excluded to demand reparation. But it would be absurd for the lawyers or doctors or architects of New York to band themselves together in a society, and to establish the rule that no man hereafter should become a lawyer, or a doctor, or an architect without undergoing the ordeal of a secret ballot at the hands of his future competitors who might choose to cast the adverse balls. Such a system would not last a fortnight. Among Stock-brokers it lasted a good many years, but finally out of its anomaly it grew the Open Board of Brokers—an institution which does more than twice as much business as the Stock Exchange, and which, unless the "Long Room" should hereafter be the more legitimate field for Stock dealings, and the two Boards should in effect cease to exist, will continue to do so. Untaught by the experience of the Stock Exchange, the members of the Gold-Room appear to have made up their minds that they can afford to claim a monopoly of the business in gold, and to exclude all competitors. The natural result is an effort on the part of new houses to establish a new Gold Exchange. And if the trade in gold continues to exist, and the new scheme is not defeated by enmity, there is no reason why it should not be as successful as the Open Board of Brokers.

Another motive impels many persons to institute a new Gold Exchange. If there are a very many loyal and honorable men there, it is generally understood that the existing Room is a secessionist concern. Its officers are said never to have been gratified by the return of rebel sympathies. No loyal men, it is said, can command the votes of its members. It is accused of having hesitated to rejoice on the news of Mr. LINCOLN'S assassination, and to the horror and disgust of all decent men, not a few of its prominent members are reported to have made the most merry over that sad day with their dealings. The money represented there has been mostly made by speculations based on the probable ruin of the credit of the United States, and it is not natural that the men who made it should continue to sympathize with the cause which enriched them. So decided has been the temper of the Room that the representatives of the two leading loyal papers, the Tribune and Times, have never been willing to enter it. It is felt by bankers and merchants that the gold dealings on this great city, which forms so large a part of the foreign trade of the United States, ought to be in loyal hands. There is no good reason for the antagonism which has existed in this country between the United States Government and the Gold-Room. No such antagonism would have existed, it is believed, had the Gold-Room been in political harmony with the city and State. Had the Gold-Room been controlled by as loyal men as govern the New York Stock Exchange or the Open Board of Brokers, it would have been no wholesale combinations to depreciate the currency, and to defeat the Government in its well-meant but ill-judged attempts to restore specie payments on specie. Speculators might have made such combinations; but the temper of the Room would have been against them—not as their favor, as has generally been the case.

Another source of dissatisfaction with the existing Gold-Room is the insecurity of dealings there. At the outset every body was admitted who was prepared to pay $1000. Large numbers of persons became members who had neither commission business nor capital to speculate with. Then the members still. Hence bankers and merchants who buy and sell gold in connection with the sale and purchase of bills of exchange, are constantly in periods of excitement, making losses by reason of the failure of the parties with whom they deal in the Gold-Room. A man will pay $5000 if they lost it, and yet who will buy and sell $100,000 of gold on their own account each day. So long as their operations are successful all is well with them; when fortune turns against them they fail, and somehow or other the Room, which is so firmly shut against new members, hardly ever turns them out. Such transactions naturally bring the room itself into disrepute, and prompt, if they do not justify, the suspicion that in that institution rogues stand a better chance of favor than honest men. Ultra loyalists will assuredly say that this is false to his country can hardly be expected to be true to his creditors.

As to the prospect of a new Gold Exchange, it is difficult to speak with confidence. Bankers and merchants have got into the habit of dealing in the Gold-Room, and it will take time to wean them from its sphere. A large amount of capital is engaged there; the members alone, without outside business, could do a large trade among themselves, and keep a market constantly open.

But, on the other hand, the public do not love the Gold-Room. It is very generally, though perhaps erroneously, believed that the members of that room, by their gambling speculations in specie, have inflicted grievous injury on the public interests and taken money out of the pocket of every man in the country. There is pretty certain that the collapse of the Gold-Room would not cause any general public mourning. It is a question how long the trade in gold will last. No one can tell. With good management on the part of the Treasury at Washington, gold ought to be so near par, a twelvemonth hence, that it will be hardly worth while to speculate in it. With such a prospect, the field for a new Gold Exchange would not be large or promising. Still, between this and next year large amounts of gold must be sold by bond-holders and bought by importers; there must naturally be considerable speculation in the matter; and if a large and new institution under honest, loyal management should undertake to supersede the present Gold-Room, nine out of ten merchants will wish it God-speed!

WAR AND INSURRECTION.

THE address of Mr. RANDALL'S Philadelphia Convention, like the minority report of the Congressional Committee upon reconstruction, reasserts the President's and Mr. BUCHANAN'S theory of "the continuing right of States." The argument is grounded on the theory that as, under the Constitution, there can be no such thing as the secession of a State, so no rebellion must be counted a mere insurrection such as Congress is expressly authorized by Article 1, Section 8) to suppress, and such as the General Government has done in 1794, on the happening of the Whisky Insurrection in Pennsylvania. That insurrection, of course, left the State of Pennsylvania with all its rights unimpaired. It did so, however, because it was not a war waged by the State of Pennsylvania, but an insurrection of a part only of its inhabitants. That there is a difference between an insurrection and a war is clear from Article 1, Section 10, of the Constitution, which says: "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty on tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay." It was clearly considered possible by the framers of the Constitution for a State to "engage in war."

But what effect such a war would have upon the rights of the State in the Union, especially when the war engaged in should be against the General Government, is not laid down; and we look in vain in the Constitution for any provision on the subject. In like manner LYCURGUS laid out journeys from the Isle of Crimea for which he provided punishments. It was a crime too monstrous to be anticipated. In our code Secession is the casus omissus. Hence if the Democratic States appealed to a Convention for proposing Amendments to the Constitution (as provided in Article 5), the omission might have been supplied by the question whether it have been settled peaceably. But they chose rather to appeal to the sword. They engaged in war against the United States, and then an insurrection of the people of the power of Congress came into action. By Article 1, Section 8, Congress has "power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures by land and water." Congress virtually declared war, August 5, 1861, when it passed a bill legalizing all the acts of the President respecting the army and navy "as if they had been issued and done under the previous express authority and direction of the Congress of the United States."

The Supreme Court decided in the Prize Cases (2 Black, p. 636) that "The present civil war between the United States and the so-called Confederate States has such character and magnitude as to give the United States the same rights and privileges which they might exercise in the case of a national and foreign war."

By the war they levied it is clear that the seceding States abdicated the position they had held under the Constitution. As there is no provision for such a case in the Constitution, so there is no precedent for it in our history. But such a precedent we must go back to the Revolution made by our forefathers in 1688. When JAMES II., after trying to break the Constitution of England, was pronounced by Parliament to have abdicated the throne. Just so the seceding States in 1861 abandoned both their duties and their rights under the Constitution. Then Parliament called in another king to take the place of the fugitive monarch; but the latter was bound by a Bill of Rights, to which he gave a solemn assent before he was allowed to take his seat on the vacant throne. Just so Congress proposes that the Southern States shall give their assent to certain Amendments to the Constitution before they resume their place in the Government. In 1688 the modifications of the English Constitution were as few in number and as moderate in character as were consistent with the safety of the Established Church, and with the maintenance of the liberty of the subject. In 1866 the proposed Amendments to the Constitution are barely sufficient to protect the liberties of loyal citizens in the South, and to provide some security against men, who, in spite of their oaths of allegiance, are not likely to have thoroughly abjured their former principles.

In one point the analogy fails. WILLIAM and MARY cheerfully accepted the Bill of Rights, and they and their successors, down to the present day, have loyally observed its stipulations. Our late Rulers, on the other hand, propose to come back to power without giving either indemnity for the past or security for the future. So far from it, they claim to take advantage of their own wrong by sending (after 1870) twenty or more additional members to the House of Representatives. The Revolution of 1688 was the last revolution in England, and its new and improved principles were secured by embodying them in the fundamental law.

THE POPULAR VERDICT.

At least twice a day for a fortnight, in fair weather and foul, by day and by night, the President has addressed us like a friend on his case with the people; that they were the final judge, that he had perfect confidence in their wisdom, and should bow obediently to their will. Did it never once occur to him that to declare such boundless faith in the wisdom and patriotism of the people, and in the next breath to denounce as traitors and assassins all who did not patriotic people elected as traitors, disunionists, and knaves, was a poor way of proving the regard he professed? Did the President not see in his friends' estimate that the people who heard and who read those speeches were so dull as not to see that in fiercely denouncing the chosen and honored representatives of the people he was denouncing the people themselves?

The tribunal to which the President appeals has begun its response. The people are authoritatively pronounced in the question of restoration. Vermont, by more than her usual majority for peace and justice, says that she does not mean a speedy rebellion to larger dimensions. Maine, by the largest majority ever known in the State, declares that she is not willing that the States which have tried to destroy the Government shall have restored by their rebellion in addition to their old members a representation larger than that of Maine. New Hampshire, and Vermont combined. And everywhere the people say the same thing. When they are asked, "Are you for disunion?" they will reply, "No; we are for union and equality of the rights of States, are you?" When they are asked, "Well, what do you want?" they will answer, "We want restoration which shall not put a premium upon rebellion, do you?"

The States which sustained the war have a perfectly clear perception of what they want. It is not party supremacy, nor confiscation, nor punishment, nor vengeance, nor confiscation, nor hostile feeling of any kind whatever, which inspires them. It is that instinctive sagacity which will not suffer the same folly to be done in a few statesmen have sometimes been. It is that wisdom which in this country will prevent the terrible spectacle so frequent in other lands, of a nation to secure the results of the first. The people, unless every sign and all antecedents are deceptive, desire to place the legitimate guiding reins of government in the hands of party tumults by grafting them upon the organic law. So far from weltering in confusion, the only party in this country which has a clear aim definitely pursued is the people's or Union party. He certainly is a very short-sighted observer, and a very superficial student of history and human nature, who does not see that the Philadelphia Convention, and the Albany Democratic Convention in this State, and similar assemblies elsewhere, are merely movements of a defeated party to regain ascendency. The only principle or policy advocated by them is what is called immediate restoration of the Union. Such a platform is like that of the absurd BELL party in the election of 1860—"The Constitution, the Union, and the Enforcement of the Laws." The very question now is not how to secure the country to war was, "What is the Constitution; what is the scope of the Union; how may the laws be enforced?" The BELL party might as wisely have chained the Bible to their platform. The very point was, who shall interpret it?

The case is not different now. The Democratic party, with the President and his friends, are no more devoted to the Constitution and the Union than their opponents. The very question is, How shall the Union be most constitutionally restored? Immediately to admit the late insurgent States to Congress after such a war involving such constitutional changes, without deliberation and sagacious care, is neither constitutional nor sensible. The result in Maine and Vermont—the party lines increased and strengthened—show that the people know it. The American people, intelligent beyond any other, know that it is not enough to win a victory—it must be secured.

DEGRADATION AND HUMILIATION.

We still read a great deal about the humiliation and degradation to which the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment subjects our fellow-citizens of the unrepresented STATES. We are told that they will never adopt it, and that they never ought to adopt it. This would be more important if we had not been told exactly the same thing during every week of the year. Desponding patriots said the insurgent States never would submit; the pure Copperheads said they never ought to submit. So, in a different, generous men of an impulsive temperament are sure that the States in question will never adopt the amendment; and the pure Copperheads are equally sure that they never ought to adopt it.

This talk of humiliation is utterly preposterous. It can not degrade or humiliate honorable States to ratify the necessary constitutional consequences of an amendment they have already accepted as a condition of reunion; while refusal to be reconstructed, except with a large advantage not contemplated by the Constitution, invites distrust of the sincerity of acquiescence in the result of the war. The citizens of States so refusing are not arbitrarily excluded from the Union; they are merely insisting that rebellion shall be rewarded with increased political power. If their fellow-citizens of the other States object to a claim so palpably unfair and so pregnant with dangerous agitation, they can not be justly accused of cherishing hostility and delaying reunion; while those who ask an act of such obvious justice and political necessity a condition to which high-spirited citizens can not be expected to submit, invoke resort to the appeals of an earlier and an evil time to excite renewed disturbance and imperil honorable reconciliation.

TRUTHS AND THREATS.

AS MR. SEWARD moved farther westward in the Presidential tour he evidently recovered some sense of the respect he owed to himself and to his position. Instead of the trivial and foolish talk in which he indulged in the State of New York, he made speeches at St. Louis and Indianapolis which were addressed to the intelligence of the people, and are therefore worthy of consideration. That at Indianapolis especially contained some passages which recalled the SEWARD of better days.

In this speech he said that under our form of government revolution is always wrong. "There is never any necessity, and therefore never any right of revolution here.....There can be no reform of our Government by violent and unlawful means.....Give me free speech and a free ballot, and there is no measure of social amelioration and progress which the American Government can not accomplish." These are fundamental truths, and they can not be too often nor too strongly repeated. Especially should they be pondered at this time when political orators appeal so often and so glibly of renewing the war, and of the success of this party or that as leading necessarily to bloodshed. This Mexican method of carrying an election campaign was introduced in this country by the Democratic party in 1860, when the chief argument against the success of LINCOLN at the polls was, that "the South" would not submit, and ought not to submit. MR. YANCEY came to New York and spoke at the Cooper Institute, at a Democratic meeting, and declared that we ought not to expect his section to submit to a Constitutional election which was disagreeable to it. He passed through a large part of the country, saying the same thing; and we do not remember that a single Democratic paper or orator protested against so atrocious and revolutionary a position. MR. YANCEY naturally assumed that silence meant assent. He assumed that assent all the more when he saw his declaration echoed by Northern orators and journals.

It is an unpleasant sign of the times that the same party is conducting the present canvass with the same assertion. MR. MONTGOMERY BLAIR and the other Presidential orators warn us that if the people constitutionally decide against what is called the President's policy there will be more terrible war, because a war of neighborhoods. The Democratic newspapers echo this menace. The New York Times does not hesitate to repeat it by calling upon the country "to avert the danger" by supporting the President's policy. That is to say, that if the people do not constitutionally and lawfully support that policy there is danger of war. From what quarter? The party which is constitutionally successful at the polls will not, of course, take up arms to support the result unless it be resisted. Will the vanquished resist their own will? If not, there can be no treason unless it be begun by those who, like MR. YANCEY and his friends in 1860, refuse to assent to the result of a lawful election.

The Union party stands, as it has always stood, for law and order. Its position could not be more truly and forcibly stated than by General WOODFORD, Union candidate for Lieutenant-Governor of New York, in his late speech in Brooklyn, a speech which is a model for dignity of tone and eloquent precision of statement. "At the outset of the canvass the Union party of the State of New York says, distinctly, if, in the election which is soon to take place, the policy of the President is sustained by the people, we will acquiesce in the result. We say as distinctly that if we the people pronounce our will in the hundering tone of majorities, we will compel submission and vindicate the law. This is the doctrine of republican democratic government. Every man, believing will vote according to their conscience, without asking the blessing of God upon the result; and when they have spoken, the will of the majority, within constitutional limits, shall be the law of the land."

FOUND DROWNED.

BEFORE the meeting of the first Philadelphia Convention we remarked that its only possible result could be facilitating the passage of a certain number of Union men into the Democratic party; for there could be but two parties in the coming elections, one of which would be the Union, and the other the Democratic party. We added that, of course, the Union men in the first Philadelphia Convention would either return to the old and natural party with which to, or they would vote and act with our opponents.

Certainly such a prophecy required no especial vision, for the result is realized, and the last week saw it verified. The Democratic Committee of this State called a Convention; the Philadelphia Convention approved the call; Democratic and Philadelphia ad lonnem delegates were appointed. The Convention met. Its President was a Democrat. Its orators were Democrats. Its whole management and tone were Democratic. It nominated a Democratic State Committee. It nominated four State officers, three of whom were Democrats. Its proceedings were reported in the Democratic papers as a Democratic assembly, and its ticket will be supported as the Democratic ticket.

Nothing could be more natural than that Democracy appropriate all the recruits so absolutely, and so pitilessly place them in the rear rank. The New York World, two months ago, sharply scolded the Union party for not acquiescing to the Democracy. "By his delay the Radicals have been able to consolidate the Union] party, and thereby to make out of the crisis of the difference, he will be able to carry with him but a comparatively small fragment." This was cold, but the sentence that followed was cruel. "As it is, he will be mainly dependent on the Democratic party, and the battle will be fought with advantages not materially greater than if the Democratic party would have possessed acting alone." It is perfectly true. The defection from the Union ranks is wholly unimportant. A few have fallen into Democratic ranks, but they have not diverted the current, and they have swollen it very little.

AT INDIANAPOLIS.

THE disturbance at Indianapolis upon occasion of the President's reception is greatly to be regretted and condemned. Every citizen of the United States is entitled, in every part of the country, to the respectful and courteous mission of his views. If any body dissents he may retire, but he has no right to interrupt. Of course none deplore and denounce the interruption at Indianapolis more sincerely than the opponents of the President, and it was one of those incidents to which every tumultuous crowd is liable.

Union men, whose cause depends upon the good sense and intelligence of the people for success, are bound to see that their opponents have every fair and free opportunity to discuss the great question. Every party which, like the old Slavery party, known as the Democracy, strives to silence a speaker by noise or disturbance of any kind, convicts itself of inability to answer him. The sad condition of the Southern States before the war, the profound ignorance which made the war possible, was due in great measure to the enforced silence of every speaker upon the most vital question of the time. When the President's organ, the Washington Intelligencer, in declaring contemptuously that "a Republican Convention" would not be allowed to assemble in any Southern State, merely announces that the cardinal principle of the Government is not in the least understood there. Indeed, no former advocate of slavery, or present apologist of its continuing spirit, could or can possibly comprehend the real spirit of our institutions.

In themselves Mr. JOHNSON'S opinions are of no importance. They are worthy attention only because he is the President of the United States. As to his character, he has no doubt whatever of the popular heart, except that which is derived from the fact that he broke with his party at the outbreak of the war, and was a conspicuous and faithful Unionist to the end. His opportunity afterward was greater than is often given to man. If he has proved wholly unequal to it he is more to be pitied. We are rather to be blamed who supposed he could be equal to the great ordeal. We sincerely regret that his journey was marked by an event so unfortunate in itself, and so little creditable to the patriotic city in which it occurred.

A VOICE FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

THE following remarkable article from the Raleigh (North Carolina) Standard, edited by the President's Provisional Governor of that State, W. W. HOLDEN, shows that the Union party has efficient and unexpected friends and co-workers in the Southern part of the country. The moderation and decision of its tone are equally significant, and there can be no question that it expresses the profound conviction of the most intelligent and faithful Union men of the South. "The appeal now," says the Standard, "is to the action of the United States who suppressed the rebellion. It is for them to say on what terms the Government shall be restored." We commend the article to the careful consideration of our leaders:

"We stated in our last that the lease had at length been fairly and finally joined between the President and Congress. The President stands upon and upon his policy, that the States are entitled to representation without further amendment to the Constitution; while the Congressional party, comprising the great mass of the Republicans, hold that further amendments to the Constitution are indispensable in order to place the recently insurgent States on a loyal basis, and to insure quiet in the future by excluding leading participants in the rebellion from holding office.

"Both sides seem to hold that the present Congress cannot be dissolved, or prorogued. The Philadelphia Convention, whose proceedings the President has so recently indorsed, declared that 'loyal representatives' be admitted; and the President has repeatedly declared that the States will be entitled to representation when they shall have complied in good faith with any existing Constitutional or legal test.'

"This, then, is the issue. It is not a new one, but for those members elect who can not take this oath to resign, and let their places be filled by those who can 'comply' with the 'legal test.' This would seem to be the obviously proper course, especially after the call, by the Philadelphia Convention, for the admission of 'loyal representatives.'

"For our part, our principles are not to be changed or altered by the will of Conventions, or by any cause that will not convince us that those principles are erroneous. We feel sure that we have undergone no change since May, 1865. We thought then, and we think now, that the Union should be restored only on the unmistakable basis of loyalty; that the President is merely a co-worker with the Congress in effecting this result; and that, while the President has indicated his work, as he declares he has, it was for the Congress to investigate it, to consider it, to modify it, or to accept it or not as their judgment might choose. We have never understood that the action of the President in this respect controlled the Congress, or that their hands was bound to accept unconditionally the work of restoration as accomplished and presented to them by him.

"We feel sure that the President and the Congress are both actuated by the purest motives. We regret the breach between them. This breach is most probably incurable. The appeal now is to the people of the States which have suppressed the rebellion. It is for them to say on what terms the Government shall be restored. We expect to be content with those terms. Our people will be zealous and interested spectators of the struggle now going on in the Northern and Western States, but they are not in a condition to take much part in this struggle. They can only look on and hope that the right may be best for the whole country. Our sympathies are with those who are most devoted to the Union; and who are determined to resist, with a loyal heart, the dictation of Northern Copperheads or Southern traitors."

WHICH IS WHICH?

THE friends of the President in the State of New York are invited to vote for MR. HOFFMAN as Governor. On the day that MR. HOFFMAN was nominated the President said at Cincinnati: "I will call upon any man here, and defy him to put his finger upon an instance in which I have swerved a hair's-breadth from the platform upon which the late lamented President and myself were elected."

Just before MR. LINCOLN and MR. JOHNSON were elected, MR. HOFFMAN made a speech in Wall Street, in which he said: "The merchants, brokers, and capitalists of New York have not on this occasion to declare it to their honest conviction that the only certain way of bestowing peace with the Union is by barring from power ABRAHAM LINCOLN with his minions, and electing in his place a patriot and statesman in the person of General MCCLELLAN."

Chief among LINCOLN'S "minions," of course, was his military Governor of Tennessee, ANDREW JOHNSON. That "minion" declares that he stands now exactly where he stood then, while his friends are exhorted to vote for MR. HOFFMAN, who declared that the "minion" ought to be hurled from power. If the President stands now where he stood then, MR. HOFFMAN and his friends can support him only because they have renounced their principles of two years ago. If they have done so, their present principles are of no importance. If they have not done so, and MR. JOHNSON stands where he stood, then MR. HOFFMAN and his friends support a man whom they declare to be totally unfit for office.

The Union men who propose to vote for MR. HOFFMAN may choose which horn of the dilemma they will. But those among them who truly honored ABRAHAM LINCOLN must vote with extreme de'ight for a man who said by direct implication that LINCOLN was not a patriot and statesman while MCCLELLAN was!

PHOTOMICROGRAPHY.

THIS hard word means the application of photography to the representation of objects as seen with the microscope. The inestimable advantage to medical science of such an application is evident, and it is agreeable to learn from competent foreign men of science that our Army Medical Museum stands in this respect far beyond any public institution or private investigator in the world.

DR. R. L. MAIRET, who writes to the London Journal of Photography to call attention to "the magnificent results in photomicrography obtained in America by Bevet-Captain JOHN C. COWEN, Assistant Surgeon United States Army, in the laboratory of the Army Medical Museum," DR. MADDOX then enters into some statistical details, and adds that they "are so far in advance of any thing I have seen in the country that the greatest credit is due to Captain COWEN."

Those who appreciate the immense service to humanity of these representations of the exact aspects of obscure and unusual disease, and of the infinite varieties and results of wounds, will duly honor the patient, accurate, ingenious, and intelligent attention necessary to perfect them.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEW YORK DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

At the New York State Democratic Convention, at Albany, on the 18th instant, Mayor John T. Hoffman was nominated for Governor, Hon. Erastus Brooks for Canal Commissioner, and William W. Wright for Canal Commissioner, and Peter Masterton for Prison Inspector. The platform, which was in general consonance with that of the Philadelphia Convention, appeared conditionally in the State as well as in the United States Governments.

NEWS ITEMS.

The Soldiers' and Sailors' Convention met at Cleveland, September 17, and was addressed by General HOOD, who declared himself for the Presidential policy. General GRANGER was chosen permanent Chairman.

The Democratic meeting at the Fredonia Farm from North Carolina represents that the condition of the farmers is generally prosperous, and that there are at present but about 1000 dependents, notwithstanding that there is a colored population of nearly 300,000.

By the census of the city of Mobile, just completed, the population foots up 40,000 souls. Of this number 30,000 are negroes.

The match of the grand Billiard Tournament in this city is that Cyrille Dion, champion of all Canada, wins the first prize—the champion cue; Edward J. Plaisted, champion of Pennsylvania, the second—a full-sized billiard table; Joseph P. Gallagher will take the T. M. Carthy, champion of Indiana, third prize—the silver table, elegantly engraved; and Mr. Jos. Bewley, champion of Ohio—the gold watch and chain.

FOREIGN NEWS.

BY TELEGRAPH.

September 19:

(LONDON.)—The Eastern question seems to be looking for a solution. Greek affairs assume a more serious cast every day, creating more to obtain the control of the Danubian Principalities, Turkey, consequently, and Greece herself.

The Porte has determined to recognize Prince CHARLES as Hereditary Sovereign of Roumania, the Principalities.

(PARIS.)—General Marquez, Minister to Congress, at Mexico, has been recalled, and will go out to Mexico to make room for the service after the French evacuation of the country.

September 20:

(VIENNA.)—A decree has been issued by the Emperor ordering the whole Austrian army to be placed upon a war footing.

September 21:

(PARIS.)—The Emperor Napoleon has sent a special mission to Mexico to confer with MAXIMILIAN.

The Patrie denies that the Emperor NAPOLEON admits that the Empire of MEXICO has withered away, and that the country should be left to itself.

(LIVERPOOL.)—The Canard steamships Europa and Thrysia sailed this afternoon for Boston direct, with a regiment of Hussars for service in Canada.

September 22:

(TRIESTE.)—Advices from Athens state that the Cretan Assembly have voted for the annexation of the Island of Candia to Greece.

September 23:

(LONDON.)—It is said that Great Britain has urged upon the Porte the immediate necessity that the Porte has refused.

(VIENNA.)—We are on the verge of another war, which threatens to equal in extent that just ended. Austria is already fighting with Prussia, and Italy has made unreasonable demands, to which Italy will not submit. Austria has encouraged the debt of Venetia, and withholds Venetia property which she has confiscated.

September 24:

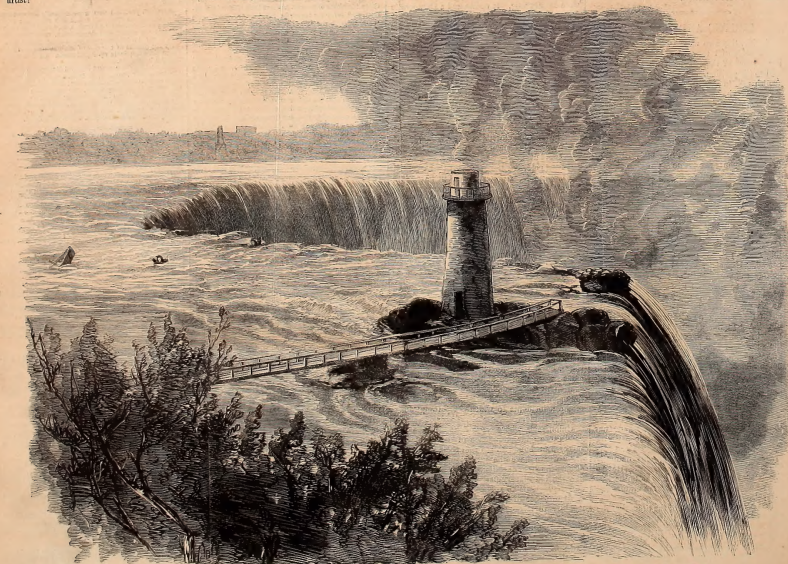
(LONDON.)—Prussia has emphatically notified Austria that she will not suffer Italy, her ally, to be insulted and defrauded, and that if Austria persists in her present course war must follow.

(VIENNA.)—The honeyward march of Prussian troops has been greedily arrested, and the demoralization of the retiring army stopped.

(DRESDEN.)—Hostility of the backs war. There is no reply from Austria to the notification of Prussia. It is now not a question as to whether troops be sent from both in motion for Vienna.

September 25:

(SOUTHAMPTON.)—The mail steamer from Rio de Janeiro brings the unconfirmed information that the people of the Allies have been badly defeated by the Paraguayans.



ACCIDENT AT JOHNSTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA, SEPTEMBER 14, 1866.—[SEE PAGE 614.]

OVER NIAGARA FALLS.

On the 12th instant two men in a boat were carried by the force of the current and a violent gale of wind over Niagara Falls. This incident, which we illustrate on this page, is thus narrated by our artist:

"FRANK LEUTZE, a ferry-man, and a Mr. COOPER, postmaster, both of Chippewa, Canada West, hoisting sail in the ferry-man's boat crossed to the American shore safely, conveying a passenger. Having accomplished this, they embarked on their return trip, rowing. The wind blowing a perfect gale, they were driven, before reaching two-thirds of their journey, back into the swifter currents, and when near the head of Goat Island they were discovered by a few persons on that island, at which time the two men—apparently fully impressed with the fearful dilemma in which they were placed—were rowing fiercely yet regularly up stream, but all to no avail, as at this point the waters commence their terrific velocity. Surely and speedily they were drawn toward the falls, still struggling desperately, until the boat plunging over the rocks it was capsized about 100 yards above the falls. Then, after struggling amidst the dashing waters for a few brief moments, still clinging to their boat or their oars, they disappeared from view over the falls."

FRANK LEUTZE AND MR. COOPER CARRIED OVER NIAGARA FALLS, SEPTEMBER 12, 1866.—[SKETCHED BY MR. F. L. BLAKE.]

"PALISSY THE POTTER."

THERE is no story of "self-help," or the "pursuit of knowledge under difficulties," more deeply interesting and pathetic than that of BERNARD PALISSY, the self-taught potter of Saintes. And no such narrative of heroic perseverance has been related with more graphic and dramatic power, or filled in with more picturesque and illustrative historical accessories, than Mr. MORLEY'S "Life of Palissy the Potter."

All our readers are familiar with those plates, dishes, and other ceramic objects, glazed with a peculiar mottled enamel and ornamented in relief, for the most part with fishes, lizards, reptiles, insects, leaves, and flowers, and named, after their inventor and producer, Palissy-ware. The ornaments are modeled with a truthfulness evincing the closest and most loving study of nature, all the subjects being taken either from the fauna and flora of the neighborhood of Saintes—where he settled, after years of wandering, as a painter, particularly on glass—or of the valley of the Seine, the latter years of his life having been spent in Paris. The reliefs are also treated with a delicacy and disposed with an artistic feeling which, united to their truth to nature, give to the pieces they decorate a value apart from many of the conventional productions addressed to the luxurious. Nevertheless, to us Palissy-ware is interesting chiefly for its quaintly curious and playful originality; and it is hard to realize that works of almost childlike fancy should be the outcome of one of the longest and bravest struggles against difficulties of every description of which we have any record—should be the chief triumph of a great artistic genius, of a natural philosopher centuries in advance of his time, and of an earnest and uncompromising Huguenot, who, but for the precious secret he had won, would have been burned at the stake long before the good old age at which he died a prisoner in the Bastile. Several weary years did PALISSY spend, enduring, as he himself tells us, misery and reproach of all kinds (sometimes being suspected of uttering base coin), occupied in discovering a white enamel glaze. And then his difficulties had only commenced, for he had still, unaided, to learn the potter's art in its highest form. In his experiments the slender family resources derived from his glass-painting and surveying were repeatedly exhausted, debts were incurred, and, greatest trial of all, his wife was converted by his ruinous enthusiasm into a bitter scold. He had to pay an assistant with the clothes off his own back. In one critical experiment he had to feed the fire of his furnace with the planks from the flooring and the very doors of his house.

The last and severest disappointment which PALISSY underwent before that ultimate success which secured him the patronage and protection of the greatest in the land is the subject of the admirable picture, lately in the Royal Academy Exhibition, by Mrs. E. M. WARD, the accomplished wife of the distinguished Royal Academician, which we have engraved on this page. This time the potter had virtually vanquished every difficulty, and was right in all his calculations as regards the preparation of the enamels and the proper degree of heat for firing them, and yet the whole batch of works he had placed in the furnace was spoiled. "The elaborate designs," says Mr. MORLEY, "the play of BERNARD'S fancy as an artist for six months; the debt incurred for maintenance and wages of the assistant; the hands wounded with labor at the furnace; the money begged and borrowed to buy chemicals; the weeks of drudgery in grinding, the hope and self-denial of eight months—all led to 'sorrow and distresses to abundantly augmented.'" This mischance occurred "because," says PALISSY, "the mortar of which I had built my furnace had been full of flints, which, feeling the vehemence of the fire (at the same time that my enamels had begun to liquefy), burn into several pieces, making a variety of cracks and explosions within the said furnace. Then, because the splinters of the flints struck against my work, the enamel, which was already liquefied and converted into a glutinous matter, retained the said flints and held them attached on all sides of my vessels and medallions, which, except for that, would have been beautiful." It is highly characteristic of Palissy that, although he might have made them if fierce for these works, damaged as they were, yet he preferred to break them to pieces in order that they should not injure the great reputation that he well knew he should now attain. "If one could sketch a cease like this," says the biographer, "with the pencil of the pen, it would make a pretty picture. The dilapidated cathoun, its beaches rudely filled up with green boughs; Palissy, ground in his one apron, tattered as dress, with a litter of broken pots and pans, vases and medallions, the products of his rich taste and fiery genius, at his feet; his angry creditors convicted to witness the potter's expected triumph; the village gossips pouring their much talk over his head and spirit; his thin, pale children crowding, wondering about; his lean wife—God forgave her on the instant—pouring on him maledictions, ignorant or careless how his heart would spin in that hour of anguish to receive one syllable of woman's consolation." Of the way that Mrs. WARD has realized this scene in her "goodly picture" our engraving will give some idea to those who have not seen the original. The only divergence from the author's account in her version is that of representing the potter's wife as betrayed, if only for a moment, into sorrowful pity for her husband at this supreme moment of agonizing disappointment. And notwithstanding that PALISSY himself tells us that he "had nothing but reproaches in the house—in place of consolation they gave me maledictions," we would fain hope there is room for the painter's assumption, pregnant as it does from a true womanly instinct of commiserating sympathy. Among the accessories of the picture will be noted various items, such as the ballet, the vials containing natural models preserved in spirits, and so forth, which help to tell the pitiful yet glorious story.

NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD ASSISTED.

WE illustrate on our first page the result of a mis. placed switch on the New York Central Railroad at Canastota, Madison County, New York, on the night of the 15th instant. The switch-tender, having changed the switch to permit a freight-train going east to pass on to the main track, was called in the meanwhile to attend to some matter which he had neglected to return and place it in proper position. He did not discover his neglect till the engineer of the passenger train going east whistled "Down brakes," and a general smash-up was then inevitable. The engine of this train plunged into the ditch, disembarked among the flying timbers and torn-up track, when it was struck by the engine of a freight-train going west at a high rate of speed. The shock, of course, the sudden escape of the pent-up steam, and the darkness of the night made the few seconds in which it occurred seem but a sudden flash of fire and bewildering. The westward-bound engine first struck the side of the one going east, tearing its covering from its sides like bark from a tree, completely demolishing the tender, knocking the loaded freight-cars from the track, and after passing completely through two others from side to side, finally stopped in a nearly perpendicular position, its forward end resting on the top of a freight-car which it had capsized in its wild career. Many persons were killed outright, and a large number were wounded. The cost of this misplaced switch will be more than $150,000.

Our illustration represents the scene after the collision, with the wheat, glass-ware, and merchandise generally, strewn in confusion upon the ground.

BURNING OF THE CLIPPER "HORNET."

OUR engraving on page 616 illustrates an unfortunate disaster which occurred to the Hornet, one of the finest of the Australian line of clippers. What story can be more thrilling than that of a ship's crew in open boats, one thousand miles from land, compelled to witness the burning of their ship, and then to drift for days upon the Pacific, almost without hope, and subject to the exposure of sea and sky, and the pangs of starvation?

The following account is given by MR. THOMAS, the third master of the Hornet, and MR. CLOUGH, a seaman:

The American ship Hornet, of 1478 tons burden, Captain JOSIAH A. MCCURDA, left New York on the 10th of January, bound for San Francisco, with a general cargo, consisting of coals, iron, 6200 boxes candles, 3400 cases brandy, 1000 bbls. and the usual assortment of miscellaneous merchandise. Beyond speaking one or two vessels, nothing occurred on the passage out, and they of note till seven o'clock on the morning of the 3d of May, when the look-out from the main-mast head saw one of the hands to draw variable, taking a lantern. While on a signal for a collision subsequently arose, but which set fire to the sails in the sail-locker between decks. The cook, working under deck, discharged a gun, while the mate remained below, trying to put out the fire with buckets, which he took off the hatchway to seaward.

The ship was at this time scudding along beautifully under a six knot somewhat trade-wind. She had got completely under the ocean-going provided with a penal track of vessels bound to California, in longitude 115° 0' west. The hatches at the time were off for ventilating the ship, as is customary. Hardly had the alarm been given before dense and dense smoke came out of the after-hatch, communicating almost instantaneously to the "round-jack-sail," which was hanging skewed up. In a very few minutes the flames burst through the main hatch and set fire to the mainsail. With the first alarm Captain MCCURDA was promptly on deck, and set one watch to work endeavoring to control the fire, while the other watch was ordered to get the boats ready and lower them away. The boats were successfully lowered without trouble, but in launching the long-boat the bottom was torn in by an eye-bolt, which stopped in the bottom about a foot square, which was stopped up with blankets and shirts during the entire cruise. The boats were provided with oils, but these being in the sail-locker it was impossible to get at them. A sending-sail, a main-royal, and some pieces of canvas lying loose on deck were thrown into the boats, with what provisions were accessible, consisting of four hams, twelve lbs. of smoked meats, a box of raisins, seven pieces of pork, one hundred pounds of bread, and four buckets of raw potatoes. Four canisters and a barrel, containing in all but twelve gallons of water, were also passed in the boats. All the ship's chronometers, sextons, compasses, quadrants, and charts were saved, also several books, but could not say what the men stood by.

At this time the whole ship was in flames overhead, the fire creeping and leaping from one to other, and the cordage, rigging, sails, and masts in one vast sheet of flame. It was impossible to get anything more from the cabin, the quarters just seven o'clock, or three-quarters of an hour after the fire broke out. The crew had to leave the ship, and all hands took to the long-boat and the two quarter-boats. Here was one of those grand sights often described but seldom witnessed. The ship, with her huge spars and sails, was gliding cheerily along her course, now all wrapped in flames, forming a pillar of fire by night and cold and costly pyrotechnic display in which the masts, spars, and rigging formed the bold relief. It was a sight enough to strike terror into the bravest heart, when he remembered that it was now deemed safe rules to the nearest land, and the chances of reaching land were to many. At eight o'clock the mizzen-mast of the ship went over her side, but the burning hull, like a huge log, kept on her course before the wind. Here and boxes of candles, made an awful conflagration, lighting the harbour for one hour after midnight. Here the flames and smoke rolled up in black masses, reaching up to the very clouds.

The boats remained by the ship during the day and night, while she was burning, the cargo gradually consumed the ship lightened, just as she would sloop, like the dead of a human creature. Here the boats were no expositions during the burning. At five o'clock on the morning of the 4th, the fire had burned through the hull to the water, the noble clipper made a plunge forward, and went down bow first, leaving no trace of her but a few charred spars and pieces of wood floating about. This was in north latitude 0° 30' and longitude 110° 8', about 1000 miles due south from Cape St. Lucas, the southern extremity of California.

During the first night Captain MCCURDA, who had throughout his misfortunes displayed a cool bravery equal to the occasion, distributed the men into the three boats, according to their capacity. In the long-boat with him were the first mate, the third mate, and eleven seamen.

The boat is the only one of the three which has been heard from. On the night of the 5th all the provisions and water were equally distributed among the three boats, of which the two smaller ones were kept in tow by the Captain's boat. The Captain kept in the track of California-bound vessels, hoping to sight some passing ship. On the 7th, 8th, and 12th six dolphins, a bonita, and turtle were caught, and divided among the three boats, giving the crews plenty of meat, but as they had no fire to eat they were unable to keep it. All the boats' crews were now put on an allowance of a gill of water, half a biscuit, and half a pound of meat per day. But when it rained, all hands were privileged to drink all the water they could catch.

On the 14th it became impossible, under a strong trade-wind, for the long-boat to continue towing the others, as the strain and jerking were so severe as to endanger both. The Captain therefore decided to cut on the mate's boat, which was done in long. 114° W., lat. 15° N. Three days afterward it was decided, for the same reason, to cut off the second boat's tow-line, and after coming alongside, dividing the beggarly remnant of stores, and bidding each other adieu, they cast off and left the boats to drift. By this time the three boats were still in sight of each other, each having a navigator in charge and heading on the same course. The Captain of the long company and from this time we have no tidings of what befell the two mates' boats.

After reaching longitude 117° West, and latitude 17° North, Captain MCCURDA decided to head for "Ameringa," Acapulco, and accordingly shaped his course to latitude 17° North, longitude 153° 30' West. The boat spent twenty-three days in reaching this point, without any signs of land. Thus far they had endeavored to keep in the usual track of California-bound vessels, in hopes of meeting a passing sail. But failing to find land here, they headed SW., in hopes of reaching the Islands.

At this time they had no meat, and nothing to eat but the boat biscuit, which they had soaked as it was rolled in, with their regular two gills of water. Pieces of the canvas and the staves of a bucket being used as food a saline relish to them, served as the main stand-by, while the leather of the boat's boots was soaked in salt water so as to make the leather soft. This served as their meat. For days they chewed the leather of their shirts and handkerchiefs. By some accident there was a supply of tobacco in the boat, which served to allay their thirst, and may have been a principal means of preserving their lives. During the night the passage the utmost discipline prevailed, with watches of two men as regards to be on deck at all times. Naked boat-by, and all hands took turns bailing to keep her afloat. In the strong trade-winds, heavy sea, and squalls which frequently almost swamped her, she was kept buoyant.

After forty-three days of wandering, about 11 A.M. on the 27th of Land-ho! was given, and the lofty summit of Mauna Kea, in the Island of Hawaii, loomed. The land was sighted a day or two sooner than they expected, having, in fact, been driven out of a course which was seen by those on shore, but at first it was supposed to be a belong party. Mr. MCCURDA remembers near the breakers, off Lanipahoehoe, two natives swam off to the boat, and, taking the destitute condition of the crew, climbed into it, shook hands with every one, and, by signs, offered to pilot her to shore, and brought the boat safely to the beach.

Some of the natives remained on board up, and on trying to do so fell over perfectly helpless, and unable to stand, and were carried ashore. Others, more powerful, were able to walk. Here the boat was hauled high and dry, and all hands took turns bailing to keep her afloat. In the strong trade-winds, heavy sea, and squalls which frequently almost swamped her, she was kept buoyant.

After forty-three days of wandering, about 11 A.M. on the 27th of Land-ho! was given, and the lofty summit of Mauna Kea, in the Island of Hawaii, loomed. The land was sighted a day or two sooner than they expected, having, in fact, been driven out of a course which was seen by those on shore, but at first it was supposed to be a belong party. Mr. MCCURDA remembers near the breakers, off Lanipahoehoe, two natives swam off to the boat, and, taking the destitute condition of the crew, climbed into it, shook hands with every one, and, by signs, offered to pilot her to shore, and brought the boat safely to the beach.

Some of the natives remained on board up, and on trying to do so fell over perfectly helpless, and unable to stand, and were carried ashore. Others, more powerful, were able to walk. Here the boat was hauled high and dry, and all hands were received with the greatest kindness by the natives, and were brought to the house of Mr. JONES PEAR, agent of J. C. KING & Co., who received them with the greatest kindness. Here the crew found by all kinds of fruits and vegetables—such as potatoes, bananas, tomatoes, &c.—which they enjoyed much. Mr. J., desiring it not prudent for them to eat these, set apart a certain quantity for each meal, with the zeal of a Florence Nightingale. Next morning they were allowed to eat a little more, and so on, with very great caution, their best providing them more at each succeeding meal.

Word having been dispatched to Hilo, the American Consul, Mr. SPENCER, came up with a horse-team and brought the sailors to that port—Captain MCCURDA, Mr. THOMAS, and seaman CLOUGH, at Lanipahoehoe till they gained more strength. At Hilo the Consul provided for all their necessities, and bestowed much care on them.

The whole party in the long-boat thus reached land safely after having been forty-three days at sea, on short allowance part of the time, and less allowance most of the voyage. What is more remarkable, there was no sickness, nor any of that dizziness which is so often the accompaniment of persons kept in a starving condition for days at sea.

It is considered probable that the two smaller boats were lost; indeed, it is almost a miracle that the long-boat was saved.

THE ACCIDENT AT JOHNSTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA.

WHEN the President was on his way to Harrisburg from Pittsburg, a sad accident occurred in connection with a demonstration in his honor at Johnstown. This occurrence is illustrated on page 612.

Between the bridge and railroad office and over the canal was a platform, erected for the occasion, on which probably 400 or 500 persons—men, women, and children—were closely gathered. The structure gave way as soon as the Presidential party was leaving. First one section of it fell, precipitating the occupants to the ground, a height of apparently 20 feet. The second part soon followed, and in less than 30 seconds these persons were thrown one upon another, or buried beneath the ruins.

The platform was across the canal was 75 feet long and from 15 to 18 feet wide. It broke in the centre, and as a consequence its occupants were precipitated to the ground, a distance of about 20 feet. The timbers and human beings were mixed up promiscuously, all falling in a confused mass. Some had both arms and legs broken, and others were injured to a less extent with contused heads and severe bruises. Seven or eight persons were killed, while four or more were in a dying condition. About ninety persons were severely, and a large number were slightly, injured.

THE UNION FIRE-ENGINE OF SALEM, MASSACHUSETTS.

AS engraving on page 620 represents the oldest fire-engine in the country, named the Union, which, together with the original records, were presented to the Essex Institute by the late Union and Naumkeag Engine Company No. 5 of Salem, Massachusetts, to William Penn Steam Engine and Hose Company No. 5, which succeeds their recent visit to Salem. MR. JOSEPH N. LARRABEE, to whom we are indebted for this sketch, furnishes the following details:

The tub or box of the engine is three feet eight inches long, twenty inches wide, and twenty inches deep. A rail, and runs on wheels twenty inches in diameter. The cylinders are four and one-half inches diameter with six and one-half inches stroke. The air-chamber, valves, and suction inlet, with a gate that water may be taken either through hose or from tub, are similar to those in engines of recent construction. It was built in London by one of two rival engine-makers — NEWSHAM or FOWLE, as it corresponds with the description of their engines given in the "Encyclopædia," and is supposed to be the first ever brought to this country. The following is a copy of the inscription:

"That the petitioners should procure an engine to the acceptance of the selectmen; and further, that in case of the refusal of any one of the petitioners, where no male heir should be left to supply, it should be supplied by the major part of the engine company. With the consent of the selectmen." The Union engine was accepted April 2, 1793, and the company received the name of the Union Engine Company.

In April, 1795, a second engine, which was presented to the town by BENJAMIN LYNDE, was received and placed in the town house, in the care of this company. It was continued in use until April, 1799, when the Essex engine was purchased by the town. On the 1st of October, 1807, another was procured, named, by vote of company, Naumkeag (the name given by the Indians to our harbor and town), in addition to the Essex. The company still retained possession of the Union engine. These records are fully corroborated by the town records, and show that the company's claims of owning the oldest engine in the country, and being the oldest engine company in the United States that can show any historical existence. The list of members obtained from the records numbers 557 names, all but 200 of which became members since the formation of the company of many of our best citizens of the present and past century. Among the number are NATHANIEL BOWDITCH, the world's great mathematician, who was a member in 1794-96; WILLIAM GRAY, familiarly known as BILLY GRAY, the millionaire of Salem, who has enjoyed the honors of the first places in town, city, and State.

In April, 1861, the company were notified that the engine was wanted for exhibition at the Patent Department in consequence of the introduction of steam fire-engines; and at a final meeting they voted to present it to the Government, which was done by presenting them to the Philadelphia company.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

SINCE of the late unfavorable weather, the prevailing toilets, both in Paris and at the baths de mer, are composed of delicate materials of every light shade of color. Even where less delicate materials are worn, light tints and narrow black and gray stripes hold their ground. A new black alpaca, white or pale gray or striped foulards and alpacas, with trimmings of blue, mauve, or applegreen velvet; or robes of pale chèvre trimmed with straw passementerie, or lines with insertions of taffeta. Outdoor robes are very rarely worn with trains, and almost invariably with a double skirt, the upper one being either looped up with bows and rosettes or rosette of ribbon, or else made to fall no lower than the knees, in which latter case it is either scolloped or vandyked at the bottom, and trimmed with velvet and ornaments of jet. These double skirts are generally not only of a different material, but of a different shade of color; for instance, the under skirt or pupe will be either violet, mauve, or blue silk, in which case sleeves are frequently worn to match; the upper skirt and basque being perhaps pale gray, straw-color, or very light fawn, or with narrow black or gray or mauve-color stripes on a white ground. The most fashionable color stripes, such as rose, cerise, sky-blue, orange, and emerald green, are no longer to be seen in outdoor costumes. If the dress is of one delicate color, pale rose is decidedly worn at the bains de mer, the trimming of the robe and the chapeau is invariably in harmony with it. With these colored gauze hats black robes are likely to be much worn as the autumn advances, in which case the robe, if caught up, will be looped up with velvet bands or bows of the same hue as the pupe, which will be trimmed with black guipure.

Colour robes are generally made with trains, the skirt being extremely scanty at the back, and of course very much gored. Occasionally there are a few plaits at the back. The bottom of the robe is sloped as a skirt to fall over the feet in front and trail for nearly a yard on the ground behind. When the skirt without trains these robes are have invariably two skirts, the under one being at times ornamented with a rather deep flounce, composed of alternate puffings of the material of the robe and insertions of guipure.

There is nothing new in the way of chapeaux; hats being almost invariably worn both in the country and at the sea-side. The light, glazed satin-hat, trimmed with scarlet velvet or light blue ribbon, is much in favor.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1.—Robe of linen, bordered with a cord of moderate thickness and trimmed with taffeta. From the main breadth of the skirt, which is of the same material as the dress, forming, with the corsage, a kind of jacket. At the sides are pointed ornaments, with silk tassels at the extremities. Chapeau Neapolitan, trimmed with a veil and bandeau. Ornaments in straw passementerie, and fastened under the chignon, and bretelles (bows) with a loop in front. Bandeau, formed of ribbon and bordered with lace.

Fig. 2.—Robe of pelt de chèvre, ornamented with large vandykes, trimmed with a delicate straw passementerie. A very pretty trimming runs down seam of the dress. The jacket has a tassel at every point, and square basque. The sleeves terminate up, and the front. Chapeau Lamballe in straw, trimmed with velvet.

Fig. 3.—Robe of foulard trimmed with taffeta ribbon laid flat and forming a jacket ornamentation. The pupe and sleeves are of thick silk, the trimming of which harmonizes with that of the skirt. Chapeau fanchon of goffered crape, with star-shaped ornaments and sleeves in straw passementerie.

Fig. 4.—Short robe of black taffeta, cut at the bottom in deep vandykes, which are headed with ribbon studded with bright steel ornaments, the effect of the same being repeated on the corsage. The pupe, of blue taffeta, is bordered with a double ruche of black ribbon. The jacket, which is also lined and edged with a bouillon of the same material as the pupe, and is trimmed to fit tight at the waist with a belt. The chapeau, of white crape, has the crown covered with silver and small jet stars, is bordered at the edges with blue velvet, and has jet ornaments hanging round the rim.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

IF does happen, little readers, that misfortunes as well as blessings in time are sometimes found in flowergardens. The best seed, the best catalogue of directions, the best care, the utmost patience, will not always bring perfect success; and it is just as well to know this beforehand, and not expect too much. Part of the seeds will not come up, perhaps some of the little plants will hang their heads and die when they are transplanted. Then your little dog scratches up one young plant to bury his dinner bone, and hungry birds will peck another in a row after a lying grasshopper. All these things will be now and then; and so, without indulging in melancholy expectations, it is well to know of them in the heat of patience and perseverance growing in the corner of every garden, and to pluck one or two of their small, yawn leaves whenever some more favorite plant is missing.

Lily said she thought every thing happened in her garden that could happen and more; and yet that was not true, for Primrose and Clover had each a special variety or two of gardening sorrows. The first kind, indeed, came to them all, and very much alike—was a succession of cold, biting, rough-edged winds. The little seedlings, newly set out, could make no resistance to the wild weather, even with a kind of blasting effect, beating them down, and almost cutting them off at the root. That part of the seed which withered and turned yellow in the little seedling never held up its head again. Lily declared the winds were like pinks in every-time became along, and that was very often in those days. Close following on the heels of the wind came the rain—pouring, dashing, driving rain, sometimes in half-drowning those plants that had survived the wind. It was a great pity, Clover said, that the very first of the flowers should be put to such a very uncommon season, for she could hardly tell now whether she had done the work well or ill. Between whiles the sun would shine and the wind cease for a little, the children would run out to see what could be done—carefully covering pinks and petunias with all the little flower-pots they could find, scraping up the earth which the rain had washed away from their roots, and giving the weary little seedlings a world of pity and tender encouragement. And thus nursed and cared for, and with the help of a sunshiny day now and then, some of the little plants looked up again, and began to grow and thrive. Small fresh green leaves appeared at the top of some of the tiny stems, and every thing seemed joyful. But those of the tender plants were not yet set out; a few of the half-hardy kinds were not yet planted; and several of the other seed-bags were not quite empty; for Sam had advised the children not to sow all of each sort at once, but to keep back a few for a second planting, lest the first should not do well. Many councils had been held about the weather, and whether it was time yet to venture the last of the precious seed treasure in the ground.

"I think I'll plant all mine to-day," said Lily, kneeling with one knee on the low window-seat and looking out at the sky, where the wind was struggling with rain-clouds. "It's getting all blue off there in the west, and papa said if it did we should have a fine day."

"But the ground will be so wet," said the prudent Grace, who is so hard to sow the seeds nicely when the ground's wet."

"Well—to-morrow, then," said Lily. "Look, Oliver, look! Is not Mr. Jarvis carriage driving along the road? And it's turning down here, I do declare!—and Maria's inside!"

The carriage came on, and stopped at the little gate, and Miss Maria got out and picked her way delicately up to the house over the smooth, damp gravel-walk.

"Well!" she said to her three friends, who were gathered at the door to meet her, "I've come to stay all day. Aren't you glad? My father said he didn't think it would rain; and it did, you know, it couldn't touch me in the coach. How do you do?"

"Oh, we're well," said Lily.

"Well, so am I," said Maria. "My mother thought it was too early to come, because you wouldn't be dressed, but that don't matter, you know; you can dress while I'm here, and then I can see all your frocks."

"Don't you want to come and look at our gardens," said Oliver, "before you take your hat off? We always go just as soon as it stops raining, to see if the plants have grown."

"Why, don't plants always grow?" said Maria, as she followed them out. "Our garden's always full, I'm sure."

"Oh no! just look how pretty!—Prim's sweet-peas are coming up!" And pretty indeed the soft, green shoots were, breaking their way through the brown mould.

"I thought they would never come," said Prim-rose, bending over them in her delight. "I planted 'em a very deep: and now see how they is! Do you have a great many sweet-peas, Maria?"

"We don't have any," said Maria; "they're old-fashioned! I told our gardener I thinks old-fashioned flowers are dreadful. He likes all the new things. My aunt—she's ever so funny sometimes, and has been staying with us a while—she asked Andrews where the sweet-peas were planted, and Andrews looked real angry, and he said, 'We have no such things in this garden, ma'am, I am happy to say!'"

"Why sure they are not common," remarked little Primrose, innocently; "but I got a whole paperful from Mr. Vick for five cents, and now they've come up. I'm so glad!"

"Dear me! what little bits of places!" said Maria, walking on to the next garden. "I suppose you don't have more than two or three sorts of flowers?"

"Indeed we do!" said Clover, flushing a little. "I have a dozen sorts, and the others have about as many. I've got plants out hyacinth beans and canary-bird vine along the fence. They're growing in pots now."

"Hyacinth beans!" said Maria; "I never heard of such things. It sounds just like vegetables. Are they good to eat?"

"I don't think any body 'll ever eat my hyacinth beans," said Clover, a little indignantly.

"Well, you needn't be angry," said Maria; "it sounds so funny, you know, to have a flower-garden all full of beans and peas. We don't have any thing but fuchsias, and geraniums, and Japan lilies, and such things."

The children were silent, glowing visions of what "such things" might mean flashed before their eyes; and for a minute the small flower-bed, with its one rose-bush, its little patches of hardy seedlings, lost color and promise together. Then Clover turned hastily toward the rear where mentally she kept her "sweet herbs," and the gentle fragrance of patience and brotherly kindness seemed to set things right in a moment.

"Oh, you have a grand garden," she said, cheerfully, "and ours will never be that, I suppose. But I guess they'll be beautiful by-and-by, when the things grow. Just look how strong my zinnias are!"

"Oh, you've got zinnias!" said Maria; "are they double ones? Andrews says double zinnias are very good for some places."

"Well, I hope this is one of the places," said Clover, laughing. "Now come down and see Lily's garden."

"The sun's so hot," pleaded Maria, "and I dropped my veil in the house. And I don't know what my mother would do if I should get freckled. I 'm apt to freckle in the sun."

To avoid such a dire misfortune they all turned back into the house, and Lily was compelled for the sight to her garden by the thought that she should not hear any of her flowers called vegetables.

It was an easy matter to entertain their little guest—that was one thing. Just give her a comfortable chair, where she could spread out her flounces; place her in a good light, where her hoot tassels and embroidered petticoat were likely to be seen now and then, and let her talk; and the small cup which Maria Jarvis kept for her happiness would be quite full. But the other children grew very weary as the day went on; rare flowers were not the pleasantest things to hear of, on the whole, and the novelty of dresses and trimmings soon were off; so that when dinner was over, and the coach came and Maria got in, Clover saw her drive away with a deep sigh of relief; and even Lily threw her arms over her head and exclaimed:

"Oh dear! I'm so tired!"

"Tired of seeing company, dear!" said Jack; "or is it that you can't wait till the time comes for you to go and spend Thursday with her? Poor Lily!"

"I'm in no hurry at all for Thursday to come," said Lily, rather sharply.

"I'm glad she's not coming here Thursday," said little Primrose. "Maria said my sweet-peas were old-fashioned. I should like to know what she is!"

"Why, she is—now-fashioned, if you really want to know," said Sam, laughing. "I guess she's right about the sweet-peas, though. I have little doubt that some new and blossomed in Eden, and that's being quite old-fashioned."

Prim's face relaxed into a smile.

"Sam, you're so nice!" she said.

"Now that's what I call a compliment," said Sam, making a low bow. "What is Clover thinking of so busily?"

Clover flushed and hesitated. "Nothing—only I want some more herbs to my garden, and I do believe Maria Jarvis made me a little bit discontented with my dear garden. It is such a shame!" said Clover, defiantly, to Lily. Sam. Sam got his arms round her and patted the hot cheeks softly.

"Let's go out and have a good walk," he said, in a manner. "let us see what the sky will show us, and hear what the wind will say to us. Come!"

THE WILD FLOWER.

A little wild flower by a spring
Looked beautiful to me;
Like some secluded heavenly thing
That I could never see.
And as my young heart felt its power
I wept and loved that flower.

I wondered how so weak a thing
Should seem to me so strong;
While others passed its beckings by
Unnoticed and long.
I ventured in its praises to sing
And word it as best I might.

I touched the chord with trembling hand;
And startled at the sound,
I never thought to touch command
Of music so profound:
Yet still I felt the hidden fire
That slumbered in the lyreling wire.

Since then I oft have touched the strings
And felt the soothing power,
The sadness which the music brings
In sorrow's darksome hour.
I found that there was joy in grief,
And in the lyre a sought relief.

And now on wings of love I sound,
And these were halcyon days:
And still when I have touched the chord
Their golden memories.
And many songs have I wrought
In love's creative loom of thought.

From Nature's page of light and shade
Full many a sketch I've taken;
Now gathering berries in the glade,
Now pebbles in the brook.
More charmed to me was the skylark sing
Than list the sound of Orpheus' string.

I never felt myself alone—
Though in the lily's cup
I loved far more to be unknown
Than known to look up.
The bird's clear song, the humming-bee
Were sweet companionship to me.

But still that modest purple flower
That first awoke my love
Remained in sunshine and in shower
A fragrant memory.
Flower of my lyre, I owe to thee
The heart's first throb of poesy.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"To appetite for breakfast?" Then in pity to yourself look around a while, and see if you can't find one before you attempt to force any thing into the unwilling stomach. "But you are a dyspeptic for breakfast!" Then you should not take any breakfast; or at least you should postpone it until you can relish it."

So said Professor Smellfungus to his hospital daughter, as she sat at breakfast-table toying with her tea-spoon.

"Something is wrong," he continued, "that you get up too early and overfatigue yourself before the morning meal; or, more likely, you do not rise early enough to get your daily exercise before breakfast; or perhaps you sit up too late at night, or eat too hea dinners and suppers. Something is wrong, my dear daughter; or else you are sick, and should consult the doctor."

The Professor went on, quite unmindful that he was ostensibly addressing his own daughter—lecturing was his business.

There is nothing so bad for dyspepsia as eating when one is not hungry. "Hungry," remarks some humbug writer, "will create digestion. Add to it Worcestershire Sauce, French Mustard, and Worcester-proof Cognac. Never, then, go to dinner till you have whetted the appetite and put the bell lustily, even if you wait forty-eight hours. Never eat till you get hungry, is a maxim worthy of a fool, and should rank with the tenths of the blunderers of mankind."

"Living off a bit of pigeon and a cup of weak tea is all well enough for a genuine invalid. But for workers, physical or mental, a nutritious diet is needful. And yet when a man has exhausted himself with brain work, and then feels no appetite, or, having an appetite, finds that he has also dyspepsia, if he eats what is reasonably wants, he blames his unfortunate constitution. He forgets that he has made exterionate demands upon it, by taking away all that little strength is left for digestion.

"As to habits before breakfast, each one should study out a plan for himself. Some, like children, are in a hurry for something to eat as soon as they are up—not a few would be glad of a comfortable repast before they rise! But many, especially in warm weather, regard the breakfast-table with listless indifference. Let such try experiments. Rise early—there is an amazing amount of time, at this season of the year, between daybreak and seven o'clock, of which many people are quite unconscious! If you have household duties, my dear," the Professor's attention was recalled to his subject by the impatient movement of her spoon, "very well, that is good exercise; or you will find your time well spent for a couple of hours' reading or writing. But better still, if you want to limit up an appetite, go out into the fresh air, take a little up to the park, or, if you can, own a cracker before you start if you feel 'faint,' stroll through the Arcade, and you will find that the beauty and the early hour. Take a ride on horseback if you prefer; but be something energetic, and try to enjoy being a; and if you venture to affirm that on your return you will look with uncommon favor upon coffee, rolls, omelet, and the et cetera of a well-spread breakfast."

So, ending his homily, the good man attacked his own coffee and rolls with the energetic appetite of one that he had taken just enough mental exercise to fit him for eating a hearty breakfast!

A pretty poem has been related to us the other day.

Some years ago there lived in the city of Boston an author of distinction who was not without certain eccentricities of character. One day a friend asked him:

"Professor A., what physician do you employ?"

"Not any," replied the Professor.

"Not any?" echoed his friend, in surprise, knowing that he had not been in health half a dozen siblings. "What do you do when your children are sick?"

"Well, I don't have any children," he said, and then, if they don't begin to get better, I give them calomel."

"Calomel! What, for every disease?"

"Well, yes, for every thing," returned the Professor in his matter-of-fact way. "Years ago I always used to call a doctor when the children were sick; and I found his invariable method was to look at the child's tongue, feel the pulse, rub his head, look very wise, and prescribe calomel—it always ended in that. So I thought I'd save the doctor the calomel myself."

"Well—but"—persisted his friend, hesitatingly, "how do you know how much calomel to give?"

"Well, I give a little more than enough, but not enough, I give a larger one—and, if it is too much, nature generally disposes of it!"

Some writer thus sympathizes with one class in the community:

"An overworked woman is always a sad object—under a gilded mask though she may wear it. Sometimes she is so much more fertile in capacities of suffering than a man, as to be a wonary varieties of beauty—sometimes as if Joel 'were driving the nail which killed Sisera,' and sometimes unconsciously lightening around the brow as if her cap-band were Luke's iron crown—and then the dressmakers and bonnet-makers, and her fits of depression, and many more traits, linked to her fine and delicate organization, tell the story, when she is placed in conditions which develop her nervous tendencies.

A popular preacher having asserted his belief that woman was capable of high aspirations, and ought to interest herself in the intellectual and moral advancement of herself and others, made this remark:

"A woman's mind is equal to weak stockings, and make Johnny-cake, and to look after and bring up her boys faithfully; and a man who can never think of a young the mean-ish, and whose morality is so small as to be content with a woman who is not a companion to woman, and will spend the first thousand years after death in creating the hell in which she ought to have been before she died."

It has been the custom in France for a great number of years to fasten gold tables to the habit of bowing back the shoulders, and thus expanding the chest. From the observation of anatomists, lately made, it appears that the habit, or collar-bone, is actually longer in females of the French nation than in those of the English. This is the true nature of the Caucasian race, as there is no other remarkable difference in their bones, and this is peculiar to the sex. It may be attributed to the habit above-mentioned, which has gradually produced a national elongation of the bone. By this means the French have increased both health and beauty among ladies.

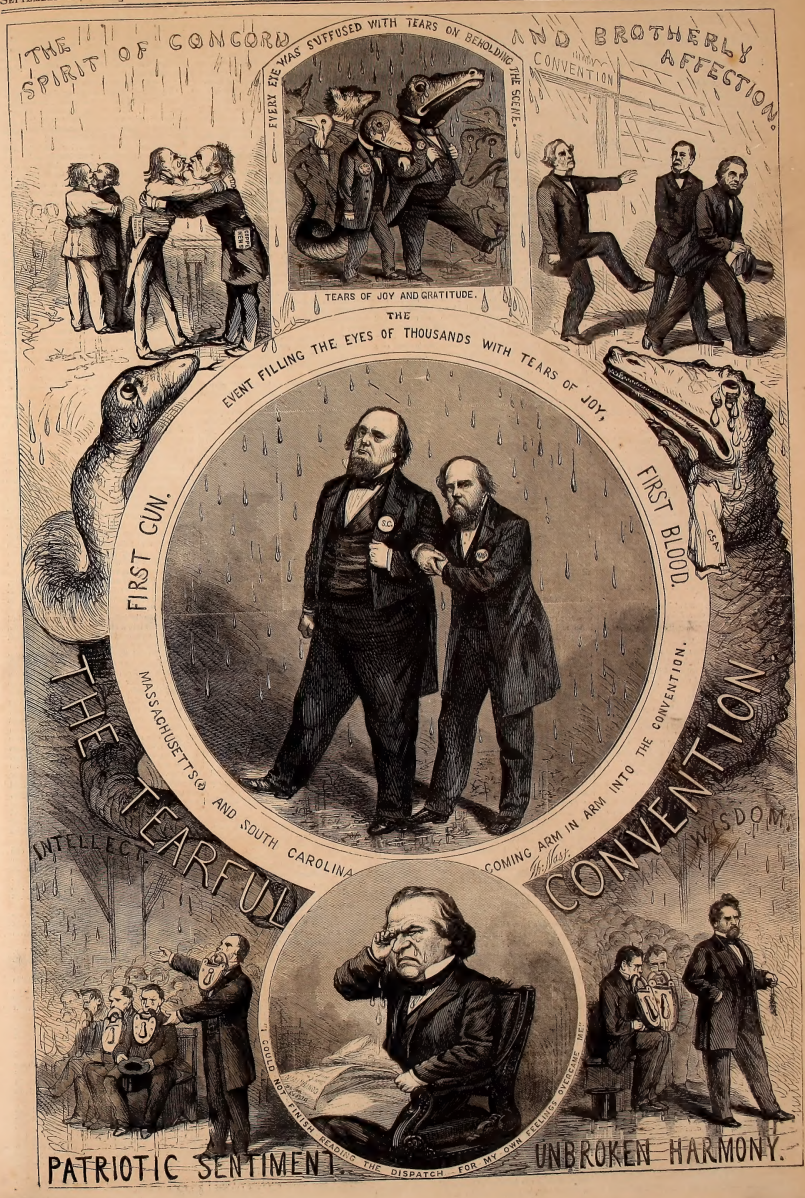
It was a very pretty compliment that Scott, the Commentator, paid to his wife. She is said to have possessed an unusually meek and gentle spirit; but on one occasion, something occurred to ruffle the smoothness of her temper, and her husband said, "My dear, a frown on your brow is like a dark cloud across a bright summer sky."

An Enoch Arden has turned up in Indiana. A soldier named Lieston, who went to war leaving a wife and child, and a few years ago she married and has just returned to find his child buried and his wife married.

At this season, when housekeepers are so much annoyed with house-flies, it may be worth while to try the following recipe, which is said effectually to destroy them:

Take half a spoonful of black pepper in powder, one of ipecacuanh in powder, one sugar, and one teaspoonful of cream, mix them well together, and place them in the room where the flies are troublesome, and they will very soon disappear.

The following bull was perpetrated by a young Irish gentleman who was exceedingly anxious to meet a certain young Irish lady at the house of a common friend, who had expressed her entire readiness to meet him—"Sure, my dear similar temptations) to perform the amiable part of "daisy-picker" to the young couple:



"But," said the poor fellow, anxiously, "there is nothing in the world so uncertain as you know, as the most certain disappointment. I am sure, under the circumstances, I wouldn't myself—neither would I suppose, my dear madam, you could manage it so as to let us meet at your house without your being without either of us being aware that the other was present!"

A wonderful cashmere shawl, now in Calcutta, will be among the sights of the Great Exhibition at Paris next year. It is worked in arabesques of unheard-of fineness on real ground, and was ten years in the working. There is a story collected together for the Queen of Oude, not long before the Sepoy revolt.

The animal creation in general seem to be aping the fashions and manners of the "upper classes." We had always supposed the horse to be one of the most intelligent of the quadrupeds; but the following holiday item would indicate that the cow has the most highly developed intellect that

BURNING OF THE CALIFORNIA CLIPPER "HORNET," ONE THOUSAND MILES FROM LAND.—SKETCHED BY MR. WEIR.—[SEE PAGE 614.]

THE SPIRIT OF CONCORD
EVERY EYE WAS SUFFUSED WITH TEARS ON BEHOLDING THE SCENE.
TEARS OF JOY AND GRATITUDE.
AND BROTHERLY AFFECTION.
CONVENTION
THE
EVENT FILLING THE EYES OF THOUSANDS WITH TEARS OF JOY, FIRST GUN.
FIRST BLOOD.
MASSACHUSETTS AND SOUTH CAROLINA
COMING ARM IN ARM INTO THE CONVENTION.
THE TEARFUL
CONVENTION
INTELLECT
WISDOM.
I COULD NOT REFRAIN READING THE DISPATCH FOR MY OWN FEELINGS OVERCAME ME!
PATRIOTIC SENTIMENT.
UNBROKEN HARMONY.

THE TALE OF AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE

In Six Weekly Portions.—Fifth Portion.

CHAPTER XI.

At nineteen, life is very vigorous within us. Let the soul be harrowed and the mind tortured as they may, the body will yet struggle to throw off its load of suffering. My youth and strength asserted themselves, and physical illness was not added to the anguish of my heart's sorrow. It was otherwise with my aunt. Her frail frame of life was rarely weakened by the shock, and we watched at her bedside with a dumb foreboding. Anxiety for her, and the necessity of attending on her, took me out of myself. The sharp present pain sometimes dulled the sharper heartache for a moment. But between my hours of nursing we would live awoke and cried within me with an exceeding bitter cry; and the meaning of voice of this vast eternal sea seemed but the echo of my little human woe. At first I could not speak of it. I could not think of it. I could only feel it. But by degrees I lost the overpowering sensation of terror that possessed me at the first agonizing aspect of my grief, and slowly dared to look it in the face. For three days after my uncle's arrival I was as one in a dream. Mechanically I went about my daily duties, and said no word, and asked no question. Mr. Norcliffe was constantly in the house, fulfilling the duties of a physician and friend with unobtrusive kindness; I think it was by his advice that they left me to myself, and forbore to speak until I should be prepared to hear. At last, as I have said, I took courage to look my trouble in the face, and I resolved to know all they could tell me. "I will hear it at once," I said, "and then—"

And then?—

I could say nothing beyond. The long vista of my future years had held one figure journeying by my side. No matter through what trials we still should walk together. That had been my dream of life.

"Uncle," I said one night when the household were preparing to go to rest, and my aunt had fallen into a heavy slumber after a restless day, "I will you come out with me on the beach for a little while? Aunt is asleep, and the servant shall stay in her room till I come back. I want to speak to you, and I think it will be settled in my mind to-night. Will you come?"

He pressed my hand in his, took up his hat, and silently we went down stairs. A short flight of stone steps led down from the terrace on which the house stood to the shore, and, once upon the wide beach, we were in absolute solitude. It was a warm dark night, with phosphorescent gleams upon the water. The soft wind, blowing seaward from the land, brought with it sweet waifs of inland perfume. Slowly, and in deep silence, we paced onward, until a turn in the shore showed us a distant light-house blinking with its red eyes far into the night.

"Dear uncle, I want you to tell me—"

"To tell you, my dear bairn?" For I had stopped and stood silent with my hand upon his arm.

"To tell me all about—Horace and my sister. I will only ask you this once, and then it will be over."

"I am glad you have spoken, Madge. It would have been my feeling to have had it all out before now. But others thought differently, and perhaps they were right."

"Yes, uncle; quite right. And—and—I want to be one thing of you." He took my trembling hand and held it in a firm though gentle clasp. "I want you to try not to say things like—like—"

"What things, my darling?"

"Such as you said that night of Horace. I know what you must feel; but oh, dear uncle, I beseech of you not to say hard things of Horace to me. I was sobbing with my head upon his breast.

"How shall I speak the truth and not say hard things?" I returned my uncle, bitterly. "But there, there, my beloved child. Heaven knows I would not willingly add to your burden. I will do my best, Madge."

Then, brokenly and with difficulty, he told me what he knew about my sister's flight. "I suspect, and indeed I do, nothing in the world. It must have begun when they were so much together at Meadow Lease. He seemed mostly, and did not expect so much time as formerly at the Gable House. At least, not with reason. Nobody could know that went on behind my back. Anna had full liberty to ask for him, he was like a son of the house." By degrees, I heard all that he could tell me. They had not left Willborough together. Horace had driven to the high-coach for his northern destination, and Anna must have met him at some preconcerted point upon the road. She was not missed till the morning, having given out to the servants that she was going to spend a few days with the Gibsons at Meadow Lease. Neither my uncle nor I had the heart to follow out the workings of the scheme. A few hours after he had missed her, and had begun to wonder at her absence, he received a hurried letter in Anna's hand, saying that she was tempt at pursuit would be worse than useless, as before those lines could reach Willborough she and he would have crossed the Scottish Border, and get married. "I was half-crazed," said my uncle. "As to sitting still at home, I could no more have done it than I could have flown to Scotland, and seized the throat of you—; well, well, I won't say it, my lassie. But that's what I longed to do at first. When it fairly came home to me that it was too late, I just flung myself into a post-chaise to come to you and your aunt. Talk of a man's strength? Yes, if fighting be the cue. But for endurance, why, the bravest of us is fain to lean on'you frail creatures when Sorrow comes and sits herself down in the ingle-nook."

In all that my uncle said and left unsaid I could trace the deep interest that Anna had given to his proud affection. He had loved her so. He had so gloried in her beauty and her high spirit, and even in her untamed vehement temper. He loved me fondly, and felt for me. Sorrow of sympathy could have been deeper, more tender, more unfailing than his. But, for himself, the bitter smart was this: that her hand should have dealt the blow. That she should be false, treacherous, ungrateful! His pet, his bonny bairn, his darling! To strive not to wound to throw the blame on Horace, there was a rankling sense of her unworthiness that wrung his kind heart cruelly, cruelly. Never again, on the rare occasions when my sister's name was mentioned between us, did I hear him speak of her by the familiar appellation of childhood. She was "your sister," or "Mrs. Lee," or "Anna." Never Nan, or Nanny. Never, never again.

When Uncle Gough had ceased speaking there was a long silence between us. At last I rose (we had been sitting on a heap of loose stones) and took his hand. "Thank you, uncle," I said. "You are very good to me."

"Good to thee, my precious bairn?" All his soul heard gratitude in a tone so grave and inarticulate of ejaculations. He took me in his arms, as if I had been indeed the bairn he called me, and wailed over me as a woman over her sick child. We wept together until the passion had spent itself, and something like peace came down upon our souls. And, as we walked slowly homeward, I got a glimpse of what, "and then," began to dawn upon me.

What if, though the bright glory of my morning were quenched forever, there still remained long twilight hours to turn to account ere the night cometh when no man can work? I was still very much, very, very sick, very miserable; but there was already a faint ray of comfort in the thought that I might yet be of use to somebody.

When we reached home the servant of the house was standing at the door looking for us, and she ran forward to say that Mrs. Gough was with my aunt, and that some one had been dispatched for the doctor, as Mrs. Gough was awake, and seemed "mortal bad." We were both there immediately, and Mr. Norcliffe arrived soon after; but the first glimpse of her face told me, inexperienced though I was, that human skill was powerless to prolong her life. She died peacefully in my uncle's arms that night.

CHAPTER XII.

We went back to the old house, Uncle Gough and I, to the empty rooms, to the dull days, and to bear the shadow of our sorrow and our loss with us. I pass by the first pain of looking on the familiar scenes and faces of my childhood unmoved. I pass by the grief of the servants, the condolences of friends, the sympathy of humble neighbors. As my uncle had said, now that Sorrow had come to sit down at our ingle-nook, it was to me that he looked for consolation. He was a man peculiarly sensitive to woman's influence, and keenly feeling as a woman's sympathy. Soft and unassuming as his wife's character had been, he had leaned on her for support in every everyday trial of life. He had turned, in my trouble, to the never-failing solace of her wifely love. Now she was dead, and Anna was gone, and Horace. Where was I to look at will, was cast out forever from his home and from his heart, and there was no one but I left to fill the vacant places. What a blank there must have been! followed our return to the Gable House! The summer had waned into the early Scotch autumn, and my uncle and I used to wander arm in arm along the garden paths and through the shrubbery, ankle-deep in fallen leaves. He seldom crossed the park the iron gates into Willborough, and few strangers crossed our threshold. But, once, old Mr. Lee came. He came one afternoon, however, and was received at home. I, sitting sewing by the window in the morning-room, heard the gate bell ring, and looked out to see who could be coming. Recognizing Mr. Lee, I stood up trembling, and my work dropped upon the floor.

"Margaret, what is it?" asked my uncle, looking at my scared face; then, following the direction of my glance, he too saw Mr. Lee, who was now almost at the door.

"I can't bear to see him, uncle. What shall I do? Let me go away."

"Yes, child," said my uncle, with his brow knitted into the stern, troubled look it often wore now. "Go, dear. He shall not disturb you. Why does he come here?" He talked to the house hour when any of his name first darkened these doors.

I hurried away up stairs, my knees shaking under me, and my heart sick with fear. Once there, I stood for above an hour, sitting motionless and dry-eyed on the bed, with a dull sick feeling at my heart. At last Hester came up stairs and knocked at my door.

"I tour uncle's love, Miss, and do you feel well enough to come down and see him?"

Then I knew that Mr. Lee was gone, and I arose and went down to my uncle. He said not a word at the time about the visit. I learned after, toward that interview had been a stormy one. Mr. Lee, while deprecating the conduct of his son, for me, and for my misfortune, had left Horace and my uncle, endeavoring to show that confirmed resentment on the part of the latter could only hurt himself, and was really unjustified. That the thing was done and could not be undone—" which," said my uncle, "was the sting of the whole matter"—so then. But it appeared that his chief object in coming had been to ascertain whether Anna's marriage would make any difference in the amount of her prospective inheritance. My uncle had always announced that my sister and I were to be the joint inheritors of what property he had to leave, and that it would be divided equally between us.

"I told him," said my uncle, speaking of this to me afterward; "I told him that neither your sister nor her husband would ever be the richer by one penny of my money. She and he have chosen their way, and must pursue it together. But never, with my consent, shall any help go from me to them, either during my life or after my death. I have one niece, one child, one heiress. He wanted to see you, feeling sure, he said, that you would not wish this. But I told him that if you were an angel I was none, and that in the matter I would be to you my own way. So he left me."

I tried, of course, to alter my uncle's resolution. What was the money to me? But whenever I reverted, even distantly, to the subject, he grew so severe and terrible in his anger against her, that I was fain to cease my pleadings, and leave it to time to soften him more effectually than any poor words of mine could. So the autumn and the winter and the spring wore away, and the summer came round again in its appointed course. Twice during the year Mr. Norcliffe had written to see us, and on his last visit had pained me by asking me to be his wife. Pained me, because my own trouble made me tender to the grieving sorrow of an honest heart. And it could never, never be.

"I don't ask for love, Miss Gedley," he said. "I know and I respect you too well to do that. But I could ever bring yourself to think of me—if you could give me no hope that time might change your resolution—you would make me a very happy man."

I think I did not fully know what my love for Horace had been, nor fully realize how that part of my life was lost to me, until I received this proposal. My uncle would have encouraged it; and Mr. Norcliffe was a gentleman every way my superior, and I was very sensible of the honor he did me when he offered me this high confidence and love in me. But all that was over. I assured him that my marrying was impossible, then and thereafter. He left us, and I saw no more gentlemen visitors.

And the last words he said to me on that occasion were these:

"Miss Gedley, if you ever need a friend's advice, or a brother's protection, will you believe that I should esteem it my dearest privilege to afford you both? Will you tell me that you trust me enough to ask me for them?"

This I could most heartily and gratefully assure him. For, when he had received letters from Anna to my uncle, and there had been one directed in Horace's hand. But Uncle Gough thrust them all unopened into the fire, watching them finally in the blaze until the last fragment was consumed. My heart yearned sometimes for news of my sister. I had been thinking, perhaps, musing on her, and on Horace, all the year; and as my first anguish softened I began to ask myself if this estrangement must be one of life and death. For I had loved her best. Was she not more beautiful, more attractive than I? I thought sometimes that if Horace had only come to me and had my confidence that they loved each other, and had asked that I should release Horace from his promise, I could have done it.

One bright day I had persuaded my uncle to drive some miles out of town to a small property he had in a neighboring village, consisting of a few cottages and some pasture-land. One of his tenants had desired to see him on, I know not what, business connected with the property. It would be a change, an occupation, an excuse for a short absence from home. I dreaded to see him entirely alone in his once cheerful and sit dreaming in the house day after day. I urged him to drive over to the village, and, having seen him set off in his high gig, with the old servant who had followed our fortunes for so many years, I took advantage of his absence to go into Willborough and make some housekeeping purchases. I had always executed my task, and was wearing the Gable House on my way back, when I remembered that cook had asked for some sweet herbs, and I turned into a garden. We all know how subtle and potent is a familiar odor to awaken sleeping memories in the brain, and the smell of that shop invariably took me back to the market-day when Anna had gayly thrust a fragrant bunch of herbs over my uncle's shoulder, and we had first seen Horace Lee. Oh me! How long, how long ago, it seemed!

The good woman who served me put up what I wanted in packets, as I took the little parcel in my hand, she said:

"So we've got your sister back among us, Miss Sedley."

"My sister!"

I suppose my face turned very white, for I felt the room reeling round me, and the woman looked at me with a startled expression.

"Dear life, miss! I hope I haven't done wrong to mention it. I never thought but what you knew. Will you sit down a moment, miss?"

"No, no, thank you. But tell me—when did they—I mean did she—"

"How long they've been here?" said the woman, helping out my unfinished sentence. "Well, I'm sure eighty years I've known the place, as high a week. My master, he seen young Mr. Lee at Rotherwood's door last Thursday. They're staying there, I think."

I thanked her and hurried out of the shop. As soon as I reached home I shut myself into my room, and without undressing lay down on the sofa, and down to think. I should run the risk of meeting them, unprepared, at any moment. I knew too well that the place of my sister's flight must be within half an hour's drive of Rothervood. But then months had passed since the elopement reproaches on a bold until I stood aghast to hear her.

"You had best be silent, Margaret," said Horace, turning to me. "Your aunt is a mad woman while the ill is on her."

He then sat motionless, with his head bowed upon his hands. Anna's loud angry tones awoke the child, who set up a piteous wail. I stooped to take it in my arms and soothe it; but she snatched it from me, and pressed it to her bosom with a fierce gasp.

"She is mine, my child! You shall not touch her!" Her love, at least, I can claim." Then, turning to her husband: "You are a weak fool. Do you think I can not see what old infatuation has come back at the sight of Margaret? You are a weak fool. What was her love to mine? She never loved you. Why, at this moment, see how pale she stands! What did she ever do to prove her love? Would she have plannged, schemed, befriended, lied, to win you?"

"Stop, Anna, in Heaven's name!" interposed Horace, with a voice of agony.

I saw white and there and signs of habitation. I would not stop for d moment, nor slacken in my pace, lest I should turn coward and go back with-out fulfilling my purpose. I reached the private door, almost breathless with my speed, and, having knocked, was admitted by a little country servant, who stared at me with all her round eyes.

"Is—your mistress—within?"

Only at the moment of asking the question did I remember that I could not speak of Anna as Mrs. Horace Lee. With strange unaccountable consistency, I who was coming there to heal the past, and offer reconciliation, could not shake that smaller effort of calling my sister by his name!

"Yes," said the girl, with her wondering eyes still fixed upon my face. "she is at home."

"I know her. I am a friend. Let me go up."

I pushed her aside, and ran up the staircase, and into the sitting-room which faced it. There—nursing a tiny infant at her breast, and singing softly to it, in the old sweet voice—sat my sister Anna.

"Margaret!"

She rose and faced me. The deep red blood rushed over her face and neck, and then, receding, left her deadly pale.

"Oh, Anna! I did not know this. You are a mother, Anna! Oh, Anna, Anna! let me kiss your child."

With sobs, and half-uttered words, and passionate embraces, we clung together, holding the little baby between us. It had so we stood, my sweet, unfit, thank God! the flowing tears washed from my remembrance the last bludgeoned bitterness of anger.

When we grew calmer and could speak to each other—that was not for a long time—Anna asked me if Uncle Gough were coming to see her. He knew of my visit? But, in her quick way, she read the answer in my face before I could utter it, and drew back with her head haughty for the first time as well.

"Ah, no. I see. He is still hard, and implacable, and vindictive. Well, we must endure it. That is all."

"Hush, hush, Anna! Do not speak so; I can not hear it. Tell me about yourself. How old is your baby? Is it a boy? Is its name—"

"Poor little thing! She is very wee and frail, isn't she? Only two months old. We came away from the north as soon as I was able to travel. She is called Lily."

I remembered Horace having once told me that his mother's name had been Lilian. I looked more closely at my sister, and as her face recovered itself after the strong emotion of our meeting, I saw that she was not looking well. She was very lovely, with the rich dark curls clustering round her forehead, and her lustrous brown eyes that looked larger than ever, from the thinness of her face; but her cheek was very pale, and there were lines of care and suffering about her mouth, and the mark on her forehead, which told of the frequent contraction of her handsome brows, had deepened.

"Little lily, poor small lily, little fair white lily, you don't know why you do you? I do, though Margaret, and you must be very good to me, and love me very much."

I had taken the infant in my arms, and I hushed it until it fell into a slumber, when Anna told me to place it on a couch in the room that was prepared for it with gifts and clothes of all kinds.

"Hark!" cried Anna, as I laid the sleeping baby down: "that is his step. Here is Horace."

I have a vague remembrance of breathing a hurried prayer for strength while that footstep mounted the stair; and then his hand was on the door knob and he stood before us. Anna advanced to meet him, and put her hands upon his shoulders; but his eye had lighted upon me, where I stood trembling like one guilty caught. Nothing down the papers he carried in his hand, he put his wife aside, and with a cry which I shall never forget sprang across the room and clasped me in his arms. It was so sudden that for a second I was powerless to move. But almost instantly I released myself from his embrace, and, retreating a step or two, held out my hand. I was astonished at my own strength, now that the test had come.

"Forgive me," said Horace, pausing his hand over his forehead, "if I was so unexpected. I—I did not know what I was doing when I caught sight of your face. Forgive me."

"Forgive you!" cried a voice, so hard and strained, that I started, scarcely knowing it for my sister's. Anna's face looked white, and her dark brows were knit, and her eyes flashed menacingly, and I saw what the change was that the year had made in Anna's heart. All the old love was dead in it.

"Forgive you!" she exclaimed. "Do you remember that your wife is present? Has the sight of Margaret so overwhelmed you as to blot out from your memory the past twelve months?"

Horace dropped my hand and turned away.

"No, no, no," he answered, "I have not forgotten, Anna, that you are my wife."

Something in the tone forced upon her irritable nerves and set her in a flame. The old furious temper took possession of her, and shook her slender figure. Like a whirlwind reproaches on us both until I stood aghast to hear her.

"You had best be silent, Margaret," said Horace, turning to me. "Your aunt is a mad woman while the ill is on her."

He then sat motionless, with his head bowed upon his hands. Anna's loud angry tones awoke the child, who set up a piteous wail. I stooped to take it in my arms and soothe it; but she snatched it from me, and pressed it to her bosom with a fierce gasp.

"She is mine, my child! You shall not touch her!" Her love, at least, I can claim." Then, turning to her husband: "You are a weak fool. Do you think I can not see what old infatuation has come back at the sight of Margaret? You are a weak fool. What was her love to mine? She never loved you. Why, at this moment, see how pale she stands! What did she ever do to prove her love? Would she have plannged, schemed, befriended, lied, to win you?"

"Stop, Anna, in Heaven's name!" interposed Horace, with a voice of agony.

rising.

"Say no more while this mad temper possesses you. Spare us, and spare yourself."

"No; I will not spare myself. I did plan, I did scheme, I did defraud, I did lie. I was false to my sister, to my uncle, to every one. There was nothing I would not have done or risked for you, because I loved you so, and because it seemed as if my great love must win yours in the end."

"If neither for my sake nor your own, then for our child's, I beseech you to command yourself," said Horace.

The vehemence of her passion had so exhausted her that she burst into a storm of hysterical sobs, and fell back upon the couch with the baby wailing and moaning at her arms. Horace went to her, and motioned me away as I advanced:

"Go now, Margaret. You can do no good," he said, softly. And indeed Anna's sobs redoubled at my approach, and she shrank away from me. "Go, and try to forget this miserable scene. God completes you for coming, Margaret! Don't—" he hesitated, and then went on in a lower voice—"don't quite desert us. We deserve nothing at your hands, but you are not one to balance that bitter truth against our need of you. And—and, for the sake of this innocent little one, don't desert us, Margaret. Don't quite desert us."

I went away from the room and from the house; and, out of the dark sea of sorrow around me, only one thought rose clearly into my mind. That he had loved me until she turned his heart against me. That he had been deceived. That he had not been coldly false.

For some days after I hesitated whether or not I should tell my uncle that I had been to see Anna. Had my visit ended peacefully, or given me any hope of happier relations arising between us, I would have risked his short-lived anger, and confessed the truth at once. But I shrank from the idea of a recurrence of such harrowing scenes. I could not tell whether he knew of Horace's return to Willborough; but I thought it almost impossible that he should still be ignorant of it. So the days went by, and I was still undecided. At last I resolved to let Uncle Gough know by indirect means. So I requested Stock to gather some choice wood fruit, for which the gardens of the Gable House were famous, as I wished to send a present to a friend. The old man brought the fruit wrapped in vine-leaves to the morning-room, where I was sitting, and where Uncle Gough was deep in the perusal of the weekly Gazette from London. Poor Stock was very feeble now, and bent by rheumatism. My aunt's death had been a real grief to the old man, whose few attachments were very strong and lasting.

"I've been an got what's left on 'em, Miss Margrit. They don't like they used to be, but the Lord's will be done!"

"Thank you, Stock. They look very fine, I think."

"Ah, look? If looks was all, some on us 'ud stand but a poor chance. Them nectarines—why, I can remember the season afore iver Billycon set foot in the place, they was one mash o' juiciness. Bustin' they was with ripeness. Seems to me as tho' summat has been took the flavor out of everything." Uncle Gough glanced over the newspaper:

"Ay, ay, Stock. I begin to find that out myself. I'm afraid you'll be both suffering from a complaint that is apt to take the flavor out of every thing. Old age, Stock, old age. But," he added, gently, "it's a cure itself, it will cure itself."

"Yes, sure, Sir," answered Stock, conveying something like softness into his hard immovable face and unmusical voice in an indescribable way.

"Yes, sure; an' the cure'll be a lastin' an' a blessed un. Once we gits through the valley o' the shadow, there'll be joyful church 'ardder side. An' no more partin's. That's the blessedest, Sir, bain't it? No more partin's."

"Margaret," said my uncle, suddenly, when the old man had withdrawn, and I was packing the fruit in an open basket, "who are those nectarines for?" I hesitated, but I had made this opportunity, and would not let it slip. So I took courage to answer in as steady a voice as I could command.

"Dear uncle, I hope you will not be angry. I thought I might have them. They are to send to my sister Anna."

He still had the Gazette before him, so that he could not see his face; but I heard the paper rustle and shake in the dead silence that ensued. I was very much frightened. At length my uncle rose from his chair and walked slowly toward the door; but before he reached it, he held out his hand, and I ran into his arms.

"God bless thee, my child, my bairn!" he said very softly, and I felt a tear drop on my forehead. His hand was on the lock, but he paused in the act of opening the door, and said, without turning or looking at me: "I'm going into the garden, my lass. There's a vast of fruit and flowers almost spoiled for want. Take whatever you want, and do as you like with them. You—you need never tell me any thing about it."

In this way I obtained an indirect permission to send many little gifts from the Gable House to my sister, and they were accepted. It was a long time before I could bring myself to visit her again, but I did so at last, having heard from one of the servants that the child was ailing sadly. After that, I constantly went to see her. I always chose those hours for going when Horace would probably be absent—and during several months I did not see him half a dozen times. Anna's manner to me fluctuated; but though she was often fretful, irritable, and unreasonable, there was no repetition of the outburst to which she gave way on the occasion of our first meeting. Little Lily was fading and pining, and my anxiety and love for the dear child was a common ground of sympathy between us.

I had had several letters from Madame de Beaumont, giving pleasant accounts of herself and her husband. I had kept her informed, as well as I could, of all that had befallen at the Gable House; of my aunt's death, and of Anna's marriage. Her letters, as you may suppose, were but dreary exchanges for her bright, cheerful epistles. But she wished for them, and was glad to hear all about myself that I could make up my mind to tell her. I know she was glad to get my letters, because she said so. Anna would often ask to have news of the De Beaugents. Their life in Canada, and the kind of people who surrounded them, seemed to have an inexhaustible interest for her. Gradually I discovered that she was eagerly endeavoring to persuade Horace to leave England altogether, and try his fortunes abroad. He was restless and unhappy here, she said. Things were not going well with him. There, in America, he would find a wide field for his talents, and would work with energy. But I believe there was a secret unacknowledged feeling at the bottom of her heart that he would belong to her, more entirely and exclusively, when once he should be divided from the familiar scenes and associations that had separated her from him at home. He fast as it might, Anna had set her heart upon this scheme, and pursued it with maddening vehemence. Horace, conscious of it I could not tell; he never spoke to me on the subject. And, besides, as I have said, we very, very rarely met. But one circumstance I knew, and circumstance unexpectedly occurred to make him think seriously of the project. Old Mr. Lee was in the habit of receiving large sums of money for the baronet, his employer, and Sir Robert being seldom at the Hall, had very nearly absolute control of the property. There was no suspicion from Mr. Lee's decision for any tenant on the estate. Notwithstanding an arrogant pomposity of manner, and an implicit belief in the infallibility of his own wisdom, he was considered, on the whole, to deal fairly between landlord and tenant. Even those who most disliked him—I am sorry to say they were rather numerous—had to restrict their animadversions to the offensive "stuck-up-ishness of his manners." Our old gander hadn't me always of Mr. Lee," said Farmer Gibson once. "When he swims under the stone arch of the bridge on the river, he cocks his head down every time, just as though he was high enough and strong enough to carry away bridge and all, if he wasn't precious careful. Now the arch is a good six foot over him, let him crane his neck up as he will; but the silly bird can't see that. It's just the same with the steward. Why, when he comes into our place, he stoops down, so condescending, for fear he should do us a mischief like. Lord, we're all above his head all the time! Only, ye see, he don't know it, no more 'n the gander."

Unfortunately this blind pride was destined to have a fall which crushed other people in its ruins. I dare say my uncle had heard rumors of the impending crash, in Willborough, before it came. Disaster seldom comes unheralded by a warning atmosphere of its own. But I lived so entirely out of my own quiet little world, that the evil things took me quite unprepared. It seems that Mr. Lee, relying solely on his own judgment, and taking no counsel of those whose experience might have guided him, had embarked all he possessed in a ruinous speculation, which burst, leaving him and many others nearly penniless. So the news came. The worst was overwhelmingly bad. It was hinted that Mr. Lee had not risked and lost his own merely. For the errors committed with other men's gold, perhaps more pity than indignation might have been bestowed on him; though, in truth, the world is generally very ready to pity those who have been money, and finds it dreadfully hard to forgive that offense. But it was asserted that a very large sum which Mr. Lee had received for Sir Robert, and which he should have deposited in the county bank, had been appropriated by him to this other purpose. Can doubt that all the circumstances being denied and was lost with his own property in the general ruin. I first heard the news from Anna, who was half distracted with it. "He has disgraced us—disgraced Horace. That is the misery. The loss of his own money would have been a serious loss to us, of course. But this is shame and ruin." I cautioned my sister not to speak in that unguarded way until the truth of the matter should be positively known. But she took this in ill part, asking me if I supposed the good name of her husband's father were not as dear to her as to Mr. Brierly, she was in no mood to be argued with, and I could only hope that, in her excitement, she had exaggerated the extent of the evil. Of course, I was hurrying to speak to my uncle of the matter, I learned, to my dismay, that the worst had been confirmed, and that Mr. Lee would not be able to pay his rent, but one with a slur upon his name henceforward. "Uncle, what will they do with Mr. Lee? Can Sir Robert ruin him?" I said, in my fear. "Ay, lass," he answered, with a sternness that was full of anxiety I forgot the tacit understanding between us that the name of Lee was never more to be mentioned in the Gable House. "Ay, lass, he can ruin him, too, perhaps; for he answered with a troubled face, "My lassie, it is a bad business. I am told his lordship has thrown to the fire all thought of the longing to Sir Robert; if he can do so, they say it will be hushed up. As to old Lee's own savings, they are known to the world to be gone, like the dust of last summer." This was the calamity which made Horace finally resolve to leave England. He sold his share in Rotherwood's business to young Clinch; and the sum thus raised, together with his savings during the years he acted as Sir Robert's money. I believe the baronet behaved considerately, and forebore to take legal proceedings, on the understanding that Horace had his property should be restored. But of course Mr. Lee lost the situation he had filled so many years, and in his old age was cast destitute upon the world. So all was done, there remained but a slender store wherewith to take Horace and his wife and child to Canada. Anna was going first to Quebec, in the hope that De Beaugent—now a prosperous man—might be able to assist him to find employment. It was a sad, sad time. I was with them very much, rendering what assistance I could. Soon after it was settled that they should go, my uncle announced to me one day that he would be absent from Willborough for a week or so.

"I'm going to bide with Norcliffe, Madge," he said. "He has often asked me to go and see him, but I have never had the heart to do it yet. You'll be more at liberty when I am out of the way for a season. I'll be back with you, my darling, on the twentieth."

Horace and my sister were to leave Willborough on the nineteenth. Before my uncle started for Beachington, almost at the last moment, he gave me a little packet.

"This," said he, nervously, "is for you, Madge. It is your own, to do as you will with. I put no restriction whatever on the use you are to make of it, but this: Let it be for all your sorrow."

When he was gone I opened it. It contained a bank-note for fifty pounds. The few days preceding my uncle's departure were very busy days, and seemed to fly past us.

On the last evening I was left alone with Horace. Anna had gone to bed, for her fatigue was real, and we sat in the bare dismantled room, surrounded by the discomfort and desolation which attend the preparations for a long journey, while the evening shadows were deepening rapidly into darkness. Then, for the first time, I learned that old Mr. Lee was to accompany them. "I could not leave my father here to starve, Margaret," said Horace. "I have no means of providing for him. He must cast in the lot with us. Perhaps, Willborough sooner and Willborough people are painful to him now. It is best that we should all go and hide our shame and misery together."

"I hope," said I, faltering, "I hope and trust your going may be for the best. There are some here who think that this—this—"

"This disgrace," suggested Horace, bitterly.

"—this misfortune—need not have driven you from England. You, at least, are blameless."

"Am I?" he returned, in a tone that sent a sharp pang to my heart. "Yes, oh yes! I am blameless, Margaret, do you think I could have gone on living this life much longer? It was killing me."

"Horace!"

"Yes, it was killing me and killing her. We can never know happiness again."

"Oh, Horace, do not say so!"

"Never, never again. But at least the daily and hourly torture we both endure in this place may be lessened. I am a wretch to grieve you, Margaret," he said, rising and going to the window; "a selfish wretch. But the truth is, I am worn out, mind and body, by these last few weeks. I scarcely know what I am doing sometimes."

I saw his hand go wearily up to his head against the dim window-pane.

"I know you are not well," I answered, struggling to regain composure; "I have seen it for some time. The voyage and the change may be of service to you, and to my poor pale Lily. Horace, I have but one other word to say, and I say it with my whole heart—be good to Anna. She loves you; be patient with her; remember she will have but you in all the world now."

"God help her, poor girl!" he answered. "Yes, Margaret, you may trust me to be patient with her. Who should be patient with her, if not I? We must help each other."

When Anna rejoined us we sat and talked a while with some poor assumption of cheerfulness. We spoke of our old governess, and of her wedding-day, and I sent many messages to her and to her husband. Before I left I went to look at baby sleeping in her cot, and slipped into her little tender hand a paper containing my uncle's gift. I had written on it, "To Lily, from Aunt Margaret." But the following day the little servant brought me a letter, let with her for me by my sister. It contained the bank-note and these words: "If my uncle chooses to recognize me as his niece and adopted daughter I will cheerfully accept his son-in-law. I will take nothing in the shape of alms from you. A. L."

Stubborn, self-tormenting spirit! Poor misguided girl!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

IMPORTANT TO NATURAL MEN.—The best light for reading—Brierley Hall.

A BEAT THAT.—We know a man so clever with his lathe that he can even turn a deaf ear.

During a visit to England an Irish lady was one day defending her country with characteristic warmth against those who were concerning its bull-making propensities by a witty Englishman. "Well," he at length said, "I must allow that if anybody can commit bulls, you must, at all events, confess you can commit an outrageous absurdity." "Oh, I don't understand," cried the Irish girl; "yet even our murders are bulls at all events." "Murders bulls!" exclaimed the astonished Saxon. "Oh, why now!" broke in the gentleman with generosity, "why now, I must confess, I never heard of murders." "No," she replied, "not defending, but explaining his own heartiness, Pat Murphy, after knocking his neighbor down with a stone with blood, if he was asked why he did it, would say, 'Oh, by the hard blows, are her punishment; but if the English boy's wife offend him, very likely she will be bet tonight to rise in the morning and find her throat cut."

Why is a noisy tumult like a boatman rowing against the current? Because it is a stream (a scream) up-hower).

How may a man be known from a fatigued dog?—One wears a shirt, the other pants.

Somebody, evidently an old bachelor used to such things, thus describes how they do in Maine: "Quarter young ladies in the Maine Law State, it is said, still visit the cellars of the young married men, once a week, to see if they have been tampering with liquor. Just against this temptation a young temperance woman, with all the dignity of an executive officer, and the innocence of a love, will go. Any young man who believes that you are in the habit of tampering with liquor, and they have appointed you to examine you according to our established rules: are you willing?" You nod acquiescingly. The young lady applies her left hand gracefully around your neck, dashes back her raven curls, tastes, sips-ips, pronounces upon up-ique, her snowy, heaving bosom against your own, and with her angelic features lit up with a smile as sweet as heaven, places her rich, rosy, pouty, sugar, moistens, lily, rose-bud, cream-tart, sippe-ips, peach-pudding, apple-dumpling, pomegranted, nectar lips against yours, and (O Jerusalem, hold us!) kisses you. Behold the gals and the Maine Law, and death to all opposition!"

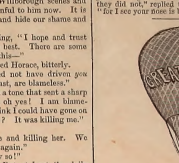
"PRAY," inquired one minister of another, seeing so many ladies present, "why do you always bow when you address your congregation as 'dear brethren?'" "Oh, that," replied the other, "is a habit I've got," "the brethren embrace the sisters."

EXCELLENT HOUSEHOLD RECIPES.

Raised Cruel.—Stick a cruet of bread on your fork and raise it in the air.

Jeopard Hair.—Get up very early in the morning and dip your head in the water-jug; you will thus have jeopard hair to perfection.

Apple Pursuader.—Throw your apple down stairs. This is a simple but excellent way of making apple turnover.



To take out Ink-stains in Linen.—Throw the soiled garment over your shoulder and walk down the Ilich Street with it.

An Ice Cream.—Pick out the prettiest girl you can see, stir gently into the corner, and ask her to give you a kiss; you will soon have a nice ice-cream.

A man much addicted to morning remarked to his bed-fellow in the morning that he had slept like a top. "I know it," said the other; "I was spinning myself."

CONUNDRUM FOR CONVOCATION.—A reverend gentleman, the Canon of a Cathedral, had his pocket picked. Why was this Canon like an Armstrong GUN?—Of course, because he was rifled.

Most of our readers are familiar, no doubt, with the young Irishman who declared he'd "die of a sweetheart that he was in such a way about her he couldn't sleep at night for dreaming of her. A parallel instance to this occurred when a poor fellow protested to "his love" that he "had no eyes for anything else, no rather all night for thinking about her. "Very likely they did not," replied this overt plague of his life, "for I see your nose is between them."

"POKE IS GOING UP."—Cincinnati Paper.

WILLIE.

WILLIE came to me to a wooing,
Fie! Willie, fie!
To no purpose all your suing,
I'll not wed—not I.

Willie only came more often,
Fie! Willie, fie!
All your talking he'er can soften
Such a maid as I.

Still he came and still he pleaded,
Fie! Willie, fie!
Sure such vows were ne'er were needed,
I'll not wed—not I.

That he, stupid! not at present—
Go, Willie, go!
Such rude questions are unpleasant—
Can't you take a No!

Besides, supplicating, pressing:
No, Willie, no!
All at once—I was quite distressing—
Willie turned to go.

When I found I couldn't get him
Angry much more with me,
Go—of course I couldn't let him—
Willie, darling!—stay!

A HOUSE TO LET.

FAREY WITH ORDER TO VIEW.—"Can you tell me why the last tenant left this house?"

FAREY IN CHARGE.—"Left? Lor, poor dear man, he didn't leave. He's still in the wife's yard, and hanged himself in that there very room."

A man who is advertising lodgings "to let for early risers," at Bangor, remarks, added, "N.B.—Any gentleman's fowls of unusual vocal powers are kept on the adjoining premises."

"MR. WEBB, will you have the kindness to lend me six dollars?" "Certainly, upon one condition." "Name it, Sir." "That you tell me what you mean by like the back of my neck." "I must give it up." "Well, it is because I can't see it."

What riches are those that certainly make themselves wings and fly away?—Ostriches.

LURED.

SAID the wind to the lamp in the light-house tower,
"Come out and play with me;
Thou shalt light my path in the midnight hour,
Alone o'er the stormy sea."

He whistled in vain o'er the raging foam,
While calm—bed-time was coming home,
While safe and bright in its lofty home
Burnt the coy and steadfast flame.

"Come away, come away, thou art prisoner there;
Thou canst not know how merry free;
My soft caresses come merrily share,
Come out and play with me."

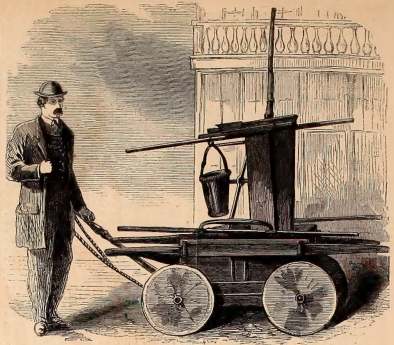
I may not be lured from my cyrie above
To light thee o'er billow or foam;
Much peril I see in my beloved's love,
Much safety for me in my home."

He toyed with the lattice so softly—as sweet
As the zephyr of evening his breath—
Till he laid the full warmth of his love at her feet,
And she yielded to freedom—and death!

O maidens! the lamp in that light-house tower
Is not more out of darkness astray
Beware of the perilous love of an hour,
Or the feeling that home is a prison.

GOVERNOR PAUL DILLINGHAM, OF VERMONT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BLACK & CASE, BOSTON.]

GOVERNOR DILLINGHAM OF VERMONT.



We give on this page a portrait of Honorable PAUL DILLINGHAM, who has just been elected Governor of Vermont.

PAUL DILLINGHAM was the son of PAUL and HANNAH (SMITH) DILLINGHAM, and was born in Shutesbury, Massachusetts, August 10, 1790. His father served the country in the Revolutionary War, first in the Massachusetts Militia for six months, then in the Continental Army three years, from June 1777 to 1780, his regiment being connected with that part of the army which was under the more immediate command of General WASHINGTON. His grandfather, JOHN DILLINGHAM, served in the "Old French War," and was killed in June, 1759, in the battle preceding the surrender of Quebec to WOLFE.

When about six years old he removed with his parents to Waterbury, Vermont, which has ever since been his home. In 1818 and 1819 he attended Washington County Grammar school at Montpelier, then under the tuition of SENECA WHITE, a recent graduate at Dartmouth; and in 1820 he commenced the study of law with HORATIO DAN CARPENTER of Waterbury. He was admitted to the Washington County Bar at the September term of 1824, and from that date has been in the active service of his profession. As a jury lawyer he has long stood among the first, if not the very first of all, in Vermont.

He was Town-Clerk of Waterbury from 1829 to 1844. In 1833 he was elected the representative of Waterbury in the Legislature, and was re-elected the next year. In 1835 he was elected State Attorney for Washington County, and held the office for three years. In 1836 he was a member of the Constitutional Convention. From 1843 to 1847 he was a member of the United States Congress. In 1861 he was a member of the State Senate; in 1862, 1863, and 1864 he was Lieutenant-Governor, and having acquitted himself nobly in all the places he has held, he well deserves the highest honor which the State of Vermont ever bestows upon one of its citizens.

MR. DILLINGHAM was a Democrat by birth and education, and always acted with the Democratic party; not, however, without many inward and some outward protests against its subserviency to slavery. During the last Presidential campaign he was a frequent speaker at popular meetings, not only in Vermont, but in New Hampshire and New York. His devotion to the Union has not been made manifest by words alone. He gave two sons to fight, one of them to die, for the country.

THE OLDEST FIRE-ENGINE IN THE UNITED STATES.—(SEE PAGE 614.)

DUMPING GROUND, FOOT OF BEACH STREET.

OUR engraving below furnishes a faithful picture representing an everyday scene at any of the great dumping grounds of the city. These nondescripts whom our artist has portrayed digging so busily and eagerly at this heap of rubbish live upon the refuse of respectable folk. The bones and coals and rags gathered together by these people are taken to the various receptacles of such articles, and the meagre pittance obtained in return is spent for a little bread and as much bad whisky as can be bought. And so these miserables live until life can no longer be sustained; but even at death, it may be said that they only come into a little closer contact with the corruption which has tainted the atmosphere of their poor lives.

DUMPING GROUND AT THE FOOT OF BEACH STREET, NEW YORK CITY.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

POOR CHRISTINE.

"I REMEMBER it fifty years ago, Fred," an old man said to his boy companion, as they both stood looking up through the June sunshine at the great front of the Cathedral of Rouen. "Yes, fifty years ago I stood before it as we are standing now, and I think the very same birds were building their nests then up over the carvings there. Look how they fly in and out! How many generations of them have lived there, do you think, my boy?"

They stood in the open square, with their backs to the cafés and the gay shops, the sunlight falling tenderly on the great gray sculptured walls before them, lighting up shaft and capital and niche with all their "kingly crowning," with all their wondrous workmanship of living form and clustered pinnacle.

"Fifty years ago," he said again, softly. "Poor Christine!"

Fifty years ago Frank Liston had spent a summer holiday in Rouen; he was about nineteen then, a high-minded, enthusiastic youth. His father was dead, and he was educating himself to be an artist, and was looking forward with all the eagerness of a generous nature to the time when he should be able to remove his mother, who was poor now, above all want. Young as he was, he had worked so hard already that he had more than once earned something for her, and with a flushing cheek had poured his golden guineas into her lap; and she, by hard pinching, had saved some of these guineas, and this summer, because, in striving after such early wages, he had begun to outrun his strength, she made him take a few of them again, and sent him across the Channel to visit (what in his heart she knew he longed to see) some one or two of the old picturesque French towns.

It was bright June weather when he reached the first of them at which he meant to halt, Rouen, and saw from far away the dark old city, toward which for years his artist's heart had tended, stretched out amidst the windings of the Seine. He had been laughed at by one or two before he started on his journey, and had been told that this old Rouen was nothing but a miserable town of grimy, tottering houses and blackened churches, but the youth had gayly returned laugh for laugh. He knew well what he had crossed the sea to seek, and he knew that he should not fail to find it. Nor did he. He found it, even in the midst of those decaying houses and those mouldering churches, he found it in narrow streets and in neglected corners; and wheresoever he discovered it, whether in open square or hidden alley, he hailed it as men hail the sight of long sought, long unseen friends' faces. He had brought his sketching board and all his materials for drawing with him, and holiday though it was, he meant to work throughout it; but the novelty and the loveliness of every thing about him distracted him so at first that a few days had passed before he could do any thing but roam and gaze around him. He had been for three days in Rouen before at length he took his post one morning before the west front of the cathedral and began to draw. It was a mild, warm summer's day, and the square was very quiet. Only a few people passing in and out of the church, and occasionally a child or two attracted by curiosity to steal near and stare at him, disturbed him as he worked, and hour after hour passed happily over him. During hour after hour, too, there was one person besides himself who, having come to the square before him, remained till long after he had gone away—a girl selling rosaries and little images at the cathedral door. After he had been working for some time he noticed her. When his work was over, and he came forward before he turned homeward to enter for a few minutes into the church, he stopped when he came to where she sat in the cool shadow by the porch, and looking into her basket took up in his hand a little rosary of coral beads.

"POOR CHRISTINE."

"How much?" he asked.

"A franc, monsieur," she said.

She smiled and thanked him as he gave the money to her, and he took his beads and passed on. He thought for a moment, "What a pleasant smile she has!" and then he thought no more of her till the next morning, when he came back to resume his work, and found her in her place again.

That day he took note of how picturesque the quaint old Normandy dress looked on her, the great high cap so scrupulously starched and white, the short petticoat so bright in hue. A trim, neat figure too, rounded, and light, and firm; a young, bright face, not beautiful, but pleasant as sunlight to look upon. He should like to make a sketch some morning of her, he thought, and that day when his work was done he went up to where she sat, and entered into talk with her. He had a frank, fearless, boyish habit of talking to every kind of person who came across him, man or woman, gentle or simple. For years already, ever since he had thought of becoming a painter, he had been accustomed to roam about the country, attaching himself sometimes in all simple faith to strange enough companions, falling into odd adventures, running occasionally some risks, and yet always, by some good guidance or instinct, escaping scathless from all; bringing his fresh, honest, trusting nature, that, thinking no harm itself, suspected no harm in others, undimmed and unaddened out of every trial. He went up to the girl and asked:

"Do you come here with your basket every day?"

They had already exchanged a little nod of recognition.

"Yes, monsieur, every day," she answered.

"Well—and don't you get very tired of it?" he said.

"Tired of it!" she repeated, with a smile that showed two rows of even, snowy teeth. "Oh no, monsieur; I know every body who passes here, and I amuse myself with watching for them. There are hundreds who come every day, winter and summer, as regular as the clock there. Then I see all the strangers," she exclaimed, in a tone of gentle exultation; "there is not a creature ever comes to Rouen, they say, but he comes here."

"Well, if you look out for strangers you will soon see plenty of me," Frank said, good-humoredly; "for I shall be here every day, I dare say, for the next two or three weeks."

"I saw monsieur the first day he came," she answered, with a smile; "he came and stood looking up there," pointing with her finger to the church-front, "till I thought he was counting all the figures on it."

He gave a laugh, and then colored a little; young as he was, he blushed for a moment at the thought that when he did not know it a woman had been watching him.

"Well, I was not counting the figures exactly," he said; "but do you know what I have been doing these last two days? I have been drawing the church—making a picture of it. I am a painter," he said, with youthful dignity.

"Ah! so?" And the bright brown eyes looked up into his face, not awe-struck, but a little curious and wondering.

"I will show you my picture presently, when I have got on a little farther with it, and then you shall tell me if you think I have made it like. Now when you sit here all day, hour after hour," he said, inquiringly, "do you ever think much about the church?"

PARIS FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER, 1866.—[SEE PAGE 614.]

"Monsieur!" she said, and the brown eyes opened wider.

"I mean, do you look at it much and try to find out what the figures on it mean? Do you ever think about the people who built it?"

She looked at him with a half pitying smile, and said,

"Monsieur, the church is very old; they are all dead."

"All dead! I should think they were," he answered quickly. "But what is to prevent you from thinking of them though they are dead? You know they were once alive. Now one of them must have cut these little twisted shafts here once; have you never wondered who he was, or what became of him?"

She shook her head placidly.

"What would be the use? I could not find out," she said.

"No, you could not find out; but you might try to fancy them all at work here, might you not? and how they came, just as you come, day after day, all these hundreds of years ago, and set up stone after stone, and carved figure after figure. Think how they must have watched their work and grown happy at the sight of it. Just think of them all here, with their hammers striking the stone, and the noise of every blow in the air, all of them talking in a language that would be almost like a strange tongue to us now. You know it all was so; why can't you think of it?"

"It may be easy for monsieur to think of the dead," she answered, simply; "but for me I do not find it easy, unless it may be of the blessed saints," and she crossed herself; "but then we know that they lived; and so for those others—" she said, and, slightly shrugging her shoulders, broke off her sentence with a dubious smile.

He had nearly burst into an answer about the saints that was more impetuous than reverent; but happily he checked himself in time, and instead of speaking stood looking for a minute in silence up over the great dark, glorious church-front, and wondering at what she had said. Out from the grey, solemn stone scene seemed to thousand voices that spoke to him: how could it be, he thought, that this girl had passed her life under the shelter of its shadow, and yet had to her every stone of it was dumb.

"Then you don't care for it?" he said, abruptly, at last, turning to her again.

"Nay, monsieur is mistaken," she answered, gently. "See, it is like home to me here; when it is hot summer all here in the cool shade; when winter comes I shelter myself there within the porch. It is like a good friend to me; other things change, but never changes. When I am glad I go in and kneel down and thank the blessed Virgin, and when I am sad I go there to say my prayers. Monsieur cannot wrong; I care for it."

She raised her face with a sudden smile as she paused, and, eager to believe that all the world cared for what she loved, eager for a universal sympathy with his own enthusiasm, he looked with pleased contentment into the girl's clear, honest eyes, and—

"Well, I am glad you like it," he said, heartily. "I thought you could not have lived here so many years and have cared nothing for it. You have lived in Rouen all your life, do you say? how long a time is that?"

"I am twenty," she said.

"Are you? Why you are older than I am, then! And what is your name?"

"Christine, monsieur," she answered.

Some one passing into the church had stopped beside her basket, and was beginning to look over its little stock of images and beads. She had to turn round to attend to him, and then before his purchase was made another customer came, and she lingered and looked on for a few minutes; then he said "good-by," and the boy and girl smiled to one another, and parted with a friendly nod.

He went home, and there was something pleasant to him in the thought which crossed him once or twice during the remainder of the day that in the morning he should see Christine again. Several times her face rose brightly up before him, with its certain, honest smile, and an odd kind of warmth into his heart; for, fair and dear to him as was this old Rouen, yet he moved as a stranger in it, and no other face than those of her had given either greeting or kindly word to him. And so, when he went to his post again next day, and she, who had been watching for him, at once when he appeared nodded and smiled to him across the square, instead of stationing himself in his accustomed place and beginning his work, as he had meant to do, he walked straight to her in a sudden impulse of pleasure for her cheery little face and welcome, and, like a thorough Englishman, put out his hand to her.

"You are the only creature that I know in Rouen!" he exclaimed, "except my landlady, and she is quite old. As I came along just now, I was wondering whether you would be here before me."

"Ah, monsieur," she said, laughing, "I have been here for hours. Look there—it is 10 o'clock. Do you think I begin my day so late as at 10 o'clock?"

"Is it really ten? Then I must be quick and begin my work too. By-the-way, I wonder—oh, may I call you Christine?" he asked, abruptly.

"Certainly, monsieur; it is my name."

"Thank you. Well, I was going to say, I wonder, Christine, if you would let me make a sketch of you?"

"Of me?" and the girl laughed with sudden, half-shy pleasure.

"I think I could do it, if you wouldn't mind sitting to me. I don't catch likenesses always very well, but I think I should succeed with yours. May I try?"

"But monsieur could find so many prettier girls—"

"Oh, I don't want prettier girls: I would rather have you," he interrupted her, bluntly. "You will let me do it, then, next to you? When may I begin? If I were to come early to-morrow—say at eight o'clock—would you be here then? Would that suit you?"

Any hour that suited monsieur.

"Very well, then; eight o'clock to-morrow morning. And now I must go to my picture." He turned half-way, and then looked suddenly back. "Have you a father and mother, Christine?" he said.

"No father, monsieur; but I have a good mother. She makes up all my stock for me. I buy the beads and take them to her, and she strings them—so. She makes these crosses too. She is very feeble, but she does all that for me."

"And then you come and sell them, Christine?" he said, quickly. "Do you know I have a mother too, and I work for her. We are two girls, and I make drawings and sell them."

"God bless you, then, monsieur!" she answered, fervently; "you will never be sorry for doing that."

He was touched by the genuine tone of sympathy.

"No, I know I shall not. I would rather help her than do any thing else in the world," he said, and the color rose up to his cheeks.

She smiled, looking in his face as he spoke. After a moment's silence, she said, simply and earnestly,

"It is sometimes hard to earn a living—harder than I hope it will ever be to you, monsieur; but I would rather be just a good girl as I am, and have my mother rejoice in me, than be the greatest lady in Rouen without her." And then she glanced up with a sunny look that chased away the tears which had risen for a moment to her eyes, and—"But even me—the world does not treat me very badly," she said, cheerfully. "I have a little hut to go to now and then, and when it is, I go in there and pray to the dear Virgin, and before long the sunshine comes back again. I am always going away. There are many good people in the world, monsieur, to keep the poor from starving."

She had a sweet voice, lower and softer than a Frenchwoman's voices often are. The face, too, had sweetness in it. He saw that now, though he had only noticed its bright, honest expression before.

"But I am keeping you from your picture," she said, smilingly, after a moment's silence.

That was true; so with a few more words he turned away, and stationing himself in his place began to work. It was a calm, gray summer day, windless and sombre, yet with a hopeful light here and there that shone through the thin clouds. He sat and worked, and as his sketch went on, and bit by bit he seized and fixed the impression of himself of the loveliness before him, in the very joy and boyish lightness of his heart he could have sung aloud. He had worked on for hours on other days; but been so happy upon no other; all life seemed full of gladness to him, and his life especially. It was the love of all that is fair and noble and good which the world ring with his name, but in his bright youth there were days—and this was one of them—when it almost seemed as if the love was given him to cut his way through the diamond gates.

He worked till it was growing late. All day among the many things that had come to happen, one thing had been the presence of Christine, bond of sympathy had sprung up between him and his simple, untaught, pure-hearted girl—real human sympathy, such as made even the sight of her across the square a thing that kept his young heart warm. He liked to look and talk with her, and each her smile; it was as good as sunlight to him. The old stones had their voices for him and tales to tell him, beads and crosses and all; but the girl belonged to them it was good also to lift his eyes up sometimes and look upon a friendly, living face. Its knew it was: he knew, at the end of work, that his day had been the brighter for Christine.

Nor was it the last, by many a one, that she helped to brighten for him. Before the month was out she became his one friend and one companion in Rouen; and no gentler friendship, no more honest and more companionable one could a man think between these two stray wanderers—the girl whose portion in this world was the selling of her beads at the church-doors, and the boy whose beckoning beacon-light was burning on the high hill.

He made his sketch of her. It was a feeble little sketch, yet like enough to be a real possession to him, and he could see that it gave her pleasure when he showed it to her. Then he began another, and another, and another, and fifty feet away from us, telling her heads at this moment among the old women kneeling on the floor. But if I knew that she was, do you think I would go in and try to find her?" He shook his head, and smiled, half-sadly. "We can not put life into dead bones, Fred," he said, "nor throw a bridge across from youth to age. If I found her now, do you think we could rush into each other's arms? Nay, nay lad, the girl and boy we have been talking of died and were buried fifty years ago."

He stood and leaned upon his stick, looking up again to where the swallows were flying in and out above the porch, till presently there came a sound of music that came through the door.

"We are losing the mass, my boy; let us go in."

And so they went in, and listened to the gorgeous music that was rolling and swelling along transept and aisle.

The last days of Ex-President MARTIN VAN BUREN were made comfortable by the use of JONAS WHITCOMB'S Asthma Remedy. Letters from his physician, and from Mr. VAN BUREN himself, express much gratification with the result of its use.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PREPARED OIL of PALM and MACE FOR PRESERVING, RESTORING,
AND BEAUTIFYING THE HAIR.

And is the most delightful and wonderful article the world ever produced.

Ladies will find it not only a certain remedy to restore, darken, and beautify the hair, but also a delicate article for the toilet, as it is highly perfumed with a rich and delicate perfume, independent of the fragrant odor of the oils of Palm and Mace.

THE MARVEL OF PERU,
A NEW AND BEAUTIFUL PERFUME.

The delicacy of this delightful extract, and its wonderful lasting qualities, are unequaled by any thing of the kind known to the world, and have obtained for it the prima odora of perfumes.

The above will be for sale by all druggists and perfumers.

PRICE 81 PER BOTTLE EACH.

Sent by express to any address by the proprietors.

WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE
FOR EXPELLING WORMS.

Remember, it is the only thing that can be depended upon. It has been a source of trial, and has always been failed with joy by the suffering. Price 25c. per bottle.

For sale by all Druggists. Prepared by T. W. WINER & CO., Sole Proprietors, No. 160 Liberty Street, N. Y.

BATH, HOMBURG.

In order of the Council of the town of Homburg there has been constituted a CURE-COMMISSION. The same has to give answers in all occurring questions from abroad, as well as to give advice in the place; and all strangers who should be in want of same, the Commission is formed out of independent residents of the place. With regard to the many questions made latterly by letter and telegram, the Commission recommends strongly to the present, as well as the outward strangers, to address themselves to this commission, which is placed under public authority.

Letters and telegrams will be answered forthwith.

SCHLEUSSNER,
The Burgomaster of Homburg.

Allcock's Porous Plasters.

HARTFORD, CONN., Nov. 11, 1864.

MESSRS. THOS. ALLCOCK & CO.,—Please send, with dispatch, twelve dozen Allcock's Porous Plasters. Our daily experience confirms their very superior excellence. At this moment of writing a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in the shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He is now enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay $5 for a single Plaster if they could not be had at a lower rate. A second man surgeons do not make use of these perforated plasters to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted; while the perforations peculiar to them reader them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Keeping the plasters to be useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M.D.

Agency, Brandreth House, New York.

Sold by all Druggists in the United States and Canada.

DEMOREST'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE—The Ladies' Literary Conservatory of Art, Novelty, and Beauty, furnishing the Best Stories, by the Best Authors, Best Poems, Best Engravings, Best Music, Best Miscellany, Best Paper, Best Printing, and the best in every way calculated to make it the most entertaining, useful, and beautiful, or, as the New York Independent says, "Unrivaled by any acknowledged the Model Parlor Magazine of America." Yearly, $3, with a valuable premium to each subscriber. The October Number, with brilliant novelties, now ready. Liberal terms and premiums for Clubs. Single copy 25 cents, post free. Address

W. JENNINGS DEMOREST,
No. 473 Broadway, New York.

Specimen copies sent post free on receipt of 3 cents.

"How 'tis Done." Whiskers in 6 weeks. Gambling exposed. Fortune-telling. Ventriloquism &c. 100 great secrets. Free by mail. Address Hunter & Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

Agents wanted. Extraordinary inducements. The only $5 dollar household article for agents to sell. Send for Circulars. J. F. Beebie & Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE EXTRA TRIBUNE

FOR THE

POLITICAL CAMPAIGN.

A political struggle, rarely surpassed in importance or interest, has been precipitated on the country by the treachery of Andrew Johnson and some of his official or personal adherents to the great and patriotic party by which they were intrusted with power.

The aim of the conspiracy is to put the steadfast Loyalists of the South under the feet of the "whipped but not subdued" Rebels, and to make the latter to gist their vengeance on the former, whom they hate and curse as responsible for the most unexpected overthrow of their darling "Confederacy."

The recent wholesale massacres at Memphis and New Orleans were but conspicuous manifestations of the spirit of the campaign in the South, whereof the bloody triumph in Kentucky is a more recent example. The soldiers of Lee, Beauregard, Johnston, and Hood are now the dominant power from the Potomac to the Rio Grande; they elect each other to office in preference even to abject-home Rebels; they have supplanted nearly all others in policemen or firemen offices, they are organized and officered as State militia; and they ruthlessly crush every demonstration of loyal Whites or loyal Blacks in assertion of the EQUAL RIGHTS of AMERICAN FREEMEN. The most shocking outrages on Blacks are tolerated, and their white teachers subjected to violence and outrage by unchanged Rebels, who regard the murder of murder and arson by cheers for Andy Johnson and execrations of Congress.

The purpose of forcing Representatives of the Rebel States into Congress, in defiance of the loyal oath, by Presidential fiat and Military power, is openly avowed, with threats that the next session shall be treated as rebels, and a civil war thus kindled throughout the North and West.

It has thus become imperative that those who stand for LIBERTY and LOYALTY—the true friends of the UNION to exist and of MAN to be FREE—should organize and work to overthrow the Rebels and Traitors who lead the insolent conspiracy.

We must save from the SOUTH and the COPPERHEADS that revolutions go not backward—that Emancipation is an accomplished fact—that the EQUAL CIVIL RIGHTS ACT can never be repealed—that the rights of the hunted AMERICAN are henceforth guaranteed and shielded by the FEDERAL CONSTITUTION, and must be maintained against all gainsayers—the days when Britain BLACKS had no rights which WHITES were bound to respect have gone forever.

We hold to-day the power in all the Free States of 1860, in West Virginia, and in Missouri. We must hold them in our ensuing elections, and add to them Maryland and Kentucky—for these are the only triumphs treachery, otherwise Johnsonism. We must elect to the Fortieth Congress an overwhelming force devoted to Loyalty, Nationality, and the inalienable Rights of Man.

To this end let Light and Truth be universally diffused to every neighborhood, every fireside, throughout our broad country.

To this end we propose an extra issue of THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE (differing in size and appearance from the regular edition), which we will supply to all Subscriptions received prior to September 15, on the following terms, the price to be one dollar subscriptions to commence on receipt of the money:

2	copies for three months	$1
12	"	5
25	"	10
50	"	20
100	"	40

PAYABLE ALWAYS IN ADVANCE.

The papers to be sent to one address.

All friends of the cause are invited to form clubs.

Address

No. 154 NASSAU STREET, New York.

TO ADVERTISERS.

Merchants, Manufacturers, Booksellers, Real Estate Owners, Schools, and all others who desire to reach customers in all parts of the country, will find it to their interest to send for our Advertising Circular.

The circulation of THE TRIBUNE is larger than that of any other newspaper, and its terms are the most enterprising, thrifty, and industrious classes. Advertisements inserted in each of the issues of THE DAILY TRIBUNE, SEMI-WEEKLY, and WEEKLY—will be read by nearly a million of people, and the advertising rates are reduced as low as well as the money he spends in judicious advertising. The investigations of the Revenue Committee of the City resulted in naming the DAILY TRIBUNE as being one of the two papers having the largest bona fide circulation, and its weekly edition is acknowledged to be far greater than that of other newspapers. The Daily Tribune is read by enterprising and intelligent business men and their families, and the Weekly is known from there being through its columns will reach the very best classes of buyers.

Rates of Advertising in THE NEW YORK DAILY TRIBUNE: Ordinary Advertisements inserted under appropriate heads, TWENTY CENTS per line each insertion (About eight words across the page). Special Notices Two (About eight words across the page). Special Notices: One Dollar per line each insertion. Semi-Weekly TRIBUNE: Twenty-five cents per line each insertion. All business cards inserted at rates that will pay. The Political Campaign, now fairly inaugurated, is favorable to the circulation of the Tribune, and we are unanimously making it more than usually desirable as an advertising medium. Price $3 per line. All advertisements inserted for less than $5 00. The circulation of THE TRIBUNE has increased over one hundred per cent. during the past year since the first of August. This is an interesting fact to advertisers. Address THE TRIBUNE,

No. 154 Nassau Street, New York.

Real Estate Dealers both in the City and Country will find THE TRIBUNE a very valuable medium through which to reach parties seeking to buy or sell.

MERWIN & BRAY,

760 BROADWAY,

Manufacturers of the Celebrated Ballard Breech-Loading Rifles, Military and Sporting Styles.

fles carry a ball varying from one ball on each pound of lead, and workmanship of the best quality. They are warranted in every respect.

SOLE AGENTS

for the well-known Eagle Ammu Co's Cartridge Revolvers, Best and Pocket size. These Pistols require but four motions to load and discharge, a degree of perfection never before obtained. Are sure fire, and carry a much larger charge than any revolver of the same weight and size. Also Agents for the Whitney Arms Co.'s Cooch's Breech-Loading, and the New York Metallic Ammunition Co.'s Copper Cartridge Revolving Rifles.

Dealers in Arms and Ammunition of all kinds. Illustrated circulars sent on application.

760 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Stammering

Cured by Bates' Pat. Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, &c., address Simpson & Co., 277 W. 23d St., N.Y.

NOW READY.—Washburn's Autumn Catalogue of splendid Flowering Bulbs, containing a list of the splendid Flowering Bulbs, containing a list of the choicest Hyacinths, Tulips, Crocuses, Lilies, &c., with full and plain directions for their culture. It also contains a beautiful colored plate of Hyacinths and Tulips. It will be forwarded postpaid upon receipt of 10 cts. to all applicants. Address WASHBURN & CO., Horticultural Hall, Boston, Mass.

100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.,
Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, with which we want in every town and county. J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 208 Broadway, New York.

Washes Well! Wears Well!

The Genuine Magic Ruffle!

These goods, having the above trade-mark on the Rich and Cord, are warranted to stand well in all seams in each piece, and to WEAR and WASH as well as any made by hand.

THE GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES, still manufactured by the original inventors and patentees, on superior machinery, from the best materials, and under the supervision of Mr. Hamilton, who has had 30 years' constant use, giving invariable satisfaction.

Manufactured by the MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY, 76 Chambers Street, New York. Also Manufacturers of RUFFLE BINDING and RUFFLE HEMS and RUFFLES.

MEN WITH BRAINS,

And $10 capital, are making $10 to $30 per day with "The Great Labor Saver," Worth $20 to any family. Quick sales, large profits, small capital, no competition, no risk. Ladies, gentlemen, clergymen, teachers, clerks, mechanics, boys and girls can obtain a money making business, should send for papers.

Address LEVELL,
Lombard Block, Chicago, Illinois.

Take Time by the Forelock.

The miasma which generates epidemic fevers is now rising in clouds under the bracing beams of the dog-star. Every body, as well as reform animal and vegetable matter, emits unwholesome vapors, and in crowded cities and the dense assemblages which business and pleasure call together, the elements of disease are evolved. The pressure upon every vital organ is never so great as in the second and third months of summer, and every prudent teacher is that the system be equipped to be reinforced to meet it.

We hold our lives, so to speak, on a repairing basis, and this is the season when the process of dilapidation is most rapid, and repairs are most required. There free build up, prop, and sustain the powers of nature which resist malignant influences, and HOSTETTER'S BITTERS. He who takes it may be sold to clothe himself in sanitary mail, against which epidemic disease will hurl its poisoned shafts in vain. Fever and ague, pestilence-smote, but a great medical fact, attested by twelve years' experience in every climate of the habitable globe. Extremes of temperature always disturb the functions of the stomach, the bowels, the liver, and the skin. It is through these that the most dangerous maladies assail us. Tone them in advance.

Hostetter's Bitters,

And defy heat and malaria.

BABBITTONIAN SELF-TEACHING PENMANSHIP, as now taught, commended by The Scientific American, Independent, Evangelist, Methodist, Baptist, Observer, Christian Times, and by eminent Teachers who have adopted it with unprecedented success, as well as by Bankers, Clerks, Students, Parents of 92 pages 90 reflecting hand-board slips, illustrated, easy to understand, and sent postpaid on receipt of $1 50. Specimen slip of the same for 10c.; plain, 5c. Mailed postpaid, FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, New York, PUBLISHER.

"KA-FOOZLE-UM."

DAUGHTER OF THE HAREM, COMIC SONG.....25c.
"SHE SEEMS, BUT NOT A STAR," SENTIMENTAL.....25c.
THE CHIMNEY SWEEP, DANCE FOR VIOLIN, 10c.; piano..30c.
"NELLIE'S GONE FOREVER," for violin, 15c.; piano..25c.
SERGEANT GRIMES' POLKA, for violin, 15c.; piano..30c.
Mailed postpaid, FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, New York, PUBLISHER.

THE "THUNDERBOLT," Howard's new Breech-loading Rifle, superior to the Needle Gun, only $25 00. FOWLER & WILD, Agents, 189 Broadway, New York. Circulars on receipt of stamp.

$1500 PER YEAR paid by SHAW & CLARK, Piano Manufacturers, Malden, of Chicago, Ill.

$150 A MONTH! NEW BUSINESS FOR AGENTS. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular with full Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 10 cts. ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 98 Ann Street, New York, and 35 Lincoln Street, Boston.

DEMOREST'S Magic Photographs, or instantaneous Photography in the Parlor; splendid subjects, only 10 cts. per package. Mailed free on receipt of price. Address W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, New York.

Profitable employment guaranteed to male and female agents. Address O. H. Noble & Co., 102 Centre St., N. Y.

WANTED—AGENTS, $100 a month, Male and Female, to introduce the CELEBRATED NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Price only $20. Every machine warranted five years. For particulars address H. H. REGISTER & CO., 95 Broadway, room No. 3.

$5 SEWING MACHINE. $5

FIRST PREMIUM and IMPROVED, the embodiment of practical unity and extreme simplicity. Originality patented May 9, 1865. Improvement patented June 9, 1868. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with CHANGING attachment, is noiseless in operation, sews with PERFECT or WORM STITCH ALIKE on both sides with extraordinary rapidity, making SIXTEEN STITCHES to each revolution of the Wheel. Will HEMMER, HEM, SHIRR, GATHER, BRAID, SEW UP BRAIDING, &c., &c. Strongest machine manufactured. Warranted not to get out of order in 5 years. It has received the approval of all the principal journals, and of those who have used it.

With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly does the whole family like Machine-ry.—New York Tribune.

Single machines, ALL COMPLETE, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5 00. Liberal terms to agents. Agents wanted every where. Address all orders,

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY,
Office 162 Nassau Street, New York.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE.

Superior advantages in English, Classics, Sciences, Commercial, Preparatory, and Primary Departments. Lewis's Gymnasium for Ladies, and Military Drill for Gentlemen. Eminent Instructors. Terms low. Apply to Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., PRINCIPAL.

Claverack, Columbia Co., N. Y.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS.

SELPHO'S PATENT.

Are pronounced by all the most eminent surgeons and upward of ten thousand patients to be the most valuable and useful artificial limbs ever offered for sale or exposed, comprising all that is desirable in Artificial Limbs, viz., ease, comfort, durability, and cheapness. Send for Pamphlet. WILLIAM SELPHO & SON, Patentees and Manufacturers, No. 516 Broadway, New York.

[From the Rev. J. W. Poland's Autobiography.]

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. I was living in Albany, and was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a dangerous, hide cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation, having for its basis the inside bark of white pine, might be combined so as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in disease and health, I compounded a small quantity of the Medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was surprising and gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough checked, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I rent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for many months with a bad cough, aggravated by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. She found relief, and after using it some time, She took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1857, I left Albany, and since that time the WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its wonderful cures have so well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. In a remedy for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel, and all the ills that flesh is heir to, this Compound will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicines generally.

GEO. W. SWETT, M.D., PROPRIETOR,
Boston, Mass.

BURNHAMS & VAN SCHAAK, Chicago.
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio,
GENERAL AGENTS FOR THE WEST.

Important to European Travellers.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST.

BY W. P. FETRIDGE.

A New and Revised Edition (the fifth) is now ready. The Valuable Book is now ready.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

6000 AGENTS WANTED to sell six new inventions. Great inducements to families all or part time. Sells 16 cts. and 40 pages, or 25 cts. and get 96 pages and a splendid gift. Epidemic, Revival, Jewell, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED

To sell an article, patented, that will sell in every house, store, office, city, and country. Large profits to agents. Circulars free. Address, with stamp, H. ADDRESS C. M. BROWN, 74 Bleecker Street, New York.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR OCTOBER, 1866.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $4 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $8 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements for Insertion on the following low rates:

One Page	$250 00
Half Page	125 00
Quarter Page	65 00

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $4 00
One Copy for Three Months 1 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.

The BOUND VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Cloth Binding . . . . . $7 00 per Volume.
Half Morocco 10 00

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

CLUBS.—An Extra Copy will be allowed to Every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.

The Postage is Twenty Cents per Year, which must be paid at the office where received.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

A NATURAL QUESTION.

MASTER GUS. "AUNT ELIZA, does Captain VAN TUYP wear Rats in his Mustache? I think I see the Tails sticking out!"

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our PERSONAL attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

At Reduced Rates. POLLAK & SON, Merrschaum Manufacturers, 692 Broadway, near Fourth St., N.Y. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Pipes from $5 upward.

HOMES
FOR THE MILLION!

WOODWARD'S ARCHITECTURE AND RURAL ART. 1867. 175 Designs and Plans. Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 00. WOODWARD'S COMPLETE HOUSES. 75 Designs and Plans. $1 50.
MANUAL OF THE HOUSE. 192 Designs and Plans. $1 50.
GEO. E. & F. W. WOODWARD, 37 Park Row, N.Y.

Pain in the Stomach or Bowels.
Constipation, Sick Headache, Cramps, Colic, Cholera Morbus, Distress after Eating, are surely cured by the use of COE'S DYSPEPTIC CURE. It is certainly the greatest remedy in existence. For sale by Druggists every where.

50 MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP PER-CENT SAVED BY
USING B. T. BABBITT'S Pure CONCENTRATED POTASH, or READY SOAP-MAKER. Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other speculator or lye in the market. Put up in cans of 1 pound, 2 pounds, 3 pounds, 4 pounds, and 12 pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making hard and soft Soap. One pound will make 10 gallons of soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in the market.
B. T. BABBITT, 64, 63, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

Economy is Wealth.
If you want the best-fitting, strongest, and most serviceable Paper Collar ever offered to the Public, don't fail to purchase the

PATENT REVERSIBLE
PAPER COLLAR
MADE BY
MARCH BROS., PIERCE & CO.,
AGENTS.
WINTHROP SQUARE, BOSTON.

PEABODY'S BREECH-LOADING
MUSKETS, CARBINES, AND SPORTING RIFLES,
FOR METALLIC CARTRIDGES,
Manufactured by the
PROVIDENCE TOOL CO. ARMORY,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

These arms are made in the most perfect manner, are interchangeable in all their parts, and are unequaled for symmetrical appearance, simplicity, accuracy of fire, and strength. They have been received with remarkable favor in our own and several other countries, and can now be supplied in large numbers. Send for descriptive pamphlet and illustrated price-lists, printed in English, French, German, or Spanish.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Revolver exceeds all others for compactness, effectiveness, durability, power, and safety in carrying. Is light (14 oz.), small (only 7 in.), with larger metallic cartridge (32-100 ball) than any Revolver made of same size and weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. HUCKINS, 73 Beekman Street, New York.

IMPROVED
STEREOPTICON, DISSOLVING VIEW, AND
Magic-Lantern Pictures and Apparatus.
Complete outfits and instructions furnished. For Illustrated Catalogue and information, address
W. LANGENHEIM, Philadelphia, P. O., Box 1079.

SURE PILE CURE.

Dr. Gilbert's Pile Instrument, for the radical cure of piles, prolapsus, &c., without an operation or medicine, relieves the worst case in 5 minutes, and has never failed to effect a permanent cure. Send for circular. Sold by druggists generally. Discount to dealers. Sent by mail to any part of the United States on receipt of $3.
J.P. ROMAINE, Proprietor, 373 Broadway, New York.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others send mail to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 60 Broadway.

THE
Campaign Tribune.
Read Prospectus and Terms to Clubs on Page 623.

JOHN BONNER,
Stock Broker,
22 BROAD STREET.
Government Securities of all kinds, Railway Stocks, and Bonds, Petroleum and Mining Shares, and Gold, bought and sold on commission.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

THE
GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
Have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show. All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

Price-List.

YOUNG HYSON, 50 cts., 90 cts., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ℔.	OOLONG, 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 ℔.
MIXED, 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 ℔.	IMPERIAL AND HYSON, best $1 25 ℔.
JAPAN, $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ℔.	ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ℔.

(For further particulars see former editions of this paper.)

P.S.—All towns, villages, or manufactories, where a large number of men are engaged, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to

Great American Tea Company,
Nos. 31 and 33 VESEY STREET, corner of CHURCH. Post-Office Box No. 5643, New York City.

Evidence after Eight Months' Trial.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE, July 31, 1866.

Great American Tea Company, Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, New York:

GENTLEMEN,—Accompanying this I send you our regular monthly Club List, which, you will perceive, is still increasing in proportions. We have now tried your Teas and Coffees for upward of eight months, and have come to the conclusion that we get as good an article from your house and at about half the price that we would be forced to pay our merchants here.

I congratulate your Company on the great success that has crowned its efforts in its endeavors to lighten the burden of high prices borne by our laboring people; and also congratulate our Club upon its good fortune in procuring these luxuries of life at prices so fair and reasonable. Hoping you will continue to receive a liberal share of public patronage, I am, Sirs, very respectfully yours, L. CASS CARPENTER.

				Brought up	$77 70
2 lbs. Japan	H. H. Knight	at	$1 25	$2 50
1 lb. Green Coffee	do.	at	35	35
1 lb. Japan	Miss Duffy	at	1 25	1 25
1 lbs. do.	Miss Allen	at	1 25	2 50
1 lbs. do.	M. Afee	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. Oolong	S. Waller	at	1 00	1 00
2 lbs. Imperial	L. D. Roberts	at	1 25	2 50
1 lb. Japan	C. Becker	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. Green Coffee	do.	at	35	35
5 lbs. Rio Coffee	W. Mirty	at	32	1 60
4 lbs. Green Coffee	W. Stichum	at	35	1 40
2 lbs. Oolong	S. R. Brown	at	1 00	2 00
2 lbs. Young Hyson	do.	at	1 10	2 20
1 lb. Gunpowder	D. S. Holland	at	1 25	1 25
8 lbs. Green Coffee	do.	at	35	2 80
2 lbs. Oolong	Mrs. Dooley	at	1 00	2 00
1 lb. Imperial	do.	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. Japan	S. Trevvill	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. do.	Smead	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. Imperial	do.	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. Mixed	J. A. Donnel	at	1 00	2 00
3 lbs. Green Coffee	do.	at	35	1 05
3 lbs. Roast Coffee	R. J. M. Gill	at	40	1 20
2 lbs. do.	J. Gass	at	40	80
1 lb. Japan	do.	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. do.	R. Goodhart	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. Imperial	do.	at	1 25	1 25
1 lbs. Young Hyson	do.	at	1 25	1 25
10 lbs. Rio Coffee	De Mawbray	at	32	3 20
2 lbs. Oolong	do.	at	1 00	2 00
1 lb. do.	H. Pitts	at	1 00	1 00
1 lb. Souchong	A. Besser	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. Japan	B. Messer	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. do.	J. S. Sampson	at	1 25	1 25
2 lbs. Roast Coffee	C. B. Parkman	at	40	80
10 lbs. Green Coffee	A. N. Barnes	at	35	3 50
1 lb. Gunpowder	A. Watts	at	1 25	1 25
1 lb. Ground Coffee	do.	at	40	40
2 lbs. Green Coffee	J. Cox	at	35	70
2 lbs. Japan	Mrs. Hyatt	at	1 25	2 50
4 lbs. Imperial	Patsey	at	1 25	5 00
1 lb. Oolong	do.	at	1 00	1 00
2 lbs. do.	A. Thomas	at	1 00	2 00
1 lb. do.	T. H. Brooks	at	1 00	1 00
Carried up				$77 70	$181 96

NATIONAL BENEVOLENCE FOR THE PURPOSE OF BUILDING IN THE NORTHWEST THE SOLDIERS' ORPHANS AND WIDOWS' HOME!

MUNIFICENT DONATIONS!

10,000 Acres of Splendid Farm Lands! and 1157 Building Lots!
Are to be disposed of on the 24th day of December, 1866, to Subscribers, for the benefit of the SOLDIERS' ORPHANS' AND WIDOWS' HOME, OF ST. JOSEPH, MO.

This land, which is fully equal to any on the globe, lies in the Counties of Atchison, Gentry, Holt, Harrison, Bates, Nodaway, and Worth, and has been generously donated to this charity by the noble patriots of our country. The Trustees have divided the same into 141 FARMS, as follows:

ONE PRIZE, Farm of 640 acres in Atchison Co., valued at	$10,000
THREE PRIZES, Farms each 320 acres—aggregate value	15,000
TEN PRIZES, Farms each 160 acres—aggregate value	15,000
TWENTY-SEVEN PRIZES, Farms each 80 acres—aggregate value	33,750
ONE HUNDRED PRIZES, Farms each 40 acres—aggregate value	67,750
1157 PRIZES OF BUSINESS LOTS, and one-half and one-quarter acre lots, in the town of Sedgwick, in Atchison Co., directly on the St. Joseph and Council Bluffs Railroad, and within three miles of the Missouri River	121,720

Forming a Total of 1298 Prizes of Real Estate—Amounting to $267,470!

Which, together with Pianos, Melodeons, Sewing Machines, Agricultural Implements, &c., comprising many ornamental, useful, and substantial articles of manufacture, will form a grand total of 2000 PRIZES, VALUED IN THE AGGREGATE AT OVER $300,000!

Will be distributed at the Capitol, in the City of Jefferson on Dec. 24 next, under direction of the Board of Trustees, and a clear deed given to the real estate, by and under authority of an Act of the Legislature. Certificates of Shares, $5 each. For sale throughout the United States by authorized Agents. And at the precise location of each parcel of land or building lot. ☞ Certificates may also be had by addressing the Trustees of the SOLDIERS' ORPHANS AND WIDOWS' HOME, Look Box 1119, St. Joseph, Mo., or, under State Bank of Missouri, on Fulton Street, where the community are most respectfully invited, at their convenience, to call and examine the liberal and varied contributions from the State.

President of the Board, Hon. Wilford P. Hall, Ex-Gov. of Mo.; Vice-President, Hon. Geo. Smith, Lieut.-Gov. of Mo.; C. B. Messenger, General Western Agent; Ross Craig, City Agent; John E. Fitzgerald, Register.

STEREOPTICONS
MAGIC LANTERNS
For Public Exhibitions. A Priced and Illustrated Catalogue of Stereopticons, Oxy-Calcium Lanterns, Dissolving Lanterns, Magic Lanterns, &c., with views for the same, will be sent free by mail on application.
WILLIAM Y. McALLISTER,
728 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

WANTED Ag'ts, $150 per month everywhere, male and female, to sell GENUINE COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINES. Greatest invention of the age. Price only $18. Every machine warranted 3 years. Address for circular, GROVER & CO., Cleveland, O.

THE Howe Sewing Machines, lock stitch, for Families and Manufacturers. They are world-renowned. The Howe Machine Co., 609 Broadway, N. Y.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING
B. T. BABBITT'S STAR YEAST POWDER. Light Biscuit or any kind of Cake may be made with this "Yeast Powder" in two minutes. No shortening is required when sweet milk is used. Nos. 64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

Agents Wanted.—$2000 a Year, and expenses to male or female agents, to introduce a new and useful invention absolutely needed in every household. Agents preferring to work on commission can earn from $50 to $80 per day. For particulars address W. G. WILSON, Cleveland, Ohio.

MADAME JUMEL'S Mannanial Balm and Patent Medicated Soap will develop the natural beauty of the form on physiological principles. Depot 563 Canal St., N. Y., and for sale by druggists. Madame Jumel's Wrinkle Obliterator. Sold by Druggists.

BOKER'S BITTERS,
For sale by all prominent Grocers, Wine Merchants, and wholesale druggists. Depot, 1 to 5 PECKE, 3d., Sole Agent, No. 64 Liberty Street, New York.

"GET THE BEST."
WARD'S
PAPER COLLARS
For Ladies and Gentlemen. The largest assortment in the New World.
TO BE HAD EVERY WHERE,
And at wholesale and retail at the manufactory, No. 837 Broadway, New York.

1866 Fall Fashions.
J. W. BRADLEY'S DUPLEX ELLIPTIC (or Double Spring) SKIRTS. The LATEST STYLES are made of the FINEST and most flexible Cowhair, Crinoline, and Zoonoug with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE and LIGHTNESS OF QUALITY which is the STANDARD SKIRT of the Fashionable World.
AT WHOLESALE by the EXTENSIVE MANUFACTURERS and SOLE OWNERS of PATENT,
WESTBS, BRADLEY, & CARY,
97 Chambers and 79 and 81 Reade Streets,
NEW YORK.
Also at WHOLESALE by the LEADING JOBBERS.

TARRANT'S
SELTZER APERIENT.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—No. 510.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

A CENTENNIAL SONG.

BY REV. GEORGE LANSING TAYLOR, M.A.

THOU, O all-inspiring Spirit! all-illuming, unconfined,
Deep from out the inmost ardors of the calm, eternal Mind
Breathe on us thy fiery effluence, those who hear, and him who sings,
Flash through every soul thy fervors! Waft us all on rapture's wings!

Ere from godlike bliss Edenic lured and hurled by hosts of hell,
Man, the favorite of Jehovah, like a new-born planet fell,
In the counsels of creation, ere the endless silence heard:
"LET THERE BE!"—and worlds from nothing rolled harmonious at the word;—
There, ere eldest archangelic ardors hymned the wondrous plan,
Yearned the rediscovered Godhead with the love that died for man:
Yearned, and when he fell proclaimed it in that promise faint and far,
Glimmering down Earth's twilight distance like a dim and misty star.
Down long prehistoric ages, down the patriarchal years,
Dawned its beams on saints and sages, rose on raptured bards and seers,
Till, with one wild burst of anthems warbling through a thousand spheres,
Lo, Immanuel, Everlasting Saviour, Prince of Peace, appears!

Day immortal! Day uncelebrated still, though Earth so long
Beats and pants with pulse seraphic, soaring up the heights of song!
Not by mortal lays, and not by all the ecstatic choirs above,
Ever has been, ever shall be told Redemption's depth of love.
As the broad, bright tides of morning stream o'er Ocean's boundless breast,
As from out the East the lightning shineth even to the West,
So, through every land and language to the known world's farthest bound,
Flew the glad news of salvation and the long-lost Eden found!

Wondrous then the change transforming hearts and nations in a day!
Men, to moles and bats their idols casting, owned Messiah's sway;
Art, philosophy and learning, song and science, power and fame,
Thrones and kingdoms, mightiest empires, all adored Immanuel's name.

Then, alas! a wave of midnight o'er the troubled nations spread;
Manhood failed and Freedom perished; learning, science, song were dead;
And the great salvation, bought for man with agony divine,
Bound, blasphemed, was sold for lucre, bartered at an impious shrine!

Lo, once more celestial sunrise wide o'er Earth in splendor plays!
Gloom and error flee before it, smit with Truth's resistless rays!
Rock and dungeon, axe and fagot, all in vain its light withstand;
God's almighty love must conquer,—who can bind Jehovah's hand?
Wickliffe, Huss, Savanarola, Calvin, Luther, Cranmer rose,
Wrapped in zeal like Israel's prophets when they pled with Israel's foes;
Rending off the soul's base bondage, long in blood and vileness trod,
Pointing faith alone to Jesus, conscience only to its God.

Then, with vast and wondrous quickening, lo! the mind of man awoke!
Nations started from their slumbers as at midnight thunder-stroke!
Seas were crossed, new worlds discovered, stars unknown from darkness swung!
Round the globe the shout of progress rang through every land and tongue!

Then, ah! then a cloud of evil, scoffing, doubt, dispute, and sin
Veiled the brightness of the dawning, shut the heavenly sunrise in;
Wrapped in shade Immanuel's standard, late o'er longing lands unfurled;
Damped the fire on Zion's altars, dimmed her light that lights the world!
But not thus could fall God's promise, purposed ere the world began,
Breathing, burning down the ages unextinguished love for man:
Not one jot or tittle written ever from his law shall fall;
'Gainst the Church, by Jesus planted, gates of hell shall ne'er prevail.

Lo! immortal WESLEY, scorning ease and pleasure, honor, fame,
All his mind on fire from heaven, all his heart with love a-flame,
All his ardent soul illumed, anointed with the Holy Ghost,
Sanctified and sealed, arises, called to lead the blood-washed host!
Called to preach the great salvation, boundless, endless, full and free,
Grace that saves man's utmost being, saves through all eternity!

Thousands caught the rapturous tidings; heard, believed with shouts of praise;
Spread from isle to isle the story, see Britannia in a blaze!
O'er three thousand miles of ocean winds and waves the message bore,
Like a spark from heaven falling, kindling on this New World's shore!
Here a while, repressed, it smouldered, till, by God's own Spirit fanned,
Glimmering, rising, spreading, mounting, soon it swept o'er all the land!

First in Barbara Heck's pure spirit leapt to life the long-pent gleam;
Swift from soul to soul it lightened, darting wide its dazzling beam,
Till, as flames o'er autumn prairies fling their banners fierce and high,
Mingling in a fiery ocean flashing earth and glowing sky,
So the chariot of Jehovah, wrapped in brightness, as of yore,
In a pentecostal whirlwind swept the wondering nations o'er!

Embury and Webb and Strawbridge first the lambent tongues confessed;
Owen, Williams, King, and Watters, Boardman, Pilmoor, heroes blessed;—

PHILIP EMBURY'S HOUSE,
In which the first Methodist Sermon was preached in the City of New York, 1766.

STRAWBRIDGE MEETING-HOUSE, MD., 1766.

THE RIGGING LOFT,
Occupied as a Freethinking place by the Methodists of New York in 1768.

THE FIRST METHODIST CHURCH AND PARSONAGE, IN NEW YORK.
Built in John Street in 1768.

ASBURY, the great Apostle; Whatcoat, Rankin, Shadford, Lee; Abbott, Garretson, and Coughlan, Neal, M'Geary, Black, Lowe; Wooster, Hythreas, Cooper, Dickens, George, M'Kendree, Roberts, Cook; Emory, Hedding, Fisk, and Olin, Bangs, all graved in God's great book;—Names illustrious as their labors;—deathless as the march of time;—Bright with undecaying glory—sainted, high, serene, sublime!

Then rose venerable "JOHN STREET," and "SAINT GEORGE'S" ample shrine,
Altars where God's own Shekinah burned with ceaseless light divine;
Where the living word, like lightning, fell from fire-touched lips of old,
And the shouts of new-born thousands heavenward like an anthem rolled!
Not alone the blissful baptism Wesley's favored followers knew,
O'er the land, inspired and radiant, matchless, wondrous WHITEFIELD flew;
Every priesthood, creed, and order owned the impulse, proved the power;
Far and widening spread the influence, deepening, heightening every hour.

Next came war and revolution. Strife and uproar shook the land;
Leagued oppression toiled to conquer Freedom's young heroic band;
But Jehovah, God of battles, saved the weak but smote the strong;
And a NATION rose victorious, hailed around the world with song!

Then, with her, a CHURCH as mighty called her heralds from afar,
Chose her chiefs, and rose organic, marshaled for a heavenlier war:
"FREE GRACE," "FREEDOM," "FULL SALVATION," on her blood-stained banner flew;
And around the cross she wrapped the starry flag—red, white, and blue!
True to man, and true to Jesus, panoplied in light she stood;
Heaven to her one hope for all men, man one blood-bought brotherhood.
"HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD" and "PERFECT LOVE" illumed her van;—
Thus complete her march triumphant down the centuries began.

Then what future lay before her, save Jehovah who could tell?
What her agonies and conquests, how her gathering hosts should swell
Till, to-day, the shouts of millions shake the earth and cleave the sky,
Echoed back by millions ransomed, warbling through eternity!
On, through storms that rocked the nations, bold she held her glorious track,
Grandly stood for God and justice, cast no glance of trembling back;
And when hell-born, foul rebellion rose in fierce infernal ire,
Up she sprang a harnessed seraph, bright with keen celestial fire!
Where the foremost ranks of Freedom, winged with wrath, to victory rode,
There the cross above the eagle like a meteor gleamed and glowed!
And among the faint and dying walked sweet Mercy's angel bands,
On their lips the love of Jesus, life and healing in their hands.

Lo, the vast conflict ended! Slavery's shackles rent in twain!
Righteousness and Peace, embracing, soon o'er all shall smile and reign!
Millions kneel on fetters broken, bathe with tears the blood-dyed sod,
Shout their anthems throbbing up the sunlight of the throne of God!
Stretch their anxious arms imploring for man's rights withheld so long,
Asking only light and justice, fearing only hate and wrong.

With the nation's joy exultant, lo! anew the Church uprprings,
Fired with purer, loftier rapture, while a holier joy she sings!
Wesley's children, myriads, millions, bless with transport and with tears
Him whose grace has brought them victors through a hundred deathless years!
Thronging now in thousand temples glad they bend the adoring knee,
Pealing high their great CENTENNIAL, thundering forth their JUBILEE!
On their century's latest confines peering backward in amaze!
Forward on a future grander than e'er greeted prophet's gaze!

Church of God, what wonders wait thee in that future hastening near,
In this New World's vast arena, noblest empire on the sphere!
What thy myriads who can number? How thy greatness yet shall mount?
What thy work, thy trust stupendous? Who can sum the dread account?
Deep in utmost, sweet abasement mourn thy sins, forsake, abhor;
Claim thy spotless robe, and wear it; rise, already conqueror!
File thy gifts like golden mountains! Heap thy holocausts untold!
Bid the spires of countless temples tower toward heaven while time grows old!
Build thy schools for unborn prophets! Rear the halls of hallowed lore!
Let long-distant generations bless their sires who wrought before!
Aid thy struggling sons whose souls, on fire with Heaven's resistless call,
Grope through nameless want and heart-ache toward that sun which shines for all!
Send thy light to those in darkness! Save thy children! Save the poor!
Broadly sow beside all waters;—God shall make the harvest sure!

Living temple of Jehovah, precious in thy light most clear,
Framed to mock hell's hate, upsoaring till thy dome shall roof the sphere,
Not in mortal might nor wisdom lay thy deep foundations low;
Not in earthly pomp and grandeur let the wondrous fabric grow,
On the Rock of endless ages bid thy crystal turrets climb,
Gold and jasper, emerald, diamond—stones of truth to last through time!

Israel's God, we bow before thee;—all our inmost souls we bow:—
Take our prostrate hearts and treasures;—seal our consecration now!—
Let the rushing, fiery whirlwind, as of old thy Spirit came,
Fill thy temples—fill thy children—crown thy Church with tongues of flame!
Up, O Zion!—Tell the story!—shout the tale to millions dumb!
God is risen in glory on thee!—Rise and shine, thy light is come!

Embury and Webb and Strawbridge first the lambent tongues confessed;
Owen, Williams, King, and Watters, Boardman, Pilmoor, heroes blessed;—

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1866.

PARTY LEADERS.

MR. SEWARD, in his speech at Niagara, or at some other point in Western New York, said that the party to which he lately belonged was sure to be defeated because it had no leader. He predicted its defeat by sixty days—at most, by forty thousand majority —and asked to be considered no prophet if the event showed him to be mistaken. The New York Times reasons differently from Mr. SEWARD. It thinks we are to be beaten, not because we have no leader, but because we have such bad ones. The Evening Post also utterly repudiates certain persons as leaders of the Union party, and loudly calls upon the Tribune to declare whether it acknowledges Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS as a leader. Now if what is called leadership were an essential element of success in this canvass we should like to ask all these authorities what they think of the prospects of a party of which Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON is leader? Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, Mr. SUMNER, General BUTLER, and Governor BROWNLOW may be very unwise men and advocate a very impracticable policy; but has there been in the history of our politics a more utterly unwise and desperate gentleman than the President?

As a matter of fact there is no leader of the great popular Union party which sustains the Amendment, and there is need of none. The policy which is supported by the sound, humane, patriotic judgment of the country, which has triumphed in Maine and will triumph by overwhelming majorities, and will go on triumphing in every State, and will secure the just and reasonable restoration of the Union, is not the policy of Mr. STEVENS, or Mr. SUMNER, or of Mr. GREELEY, or of Governor HAMILTON, or of Parson BROWNLOW, or of General BUTLER; it is the policy of the intelligent common-sense of the American people. The gentlemen we have named follow that policy, they do not direct it. They all belong to the Union party because their opinions is the same—namely, equal rights among American citizens. They all plainly and strongly express their views as to the best method of obtaining that result. But they speak with no other authority or influence than lies in the more or less good sense of their suggestions. Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, for instance, is a protectionist, and he advocates general confiscation. But the Union party is not a tariff party, and does not see the wisdom of confiscation. Mr. GREELEY, again, favors protection, but is opposed to confiscation. Mr. SUMNER is silent upon protection, and urges impartial suffrage as a condition of restoration. General BUTLER also agrees with Mr. SUMNER in his condition, but is probably a strong free-trader. All these gentlemen undoubtedly favor impartial suffrage in some form as the chief condition of restoration; but the party with which they act has nowhere authoritatively declared for that specific measure, and they have yielded their judgment to that of the party.

Those who complain of the gentlemen we have named as leaders—the Evening Post in protesting against them, the Times in despising—do hold which they have on the party—seem to forget the facts. Mr. STEVENS was called the leader of Congress at its late session. But if by leader is meant the author of a policy, he was plainly no leader at all. The policy of Congress was declared in the Report of the Reconstruction Committee. But not even was that not the work of Mr. STEVENS, but he bitterly and openly regretted it. Not a single important measure, except the appointment of the Committee, proposed by Mr. STEVENS was adopted by the House. It honored his profound conviction, his Roman firmness, his noble fidelity to equal rights, but it did not follow him. So with Mr. SUMNER in the Senate. His proposition to require impartial suffrage as a precedent condition of restoration received three votes besides his own.

The tendency of the great Union party is toward the peace and prosperity which spring from justice and equality of rights; that is to the opponents to the dominance of that spirit of caste and hatred of race and class which will forever embroil the country. Of the first tendency the men of whom we have spoken are representatives; of the second, VALLANDIGHAM, FERNANDO WOOD, JOHN T. HOFFMAN, HORATIO SEYMOUR, and HERSCHEL JOHNSON are equally representatives. These last opposed the war, perplexed the administration, urged at Chicago surrender to the rebellion, and supported General MCCLELLAN upon that platform. The others sustained the war to the glorious end, in full reliance upon the heroism and intelligence of the people. Mr. HOFFMAN and Mr. CLYMER, with their friends and supporters, who were the Peace Copperheads of the war, now insist that the States which rebelled shall immediately return to Congress with increased power, based upon a loyal population to which they refuse all share in representation. Mr. STEVENS and Mr. SUMNER and their friends act heartily with the party which demands that loyal States shall not have lost their equality in representation because they were loyal. They are high privates in the Union ranks, which support the Constitutional Amendment as the condition of restoration, but they are not the directors of the policy of the party.

CENTENARY OF METHODISM.

WE devote some attention this week to the Centenary of American Methodism. For good or ill, this form of Protestantism has become the predominant ecclesiastical fact of the nation. The official Census places it, numerically, far in advance of any other American religious body, and the general religious statistics of the country show that it comprises nearly one-half of all our Protestant communicants. Its progress and attitude can not, therefore, fail to be, in this its hundredth year, a matter of much interest, not merely to religionists, but to statesmen and citizens generally.

It celebrates its epoch not only with religious observances, but with gigantic financial projects. Its last General Conference, in enacting the programme of the Jubilee, intimated that ten millions of dollars might be raised. Its journals announced, in July, that one million was already subscribed, though the formal efforts of the scheme had not been begun, and would not be till October. It is now generally supposed that about five millions will be raised. Some of its authorities are proposing even higher figures. The splendid pledged guarantees the success of the year. It is, we suppose, the largest amount ever contributed by an American denomination in a single year, by a special occasion. Nearly all these funds are to be consecrated to the educational interests of the Church—a very significant fact.

The success of Methodism is one of the most interesting problems of ecclesiastical history. But one hundred years old in this country, and a hundred and twenty-seven years in Europe, it is, more or less, jostled by all the old outlines of the globe, and its congregations include about one-seventh of the Protestant population of the world.

In this country it has been incomparably more vigorous than in the Old World; and as early as 1820 (only thirty years after the death of WESLEY) it advanced to the front of the whole Wesleyan movement, with a majority of 17,000 over English Methodism with all its foreign dependencies. Its practical system, and perhaps also its theology, is specially congenial to the new hemisphere. Its several bodies are singularly homogeneous—are indeed identical in theology and church discipline, and differ only in some general features of ecclesiastical polity, such as episcopacy and lay-representation. About half of the Methodism of the United States is found in "the Methodist Episcopal Church." The other half consists of several bodies, all of which differ from the parent body by excluding lay-representation in their supreme councils. Their combined population, including communicants and congregational adherents, amounts to between one-fifth and one-fourth of the whole national population. They comprise about 2,000,000 communicants, 15,000 local and 14,000 traveling preachers; 200 colleges and academies with 32,000 students; publishing institutions with an aggregate capital of about $1,000,000—the one in New York city having on its catalogue 5000 books and 900 tracts, besides 2300 Sunday-school volumes, and scattering more than 1,000,000 copies of the latter annually, and 300,000 copies of Sunday-school periodicals; besides the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, alone, has more than 1000 "circuits" and "stations," foreign and domestic, nearly 1200 laborers, more than 105,000 communicants, including 30,000 Germans and Scandinavians, with 350 preachers using their own languages. It is to raise this vast machine, besides the "Centenary contributions" of the Church. This one Church has also more than 1,500,000 Sunday scholars, and an army of 200,000 lay and local teachers. These are certainly surprising facts for a religious body which may still be said to be historically in its infancy.

Theologically, Methodism is said to be nearly if not quite identical with the Church of England. Its only standard, or symbol of doctrines (in America, at least) is an abridgment of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Anglican Church, made by WESLEY, who, it is well known, was a tenacious Churchman. It entirely rejects Calvinism, and all distinctively Calvinistic tenets. It is peculiar in having no obligatory creed; its historians boasting that it was one of the practical maxims of WESLEY'S policy "not to maintain a spiritual life by its doctrinal orthodoxy, but to maintain its orthodoxy by its spiritual life." They affirm that it has never had a serious outbreak of heresy. WESLEY threw out of his abridgment all "creeds" except the "Apostles' Creed," and this he retained only in the Formula of Baptism, which he supplied to America for most of his people, as most were baptized before they became Methodists, and most of their children are baptized before they become members. He published some "General Rules" as the "only" terms of membership; these are entirely practical, and do not include a single dogmatic condition. His "Articles of Religion" are not recognized by these "rules," but are placed apart in the Book of Discipline more as an "ordinatory" than "obligatory" standard of doctrine—showing what an inquirer may expect to find taught in the preaching of the Church, but not what he shall be required to subscribe in order to become a communicant. Consent to the "Articles," however, is required as a functional qualification for the ministry; and there is, we believe, no regular withdrawal of teaching in Methodism.

The denomination has a good record for loyalty. Made up in an eminent sense of the people, it has thoroughly identified itself with the popular cause. WESLEY was at first opposed to the Colonial Revolution, having indiscreetly republished an abridgment of his friend, Dr. JOHNSON'S, pamphlet against it. But immediately on receiving news of the battles of Concord and Lexington he changed his position, took sides with the Colonies, and so wrote to the Earl of DARTMOUTH. The letter has been published, and Mr. BANCROFT has taken special pains to vindicate WESLEY by using his document which is to his credit volume. Most of the Methodist preachers in America at the outbreak of the war were Englishmen, and, like the clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church, hastened back to England. This fact prejudiced much the public mind against the new denomination, but it was as loyal as any other religious body. The new Church actually pledged guarantees the success of the year. It is, we suppose, the largest amount ever contributed by an American denomination in a single year, by a special occasion. Nearly all these funds are to be consecrated to the educational interests of the Church—a very significant fact.

The success of Methodism is one of the most interesting problems of ecclesiastical history. But one hundred years old in this country, and a hundred and twenty-seven years in Europe, it is, more or less, jostled by all the old outlines of the globe, and its congregations include about one-seventh of the Protestant population of the world.

In this country it has been incomparably more vigorous than in the Old World; and as early as 1820 (only thirty years after the death of WESLEY) it advanced to the front of the whole Wesleyan movement, with a majority of 17,000 over English Methodism with all its foreign dependencies. Its practical system, and perhaps also its theology, is specially congenial to the new hemisphere. Its several bodies are singularly homogeneous—are indeed identical in theology and church discipline, and differ only in some general features of ecclesiastical polity, such as episcopacy and lay-representation. About half of the Methodism of the United States is found in "the Methodist Episcopal Church." The other half consists of several bodies, all of which differ from the parent body by excluding lay-representation in their supreme councils. Their combined population, including communicants and congregational adherents, amounts to between one-fifth and one-fourth of the whole national population. They comprise about 2,000,000 communicants, 15,000 local and 14,000 traveling preachers; 200 colleges and academies with 32,000 students; publishing institutions with an aggregate capital of about $1,000,000—the one in New York city having on its catalogue 5000 books and 900 tracts, besides 2300 Sunday-school volumes, and scattering more than 1,000,000 copies of the latter annually, and 300,000 copies of Sunday-school periodicals; besides the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, alone, has more than 1000 "circuits" and "stations," foreign and domestic, nearly 1200 laborers, more than 105,000 communicants, including 30,000 Germans and Scandinavians, with 350 preachers using their own languages. It is to raise this vast machine, besides the "Centenary contributions" of the Church. This one Church has also more than 1,500,000 Sunday scholars, and an army of 200,000 lay and local teachers. These are certainly surprising facts for a religious body which may still be said to be historically in its infancy.

Theologically, Methodism is said to be nearly if not quite identical with the Church of England. Its only standard, or symbol of doctrines (in America, at least) is an abridgment of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Anglican Church, made by WESLEY, who, it is well known, was a tenacious Churchman. It entirely rejects Calvinism, and all distinctively Calvinistic tenets. It is peculiar in having no obligatory creed; its historians boasting that it was one of the practical maxims of WESLEY'S policy "not to maintain a spiritual life by its doctrinal orthodoxy, but to maintain its orthodoxy by its spiritual life." They affirm that it has never had a serious outbreak of heresy. WESLEY threw out of his abridgment all "creeds" except the "Apostles' Creed," and this he retained only in the Formula of Baptism, which he supplied to America for most of his people, as most were baptized before they became Methodists, and most of their children are baptized before they become members. He published some "General Rules" as the "only" terms of membership; these are entirely practical, and do not include a single dogmatic condition. His "Articles of Religion" are not recognized by these "rules," but are placed apart in the Book of Discipline more as an "ordinatory" than "obligatory" standard of doctrine—showing what an inquirer may expect to find taught in the preaching of the Church, but not what he shall be required to subscribe in order to become a communicant. Consent to the "Articles," however, is required as a functional qualification for the ministry; and there is, we believe, no regular withdrawal of teaching in Methodism.

The denomination has a good record for loyalty. Made up in an eminent sense of the people, it has thoroughly identified itself with the popular cause. WESLEY was at first opposed to the Colonial Revolution, having indiscreetly republished an abridgment of his friend, Dr. JOHNSON'S, pamphlet against it. But immediately on receiving news of the battles of Concord and Lexington he changed his position, took sides with the Colonies, and so wrote to the Earl of DARTMOUTH. The letter has been published, and Mr. BANCROFT has taken special pains to vindicate WESLEY by using this at such prices as they can obtain. At home they can neither sell nor borrow. The proprietor of an unincumbered estate worth before the war $60,000, recently went to Richmond, Virginia, and vainly endeavored to borrow $1000 on mortgage. No one had the money to lend. Further South it is still worse. The new National Banks are using all their means in the cotton trade. Landed proprietors and owners of railways and other industrial enterprises can get no aid at home. Even for such trifling sums as $500 and $1000 they are compelled to look North.

The opportunity should not be neglected by Northern capitalists. Slavery removed, there is no reason why the South should lag behind the West in material development, progressive population, or wealth. No part of this country has been so blessed by nature as Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee. The soil will grow anything, from cotton to the finest wheat in the world; the climate is unsurpassed. A judicious traveller puts a comfortable test to the finest parts of France in saying that they reminded him of Virginia. And indeed there are but few Departments of France which can compare with that noble State. Kentucky and Tennessee are equally blessed. But for slavery each of these three States would at this time have supported a population larger than that of New York. With the abolition of slavery there is every reason to believe that the tide of European immigration will be diverted to these fertile States instead of to Illinois, Minnesota, and Iowa. It would not be surprising if the next ten years witnessed a development of what used to be called the Border Slave States as much and as thorough as was the development of the Northwestern States between 1850 and 1860. Neither Wisconsin, Minnesota, nor Iowa can for a moment compare with Virginia or Kentucky in natural gifts. And as men have become millionaires by simply buying farms in judiciously-selected spots in the Northwestern States, or by judicious investments in the railways and other industrial enterprises of that section, it is not at all impossible but that similar investments in the long-overvisited States of the South, especially the more northerly of the Southern States, may hereafter, under the impulse of European immigration, improved systems of agriculture, and, above all, a new and better public spirit, prove equally remunerative.

It is, of course, to the interest of the nation at large that the South should recover as soon as possible from the distress into which the war plunged her. All Northern men possessing common sense will aid her recovery by every means in their power. It is to be hoped that their efforts, which will naturally take the shape of private enterprises in the Southern States, will not be thwarted by exhibitions of the old intolerant spirit which was characteristic of the pro-slavery leaders. It may be hoped, for instance, that the purchaser of any one of the fine estates in Virginia which are now offered at low prices in our market will be permitted to select his own reading, to subscribe to the papers he likes, and will not be coerced by a Vigilance Committee into abandoning a newspaper which suits him because his neighbors think it too little to appreciate it. These points might as well be understood at once. We have seen a letter from a bookseller and news-dealer of a small town in South Carolina, written within three months, declaring that his neighbors forbade his selling any more copies of a certain popular Northern periodical. At the same time we have been solicited to negotiate the sale of certain property belonging to impoverished Southerners in that same locality. There is a slight inconsistency here. How can a Northern real estate agent or banker recommend his friends to buy or advance money on property which can only be tenanted subject to such conditions as the lords of the adjacent boroughs may dictate? We Northern men can not endure interference with our political creed. Some of us read the Tribune, some the Evening Post, some the Times, and some the World. But none of us will live where the enjoyment of our favorite paper is likely to be interfered with by outsiders. Before Northern capital flow freely to relieve the necessities of that region the Northern "notion" of free speech and free thought must precede it. The state of society so graphically depicted in that admirable work, "Inside," must undergo a radical change before the most energetic Northern broker can succeed in procuring much Northern money to help the South to its legs.

We entreat our Southern friends to understand—if their agents have not already made them acquainted with the fact—that they can derive no help at present from Northern Copperhead leaders or newspapers. Our Northern Copperheads have generally lost their money, and have all lost their credit. The Copperhead newspapers have no more influence than the letters of STEPHEN H. BRANCH.

The South wants money. It must have money. It will pay to lend it money. But it will be impossible for any Southerner to borrow money, even at usurious rates, upon the most undeniable security, if the lender is to be subjected at the South to disabilities or limitations of his social and personal rights.

A CLEAR ISSUE.

THE Address of the National Union Committee states briefly, precisely, and forcibly the exact issue. It is sharply defined, and there can be no misapprehension. It is the issue set forth at Syracuse, at the Loyal Southern Convention in Philadelphia, and by every Union orator and journal in the country. The foolish cry that nobody but the President and the Democrats know what they want has already died away. Vermont and Maine know distinctly what they wish. Illinois and Pennsylvania and Ohio and New York are not in the least doubt. The present issue is that the Constitutional Amendment, which the President himself formerly warmly favored, shall be adopted by any late insurgent State before it resumes its place in Congress.

This Amendment simply fixes in the organic law the legitimate results of the war.

First, It defines and defends citizenship in the United States and its rights.

Second, It bases representation upon the voting population; so that if any State chooses to keep a portion of its population uneducated, debased, and powerless, it shall not use that population to balance the intelligent and thrifty of other States; and also, that the change produced by emancipation in the original constitutional adjustment of representation may be rectified.

Third, Whoever has held office by the tenure of an oath to the Constitution of the United States, which oath he has violated, in order to find aid and treasure for the government, shall be disabled from office until Congress relieves the disability.

Fourth, The national debt shall never be repudiated, and the rebel debt shall never be paid by any State, nor any payment be made for emancipated slaves.

Fifth, Congress shall have power to enforce these guarantees by appropriate legislation.

This is the question before the people. Shall it be the country and mankind and equal liberty and steady loyalty which have gained by our victory, or shall it be the rebellion which, defeated in the field, outwits us in the surrender? And this is the question which the people understand, and have fully resolved to settle once for all.

THE HISTORICAL LESSON OF THE HOUR.

In the decision of the great question now before the country we have not only the lesson but knowledge. It is not to be wisely settled by an emotion, however generous, nor by a theory, however ingenious. The proper statesman for such a crisis are honest and shrewd and humane men who are also familiar with the great lessons of experience. Indeed, a radical defect of our national legislation is want of thorough education. Good men and true men may often adopt a false and dangerous political policy, simply because they are not familiar with the experience of men in other countries and at other times. In other words, a general and accurate knowledge of history is essential to a statesman's success.

We wish, therefore, that the address before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Yale College at its late anniversary, by Honorable ANDREW D. WHITE, might be widely circulated. It is circulated as a political tract of the highest order. MR. WHITE, of Syracuse lately, and we believe still honorary Professor of History in the University of Michigan, a Senator in the New York Legislature from the Onondaga district. His historical studies are extensive and profound, and his manly and fearless spirit leads them to bear like a Drummond light upon what seems to many minds the obscurity of the situation; and this is done without a word of allusion, sentiment, or sentiment. The address MR. WHITE maintains in his address that history shows the most energetic foe of liberty, the most dangerous to free institutions, the most destructive of nationality, to have been always an aristocracy based upon habits or traditions of oppression; and from the proofs of this he has drawn a clear picture of the manner by which the dangers springing from such an aristocracy can ever be permanently removed. Other battles may be longer, but this is the sharpest; "and as a nation uses its strength during the contest, and as it uses its wits after the contest," its national life is a success or a failure.

To the proof he summons Spain. He shows how the aristocracy was the disturbing element by erecting a substitute for patriotism, a substitute for political morality, and a theory of easy treason and perpetual anarchy; the latter involving three fatal ideas; the right of peaceable secession, the right of judging in their own cause, and the right of committing treason with impunity. Instead of grappling with this inexorable enemy Spain temporized and succumbed. This naturally produced an aristocratic inability to appreciate concessions. As length came the overwhelming force which suppressed the tyranny of the aristocracy by substituting one tyrant for many. Then the spirit of caste stimulated the evil tendencies of the monarch and demoralized the people. The result in Spain, says the orator, "was the growth of an oppressive caste, who, by their spirit of dissimulation, made despotism possible, and by their spirit of turbulence made it necessary."

MR. WHITE then cites, in illustration of his position, Ireland, France, and, finally, England; and advances with vast and irresistible proof to his conclusion that the oppressive caste must first be thoroughly subdued at all hazards, and then must be barred from resuming its power by guaranteeing full civil rights and political rights in germ to the subject class. The work of saving a nation from an oligarchy then is twofold. It is not finished until both parts are completed. Nations forget this at their peril. Nearly every great modern revolution wherein has been gain to liberty has had to be fought over a second time. So it was with the English Revolution in 1642. So it was with the French Revolution of 1789 and 1830. What has been gained by bravery has been lost by treachery. Nations have forgotten that vigorous feeling to gain liberty must be followed by sound planning to secure it."

This address is by far the most valuable application of the lessons of history to our situation that we have had, and they are presented with acute insight and trenchant force. The substance of an admirable politico-historical work is condensed into a few pages; and it would be fortunate for the country if every scholar brought his contribution to the altar in kind as Senator WHITE has done. It is a pamphlet of forty-six pages, published by THOMAS H. PEASE, New Haven.

THE SIBYLLINE OFFER.

We have stated elsewhere the precise terms upon which the loyal American people—and we use the word loyal not offensively, but for distinction—propose to allow the return of the late insurgent States. These are the terms which they are now willing to offer. Their offer will doubtless be universally and emphatically ratified at the next fall autumn elections. It will then be for the unrepresented States to determine whether they will accept these terms. The intelligent men in those States know perfectly well, whether the Democratic Copperhead papers and orators among us may say, that there is no vindictive feeling whatever upon the part of the Union party, no desire of personal revenge, no disposition to disregard the peculiar structure of our political system. But they know quite as well that it is the very general conviction of that party that there will necessarily be serious agitation until the country can see that equality of rights among the people is in the way of being every where established.

The Boston Advertiser, in recently speaking of this subject, truly remarked that the progressive settlement of such questions was like the offer of the Sibylline books. To-day you may have all for a price. To-morrow you can have less than two thirds of the price. The day after still less. Six years ago all that was asked was, that slavery should not go into the Territories. The offer was rejected, and the Slave States made war. In the first months of the war some of our Generals returned fugitive slaves, and offered to suppress insurrections. In a few months more and there was a general demand for colored troops and emancipation. In the second year slavery was generally abolished by proclamation. At the end of the war the defeated States were required by President Johnson to adopt the Emancipation Amendment. They are now asked to guarantee civil rights. It is time for Congress to consider. What rates they gained by refusing to allow that slavery should not go into the Territories, or by making war? What would they have gained by rejecting the Emancipation Amendment? What will they gain by rejecting the amendment now offered?

Had the popular leaders in those States been wise they would have been early convinced that the people who had suppressed the rebellion would not suffer those who had opposed them in the field of battle to settle the terms upon which the Union should be restored. That indeed was doubtless at first the conviction of the Southern leaders, which the President's course, by relaxed. But they should have known the loyal American people well enough to understand that they would not hesitate to repudiate a President even of their own election if he assumed to settle the great questions of the war without heeding them in the persons of their representatives. The people have shouted hoarse by the elections of the autumn, of which we have already seen the beginning, that the terms offered by Congress can not be set aside by the President nor by any lawful power. Do the States in question imagine that the terms will be made easier? Do they suppose that the people are likely after the cause of the war to reduce their demands? Let them remember the Sibylline books. It was not the price that was diminished.

THE AMERICAN SOCIAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION.

THE American Association for the promotion of Social Science is a society of eminent scholars and persons of every pursuit, whose object is inquiry into the wisest practicable methods of effecting the most desirable reforms in every department of social interest. At the last annual meeting papers of great value were read by HENRY C. CAREY, of Philadelphia, upon Social Resources; Dr. ISAAC RAY, of the Butler Insane Asylum, Providence, Rhode Island, upon the Isolation of the Insane; President HALE, of Harvard University, upon the Problems of Education; Dr. PALMER, of the University of Michigan, upon Sanitary Science; MR. SANBORN, Secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Charities, upon the Reformatories of that State, and the Present Condition of Legislation in regard to them; and other papers upon the various variety of social topics by other gentlemen. It is a thoroughly earnest and intelligent association to which the practical legislation of many States will be gratefully indebted. The next annual meeting will take place at New Haven, on Tuesday, the 8th of October, at 10 A. M.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD BONDS.

We draw attention to the advertisement of the Central Pacific Railroad Bonds, given on page 638. The Road is progressing with a rapidity unparalleled in the history of railway enterprise, and the bonds for sale by Messrs. FISK & HATCH are secured by a mortgage which is declared by Congress to constitute a first lien and superior to that of the United States Government. The earnings of the Road for the three months of May, June, and July amounted to $217,545 61.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS ITEMS.

AN Italian artist, residing in New York, named PIETRO FERRARI, has engaged another Italian, named ALESSANDRO URANI, to murder his rival at HERO; some dispute arose between them on the 19th of September, growing out of delay in the execution of the work which the employer, killing him almost instantly, and being pursued, shot himself through the head, causing death in a few minutes. Some HERO sent a considerable gift to the family of the murderer, and announced her purpose of giving a representation for their benefit.

A. G. CHITTENDEN has received United States Senator by the New Jersey Legislature.

A curious case of double dealing occurred at Dover 16 at Chicago. A tailor, from Germany, named Landenberg, finding that he could not get credit because of having stolen some money, which he pocketed, decided, rather than be tried by strike him at first, but not speaking the truth. The fearful imprecation had hardly been uttered when he fell to the floor a dead man. Upon medical examination it was found that the man had the heart disease, and that death was brought on by the excitement of the moment.

The Report of the Secretary of State gives nearly full returns of the recent Maine election, carefully prepared from official lists so far as published, and from letters from reliable sources. The list comprises 494 towns and plantations, which show a total vote of 127,000 for General Chamberlain, and 49,147 for MR. Pillsbury: making a majority of 77,719. In 1864 Governor Cony had in the same towns 68,866; MR. Howard, 44,176: majority, 24,690. MR. Pillsbury gains 16,558. The remaining places threw 3846 votes last year, and 2 the ratio of gain in the same as in the rest of the State the majority for General Chamberlain will be nearly 78,000.

It is estimated that 30,000,000 bushels of corn have been destroyed by the freshet in the Mississippi bottoms. The region from the Northwest represents the whole country, and causing an immense destruction of property.

General D. N. Couch has been appointed to the vacant Collectorship of Boston, as successor of MR. Hamlin, and George H. Kingsbury, Postmaster, in place of MR. Palfrey.

Madame Ristori made her first appearance in this city on the evening of September 24, in the character of Medea fulfilled the high expectations which had been excited. On the 26th she appeared in the rôle of Maria Stuarda (Mary Queen of Scots), her performance of which is fully justified the anticipations which had been raised by her Medea.

FOREIGN NEWS.

BY TELEGRAPH.

September 17:

(PARIS.)—The French circular says that the recent changes in Europe are favorable to France. Prussia could likely not oppose her interest in Belgium. Austria now has no hostile intent. The Convention of August 20 with Italy carried out. Navies of reconciliation Powers insure the liberty of the Baltic and the Mediterranean. Peace justifies the Emperor's mediation between Prussia and Austria and Italy, and blame the inconsistency of people of the same language and interests to any of the Powers of Europe. It knows the necessity of perfect reform and military organization, not, however, as a threat, and proposes a Congress of peace in Europe.

It is said that the Emperor Napoleon has refused to allow officers of the French army to hold office in Mexico, owing to the protest of the United States Government.

(ST. PETERSBURG.)—The news who attempted to assassinate the Czar, several months ago, has been executed.

September 19:

(BERLIN.)—The Prussian fleet in the harbor of Kiel has been put out of commission, and there are evidences on all sides of a general disarming.

September 20:

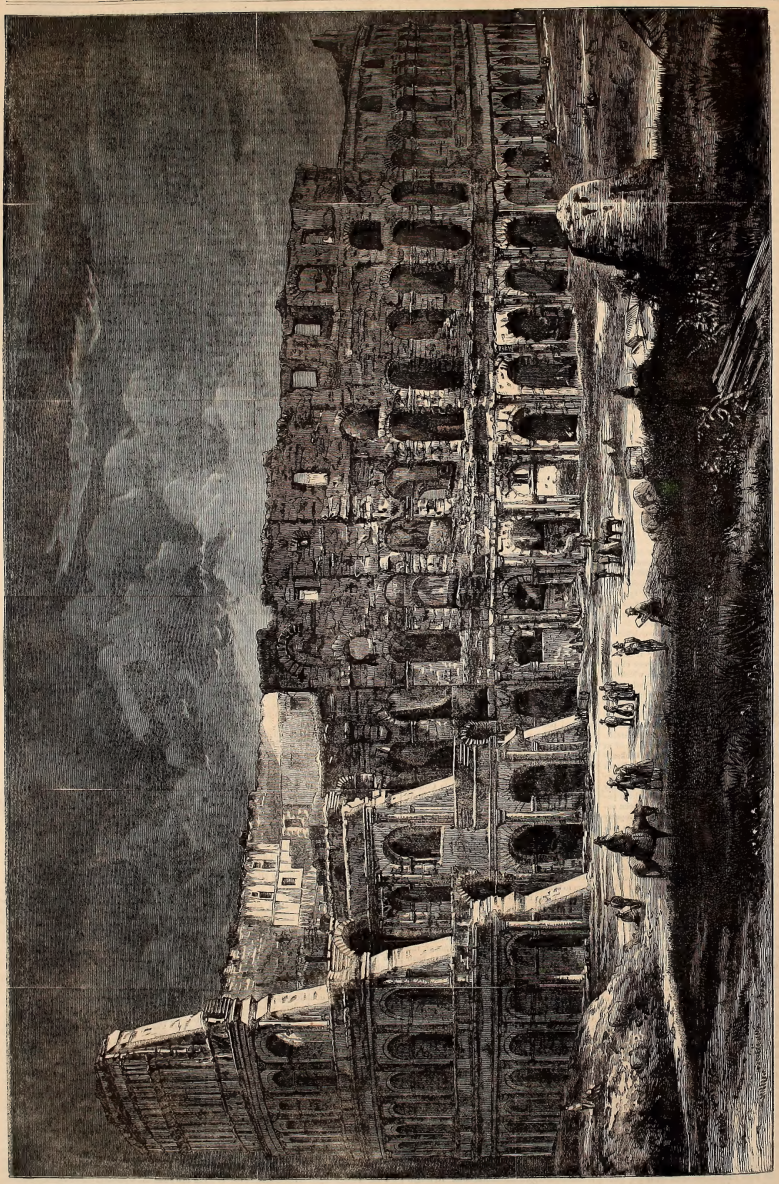
(TRIESTE.)—A great battle has been fought in the Island of Candia between the Turks and the Insurrectionists. The Turks were the victors.

September 20:

(ROME.)—The Finance Committee sent here from Mexico to negotiate for a loan are in Rome, and have announced that the Empire of Mexico is without funds.

September 21:

(BERLIN.)—The Prussian army, returning from the Austrian campaign, is the principal topic of the National Capital to-day amidst the greatest rejoicings and enthusiasm.



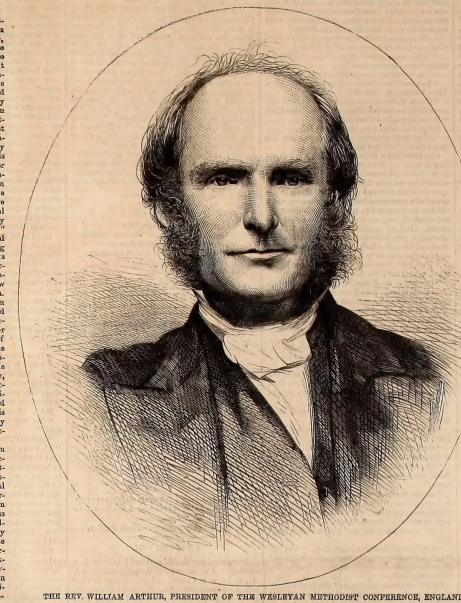
(DRESDEN.)—Peace has been concluded between Prussia and Saxony.

September 22:

(PARIS.)—It is said that the Empress Eugenie will shortly repair to Rome to condole with the Pope.

(VIENNA.)—Count Alexander has been made Commander-in-Chief of the Austrian army.

The armistice signed to August 26 are received. Fighting of a most stubborn and sanguinary nature occurred on the 16th and 18th of July, causing a loss of 4000 killed and wounded in the Allied armies, and an approximate number in the Paraguayan army.



THE COLISEUM AT ROME.—FROM A RECENT PHOTOGRAPH.—[SEE PAGE 630.]

REV. WILLIAM ARTHUR.

THE annual Conference of the Wesleyan Methodists, held at Leeds, in England, according to their custom, in the last week of July, elected the Rev. WILLIAM ARTHUR, A.M., to be the President of the Conference next year. He is a popular and useful minister, who was educated at one of the Wesleyan theological colleges, and employed some time as a missionary in the East Indies, but has lately taken his turn at several of the most important home stations, where the earnest and impressive eloquence of his preaching has been highly appreciated by multitudes of listening people. He is also favorably known as an author beyond the limits of his religious connection, having produced, in addition to the "Tracts on Revivals," and "The Tongue of Fire," which relate more particularly to the work of Evangelical ministration, an interesting biography entitled "The Successful Merchant," and a well-aimed book on the political revolution of 1859 in Italy, presenting concisely and emphatically the results of his observations and inquiries during a tour through Piedmont, Tuscany, and the Roman States, a few months after the peace of Villafranca. The cause of Italian freedom had in Mr. ARTHUR one of its earliest and ablest literary defenders; and his remarks on the Pope's temporal power in Rome were dictated by no spirit of narrow sectarian hostility, but by the broadest and most liberal considerations of justice and human right. He visited this country a few years since, and not a few of us have a vivid recollection of his eloquence and genuinity. He was a firm friend of the United States during the late rebellion. His two important works, that on Italy and "The Tongue of Fire," were republished by HARPER & BROTHERS.

The present state of the Wesleyan Connection in Great Britain was reported at the late Conference to be satisfactory. There are 331,193 church-members and 20,819 persons on trial for membership. Several new circuits have been formed in the London district, and a Wesleyan chaplain has been appointed for the Guards in Wellington Barracks. There were sixty seven candidates for ordination to the ministry examined at the late Conference. In educational efforts a remarkable advance has been made, twenty-seven new day-schools having been established last year, with an addition of 4669 scholars. The total number of day-schools connected with the Connection is 606, and scholars 88,194. There has been an increase of seventy-one Sunday-schools during the past year, and of 5756 scholars. A very large outlay has been made in chapel building. The committee intrusted with this department has authorized an estimated expenditure since the last Conference of one million of dollars, the total outlay of the year having been about one and one-third millions, and during the last clergy years $2,000,000 of chapel debts have been paid off. At the meeting of the Theological Institution Committee, it was stated that the estimated annual outlay in future, including that on behalf of the proposed new institution near Leeds, is about $42,500, but the income now only reaches $30,600. The feeling of some leading men seemed to be that it was much better to have several smaller institutions in different parts of the country than only two or three large ones. A resolution has been passed by Conference expressing the hope that the denomination will shortly be in a position to erect another college at Birmingham in addition to the one shortly to be built at Headingley. It is also decided that the expenditure shall not exceed $60,000.

THE REV. WILLIAM ARTHUR, PRESIDENT OF THE WESLEYAN METHODIST CONFERENCE, ENGLAND.

SUPPRESSION OF NUISANCES.

WE give on this page a sketch illustrating an instance—fortunately a common one—of the suppression of nuisances in our large tenement houses by the Metropolitan Board of Health.

Much has been said and published tending to throw discredit upon the Board of Health and ignoring the important work which it has accomplished. But there can be no question but that we should have had in this city a repetition of the disastrous cholera seasons from which we have on former occasions suffered so severely, but for the energetic and unceasing labors of the Board of Health. To them it is due that the cholera has been stamped out of this city, and that while from some of the cities in the West we hear of hundreds of cases daily, we are ourselves almost entirely free from this terrible scourge.

New York City is cleaner than it has been for years; and if the Board of Health had not been subject to interruptions from our courts the result would have been still more satisfactory.

THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF HEALTH SUPPRESSING NUISANCES IN A TENEMENT HOUSE IN NEW YORK CITY.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

THE COLISEUM AT ROME.

THE illustration which we give on page 628 of the Coliseum at Rome is from a recent photograph, and gives an accurate view of the present condition of the most stupendous amphitheatre of ancient times. It was commenced by the Emperor VESPASIAN and finished by TITUS. Hitherto amphitheatres had been constructed of wood, like the mont part; but these structures were too frail for their purpose. The fall of one of these wooden buildings at Fidenæ killed or injured 50,000 persons. Accidents of this sort led to the construction of the famous Coliseum. It is said that the expenses of this structure would have erected a metropolis.

Nine thousand wild beasts were destroyed at the dedication of the amphitheatre. These were hunted to death in the presence of the blood-delighted people of Romans, and then the area was suddenly filled with water, and sea animals were made to contend, and a sea-fight exhibited. It was here that the most celebrated of the gladiatorial contests were exhibited; and here it was that, during the era of the persecution of Christians, the martyrs of the new faith were made to contend with wild beasts for the amusement of a heathen audience. In 1750 some depredations began to be made upon the building. Besides former removals, MICHAEL ANGELO took away nearly one-half of the external wall to build the Palazzo-Farnese.

When this amphitheatre was in its glory and filled with Romans, with the Emperor seated in a conspicuous and highly adorned seat, with the aristocracy of the great city in the first tier, the people above, and in the galleries the servants and dependants, with the women seated in their front, the sight must have been magnificent and imposing. But the scene which led that vast audience to gather to gloat over the violent death of human beings gives us an insight into the character of the Romans, and the degradation of the ante-Christian era.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,

Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XX.

THE motto of that afternoon might have been:

"Who knows whither the clouds have fled?
In the unmeasured heaven they know not whither:
And the eye forget the tears they have shed—
The heart forgets its sorrow and ache."

For every thing was in a glory of freshness and sweetness: the sky was brilliantly blue; and the thirsty leaves had either drunk up all the rain-drops, or were burnt from so jewels in the sunshine.

The children fairly danced along the road; darting hither and thither after dandelions and buttercups and chickweed; laughing at the tired frogs in the wayside ditches, and studying themselves in the little pools of water that spotted the muddy road.

"Would you get in that little boat, Sam," said Primrose, coming to his side with both hands full of spring beauties. "Is it to hold flowers?"

"No sure; you may put them in by-and-by."

"But what's it now?"

"Some jelly from mamma, for an ailing child."

"Ailing?" said Lily. "What's ailing?"

"He is not always very sick, but will probably never be well."

"Poor child!" said Lily, taking a jump over a little bright pool in her way. "It's nice of mamma to send him jelly. Sam, we're going to plant all the rest of our seeds to-morrow."

"Another time," said Sam, "try and plant just before rather than just after a rain. The ground is harder to work."

"Harder, because it's softer," said Lily.

"I did think of sowing mine yesterday," said Clover; "but it was so cold—and I didn't want the run any risks. Sam, when these are planted—sowed, I mean—and all the rest of my little seedlings are out, my garden will be pretty full, won't it, just left a place for each kind, all marked out and ready?"

"And that's all the spare room you have?"

"Every bit. Except—there's one other little place," said Clover, hesitating.

"What is that for?"

"For—the geranium, you know," said Clover, "Only, dear me, the geranium! I have not forgotten my promise; but the weather has been too cold for such tender things."

"I think our gardens will be replenish'd," said Primrose, "if Maria Jarvis does call 'em queer little places."

"I, mine is making quite a show already," said Lily; "it's getting all green. I saw it this morning from the window."

Sam uttered one of his provoking "Ah's!" and inquired whether it was green with flowers or weeds.

"Why, it can't be weeds, of course," said Lily; "I've just planted my flowers there, and there weren't any weeds even in sight."

"I pulled up two out of my garden," said Clover, shaking her head. "Sam, where do weeds come from?"

"They come from seeds; and the earth is full of the seeds, just as our beartaree full of seed thoughts and tempers, all ready to spring and grow the moment they have a chance. Then other seeds come sailing along on the wings of the wind, and drop down and lodge here and there; as some bad thought or impulse drops into our hearts from a poor book or a silly conversation. And as if that was not enough, we ourselves go and walk in weedy places—into foolish company, and bring home weed seeds or sin seeds, or folly seeds, in plenty."

As Sam spoke he lifted the corner of Lily's short cloak, and behold it was stuck full of burs!

"Well, what now?" said Lily. "Tiresome things! they would get on."

"You are taking them home to plant," said Sam. "To plant!" cried Clover, in terror. "Oh, stop, Lily; let me pick them off!"

"If you should try for the road-side they will grow there, and molest future travelers," said Sam. "Never help spread a bad thing."

"But what shall I do, then?" said Lily.

"Wear them patiently till we get to a fire, and then pick them off and burn them."

Lily grumbled a little at that; but she had not long to wait. A few steps more brought them to a little bit of a road house by the way-side, with only an old fence between it and the road. Sam pushed open the little gate and went in, and there, in the morsel of a court-yard before the house, was a child at work, earnestly, patiently, with great toil and effort, digging up the ground with an old fire-shovel. He stood up at the sound of the gate-latch, showing a pale little face, to which not even his work had brought a flush; but it came now, a flush of great gladness, as he looked at Sam.

"Well, Dick, how does your garden grow?" Sam asked, taking the little thin hand in his own.

"I've got it most dug, Sir, and my morning-glory seeds is up. They'll cover the fence, mother says. There's a blue seed and a white seed."

"Two morning-glory seeds!" said Lily, trying to see Clover's face when she heard that, and remembered her little paper bags full of precious bayonet beans and canary-bird vine.

"Is that all you have to plant?" inquired Sam.

"Jane Lefferts gave me some marygold seeds," said the child, "There was three—I'm all red and brown and yellow they'll be." And stimulated by the thought of the marigold flowers, little Dick piled his old shovel with great zeal; then stopped for breath.

"How do you do to-day, Dick?" said Sam, kindly.

"Better, sometimes, and sometimes worse," said Dick, with a smile.

"Dick, do you love flowers very much?" said little Primrose, sidling up to him with her wistful look.

"Oh, better'n any thing!" said Dick. "Just think, when the morning-glories roun all over the fence!"

Primrose drew a long breath of wonder and ecstasy, and sympathy, mingled with two or three other things that she herself did not know, looking up with an appealing face to Clover.

"It's a grand day for your garden to-day," said Sam.

"Yes," said Dick, with a happy look. "And just think: my mother says the sun's just as bright and the rain's just as sweet here on my seeds as in Mr. Jarvis's big garden."

"Ay!" said Sam, musingly; "the Lord maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust."

Mother says that's why it's all good, because God seeds it," said Dick. "And she thinks he'll make my flowers grow, because I love him and she love him."

It was such a new idea, you should have seen the three children that it set them wonder.

"Will that make 'em grow?" said Primrose, thinking of a patch in her own little garden where the seeds had not sprung up. But Dick gave her no help out of the difficulty.

"It must to that with mine," he said, "'cause there's nothing else! Mother says we never get any thing any other way."

"Happy people you and your mother are," said Sam. "Well, Dick, God has sent you something else to-day—he told my mother to make you some jelly, and to put a loaf of nice white bread in the basket too. So you can have a little supper nobody else. And whatever you want just tell Him, and He'll know just the best person to send with it." And Sam set down the basket he held on the doorstep and strode off into the road again, followed by his wondering little sisters.

"

As if the words had been put into my mouth, and were not my own, I rose and embraced him:

"Oh, dearest uncle, forgive her, forgive her!"

He put me gently away from him after a while, and made me no answer. But when we parted for the night he kissed and blessed me solemnly, and the last words he spoke to me were:

"Counsel are the peace-makers. I will try, Madge: I will try."

The sickly flare of a candle in the faint gray watchy daybreak was the first thing that met my eyes when I awoke next morning. The face of the woman who held it in her trembling hand startled me into complete wakefulness at once.

"Hester, what is the matter?"

"Miss Dorcas, Master! Master!"

"Is my uncle ill?"

"Oh, Miss Margaret! I'm afraid—"

I can remember how I reached his room. I have a confused idea of her huddling a great cloak over my shoulders, and of the chilly feeling of the oaken boards to my bare feet. I had hardly made a step across the threshold of my uncle's chamber when a strong gentle grasp was laid on my arm, and I heard Dr. Dacres's voice, saying:

"One moment, my dear Miss Sedley. Stay one instant to collect your strength!"

"Dr. Dicon. Let me go to him. He is ill; he wants me. You must not keep me from him!"

"My dear Miss Sedley, believe me, I would not so if your presence could be of use and comfort to him. But—be composed, I beseech of you—be—"

I broke from him and advanced to the bed. Oh, my beloved guardian and benefactor! No passionate tone of love he had listened to so often, no loving touch of the hand he had held in his generous protecting clasp, could stir him now. Dead, dead!

I was not unsupported in this heavy hour. Our old doctor was kind and friendly, and Mr. Norcliffe responded with instant promptitude to the hasty summons I sent him. They agreed that some affection of the heart had been the immediate cause of my uncle's death, and that it must have been peaceful and painless. He had passed away in sleep, they believed, for he was lying quite placidly on his undisturbed pillow when they found him in the morning, lifeless and cold. There had been no change made in his will. With the exception of some legacies to the servants I was left absolute mistress of the property.

"I know," said I to Mr. Norcliffe, "that he meant to make some provision for Anna and her boy. I am thankful to remember now that his last words to me were words of softening toward Anna."

"I believe you do, Margaret," said Mr. Norcliffe, "that he so intended. But the alteration has not been made. Whatever portion of your uncle's money goes to Mrs. Les now she must receive from your hand."

"I will hold it in trust for her," I answered. And we said no more.

CHAPTER XIV.

"SOME one wants you, please, Miss Margaret."

Hester's thin straight form stood in the doorway, and Hester's thin high voice spoke to me. I was sitting, very dreary and forlorn, in the old morning-room. The fire had died down to a dull red; the sky was leaden and lowering; winter was without, the house and grief within. Only yesterday they had carried away its master never to return. The last journey across the home threshold had been made; that journey which we must all make some day, and which leaves those who remain behind so desolate. Mr. Norcliffe was staying with Dr. Dicon, and they had both gone home, and left me for the evening. I was sitting solitary and sad, as I have said, by the low fire, with a sensation of utter loneliness and a yearning void in my heart when I was roused by Hester's, "Some one wants you, please, Miss Margaret."

"Wants me, Hester? Who is it?"

"They asked for master first, please, miss," said Hester, pressing her apron to her eyes, "and I said as there was—as there was—as no one here but you."

A tremor in her usually measured tones roused my attention, deadened and dead though all my senses seemed to be, with much crying.

"Who is it, Hester?"

"Oh, Miss Margaret, would you step into the dining-room, please? I couldn't bring myself to tell her. Will you, please, step into the dining-room?"

I got up and followed her with a confused dizzy feeling, and a strange doubt of my own identity, if I may so express the sensation which I have experienced once or twice on occasions of strong emotion. The dining-parlor was without even the dull fire which burned in the morning-room. Its air struck cold and dreary. Some leafless boughs in the garden, bedropped with sleet, tapped like elfin fingers on the window-pane. A woman, dressed in the deepest mourning, was sitting in the corner of my uncle's chair—at the end of the room. She rose up on my entrance. "I want to see my uncle," she said.

"Anna!"

She put out one hand to hold me off as I rushed toward her, and then I saw that she held a little sleeping child, wrapped in her shawl. "I want to see my uncle. Do you mean to keep me from him?"

"Oh, Anna, Anna, for your own sake do not speak so harshly. My poor girl, my poor love—too late, too late!"

She staggered, and Hester, who had come with me into the room, made a step forward, as if to relieve her of the child. But she clasped him tighter, and leaned on the chair behind her for support.

"Too late! What do you mean?" I could barely hear the words, her voice was so low and faint.

"Anna, he is dead. He was buried yesterday!"

She sank down into the great chair, and the little child rolled from her arm, as its grasp relaxed, on to her knee; but Hester took him and laid him, still half asleep, upon the sofa, while I busied myself with my sister. She had swooned. I called the other women-servants, and by degrees we revived her, and half carried, half supported, her to my own chamber, where we undressed her and laid her on the bed. She resigned herself to our hands, but uttered no word, and her wan face was motionless and rigid. After a time I sent the others away and sat by her side, silently watching. A dim light from the shaded lamp fell upon her face, and as I looked at it it seemed as if the years had been rolled back like a curtain, and I lived over again that moonlight, when in her very room I had told Anna of my love. Poor, changed, pale face! Drawn, and haggard, and aged, how altered from the lovely girlish countenance which had lain on the pillow blooming out of its nest of soft dark curls!

I glanced at the black dress that lay beside the bed, and I read in it the history of her grief.

As I sat gazing on my sister's face the large dark eyes opened and looked at me.

"I have been very ill, Margaret," at death's door. That is why I am so weak. Oh, I have suffered much in mind and body!"

She followed my glance to the black gown which lay by the bed. "Yes," she said, slowly, in a faint hoarse voice, "I have lost him. I have come home to die, with my fatherless child. If it were not for the child I would pray that this hour might be my last. But I am not worthy to pray, while you are weeping. How I envy you those tears! Mine are all spent, I think."

She closed her eyes again, and lay silent for a long time. Then her lips moved, and I heard her whisper:

"Margaret, bend down your face to me."

I leaned over her and touched her cheek with mine. I believe the same recollection rushed into her mind that had been in mine, for she suddenly she threw her arms around my neck, burying her face upon my breast, and burst into a flood of hysterical tears. I let her weep, while I held her in my arms, and speaking no word until the fit had exhausted itself. The tears eased her heart, and at last she lay, weak but composed, with my hand in hers. Far, far into the night I sat beside her bed, and listened to the broken story she told at intervals.

"No! Let me speak," she said, when, in consideration of her bodily weakness, I would have urged her to try to rest. "I can not rest now. I have told you all my misery. You know that we were poor, but you can not imagine how poor we were. Eighteen months ago Anna's husband struggled and suffered bravely, but I know now, and I knew then, that he felt it was all in vain. As long as we remained in England there was no chance, and no good husband things were not so bad. They helped us in a hundred nameless ways. Anna, don't I, little Lily boy? Margaret, I could not have procured the necessary help for her if it had not been for our old governess. I may—I may—I may, I anguish and die. But my wicked, proud spirit was not softened yet."

A spark of the old fire blazed in her eyes as she spoke.

"I could have endured it all and more, without clutching, if he had only been spared to me. But I would not bend, so I was broken—ground into dust by the only blow that could utterly overcome me. I mean, weak in body as I am, I should fall into a fever. We were in a wild, almost barbarous place, helpless—penniless. Then, Margaret, when he was struck down in his youth, and lay on a sick bed, then I was humbled and afraid. I would have gone on my knees before you to obtain the least one of the comforts he needed. We were hundreds of miles away from the only friends who cared for us on all that vast continent. I wrote to Madame de Beaupré myself, imploring her to send me help. The good creature came to me herself."

"God bless her!"

"Amen! God bless her! Yes; she made that long dreadful journey alone, traveling day and night to reach us. She found me holding the baby in his, and gazing on the wistful face. The little fellow, barely two years old, would sit mute and still, kneeling by his father for hours. If we attempted to take him away he struggled and sobbed until none of us had the heart to remove him. Many times we have seen us all so dropped asleep to carry him to his own little crib. One night I had fallen into an uneasy slumber from exhaustion, and I lay stretched on the floor at the foot of my husband's bed, when, in the dead silence of the night, I was awakened by hearing your name pronounced in a loud, clear voice. I looked to my feet, and saw Horace gazing intently in the direction of the door. 'You are come,' he said, with a smile, 'I knew you would come!' Margaret, before the avenging God, I believe that the anguish I endured at that moment might atone even for great wrong. I did you. 'My own love, my Horace!' I cried, frantically, clasping his poor, thin hand, 'don't you know me? Speak to me, my husband, or my heart will break.' His gaze never wavered from the door, but he pressed my hand with a feeble clasp, and whispered, 'Look at Margaret!' and so he died.

"Well! Grief does not kill, for I am here. I lay for six weeks, raving in brain-fever, and insensible to every thing around me. Our good friend nursed me, and took care of my boy, and fed us and clothed us, and, when I could be moved, carried us both to her own home near Quebec. And then she urged me to return, and cast myself at uncle's feet, and supplicate for pardon and reconciliation. She spoke firmly and openly to me. She probed my heart, and fearlessly showed me what a wretch I had been, even when I had most glorified myself in my misery. She told me that it was a duty I owed to my dead Horace to confide his boy to the loving care of those who could provide for him. She urged me remember that I had remained of perverse pride in my broken heart, and I came. If I could but have seen my uncle—if he could but have known how I longed for his pardon and his love, even when I was hardest and worst—but that consolation was denied me. It is just."

"Anna, he loved and forgave you at the last. I know that he dearly loved and fully forgave you. Had he not been taken away so suddenly he would have shown you by his will that—"

She laid her hand upon my lips.

"It is better so. I know that my boy and I must owe every thing to your generous hand, and I will take your gift from you as though it came from Heaven. Margaret, I am ill. I have been fought in a hard, hard school. It is better so, Margaret, better so."

I have little to add, Lucy. By slow degrees Anna recovered some measure of strength; but she was never more the blooming creature she had been once. While she lived she shared my home, and daily, hourly, made some new return toward the old fondness which had united us as children. The haughty spirit sometimes rose, the wayward temper occasionally broke forth, but never again was there any serious breach between us. Her boy, little Sedley—your father, Lucy—grew and thrived, and was the pride and sunshine of our home. Stock, bedridden and very near the close of his long life, permitted Anna's boy to climb up on a chair to his bed, all dimpled and chubby-piece in his cheeks, and to reach down and fill for him his cherished pipe. Such a concession Stock never made before. Baby and nurse and crabbed warder was attended by falling from the inexpert little fingers; but Stock resented any attempt to interfere with him.

"Let us be," he would growl out to Hester, who had constituted herself chief nurse-maid, and was a little jealous of her authority. "Women-folks knows nought about babies."

"Children should be obedient, Mr. Stock," Hester would retort, sharply.

"Ah! and so should women. Let us be. He'll be all right, I tell ye. He's got more sense in his little curly poll nor some as is more'n twenty times his age. Let us be, I tell ye, or I'll be wroth, d' that child!"

Nor did any number of mishaps, in the filling of a long series of pipes, shake Stock one jot in his conviction that if the "women-folks" would only have Master Sedley's boy, he would infallibly come out triumphant from any possible trial of his skill and wisdom. The child took greatly to me. Sometimes, when he came willingly to sit on me in his gleeful way, his merry laughter and bright arch glance would make me sad for a season. For it was as if his features spoke some subtle and pleasant lesson to me. But little Sedley, though he inherited Horace's sweet temper and buoyant disposition, was made of sterner stuff than his father. He had what poor Uncle Gough used to say Horace wanted—ballast.

You have heard of Mr. Norcliffe from your father. He took my sister's boy in hand and helped to make him the clever doctor he is now; and the pretty house where you and your brothers and sisters were born once belonged to him. After my sister's death I gave up the Gable House and came to be near Sedley Les and his young wife. When children gathered round him and their pleasant home was filled with the sound of fresh young voices, I begged to have you, my godchild, to be as a daughter to me. Your good parents gave me you with their trusting, and their treasure is very dear and precious to my heart.

Anna died with her head upon my breast, and my hand in hers. My name was the last word upon her lips, as it had been on the lips of him whom we both loved so well.

From my chamber window that looks on the sea I sit and watch the glorious striving waves, that rise and fall, and fall and rise again. With very different eyes do I look upon them now, from those of that poor lonely girl who sat at this window for years near fifty years ago. The waves toss and leap wildly, but the heart that once beat more wildly than they is still. I look out at the sunset, and think with a thankful spirit that my life is setting, serene and bright, even as the daylight dies brightly in the west. I wait the summons to depart, not impatiently—for life has many sweet elements for me—but with hope. The remembrance of my early sins, my errors, persons, and incidents become, not less but more clear to me as I grow old. And sometimes it is with me, as the German poet has said: "I look upon each near scene as far off, and that which has disappeared becomes the only reality."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

CHARITY TOWARD AN ENEMY.—A Mr. Stirling, who was minister of the barony church of Glasgow during the war with France, and other countries, maintained against the insatiable ambition of Louis XIV., that gold, the sinews of war, was the true cause of strife, used to beseech the Lord that he would take the haughty tyrant of France and shake him over the mouth of hell; "but, good Lord," added the worthy man, "dinna let him fall in." The curious prayer having been mentioned to Louis he laughed heartily at his new and ingenious method of punishing sinners, and frequently afterward gave as a toast "The good Scotch parson."

A NOTABLE DIFFERENCE.—The difference between a bank-note and a bird-note is, that the latter is "cheep" and the former isn't.

A distinguished Frenchman don't like American lighthood, because the dear creatures eat with their hats on. Not now—a lamp-mat is no hat.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

An Insolvent Dairyman complained that his only persecuting creditor was his Dun Cow.

An Asylum for Lunatic Creditors would find an appropriate site at Duns-lane.

A gentleman was complaining that it cost him ten dollars every time he went to church, as he only attended five times a year and his pew tax was fifty dollars per annum. "Why don't you go oftener," asked a religious broker, "and reduce the average?" That was a poser.

The Koran has the following passage: "Mohammed, in one of his visions, saw an angel in the third heaven so large that his size reached seventy days' journey apart." What an awful "bridge" he must have had to walk on!

The Telegraph Cable makes a bed of the Atlantic Ocean and pillows of the two continents.

A worthy man, who told that he was about to die, was asked by his wife if he was ready. "Yes," said he, "I have put on my clean shirt, taken off my boots and stockings and on and off. And this is about what life gets reduced to at about seven."

FOREM.—The individual who was lost in thought has since been discovered in a brown study.

An author-friend of ours says that all the elegant Cockneyisms lack about the Still Hour. He only wishes that his adored family would allow Ales such a month.

Why might surgeons really believe there is no such thing as chest?—Because they never saw it.

SWITH. "Brown's a regular wag, isn't he? He's fond of cracking his jokes."

Somerset. "Yes, he cracks his jokes—that's the reason they're so bad."

MOVABLE FEASTS.—"Baked Tatters all hot!"

"My dear Hentick, I had a very mysterious dream about you." "What was it, dear?" "Why, I saw you carried up to heaven in a golden chariot, surrounded by angels with wings." "Indeed! What is that a sign of, dear?" "It is a sign of a foul stomach, my dear."

"Sambo, where de boy?" "Wid de rake." "Whare de rake?" "Wid de hoe." "Whare dey both?" "Wid boaf hands."

JARKINS.—A seller of cement described it as peculiarly useful in mending jars.—"Would it mend the jars of matrimony?" "What was in the cement for in that case," said the peddler, "for that is sound enough." "Then I don't need both," said Jarkins. "In that case, there is more sound than sense," replied the peddler, and unmended.

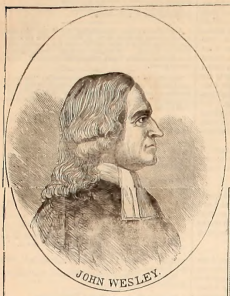
A NICE HORSE.—"Momma," said a little fellow whose mother had forbidden him to draw horses and slates on the mantel-piece, as he heard with a sharp nail—"momma, this ain't a nice house. At Sam Hackett's house, he has a nice ball on the hall, and when the shovel and tongs over the carpet; but here we can't get any fun at all."

A Western Paradise is thus described: "No income tax; no infernal revenue; no spies to see if you treat the head of the family on special patrol; no day-tax, school-tax, or beauty fund." And, to end with, the Indiana editor hath forgotten to add the greenback from whether, so all our ones are tens."

DRY-GOODS DRUMMERS AT THE SOUTH.

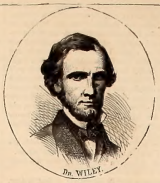
IT would be singular if our Southern brethren did not despise us, if they judge us from some of the men who go among them, and if, in order to secure their custom, odds rebels themselves in their expression of rebel sentiments. In fact, it must be admitted that now, as before the war, the class of Northern men who go Southward, seeking custom, or designing to make a permanent stay, are a most despicable representative of the North, and form the most dangerous class of Southern citizens. We give on page 627 an illustration which we propose a series of too common occurrence upon our Southern railroads and in the hotels of Charleston, Mobile, and New Orleans. The rebel tells his own story, and it is to us a very painful and disgusting one.

We shall hail the day with joy when citizens from Northern States going Southward shall fairly represent the people of those States. Then, and not until then, will the badness of those who are honest, unflinching purpose become habitual, and do much to secure that freedom in the expression of opinion which is now in the South almost impossible.

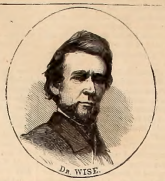


SHERIDAN'S TEN-PINS.

Our soldiers could not very well carry bowling-alleys along with them, but General SHERIDAN supplied this deficiency by the invention of a game of ten-pins, which we illustrate on page 627. A ball, usually a 6-pounder shell, was suspended from the limb of a tree, or from some convenient arrangement. The head of the ten-pins was placed either beyond or in front of the spot over which the ball hangs when at rest. This is necessary, as a direct hit is almost impossible to make otherwise. The game is played by throwing the ball so that it shall miss the pins on its forward swing, and strike them on the return. In order to do this it is necessary to "english" or twist the ball as it leaves the hand. Some very nice calculations are required to do this with certainty. Three shots are given to each player; but he loses these if he strikes the pins on the forward swing.

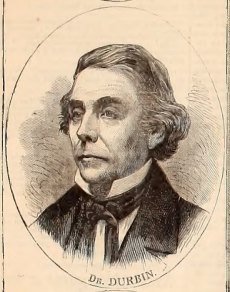


SHERIDAN," says our artist, "is by far the best player that I have seen, although some of his staff, and Colonel CRAIGHILL and CAPERELLE, are quite successful players."



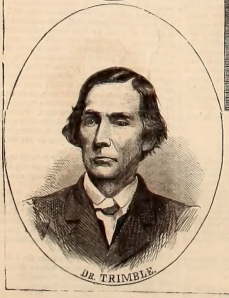
Following his freely-expressed idea, "that a Rebel is a man who can not unbend, but makes an effort to be a great man all the time," General SHERIDAN has arranged a game among the troops which has become lame in New Orleans. Here General with his staff and friends amuse themselves occasionally during the afternoon.

The game was always a favorite in the Army in the Cumberland, but never, we believe, introduce into the Army of the Potomac. General SHERIDAN is fond for the amusement of the contraband which camped near Murfreesborough.

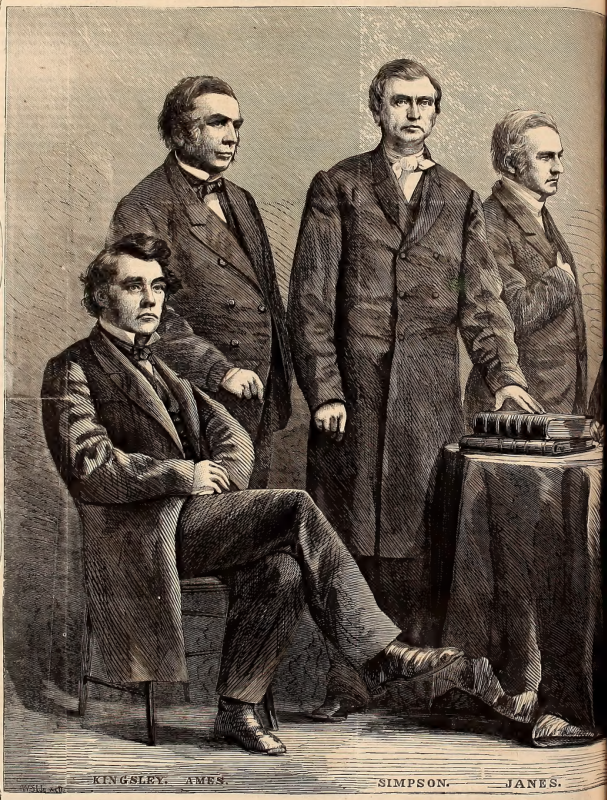


JOHN WESLEY.

DR. CURRY.



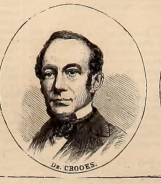
DR. WILEY.



DR. WISE.

DR. EDDY.

DR. DURBIN.



DR. HARRIS.

DR. TRIMBLE.

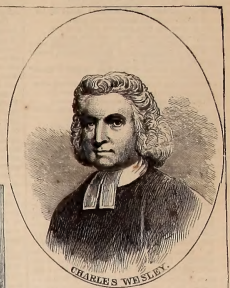
KINGSLEY. AMES. SIMPSON. JANES.

DR. HAVEN.

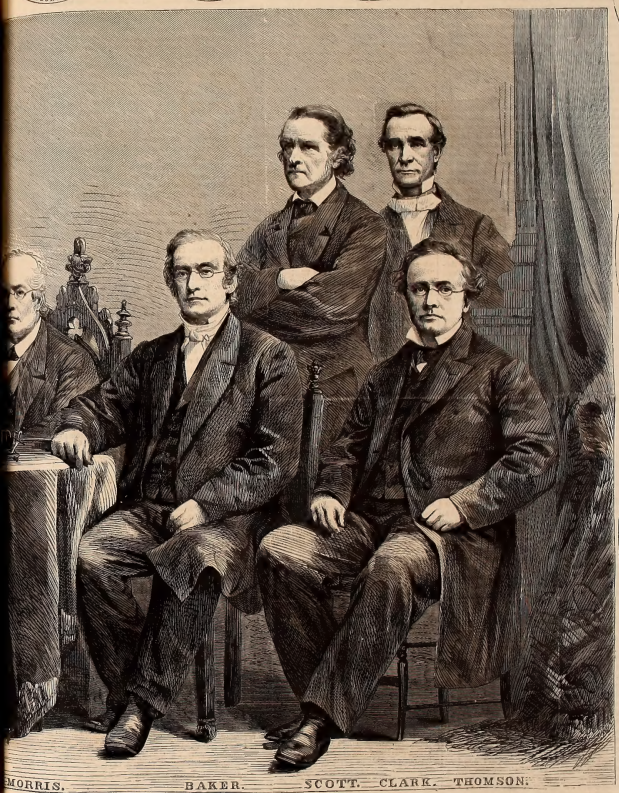
DR. NEWMAN.

DR. CROOES.

BISHOP ASBURY.



DISTINGUISHED MEN OF METHODISM.—FROM P



DR. CORLETON

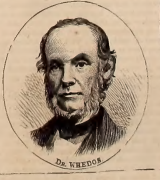
DR. NESBIT

DR. CRARY

DR. REID

CHARLES WESLEY.

MORRIS. BAKER. SCOTT. CLARK. THOMSON.



DR. NAST.

DR. McCLINTOCK.

BISHOP HEDDING.

DR. LORE

DR. MONROE.

DR. WHEDON

DR. STEVENS.

APHS BY BRADY, HALLETT, AND OTHERS.—[SEE PAGE 634.]

NOTHING TO SPARE.

WHAT! hast thou naught to spare? Alas! thy lot
Indeed is hapless: thou art very poor.
Poorer than thy poor brethren who have not
The hoarded much, that crieth still for more!
Where are thy baubles? Where thy glittering toys?
Where thy rich trappings? Thy amusements, where?
The daily luxury, that only cloys?
Oh! look, and see if thou hast "naught to spare."

Where is thy wasted time? Thy unbreathed word
Of gentleness? Thy hidden tears unshed?
The look of pity which thou mightest accord?
Oh! do not tell me thou hast "naught to spare."
Rethink thee ere thou speakest so again,
And for thy needy brethren have some care;
Oh! be more grateful to thy Father, when
So much He giveth thee—so much "to spare."

THE CENTENARY OF AMERICAN METHODISM.

THE Methodists celebrate in October their first Centenary in the New World. PHILIP EMBURY, THOMAS WRAN, and ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, were the earliest pioneers of American Methodism; they were "local preachers," or volunteers, not receiving salaries as do "traveling preachers" whose time is exclusively devoted to the ministry. From the formation of the first Methodist Society in America in 1766 to march has been triumphant. In our Centential picture we present the heads of many representative men in the Church, with all of the living bishops. JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, the founders of the sect, are also there, but they are so generally known that we need only refer to them.

No man did more for Christianity in the Western hemisphere than Bishop ASBURY. In the not only eighteen years old he entered the itinerant ministry in England, and soon afterward emigrated to America. At the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the year 1784, he was appointed Bishop. The Church had then less than 15,000 members, with 60 preachers; and when he died (1816), in his 71st year, the spiritual army which he led numbered over 211,000 Methodists, with 700 traveling preachers!

ROBERT WILLIAMS, a Wesleyan preacher, had arrived as early as 1769, then came JOSEPH MEE, and during the same year RICHARD BOARDMAN, with JOSEPH PILMOOR, who were the first regular Methodists or Wesleyan Missionaries. Bishop COKE ordained Bishop ASBURY, and these were the first Protestant Bishops of the Western World, unless we should except the episcopal officers of some of the Colonial Moravian settlements. From this small beginning Methodism in America has achieved a greater triumph in less than any since the days of the Apostles. About two millions of church-members, exclusive of some six millions of congregational adherents, are now embodied in its churches in America.

ELIJAH HEDDING, D.D., was born in Dutchess County, New York, June 7, 1780, and died April 9, 1852. He was elected to the episcopal office in 1824. He established the earliest Methodist paper, Zion's Herald, and labored zealously for the advancement of literary and theological education. He was a man of imposing personal appearance, of singular dignity and suavity, and of rare wisdom in counsel, and high authority in theological science.

BISHOP THOMAS A. MORRIS, D.D., is a Virginian, born 1794. After serving as editor of the Western Christian Advocate, etc., he was elected to the Episcopal office in 1836. As a preacher, pure and exemplary, he still lives to bless the Church with his wise counsels,—a man of extremely laconic speech, brief but always impressive in his preaching, in conversation given to anecdote and pithy sayings and to a rich humor.

LEVI SCOTT, D.D., is a Marylander. He entered the ministry in 1826; in 1840 he became Principal of the Carlisle Grammar School, and subsequently one of the Book Agents at New York. In 1852 he was consecrated Bishop. In the performance of his episcopal duties he has visited the distant missions in Western Africa, and has recently ordained Bishop ROBERTS, a colored man, to that work. He commands the highest estimation of his Church for his piety, talents, and memorable services.

Bishop EDMUND S. JANES is a native of Sheffield, Massachusetts. He was born in 1807, commenced preaching in 1830, was elected Secretary of the American Bible Society in 1840, and Bishop in 1844. He is a man of ready and laborious minister, and has visited officially the California churches and the Methodist Missions in Europe.

OSMAN C. BAKER, D.D., was born at Marlow, New Hampshire, in 1812. He studied under FISK at Middletown, Connecticut, became a teacher in Newbury, and as a later period Professor in the Biblical Institute at Concord. In 1852 he was elected Bishop. He is a man of sound learning, of singular prudence, and an authority in Methodist jurisprudence.

EDWARD R. AMES, D.D., is a Western man, a native of Ohio, born in 1806, and educated at the Ohio University. He became a professor in an Illinois College, Missionary Secretary for the West, and, in 1852, Bishop. His personal appearance commands respect, and he is noted for his devotion and sagacity in the affairs of his denomination.

MATTHEW SIMPSON, D.D., was born in Ohio, June 21, 1810, and descended from Methodist stock. At first he studied medicine, then became the Professor of Natural Science in Allegheny College, and afterward President of the Indiana Asbury University. Next we find him editor of the Western Christian Advocate, and finally, a Bishop. As a pulpit orator he is inferior to none in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He abounds in happy and brilliant illustrations: his voice is peculiar and monotonous, but his vigorous intellect and vivid sensibility give his sermons irresistible power.

DAVID W. CLARK, D.D., was born on Mount Desert Island, Maine. He graduated at the Wesleyan University in 1836, and has been a practical teacher, and for several years editor of the well-known Ladies' Repository. A writer of eminence, he has published several valuable works. In the year 1864 he was elected Bishop, and is universally respected.

Bishop EDWARD THOMSON, D.D., was born at Portsea, England, 1810, emigrated to the United States in 1819, and studied and practiced medicine. For some years he was either President or Professor in Western colleges. He also edited the Ladies' Repository, and in 1860 became editor of the Christian Advocate. He was made a Bishop in 1864. He is a polished writer and speaker, and is greatly esteemed.

Bishop CALVIN KINGSLEY was one of the last elected to the Episcopal office. He is a Western man, and a zealous and able fellow-laborer with his brethren and no prelate in the councils of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was editor of the Western Christian Advocate for several years, and also a Professor in the Allegheny College at Meadville, Pennsylvania.

Our picture is so arranged as to represent on one side of the Bishops the Secretaries of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The portrait of JOHN P. DURBIN, D.D., is a most striking one. He is a Kentuckian born and was born in 1800. After his graduation at college, in 1825, he became Professor of Languages in Augusta College; in 1831 he was elected Chaplain to Congress; in 1833 he became editor of the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, and in 1834 was appointed President of Dickinson College. He afterward published his Travels in Europe, and in 1850 was elected Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society, for the responsible duties of which office he possesses admirable qualifications. He is a powerful and most eloquent and popular pulpit orators. WILLIAM L. HARRIS, his efficient assistant, is also a Western man. He was born in Ohio, September 4, 1817. In 1847 he was appointed Principal of the Baldwin Institute, then a Professor in the Ohio Wesleyan University, and in 1860 Assistant Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society. He is a ready debater, laborious, social, and a general favorite.

J. M. TRIMBLE, D.D., is the Second Assistant Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society, a Western man, born in Ohio in 1811. He entered the ministry as early as the year 1828, and has occupied the most important appointments in the Church. He is a laborious man, seemed, and is a man of effective talent. He was elected to his present important post in 1864, and now devotes his whole time to the duties of it.

On the right of the main picture are the heads of three clergymen—DR. NAST, M'CLINTOCK, and STEVENS—all of them editors, authors, and pulpit orators. At the top and bottom are the likenesses of the present editors of the Methodist periodicals, and the Treasurer of the Society. DR. CORRY (editor of the Christian Advocate), CORLIETT (editor of Zion's Herald), and HAVEN (ex-editor), and two publishers, LANE and SCOTT, are distinguished sons of the Methodist Church; DR. CROOKS, the learned editor of The Methodist; DR. CURTISS, editor of DR. WHEDON, the metaphysician of the Church, and editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, is from Hamilton. DR. PEIRCE was educated in the New York University; was formerly President of Genesee College, and is now the editor of the Western Christian Advocate. DR. DASHIELL, the head of the Sunday-school department of the Church, and its eminently, especially as a writer and editor for children. The Rev. DR. H. F. CHASE, editor of the Central Christian Advocate, is a good type of the House-steward—independent and plain-spoken. The Rev. DR. CURTIS, editor of the Western Christian Advocate, published at Chicago, is "a live man" and a live paper. The Rev. DR. MAN has become one of the most eloquent and useful men of the Church. His travels in the Holy Land have been published by the Harpers, and fills well the editorial chair; and DR. MOSMER, a minister of great influence, and a powerful preacher, completes the whole list; and talents to the agency of the Church Extension Society, in which cause he has been most energetic and successful. DR. MOSMER, with his organization, has shown great wisdom in the selection of its bishops, editors, etc. All those whose likenesses are given in the picture are "men of mark," and, with two or three exceptions, have at various times been elected to office by the General Conference. The two large principles, it will be seen, have been selected from those who have been connected with the press of the Church.

How rapid and astonishing has been the progress of Methodism! On the 12th of May, 1739, the foundations of the first Methodist chapel in the world were laid at Bristol, England; and in November following the "Foundry," in London, was consecrated. The former bore the humble name of "The Preaching House;" and the latter took the former title of the "Old Foundry," having been once used for casting iron. At that moment JOHN WESLEY had no thought of founding a new sect. He was a firm Churchman, and opened these edifices for the temporary accommodation of his followers, and for a still better reason—the clergy of the Establishment had excluded him from its pulpits and his people from their sacramental altars.

The year when these earliest chapels were opened is considered the epoch of Methodism, for it was in the year 1739, also, that MR. WESLEY organized his first society; and this, he says, "was the rise of the United Society," which has continued in unbroken succession down to the present day. WESLEY, the great founder of the sect, lived to see METHODISM established in the United States with an Episcopal organization. He also saw it planted in the British North American Provinces and the West India Islands, and died in 1791, with his religious system extending to Africa, and numbered by five hundred and fifty itinerant, with thousands of local and traveling preachers, and over one hundred and fifty thousand members.

In the year 1839 was celebrated the one hundredth aniversary of English Wesleyan Methodism, a festive day of religious observance by Methodists throughout their churches in all parts of the world. Pecuniary contributions were called for and answered by a liberality never equaled in their history, if in that of any other Christian body. The "Wesleyan" gave one million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and the American Methodists one hundred thousand. Signal indeed had been the blessings of Heaven upon their past history, and at that Centenary the denomination had increased to more than one million of communicants in the United Kingdom, British Provinces, West Indies, the United States, etc., including the thousands in the unbridged transit preachers. Its missionaries were about three hundred and fifty, with some three thousand unpaid assistants, occupying more than three hundred stations in Sweden, Germany, France, Cadiz, Gibraltar, Malta, Africa, Ceylon, Continental India, New South Wales, Van Diemen's Land, New Zealand, Hawaii Islands, Vavau, Feejee, and West India Islands. In their mission-schools they enrolled about forty thousand. More than seventy thousand communicants, and two hundred thousand hearers, attended their mission chapels.

Such was the first century of Wesleyan Methodism, clearly demonstrating its Providential mission and its wonderful adaptation, spiritual life. Introduced into America one hundred years ago, it has retained the spirit of its original mission, and has been a powerful religious agent, and here its growth has been rapid beyond a parallel. Its first religious society was formed in this city in the year 1766. It has now, at the end of the last century, in thirty-four years, its standards had been planted from Nova Scotia to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the limits of civilized society. By this time there were eight annual Conferences, three bishops—COKE, ASBURY, and WRAN—with 83 preachers, with several thousand local preachers, and about 65,000 members, of whom 13,000 were Africans. By the year 1812 the membership had increased to 250,000, and its preachers to over 1300.

American Methodism, like the parent Wesleyan body, has been the friend of liberty and education. As early as the year 1784 Bishops COKE and ASBURY commenced Cokesbury College, near Baltimore, which was burned by unconscious others have rapidly followed in the denomination. The Methodist Episcopal Church now reports not less than 26 colleges, including theological schools, with 158 professors and teachers, 8345 students, 105,531 library volumes, and property valued at $3,067,861. To these must be added 77 academies, 556 instructors, 17,761 scholars, 10,462 of whom are females. Before the year 1870, Southern Methodists Church had 12 colleges, 77 academies, with 8000 students, making an aggregate in the two bodies of 194 literary institutions with 31,106 scholars. Who can estimate the moral, social, and religious influences which these educational movements of Methodism have exerted on our land?

Methodism is diffusing literature among the people. WESLEY himself incessantly employed his pen. His Methodist Magazine, which he began, is called, is now one of the largest religious publishing establishments in the world, its capital being invested in stock the year 1789 from $600 to nearly $1,000,000. It circulates more than a million copies monthly of periodicals, one Quarterly Review, two Monthlies, one Semi-Monthly, with eight Weeklies. These probably have a larger circulation than any other works of the same class in the world. No one can affirm that Methodism does not greatly contribute to the progress of general literature.

A most prominent place does Methodism occupy in the vital work of Sunday-school teaching. The Methodist Episcopal Church alone has now 13,400 schools, 918,000 scholars, 150,000 teachers, and during the past year chimed in 90,000 converts in these branch institutions. In the school libraries are more than 2,229,000 volumes, and nearly 260,000 Sundays-school papers are issued and circulated weekly monthly. We believe that no institutions in our land dispense a mightier power for private and public good than the Methodist-schools.

Methodism continues essentially, as it ever has been, a missionary movement. From 1808 to the present time it believes have contributed about more than twenty millions of dollars for foreign missions. Last year the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church reached almost $650,000; and it has now from this country missionaries in China, India, Africa, Bulgaria, Germany, Switzerland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and South America. From its commencement to 1865 its funds have amounted to nearly six million dollars. It is to raise a million the present year.

According to the last United States Census Report the Methodist Episcopal Church, as a whole, is the richest in the land. Her property in churches and parsonages is there valued at $27,000,000; in colleges and theological schools, $3,055,000—making, exclusive of the Book Concern and other property, $30,055,000. Such statistics are by some thought dull and uninteresting, but they are the ledgers of history, and in Church and State constitute the balance-sheet of social and religious improvement, and, as such, we leave these on Methodism without further comment.

SPEAK GENTLY.

"I AM entirely at a loss to know what to do with that boy," said Mrs. Burton to her husband, with much concern on her face, and in an anxious tone of voice. "I never yield to his imperious temper. I never indulge him in any thing; I think about him, and care about him at all times, but see no good result."

While Mrs. Burton was speaking, a bright, active boy, eight years of age, came dashing into the room, and, without heeding any one, commenced beating with two large sticks against one of the window-sills, and making a deafening noise.

"Incorrigible boy!" exclaimed his mother, going quickly up to him, and jerking the stick out of his hand, "can I not teach you some manners or decency? I have told you a hundred times that when you come into a room where any one is sitting you must be quiet. Go up stairs this moment, and do not let me see your face for an hour!"

The boy became sulky in an instant, and stood where he was pouting sullenly.

"Did you hear what I said? Go up stairs this moment!"

Mrs. Burton spoke in a very angry tone, and looked quite as angry as she spoke.

Slowly moved the boy toward the door, a scowl gathering his brow, that was but a moment before so bright and cheerful. His steps were too deliberate for the overexcited feelings of the mother; she sprang upon him, struck him, and, seizing his arm, pushed him from the room and closed the door loudly after him.

"I declare I am out of all heart!" she exclaimed, sinking down upon a chair. "It is line upon line and precept upon precept, but all to no good purpose. I think I will break my rod over him!"

Mr. Burton said nothing, but he saw plainly enough that it was not all the child's fault. He doubted the wisdom of speaking and punishing so unequivocally, although he had often and often been on the point of doing so involuntarily. He knew the tempers of his wife well, and he was sometimes anxious about every thing that looked like charging any fault upon herself, that he feared more harm than good would result from an attempt on his part to show her that she was much more than half to blame for the boy's perverseness of temper.

Once or twice in the little fellow's upward himself at the door, but was driven back with harsh words until the hour for tea arrived. The sound of the tea-bell caused a sudden alteration in the boy's appearance. He impressions made on his mind. His little feet answered the welcome summons with a clatter that could be heard all over the house.

"Go back, Sir!" she said, sternly, as he burst open the dining-room door, and sent it swinging with a loud concussion against the wall, "and see if you can not walk down stairs more like a boy than a horse."

Master Henry withdrew, pouting out his rosy lips to the distance of nearly an inch. He went up one flight of stairs, and then returned.

"Go up to the third story!" was the first started from, and come down quietly all the way, or you shall not have a mouthful of supper."

I do not very well know how he did it.

"Go up, I tell you, this instant, or I will send you to bed without any thing to eat."

This was a threat that former experience had taught him might be executed, and so he deemed it better to submit than to run the risk of having his own way. The distance to the third story was made in a few light springs, and then he came pattering down as lightly, and took his place at the table quickly, but silently.

"There—there, not too fast; you have plenty to eat, and time enough to eat it in."

Harry settled himself down to the table as quietly as his mercurial spirits would let him, and tried to wait until Mrs. Burton had helped all at his efforts to do so, his hand went over into the breadbasket. A look from his mother caused him to drop the slice he had seized; it was not the look to which there was much affection. While waiting to be helped his hands were busy with his knife and fork, making a sad confusion of them.

"Put down your hands!" harshly spoken, remedied this evil, or rather sent the active movement from the fellow's hands to his feet. He had commenced a swinging motion, his heels striking noisily against the chair.

"Keep your feet still!" caused this to cease.

After one or two more reproofs, the boy was left to himself. As soon as he received his cup of tea he poured the entire contents into his saucer and then tried to lift it steadily to his lips. In doing so he spilled one-third of the contents upon the table-cloth.

A look at his mother, and a sudden check and rewarded this feat.

"Have I not told you over and over again, you incorrigible, bad boy, not to pour the whole of your tea into your saucer? Just see what a mess you have made with the table-cloth! I declare I am out of all patience with you! Go away from the table this instant!"

Harry went crying away, not in anger, but in grief. He had spilled his tea by accident. His mother had so many reproofs and injunctions to make that the hearing of them all in mind was a thing impossible. As to pouring out all his tea at a time, he had no recollection of any interdiction on that subject, though it had been made over and over again very often. In a little while he came creeping slowly back and resumed his place at the table, his eyes on his mother's face. Mrs. Burton was sorry that she had sent him away for what was only an accident; she felt that she had hardly been just to the thoughtless boy. She did not, therefore, object to his coming back, and said, as he took his seat, "Next time see that you are more careful. I have told you again and again not to fill your saucer to the brim; you never can do it without spilling the tea upon the table-cloth."

This was spoken in kindness.

A scene somewhat similar to this was enacted at every meal; but instead of improving in his behavior the boy grew more and more heedless. Mrs. Burton rarely said any thing to Harry about his unruly manner, but when he did, a word was enough. That word was always mildly yet firmly spoken. He did not think him a bad boy or difficult to manage—at least he had never found him so. "I wish I knew what to do with that child," said Mrs. Burton, after the little fellow had been sent to bed an hour before his time, in consequence of some violation of law or order: "he makes me constantly feel unhappy. I dislike to be scolding him forever, but what can I do? If I did not curb him in some way Harry would be no living in the house with him. I am afraid he will cause us a great deal of trouble."

Mr. Burton sat silent. He wanted to say a word on the subject, but he feared that its effect might not be what he desired.

"I wish you would advise me what to do, Mr. Burton," said his wife, a little petulantly. "You sit, and do not say a single word, as if you had no kind of interest in the matter. What am I to do? I have exhausted all my own resources, and feel completely at a loss."

"There is a way which, if you would adopt it, I think might do good." Mr. Burton spoke with a slight appearance of hesitation. "If you will speak gently to Harry, I am sure you would be able to manage him far better than you do."

Mrs. Burton was ever ornamental in an instant; she felt the reproof deeply; her self-esteem was severely wounded.

"Speak gently, indeed!" she replied, "I might as well speak to the wind; I am scarcely heard now at the top of my voice."

As her husband did not argue the matter with her, nor say any thing that was calculated to keep up the excitement under which she was laboring, her feelings, in a little while, quieted down, and her thoughts became active. The words, "speak gently," were constantly in her mind, and there was a reproving tone in them. On going to bed that night she could not get to sleep for several hours; her mind was too busily engaged in reviewing her conduct toward the child. She clearly perceived that she had too frequently suffered her mind to get excited and angry, and that she was often annoyed at trifles which ought to have been overlooked.

"I am afraid I have been unjust to my child," she sighed over and over again, turning restlessly upon her pillow.

"I will try and do better," she said to herself as she rose in the morning, feeling but little refreshed from sleep. When she was ready to leave her room she heard Harry's voice calling her from the next chamber where he slept. The tones were fretful; he wanted some attendance, and was crying out for it in a manner that instantly disturbed the even current of the mother's feelings. She was about telling him, angrily, to be quiet until she could finish dressing herself, when the words, "speak gently," seemed whispered in her ear. Their effect was magical; the mother's spirit was subdued.

"I will speak gently," she murmured, and went in to Harry, who was still crying out fretfully.

"What do you want, my son," she said, in a quiet, kind voice.

The boy looked up with surprise; his eye brightened, and the whole expression of his face was changed in an instant.

"I can not find my stockings, mamma," he said.

"There they are, under the bureau," returned Mrs. Burton, gently as she had at first spoken.

"Oh yes, so they are!" cheerfully replied Harry; "I could not see them any where."

"Did your little crying would bring them?"

This was said with a smile, and in a tone so unlike his mother, that the child looked up again into her face with surprise that was, Mrs. Burton plainly saw, mingled with pleasure.

"Do you want any thing else?" she asked.

"No, mamma," he replied, cheerfully, "I can dress myself now."

This first little effort was crowned with the most encouraging results to the mother; she felt a new peace settling in her bosom, the consciousness of having gained a true victory over the perverse tendencies of both her own heart and that of her boy. It was a little act, but it was the first-fruits, and the gathering, even of so small a harvest, was sweet to her spirit.

For the first time in many months the breakfast-table was pleasant to all. Harry never once interrupted the conversation that passed at intervals between his father and mother. When he asked for any thing it was in a way pleasing to all. Once or twice Mrs. Burton found it necessary to correct some little fault in manner, but the way in which she did it did not in the least disturb her child's temper, and instead of not seeming to hear her words, as had almost always been the case, he regarded all that was said, and tried to do as she wished.

"There is a wonderful power in gentle words," remarked Mr. Burton to his wife, after Harry had left the table.

"Yes, wonderful indeed; their effect surprises me."

"Love is strong."

Days, weeks, months, and years went by; during all this time the mother continued to strive very earnestly with herself, and very kindly with her child. The happiest results followed; the fretful, passionate, disorderly boy became comparatively and orderly in his habits. A word, gently spoken, was all-powerful in its influence for good, but the least shade of harshness would arouse his stubborn will and deform his fair young face.

Whenever mothers complain to Mrs. Burton of the difficulty they find in managing their children, she has one piece of advice to give, and that is "Command yourself, and 'speak gently.'"

THOMANN'S FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The fall season has fairly come, though sultry summer days have been spiritedly interspersed throughout. But the gay world, for the most part, lingers no longer in the green fields and watering places, and fashion, with beckoning hand, invites return, and the streets of New York are thronged with an animated crowd of "old friends and brave men," each intent on business or pleasure. Madame Fashion has not been remiss in the concocting of novelties for autumn, but, with closed doors, has been ingeniously devising new laws to be promulgated this fall; and notably the corsets, ladies especially are looking according to autumn toilets. The eager gazers who threaded their way through the crowds of Broadway Saturday, day last week, regardless of the drizzling rain, showed a degree of interest in the great exhibition of little bonnets worthy of a larger cause.

Although in some instances there seems to have been an attempt to "eclipse," the effort appears to be that the new styles of those little ornaments denominated "bonnets" are rather smaller than ever. The list of the different head coverings recognized by fashion are divided into numerous orders—Pinchon, Empire, Pamela, Gabrielle, Metternich, Marie, Mignon, Cardinal, Jane, Rotari, etc., etc.—and these orders into genera and species too numerous to mention. Each lady has a counter for herself—Fashion considerately provides which species is the rarest, and the most becoming for her to adopt. The fancies in all the various varieties, still blossoms, fresh and fair; while the Cantaine is a pretty novelty.

In Paris, simultaneously with the recent announcement that the Empress was about to start for Biarritz, was issued hers, christened after Biarritz, from their appearance. These toquets are made of black, white, and light gray felt, and are bordered with a band of velvet studded thickly with gems; a feather appearance to this rather masculine head-gear, either a beautiful, half-spread rose, a china aster, a tuft of pansies, or a bouquet of violets, is set artistically at the side. A Parisian journal, after describing a Lamballe bonnet composed of white felt, set in beads, and ornamented at each side (on the ears as it were) with two bunches of violet velvet pansies, adds: "These tufts of flowers on the ears lead us to hope that we are not doomed to walk out with uncovered ears during the approaching cold season, for a although larger bonnets have been made in preparation for the colder weather, nobody will purchase them."

Among the bonnets intended to adorn the more popular this fall striped and plaid goods of the brightest and gayest colors abound. Velvet is largely used, available as ever; and a new shade of blue, called azure, and of green distinguished as peacock, are likely to be in special favor. For street wear the new striped poplin, silk and wool, is new and stylish. Plain black dress costumes to be worn with fancy sacques are greatest. Black silk striped with satin is very fashionable. For dress occasions white will be in favor. There is a new material, imported by Arnoux & Co., called soie d'satin cashmere, a rich twilled silk with a satin thread. It is to be obtained in all the new shades, and will be a favorite fabric for bridal dresses.

Gored skirts are still in the ascendant, especially for dress wear. Skirts are now universally made shaded up at each side as far as the waist, and edged with deep flutings, box-plaited, and of the same material, either white or striped in colors. The circular will be the favorite style. Sometimes a hood is added, trimmed with jet fringe, and when dress is of wool lined it is very becoming.

The mixture of muslin and silk is at present very popular. The newest white muslin bodices are called "Loyses," and are made in puffings and trimmed with three cross-cut bands of silk, the edges of which are scribing braces, both at the front and back. The waist is restricted with a belt of colored sash, which fastens at the left side: the collar is pointed. The sleeves are formed with three puffings of muslin, which alternate with three cross-cut bands of silk. Velvet is also used for trimming these puffed white muslin bodices, and the velvet is embroidered either in silk or in jet.

Among the various novelties of the season are chains which are extensively used for dress trimmings. They vary in size "from the diameter of a pea" to "pea to that of a small butter plate."

Fabrics promise to be immensely long. Five or six tasteraised rings, falling nearly to the shoulder, are a fashionable model.

There would be no end to the unique and pretty changes introduced by fashion; yet for the present we will make a period here and close our budget.

No one can fail to find in this great city such amusement as is suited to his individual taste. And if his taste happens to need cultivation, he has ample opportunity for training it here. Libraries are to some extent open to the public; and we believe are long increased facilities in the way of public circulating libraries, reading-rooms, etc., will give to every one ample opportunity for indulging a taste for reading. Concerts of various kinds, sacred and secular, vocal and instrumental, are more than ever demanded by the public. The drama, the comedy, and the tragedy, in various grades of excellence according to the popular standard, are source of entertainment to multitudes. Riston's recent appearance has awakened a great enthusiasm in her behalf; and her wonderful power as a tragedienne has seldom been surpassed. Her views of poetry will be also to greatly their taste at numerous places. Messrs. Goupil and Schaus have fine collections of engravings, to which they have lately added some very fine ones after eminent English artists, which are well worthy a careful examination. This has been projected by Mr. T. W. Dufresne of the city to establish a "Garden of Art." A site has been secured in the vicinity of the Central Park. The ground embraces two entire blocks, bounded on the north by Sixty-second Street, on the south by Sixtieth Street, on the west by Seventh Avenue, and on the east by Eleventh Avenue, an area of 41,000 square yards. Here it is proposed to erect a building fronting on Tenth Avenue, covering the entire line of frontage—60 feet—from Sixtieth to Sixty-second Street. The great object claimed by the projector is to provide New York with a place of popular resort, relating in character—a place which will have for its chief features if not the real greatness of the palace and gardens at Sydenham, the popular places world-famous for their scenic beauty: and while he administers to the pleasure of his visitors, he hopes to cultivate a taste for the fine arts, and thereby to bring them in communion with the embodied thoughts of the great Masters of the Past and of the Present.

The following communication with a request to insert, which we do with great willingness, regarding it as a very good item for our column:

Wanted—Wives.

"In your issue of September 8 I notice under the head of Home and Foreign Gossip the following: 'A Western paper contains the following announcement: "Wanted—Fifty Women to go to John Caudal, City Marshal, South of Leavenworth, Kansas," etc. Now, as our 'Western' city of Leavenworth contains about 20,000 inhabitants, it is at least possible that a Miss 'Ann Gleeful' may be willing to be sent to Mr. John Caudal for City Marshal, I, as a resident of Leavenworth, deny such 'soft impeachment' as that Mr. Marshal Caudal or Marshal Caudal, a worthy soldier, who, I hope for the month to come still to remain, and to my young lady who reads, for he has already a charming wife; also, a charming family. Now, I ask you, is not the whole announcement was a scandalous joke on our portly Marshal?

In regard to the above we would simply remark that we have never given our affidavit that nothing but the truth should appear in the columns of "Home and Foreign Gossip." The name is sufficiently indicative of the powerful contents. "Wanted—Fifty Women" could scarcely be "goesly" if it were always true. And while we give our readers a variety of matter, the truthful and the fictitious, every story or amusing announcement is not withheld even if we can not prove its truth. Should any one ever happy to notify the public that Miss Anna Gould and John Caudal have broken off their engagement, or have never been engaged, or have married, we shall, just as the case may be.

We have heard of sugar from saw-dust before, but now it is said that a chemist has extracted from coal tar a substance which is indistinguishable from sugar. He has named it "phenoze."

Some people cover their eyes with green or other shades when they read by gas-light, no matter what. It is now ascertained by the best oculists that shades injure the naked eyes, by overstrengthening it, from their creating heat and inflammation in the eyes surfaces. If the eye be injured and light insupportable, the best way to do is to keep the eyes completely shut. We have heard it stated as a curious fact, that, when the English army returned from Egypt, those soldiers were least affected with ophthalmy who had worn no fronts to their hats.

Various accounts come to us of the immense opera house which Louis Napoleon is building in Paris. It is estimated that it will cost $8,000,000. It will be constructed entirely of brick, and metal, and no inflammable combustible being allowed to enter into its construction. It will cover about a half a mile square, and be two hundred feet in external height, according to report. Every box will have a separate saloon attached. Should this be completed, a new opera house will not be constructed from the street to the second story. There will be a little ahead of any thing built in modern times.

A French paper states that arrangements have been made to send some seventy female convicts to Cayenne, the Government having determined to take measures in earnest for the population of that colony. These girls, several of whom are remarkably handsome, are destined to become the wives of convicts in Cayenne who have distinguished themselves by industry and good conduct. Each couple will be endowed with a grant of land and a sufficient loan to begin the agricultural work. The Government official journal inquires whether the consent of these prospective brides has been asked, and objects that marriage, and, above all, marriage with convicts, is not within the purview of their sentence.

LITTLE JOHNNY.

Every body in Harmouth knew little Johnny, with his curly head and his tiny cronts, with which he could get over the ground a good deal faster than most other people who had free use of their legs. The great favorite was he with the Duff weather-beaten beachmen, who often used to take him out with them in their shore-boats to the loggers when they were fishing within sight of Harmouth Harbor. Then they used to make him sing, for he had a capital voice, and had learned to give out the "Death of Nelson" and "The Boatswain's Bowling" with musical emphasis and spirit not to be expected in a child of ten. Standing on the shore you could hear his notes ascending over the water and presently the shouts and hurrahs of his audience when he came to a conclusion. Johnny had no mother; she had long been dead, having failed to bring her child into the world, and then pass quietly away as if in a peaceful sleep. The only vestige that remained to him of her was a tombstone under the great yew-tree in the corner of Harmouth Church-yard, and there every Sunday after the morning service he would lie father and child hand in hand, silent and sad. For though he had lost his wife close on half a score years, Joe Barton, rough and stern hearted as he was, had not forgotten her who for one brief twelve months made life sunshine to him.

"Poor little woman!" he would say, turning away; and as he passed through the gate that led out of the resting-place of the dead a great salt tear as big as a pebble would force its way out and slowly creep down his brown cheek. He and Johnny lived in a comfortable cottage outside the town, for Joe had been a successful man; from a fisherman he had gradually become part-owner of a lugger, then sole proprietor of it, and then at last had no less than three boats of his own. So in course of time he secured a very nice little nest-egg which he invested in the shares of the county bank, and thus having labored long and well, retired to rest him for the remainder of his days. The bank had a local branch at Harmouth, and most of the fishermen and inhabitants deposited their money there. Joe always had an intense love of the sea. He was worn in a fisher's cot, and his heart good to hear the waves, and that they used to talk to him for all the world like human beings." When he gave up fishing he had built small pleasure-boats, and was much etched with great ceremony The Sooty Jack, and a smart, trim little craft she was, with sailing powers resembling those of a miraculous. Although the summer she was kept fully occupied, and heartily enjoyed the speeds she had to listen to from the juvenile frequenters of the beach, she was then cut for a sail with him. But he always had plenty of occupation with what with his sons and his suits and ginger-beer Joe Barton was at last worshipped as a hero. Johnny ever went with him on these marine excursions, and despite his dishevelled and ever-attendant crutch, without which he could not move, he had learned to handle and manœuvre The Sooty Jack with the greatest ease, and was as expert at taking in a reef or "putting about" as the oldest salt in Harmouth.

On the particular summer's day, the sea so smooth that it rippled on to the beach without noise, and seemed to be coyly kissing the pebbles. So hot, too, that the crowd in the music boats floating about were leaning listlessly on their oars, allowing themselves to drift lazily along with the tide. All Harmouth seemed to be on the water, every thing in the shape of a boat was engaged. The Sooty Jack alone remained idle. There she lay, about a hundred yards from the shore, moored somewhat, and every thing as neatly fastened up as when she had been left the night before. Many and anxious were the inquiries that Joe Barton, and general were the expressions of regret that he should not be in the water such a lovely day. No one could have been and gone, not even Johnny. All he could say was that his father had received a letter the night before from a friend which he had read silent and gloomy all the rest of the evening, and gone out before six o'clock in the morning, when he was back, without saying a word. So Joe Barton's day remained idle all through that livelong summer's day.

Evening came on, and Johnny, who had been lounging about uneasily, for he could not bear his father to be away from him, began to feel very tired and sleepy, and thinking that as his father could be cool and comfortable, hailed one of the passing boats, and was duly transported to The Sooty Jack. Creeping into the cabin at her bow, with space sails, empty ginger-beer bottles, and such like were kept, he soon fell into a sound and heavy slumber. How long he never knew, but when he woke he was startled by hearing a rippling sound above his head; it was quite dark, and all the boat felt as if she were moving smartly along. What could have happened? Had he been left on board from harbor? A moment he lay still, frightened in spite of himself. Then slowly he raised himself on his elbow, and making but a slight motion, looked out into an aperture through which he had entered. He could see the moisture bedimmed but with the fresh breeze, and that was all. But was it the moisture? He knew he was out on the sea, but how had he come there? Could any body out of spite have sent him adrift? Joe had by no one ever made a grudge against him; suddenly he was startled by a groan as if of pain. His heart thumped against his side, his perspiration broke out on his cold as ice forehead, he neither moved hand nor foot. Then there was another groan, and another, and presently a moan and broken with emotion, burst into a passionate prayer. Johnny was braver now, and dragging himself along on his hands and knees as quickly as his affliction would allow, he made for the entrance and thrust his head out. There was no moon, but the stars shone out heavily, and in their dim light he could see the figure of a man with his back toward him, rocking backward and forward, his face buried in his hands and murmuring to himself. Who could it be? Johnny essayed to speak, but his lips were parched, soundless, and glued together, as his tongue was hard and dry. He started at the black shadow as if it were a spirit. Between it and him there was a seat running across the boat, and he too stood as if in order to get himself along not could not. The figure moved its head, and in a momentary flash of summer lightning Johnny saw it was that of his father. He tried to speak again, but he could not, while his eyes eagerly devoured his every movement. He saw him move his hand down to the seat beside him, saw him raise his arm with something that glittered in the silver light, he heard a click, and then, as if by an electric shock, every nerve burst upon him. Hurling himself forward with the energy of despair he caught his father by the arm. There was a cry, a report, and then he felt something grasp his fingers. But he heeded it not; seizing the pistol from his hand he threw it with all his strength into the sea, and then sank fainting into the bottom of the boat.

Black grew the clouds, higher rose the wind, beat up the waves in angry consternation. There was no sign or appearance of the advent of a severe storm. The Sooty Jack, left to herself, was heeling over as she rode the sea in a tumultuous manner, but still Joe Barton, for it was he, sat with his face in his hands; still Johnny lay silent and motionless in the bottom of the boat. Presently a great, green wave came curling along, and dashing against the boat's side, wetted both to the skin. It roused Joe from his stupor, it roused Johnny from his insensibility; in another moment they were in one another's arms. Still the wind freshened, still the waves rose higher and higher, those two clasped in this firm embrace heeded them not, for the mercy of God was in their hearts, and the storm and tempest had no fear for them.

It blew a gale that night and morning, and a large vessel went ashore on Harmouth sands, but no lives were lost. The wives of the fishermen lay sleepless and uneasy in their beds, for their good men were out on the angry sea earning bread for them and the children. The hoarse voice of the wind and the angry roar of the waves sent a thrill to their hearts as they heard them, and many a prayer rose up through the black sky and gained the ear of the Unseen. When the morning sun broke bravely through the drifting clouds there was a heartfelt shout of thanksgiving to see the toilers of the night come safely into harbor. Hope were the breakfasts eaten, sound was the sleep that followed, for it had been a hard battle between man and the elements.

Later in the day a knot of men were lounging on the shore. "Where's The Saucy Jack?" asked one. "Ain't Joe Barton turned up yet?" said another. While old Murtoch, the patriarch of the group, mumbled out "She ain't drawed up, she ain't at anchor; I'm blessed if I don't think she's gone down head first." This inaugurated a conversation about Joe, and various and singular were the reasons given for his continued absence. While they were engaged in this discussion, a man, bareheaded and breathless, rushed frantically down over the pebbles, his face pale as death, his eyes almost starting out of his head. When he reached the group, he stopped and remained speechless. "Hullo, Silas, what's wrong, lad?" inquired one. "You look dazed, man," said another.

"The Bank," he whispered, hoarsely.

"Well, what of the Bank?" asked old Murtoch, impatiently.

"It's broke," he gasped, and then, without vouchsafing any further information, rushed away as quickly as he had come. The news he brought fell like a thunder-bolt in the midst of those to whom he told it; they seemed stunned for a moment, and then hastened up to the town to find if he had spoken the truth.

Alas! it was but too true, the County Bank, being unable to meet a run upon its resources on the previous day at the chief market town, where its head office was, had been compelled to stop payment, and close all its branch establishments. Considerable assets, however, were expected, the number of shareholders being amply sufficient to cover all liabilities. It was some time before the Harmouth fishermen could be made to understand that, if they were only patient, they would have nearly all their money back. They stood in a body outside the Bank door till the darkness took them home worn out and sad at heart to bed. There went out no boats that night from Harmouth to fish!

The morning dawning the day on which the Harmouth ——, sat stopped, a boat was seen some distance out making its way for the shore as well as it could with a broken mast and a ragged sail. All eyes were strained toward it. Whose could it be? Where was it coming from? Old Murtoch, shading his eyes with his hand, gazed silently out over the watery space. Then in a moment he dropped his arm exclaiming, "Well, bless my heart, if it ain't The Saucy Jack, with Joe and the kid aboard." Immense was the astonishment; some said "it couldn't be," but by-and-by, sure enough, she glided in past the pier-head, Joe at the tiller, and Johnny making himself useful in hauling in the sails. They both looked pale and weary, but the shout of welcome with which they were received lit up both their faces pleasantly. When The Saucy Jack had been made fast, Joe and his boy came ashore. All were eager to tell him the news, but none liked to, for it was well known that he was a large shareholder in the bank. But he seemed to understand their whispering, and taking Johnny's hand, he merely said quietly, "I know all about it. It's been and ruined me, but that's neither here nor there," and then moved off toward home. But ere he had gone many steps he took Johnny up in his arms, crutch and all, and carried him home and up to his bed in his own tiny room. He would not undress him, for already was the poor little man in a heavy slumber, but laying him down tenderly on the outside of the counterpane, that great, strong man fell on his knees, and with his face resting on the hands of his sleeping child, thus remained for a long, long time. What he thought, what he prayed, what thanksgivings burst from his very soul only the Book wherein his life is written can reveal. It was one of those times in the existence of a man when the days that are gone are lived over again, and the lessons they have taught are appreciated. Then the clouds roll back, the dawn breaks with promise of fine weather, and he nerves himself anew to face the future, bring it sunshine or storm. Thus taking courage, Joe Barton raised himself from his knees, no longer the craven and coward, afraid to meet the ills of life, but ready to grin and bear them. He was an altered man. And who had been the mysterious agent in the hand of Providence that had wrought his reformation? His poor, little deformed child, who through the night of storm and danger had been near him with lion heart and dauntless courage, who had taught him that mercy is extended even unto him who would take his own life.

LITTLE JOHNNY.

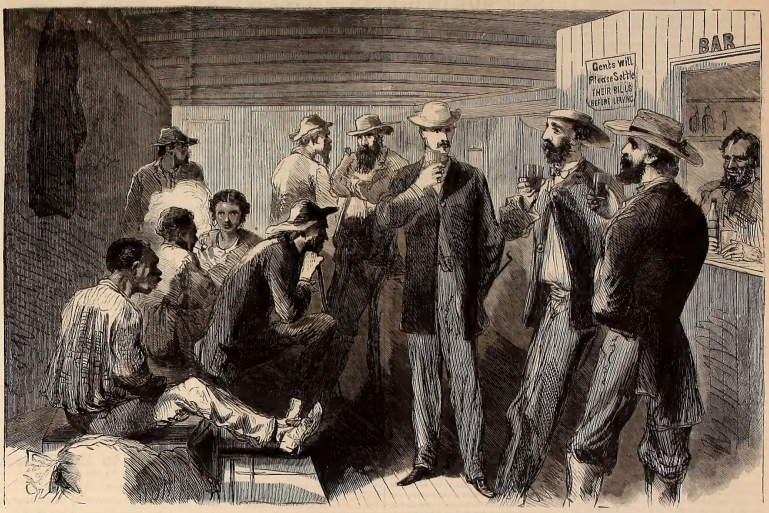
A few words more. Years passed on; the expected call had been made by the bank, and Joe's goods and chattels were all sold, but he neither groaned nor grumbled: he set himself manfully to work once again, and though his hair grew gray, and he was not quite so hearty and strong as of yore, yet all were willing to lend him a hand, and he soon began to find his circumstances improving. But for one circumstance he would have been happy. Johnny had never been thoroughly well since that dreadful night of storm and disaster; his back had grown rounder, and he complained of a pain in his leg frequently. Joe grew very anxious; every spare moment was dedicated to his child. One day he took him to London to see a great doctor, and when he came back he looked ten years older, for there was a gloomy prophecy gnawing at his heart. From that day Johnny took to his bed. He was a good, patient little fellow, but he would have no nurse but his dear old daddy; and his thin, pale face, used to light up the moment Joe entered the room; and when his father sat down by him he would put his hand into his horny palms and smile as if supremely happy. One morning Joe came in to breakfast, and, as usual, bounded up stairs to see his boy. Johnny was lying on his back, his eyes turned expectantly toward the door. The window was wide open, and a delicious soft breeze from the sea came playing through it. The sick child was going to his rest, there could be little doubt about that; his eyes were unnaturally bright, his cheek strangely flushed; in a few moments the ebb of the tide must set in. Joe sat down beside him, and then, as he was wont, Johnny put his hand in his, and then slowly and quietly spoke thus:

"Dear daddy, I'm going home. The doctor was right when he told you I weren't good for long. I feel as if I hadn't got no blood in my body, and my legs feel so strange. Hold me up in your arms, daddy, I want to whisper to you."

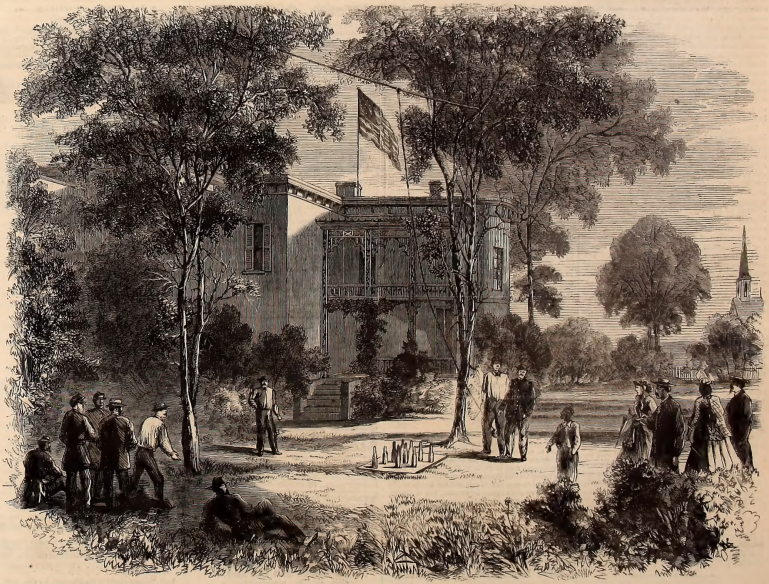
Joe felt inclined to resist for a moment, for he would have gone for the doctor, but the child's manner chained him to his seat. Putting his arm round him, he brought his head close to his shoulder. Johnny nestled himself close, pressed his lips against the big bushy whiskers, and then continued:



"Daddy, don't lose heart again. Promise me that, won't you? Remember, daddy darling, the secret. I—I've kept it, you keep it too, won't you?"

Pressing his hands to his father's face, he looked eagerly into his eyes, passed his fingers over his cheek, and murmuring, "The secret, remember," in a moment was dead.

They laid him in the corner of the church-yard, under the yew-tree, by his mother, and on Sunday mornings, after service, Joe has now to stand alone and gaze on the spot where rest the two beings he loved so well. But his secret is buried there too. What secret? That having received a letter to acquaint him of impending ruin, and found its information correct, he had sought to escape meeting his disaster by himself destroying the life that a merciful Creator had given him. How he was saved from this crime has been told, and the secret that was is a secret no longer.



A STORM ON THE PRAIRIES.—A SCENE IN WESTERN LOUISIANA.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH—THE DRY-GOODS DRUMMER ON HIS TRAVELS.—SCENE ON THE GALVESTON AND HOUSTON RAILROAD.—"HERE'S JEFF, FELLOWS!"

SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 681.]

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH—SHERIDAN'S TEN-PINS.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.

[SEE PAGE 631.]

LAST WORDS.

FROM the time that human beings began to reflect, they have treasured up the words of the dying as peculiarly weighty and sacred. They often become their Icons in a family, are handed on by tradition from generation to generation, and from being emblazoned on the shield of the iron baron, descend at last to the seals and couches of his silken descendants. The last utterance of a falling chieftain has often been made the war-cry of his followers, raged them on to deeds of heroical valor, to recovery of lost ground, and conquest of new.

In Italy the sayings of the departed on their death-beds are sometimes written on scrolls, and hung in their parish church. We have seen a church in Florence, the walls of which were quite lit this manner with the devout reflections of a daughter of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. Crowds visited the spot before and after the day of the funeral, and were edified, no doubt, by the many good and wise things the young princess had uttered. All the schools of philosophy that have been ever founded, have failed to inspire men at the close of life with sentiments one half so beautiful, so thrilling to the ear of by-standers, as precious to the memories of mourners as those which the Christian religion has put into the lips of her expiring children. They are as flowers that blossom on the bier, and diffuse an immortal fragrance. They are golden texts, which cheer us and fade not away while the night of bereavement closes round our path.

This is rather a serious subject, nor would it be decorous to treat it lightly. There is no sound in the wide world so dreadful as the accents of remorse on a dying bed, nor any instance of it more striking than that of Julian the Apostate. The Persian army had attacked his rear, and he rode to resist them. The imperial standard bore the letters X. and P., "The Beasts and People," emblazoned on it, instead of the Labarum, under which, since the time of Constantine, the legions of the empire had so often rushed on to victory. The Persians were repulsed, but Julian was wounded. His physicians could not stop the blood, and he called for a horse. He tried to mount, fell back into the arms of his followers, filled his hand with blood, cast it into the air, and cried, "Galilean, Thou hast conquered!" Not half so sad was the voice of Kosciusko when he fell, though not to die, pierced by Russian lances, and exclaiming, "An end of Poland!" The last whose breast is clean, who has confidence in the goodness of his cause, meets his fate with dignity, and brightens the horrors of death with a smile. He may die on the scaffold as a traitor and rebel, and yet, like Lord Lovat, in the rising of 1745, exclaim with his latest breath, Judex et causam et pro patriâ mori! Not that the noble sentiment came well from him. It was, in his case, a bitter mockery; for his life had been spent in the violation of every duty, and its sole object was self. "Thou sweet to die for our dear country's sake!" would come better from the general Wolfe; and is in fact, in other words, just what he did say when, having gained the heights of Abraham, and fallen in the French at Quebec, he received a shot in the wrist, which he wrapped in a handkerchief, pressed on, continued to shout out in the gory field, and, having pierced by a fatal bullet in the breast, allowed himself unwillingly to be carried behind the ranks. When told that the French army was taking to flight, he exclaimed, "Then I am happy," and instantly expired.

The composure and fortitude which mark the last moments of some heinous offenders is very baffling to moralists. The usual chain of moral causes and effects seems in them to be broken; and it is sometimes, particularly in Eastern countries, difficult to restore the links even in imagination, and to render a plausible account of the miscreant's end and life. Thun Nuncomar, the chief of the Brahmins of Bengal, who practiced more than the usual amount of deceit which belongs to the timid and effeminate Bengalee, and who had been detected repeatedly in the most criminal intrigues, was at last brought to trial on a false, and condemned to be hanged, during the Governorship of Warren Hastings, met his ignominious fate with the utmost calmness. His crimes were many, and the crimes he had committed were common to his race, and often accounted virtues. He conversed with the sheriff about his execution through a sigh or the motion of one finger of his face. He looked round him from his palanquin on the scaffold and his frantic fellow-countrymen with unaltered serenity, mounted the steps with a firm foot, desired his best remembrances to his friends in the council, and gave the signal to the executioner amidst the wailing and howling of countless Hindoos. Yet all this was the dignity of a deception. It was but stage effect, or the reflection of one whose leading idea is Fate. Very different was the resignation of the great peace-loving general and statesman, Washington, when dying at Mount Vernon. To him craft was unknown. No murmur of complaint or impatience passed his lips, but he suffered severely. His weeping family, his friends, his sorrowing servants stood round him, and a nation, to which he had given birth, was mourning without. "Let me be buried privately," he said; "and let no funeral oration be pronounced over my remains. . . . I am dying hard, but it will soon be over." Such were his simple words. He had never been an orator, nor would the arts of rhetoric, or stage, have been consistent with the extreme simplicity of his character.

"Unequaled among the preparations of American Chemists."—BOKOVAY'S Cocoaine for the Hair, and Florimel for the Handkerchief.—True Flag, Boston.

The popular Destrictic, Jogers's Fragrant Odontoline. Any druggist will order it for you. Price 75 cts. ROGERS & MAXFIELD, Proprietors, 25 Cedar St., New York. DURAND BARKER & CO., General Agents.

FIRST MORTGAGE

BONDS

OF THE CENTRAL

Pacific R.R. Company,

OF CALIFORNIA.

Interest at the Rate of Six per Cent. per Annum, payable Semi-Annually, on the First Days of January and July.

Principal and Interest Payable in U. S. Gold Coin in the City of New York.

Amount of Issue . . . . $7,386,000.

In Coupon Bonds of $1000 Each.

The Bonds Have Thirty Years to run, and are secured by a First Mortgage, constituting an absolute prior lien on that portion of the Road, Equipments, Franchises, and entire Property of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, located in the State of California, and extending from Sacramento City to the California State Line, forming a part of the GREAT PACIFIC RAILROAD ROUTE, adopted and aided by the UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

The amount of these First Mortgage Bonds to be issued per mile is limited by law to the amount of United States Bonds allowed and issued to aid the construction of the Road, and the Mortgage by which they are secured is declared by Act of Congress to be constitute a lien prior and superior to that of the United States Government.

The bonds received from the Government (a) amount equal to this First Mortgage) is economically and judiciously applied to the construction and equipment of the Road, together with nearly $7,000,000, received from Stock Subscriptions and other sources. The First Mortgage, therefore, amounts to but about 35 per cent. of the actual cost and value of the property which it covers.

The road is now completed, equipped, and running from Sacramento City to Alta, a distance of 73 miles, and the earnings for the three months ending August 1st were as follows, viz.:

May, 1866	$65,115 83
June, "	67,429 78
July, "	85,000 00

IN GOLD.

The earnings are steadily increasing, and are estimated at over $100,000 in gold for the month of August —the official report for that month not having been received at this date.

The construction of the road is going vigorously forward—34 miles additional being ready for the cars, and it will probably be in full operation to the California State Line, 156 miles from Sacramento City, during the summer of 1868, when its earnings must be very large, as the entire trade of Nevada, and a large proportion of that of Utah, Idaho, and Montana must pass over its line. It has been shown by reliable statistics that in 1865 over $13,000,000 in gold was paid for freighting goods from California to Nevada.

This part of the Great Pacific Railroad Route is destined to be one of the most valuable lines of railway in the world, and its First Mortgage Bonds are among the best secured and most desirable investments ever offered.

Over $1,000,000 has already been expended in grading beyond the point to which the road is now running, and the iron is bought and paid for sufficient to lay the track the entire distance to the State Line.

The Road has been completed and equipped thus far without the sale of a single dollar of its First Mortgage Bonds, and they are now offered to the public for the first time, after the earnings of the Road have reached the sum of $100,000 per month in gold, only about 35 per cent. of the amount required for operating expenses.

The Bonds are offered at 95 per cent. and accrued interest from July 1st, in Currency. Orders may be forwarded to us direct, or through the principal Banks and Bankers in all parts of the country.

Remittances may be made in drafts on New York, or in Legal Tender Notes, National Bank Notes, or other funds current in the city, and the Bonds will be forwarded to any address by express, free of charge. Inquiries for further particulars, by mail or otherwise, will receive punctual attention.

FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS,

No. 5 Nassau Street, New York.

N.B.—All kinds of Government Securities received at the full market price in exchange for the above Bonds.

$5 SEWING MACHINE. $5

FIRST PREMIUM and IMPROVED, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented May 15, 1862; Improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with CORDING attachment, is noiseless in operation, sews with a variety of SINGLE THREAD OF ALL KINDS with extraordinary rapidity, making STITCHES alike on both sides of the wheel. HEMMER, GATHERER, RUFFLER, BRIDER, TUCK, AND UP DRAUGHT, &c., &c. Strongest machine manufactured. Warranted not to get out of order in 5 years. It has received the approval of all the principal journals, and of those who have seen it.

With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly does the stitching exactly like hand-sewing.—New York Tribune.

Single machines, ALL COMPLETE, sent to any part of the country on receipt of price, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Sixty delivery guaranteed. Liberal discount to the trade. Address all orders, FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY, 403 and 405 Broadway, New York.

MERWIN & BRAY,

202 BROADWAY,

Manufacturers of the Celebrated Ballard Breech-Loading Rifles, Military and Sporting Styles.

The Rifles carry a ball very long from one half oz. each to 120 to the lb. Material and workmanship of the best quality. They are warranted in every respect.

SOLE AGENTS

for the well-known Eagle Arms Co.'s Cartridge Revolvers, Belt and Pocket size. These Pistols combine four modes of loading, four and discharge, a degree of perfection never before obtained. Are one third lighter than any pistol half than any other revolver of the same weight and size. Also Agents for the Whitney Arms Co.'s Rifles, Pistols, &c., and for the New York Metallic Ammunition Co.'s Copper Cartridges for Pistols and Rifles.

Dealers in Arms and Ammunition of all kinds. Illustrated circulars sent free on application.

202 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

A New Edition Now Ready:

NEW PHYSIOGNOMY—OR, "SIGNS OF CHARACTER," as manifested through 100 Illustrations. By S. R. WELLS, Editor Phrenological Journal. One large vol., Embossed Muslin, $3; Heavy Calf, $5; Turkey Morocco, full gilt, $5. Agents wanted. Please address Messrs. FOWLER & WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

NOW READY—Washburn's Autumn Catalogue of the splendid Flowering Bulbs, containing a list of the choicest Hyacinths, Tulips, Crocuses, Lilies, &c., with full and explicit directions for their culture. It also contains a beautiful colored plate, and many other fine engravings. It will be forwarded postpaid upon receipt of 30 cts. in stamps. Address WASHBURN & CO., Horticultural Hall, Boston, Mass.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, GOBLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.,

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Each package contains a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circulars containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every town in the U. S. C. H. WINSLOW & CO., 338 Broadway, New York.

Profitable employment guaranteed to male and female agents. Address C. H. WINSLOW & CO., 338 Broadway, New York.

WANTED—AGENTS, $250 a month. Male and Female, to sell the GENUINE COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Price only $20. Every machine warranted 5 years. For particulars address H. B. HEGEMAN & CO., 335 Broadway, Room No. 3.

$125 a Month. Sample sent Free. Agents wanted every where, male and female, local and traveling. Business permanent the year round. Address CONKLIN & CO., Brooklyn, N. Y.

$10. Gold and Silver Watches. $10.

We are retailing watches at wholesale rates. Every watch warranted. Send for full and correct timekeeper, patent lever movement, and coin silver hunting-case, by sending $10. Address, for circular, H. ROSKINS & CO., 26 Beekman Street, New York.

DEMOREST'S MONTHLY, the Model Parlor Magazine of the World. Send for specimen number free. Address DEMOREST'S MONTHLY, the Model Parlor Magazine, 473 Broadway, New York.

Kradle, Krib, or Bedd Klose Klasps

Cure in Croup by preventing it. 2 or 4 compose a Set. Mailed free on receipt of price. Ask for Demorest's Best Close Clasps. 28 cents each. W. DEMOREST'S FASHION EMPORIUM, 473 Broadway. Sold at all the house furnishing stores.

For Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Send to Mailed Free. Address Adam Press Co., Patent, 36 and 38 St., New York, and 35 Lincoln St., Boston.

Agents wanted. Extraordinary Inducements. The only bona fide household article for agents to sell. Send for circulars. J. P. HORNE & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

$1500 Wanted, by SHAW & CARR, Biddeford, Maine, or Chicago, Illinois.

$150 A MONTH! New Business for Agents. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

6000 Agents wanted to sell 6 new inventions of great value to families in all parts of the country. Sells 25 cts. and get 50 pages; or 35 cts., and get 80 pages and a sample package of Parlor Ornaments. Brown Bros., Lowell, Mass.

MAGIC BOW AND ARROW. Send 15 cts. for sample to L. P. TIBBALS, 478 Broadway, N. Y.

"How 'tis Done." Whiskers in 6 w'ks. Gambling exposed. Fortunes told. Horticulture. 100 great secrets. Free for 25c. Address Hunter & Co., Hinsdale, N. H.

Important to European Travellers.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST.

BY W. P. FETRIDGE.

A New and Revised Edition (the Fifth Year) of this Valuable Hand-Book is now ready. Large 12mo, Tinted Pocket-Book Form, $2.50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

RESTORE YOUR SIGHT!

SPECTACLES AND SURGICAL OPERATIONS RENDERED LESS NECESSARY THE INVALUABLE BLESSING OF SIGHT IS MADE PERPETUAL BY THE USE OF THE NEW PATENT IMPROVED IVORY EYE-CUPS.

Many of our most eminent Physicians, Oculists, Students, and Divines have put them to the severest test and permanently cured of—

1. IMPAIRED VISION.
2. PRESBYOPIA, or Far Sightedness.
3. ASTHENOPIA, or Weak Eyes.
4. BLEPHORA—Blinking or Watery Eyes.
5. SORE EYES.
6. WEAKNESS OF THE RETINA, or Optic Nerve.
7. OPHTHALMIA, or Inflammation of the Eye.
8. PHOTOPHOBIA, or Intolerance of Light.
9. PTOSIS, or Falling of the Eyelids.
10. MYODESOPSIA, or seeing specks before the Eyes
11. AMAUROSIS, or Obscurity of Vision.
12. CATARACTS, and Other Disorders of the Eye.

ANY ONE can use the IVORY EYE-CUPS without the aid of DOCTOR or MEDICINE, so as to receive immediate beneficial results, and never wear spectacles; or, if using now, to lay them aside forever. Over 5000 certificates of cases where a cure was previously guaranteed, may be seen at our office. We guarantee a cure in every case where the directions are followed, or we will refund the money. For sale by Druggists and Oculists. To receive our TREATISE ON THE EYE by return mail free, send your full address to

Dr. J. ALL & CO.,
Box 701, P. O. 138 Nassau St., New York.

CF For the worst cases of MYOPIA, or NEARSIGHTEDNESS, use our NEW MYOPIC ATTACHMENTS, easily adjusted and applied to the Ivory Eye-Cups. Send for a Pamphlet.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,
Publish this Day:

Bound to the Wheel.

A NOVEL.

By JOHN SAUNDERS,

Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," "Martin Pole," &c

8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.

A very interesting story.—London Sun.

The idea of the hero is original, and very carefully worked out.—London Spectator.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have recently Published:

BATTLE PIECES AND ASPECTS OF THE WAR. By HERMAN MELVILLE. Author of "Typee," "Omoo," "Redburn," "Mardi," "Moby Dick," "Whitejacket," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE HIDDEN SIN. A Novel. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $1 50; Paper, $1 00.

ENGLISHMEN AND ITALIAN BRIGANDS. A Narrative of Capture and Captivity. By C. J. MACRAE. With a Map and several Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

INSIDE: A Chronicle of Secession. A Novel. By GEORGE P. HAMMERTON. With Illustrations by THOMAS NAST. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75; Paper, $1 25.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Australia, Sicily, Spain, Syria, Egypt, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Italy. Fifth Edition. With a Railroad Map corrected up to July, 1866, and a Map embracing Colored Routes of Travel in the seven Countries. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Fifth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $2 50.

CF HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR OCTOBER, 1866.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $4 00
An Extra Copy gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or a Copy and an Extra Copy, at $8 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited Number of first-class Advertisements for their Magazine, at the following low rates:

One Page	$250 00
Half Page	125 00
Quarter Page	75 00

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average, eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year $4 00
One Copy for Three Months 1 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed to every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.

THE BOUND VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Cloth Binding . . . . . $7 00 per Volume.
Half Morocco . . . . . 10 00 "

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for each insertion, and no Extra Charge for certain Advertisements, such Insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

GREAT ART ASSOCIATION,

No. 627 BROADWAY,

(OPPOSITE THE OLYMPIC THEATRE)

This Company, originally organized as

PIKE'S NEW YORK OPERA-HOUSE ASSOCIATION,

Being anxious to bring their business to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion, offer the following unexampled inducement:

TWO DOLLARS

Will at once secure one of the following fine Steel Engravings, which can not be obtained at retail at less than $5—the following plates and copyrights having been secured for the exclusive use of this Association:

"Washington's First Interview with his Wife." From the original painting by Ehninger. Engraved by G. B. Hall. Size, 19 by 25.

"Signing of the Compact in the Cabin of the Mayflower." From the original painting in possession of the late Major-General Phil. Kearney. Engraved by G. E. Perine. Size, 24 by 36.

"Washington's Last Interview with his Mother." A beautiful Engraving by Duthie, from original painting.

And as equal share in the following list of magnificent Oil Paintings and superior Engravings:

"The Surrender and the Valley of Lauterbrunnen." A magnificent painting, 8d by 96, by J. Buller. Valued at $6000.

"Greek Idyl." An exquisite work of art, by Brun, 8 ft. 4 in. by 5 ft. 8 in. Valued at $2500.

"Cattle Market." A superb painting, by Van Marcke, 5 ft. 3 in. by 6 ft. Valued at $2400.

"Cattle and Shipping." An admirable work, by the celebrated Backhuysen, 67 by 85 in. Valued at $1700.

"The Falls of the Inn." By Schelee. 68 by 74. Valued at $1700.

"The Lake Lucerne." One of the finest works of the celebrated Jungheim, 56 by 72. Valued at $2400.

"Herd of Sheep." By Von Lamputten 44 by 60. Valued at $700.

"Virgin of Madrid." A genuine Murillo, and a gem of art. 41 by 49. Valued at $3000.

"Shetland Ponies." By the celebrated Morris. 45 by 65. Valued at $600.

"Penitent Magdalen." By Battoni. 8 ft. 3 in. by 4 ft. 11 in. Finest view at $2000.

"Farm-Yard Scene." "With bull in foreground. A superb painting, by Van Marcke, 50 by 57. Value, $3000.

"Judith with the Head of Holofernes." 61 by 66. By Milner, and the chef d'œuvre of that celebrated artist. Value, $5000.

"Rebecca at the Well." A veritable gem, 46½ by 61, by the celebrated Brun.

"A Forest in Winter Time." With a fox in the foreground. 55 by 80. By Jacobsen. Value, $2250.

"The Lake of Brienz, Switzerland." A chef d'œuvre, by Joseph Baelitz, 47½ by 64½. Valued at $2000.

Two Pendants, representing "Cattle" and "Market View," 54½ by 82 each. Gems of the Dutch school. By Koningh. Value, $900.

"Cattle Scene." 29 by 19. By Gregor. Value, $280.

A magnificent painting of the "Interior of the Royal Palace at Potsdam, Prussia." One of the finest works of the celebrated R. S. Zimmermann. Purchased for $3000.

"The Garden of Gethsemane." One of the finest works of the famous Otto Georgé, 63 by 92, and valued at $2000.

A veritable gem, 48½ by 39, by Goldsberg, after the celebrated Lessing, representing "John Huss before the Clerical Council at Constance, in 1417." Valued at $750.

Another beautiful painting, 43 by 50, by the same master: "Mozart at the Piano." Price, $700.

A magnificent painting, by C. Millner: "Sunset in the Tyrolese Mountains." 69 by 61. Valued at $2000.

Nine Original Italian Paintings, each valued at $500, as follows: "Two Flagellations." "John the Baptist." Nine Original Italian Paintings, each valued at $500, as follows: "Two Flagellations." "John the Baptist." "An Italian Landscape." "The Nativity of Christ." "The Fox and the Poultry." "Lot and his Daughter." "The Crucifixion." "Cupid." St. Elizabeth's Martyrdom."

Seven Superb Engravings, consisting of the following subjects: "The Head Waters of the Susquehanna." "American Autumn Forest Scene." "Winter in the Catskill Mountains." "White Water Lake Scenery." "The Spring Time of the Year." "Sunshine on a Shield Lake." "Winter Scene." The above by distinguished artists. 19 by 25.

"The Sacred Shepherd." A magnificent Italian work, 60 by 54, very old, bought from the collection of the Hon. Francis Thurston, England, and, with several gems of art, brought to this country twenty-five years ago. It has been purchased by the Association as a feature in the art distribution, and is valued by connoisseurs at $3000.

"The Judgment of the Elder." Another antique Italian work, 60 by 54, purchased at the same time, from the same collection of the Hon. Francis Thurston. It is a truly noble painting, and in conception, symmetry, rich coloring, and complete crucible, bears unmistakable evidence of its originality. This and the accompanying picture were purchased from an ancient collection in the city of Venice. Valued at $5000.

"Scene in the Highlands," with sheep and cattle. One of the celebrated Landseer's early productions. 26 by 45. Valued at $1000.

Winter Scene: "The First Snow." 26 by 32. Valued at $375.

"Scene on the Housatonic River." 17 by 24. Value, $250.

"Windsor Castle in the Present Time." With portraits of the Queen and Prince Albert. 21 by 26. Valued at $150.

"The Empress of the French and her Maids of Honor." 23 by 27. Value, $120.

"The Maid and the Magpie." In walnut and gold. 32 by 37. $190.

"Luther Burning the Papal Bull at Wittenberg." 54 by 44. $100.

"Luther Nailing his Protest at the Church Door." 23 by 44. $75.

"Beatrice Cenci" and "Evangeline." Two fine paintings. 19 by 24. $80 each.

"The Past and the Future" and "Hope and Faith." Two ditto. 21 by 25. $70.

"Erin, Farewell." In walnut and gold. 25 by 29. $65.

"Vni Bouheur." In walnut and gold. 22 by 26. $60.

Seven fine engravings, illustrating the following: "The Sheltering Tree." "The Flooded Village." "Monkey Hearing the Cats." "Combat of the Stags." "Chess Cracks." "Self-Love." "Daughter of Eve." The seven valued at $250.

"Raphael's Madonna." In gilt circle, 29 by 29. Valued at $90.

"Raphael Introduced to Leonardo da Vinci:" "Shakspeare and his Contemporaries:" "Sir Walter Scott and his Literary Friends." The above pictures are 24 by 30 each, and have a total value of $180.

"The Destruction of Jerusalem." In walnut and gold. 32 by 46. $160.

"Fairy Tales." 19 by 21. $40.

Three fine paintings, each 28 by 36: "Christ Blessing Little Children." "Christ's Parables." "Bethlehem and the Nativity of Christ." Valued at $75 each.

Fifty-eight Fine Engravings,

IN HANDSOME FRAMES, WHICH WILL CONSTITUTE A PORTION OF THE GRAND ART SALE. The above grand collection may be seen at the ART GALLERY, No. 627 BROADWAY.

The number of Certificates is limited to FORTY THOUSAND, and the books will be closed, without fail,

On November 20, 1866,

When there will be a Committee appointed on behalf of the Shareholders for the great final distribution. The above inducement is offered at a ruinous sacrifice by the Association, and simply in order to close up their business: consequently there will be

POSITIVELY NO POSTPONEMENT.

The mere cost of the Paintings and Engravings was

OVER TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,

As will be sufficiently apparent to all who visit the Gallery, which will be open throughout the day and evening. EF A liberal discount of ten per cent. will be allowed for clubs of five or more.

Communications should be addressed to

F. HUNT & CO., Managers and Directors.

Money by express, draft, post-office orders, in registered letters, can be sent at the risk of the Association. In all cases where exchange are forwarded by Express, these costs must be sent for tubing, and also stamps for return postage on tickets or communications.

Competent General Agents wanted in all the principal cities, to whom liberal commission will be allowed. Good references required.

Tomes, Melvain & Co.,

No. 6 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in English and German Guns, Pistols, &c.,

Sporting Ammunition of all Descriptions,

TABLE and POCKET CUTLERY,

Hunting-Knives, Razors, and Scissors, French and English Jewelry, Military and Fancy Goods, Perfumery, Brushes, Combs, Toilet Articles, &c.

The largest and most extensive stock in the United States.

Sole Ag'ts for [Ely's Cups, Wadding, and Cartridges, Bonbon's Celebrated Army Razors.

Westley Richards's Breech-Loading Fowling-Pieces.

NOW READY.—THE ILLUSTRATED ANNUAL OF PHRENOLOGY AND PHYSIOGNOMY for 1867. 50 Engravings. 30 cents, by return post. FOWLER & WELLS, New York.

THE NEW LIGHT.

Atmospheric Kerosene Lamp; no Smoke, no Smell, no Chimney; and produces a light superior to gas. Now on exhibition and for sale at No. 9 Courtlandt St., north side, one door from Broadway. This is no humbug patent burner affair, but a lamp peculiar to itself, and the only one ever invented that will produce a pure white flame from kerosene oil: it (1) consumes the light of a chimney lamp, and consumes less oil. Country and State rights for sale, and parties purchasing supplied with Lamps and Fixtures at manufacturing rates.

H. DANFORD, No. 9 Courtland St., N. Y.

DISTINGUISHED CHARACTERS.—Bismarck, Archduke Albert, Queen Emma, Joseph Sturge, Horace Vernet, F. N. Gisborn, Cyrus W. Field; a group of Native Africans: Anthropology, Physiology, Psychology, Pneumatology, and Psylogonomy: Beaming Eyes, Impressions, Large Noses, Prenatal Influences; Whom to Elect; Sending Suicides; Phrenology, by John Neal; "Out of Place," by Mrs. Wyllis; "Quack Medicines," Fagging and Flogging, Foreign Affa, &c., in SEPT. NO. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. 15 cents, or $3 a Year. FOWLER & WELLS, New York.

THE

Great Acclimating Tonic.

Wherever HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS, the celebrated American preventive of Climatic Diseases, have been introduced into unhealty regions, their effects in sustaining the health, vigor, and animal spirits of those whose pursuits required them to encounter extraordinary risks from exposure and privation, have been wonderful. In the army the superiority of this article over every other invigorating and alterative medicine has become so manifest where used, that it is relied upon exclusively as a protection against Bilious Fever, Fever and Ague, and Bowel complaints of every kind. The soldiers say it is the only stimulant which produces and keeps up a healthy habit of body in unwholesome locations. For the unacclimated pioneer and settler it is the most reliable of all safeguards against sickness. Throughout the United States it is considered the most healthful and agreeable of all tonics, and altogether unequaled as a remedy for Dyspepsia. The medicinal ingredients are all vegetable, and are held in solution by the most wholesome stimulant known—the Essence of Rye.

"Hostetter's Bitters"

Are manufactured at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and no less than 60,000 dozen bottles are sold annually by druggists.

AGENTS WANTED

To sell an article, patented, that will sell in every house, store, office, city, and county. Large profits to agents. Circulars free. Sample 50 cts. Call on or address C. M. BROWN, 74 Beekman Street, New York.

Brandreth's Pills.

Our theory: Local disease, whether of the stomach and bowels, members of the joints, rheumatic pains, cutaneous eruptions, even dyspeptic complaints, boils, or whatever form such local disease puts on, are so many "PROOFS" of a disordered state of the blood and bowels, which

BRANDRETH'S PILLS

Correct and cure. EXPERIENCE and 40,000 certificates say this is so. B. BRANDRETH.

A GOOD BOOK GIVEN AWAY,

Send a Stamp to ADAMS & CO., Publishers, Boston.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The circulation of THE TRIBUNE being larger than that of any other newspaper, it is of course the most valuable medium in which to advertise. It is read by the most intelligent and enterprising of our population, and advertisers can rest afford to omit inserting their advertisements in THE TRIBUNE.

CIRCULATION OF THE TRIBUNE.

Monday, Sept. 10	Daily	46,125 copies.
Tuesday, Sept. 11	Daily	46,653 copies.
Tuesday, Sept. 11	Semi-Weekly	97,000 copies.
Wednesday, Sept. 12	Daily	46,653 copies.
Wednesday, Sept. 12	Weekly	197,700 copies.
Thursday, Sept. 13	Daily	46,185 copies.
Friday, Sept. 14	Daily	46,010 copies.
Friday, Sept. 14	Semi-Weekly	97,000 copies.
Saturday, Sept. 15	Daily	46,796 copies.
Monday, Sept. 17	Daily	46,250 copies.
Tuesday, Sept. 18	Daily	46,250 copies.
Tuesday, Sept. 18	Semi-Weekly	97,000 copies.
Wednesday, Sept. 19	Daily	46,250 copies.
Wednesday, Sept. 19	Weekly	197,750 copies.
Thursday, Sept. 20	Daily	46,740 copies.
Friday, Sept. 21	Daily	46,585 copies.
Friday, Sept. 21	Semi-Weekly	97,000 copies.
Saturday, Sept. 22	Daily	47,040 copies.

The above is the precise number of copies of THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE printed and circulated during the last two weeks. We shall continue the report from week to week for the information of the business community.

PRICE OF ADVERTISING IN THE TRIBUNE.

DAILY TRIBUNE, 10 cents per line, each insertion.
SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE, 25 cents per line.
WEEKLY TRIBUNE, $1 per line, each insertion. No advertisement inserted in THE WEEKLY for less than $5.
Address THE TRIBUNE,
No. 154 Nassau Street, New York.

Washes Well! Wears Well!

TRADE MARK.

The Genuine Magic Ruffle!

These goods, having the above trade-mark on the Box and Card, are warranted to measure six full yards in each piece, and to WEAR and WASH as well as any made by hand.

THE GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES, still manufactured by the original inventors and patentees, on superior machinery, from the best materials, and under careful supervision, have withstood the tests of ten years' trial, proving the invaluable merits claimed.

Manufactured by THE MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY, 25 Chambers Street, and 464 Broadway, New York.
RUFFLE PLUTING IRONS. HOME-MADE RUFFLES.

PREPARED OIL of PALM and MACE

FOR

PRESERVING, RESTORING,

AND BEAUTIFYING THE HAIR.

And is the most delightful and wonderful article the world ever produced.

It will feed the hair, if not only a certain remedy to restore, darken, and beautify the hair, but also a destructive to the hair falling, as it is highly perfumed, a rich and delicate perfume, independent of the fragrant odor of the oils of Palm and Mace.

THE MARVEL OF PERU,

A NEW AND BEAUTIFUL PERFUME.

The delicacy of this delightful extract, and its wonderful lasting qualities, are unequaled by any thing of the kind known in the world, and have stamped it the highest class of perfumes.

The above articles for sale by all druggists and perfumers.

PRICE 81 PER BOTTLE EACH.

Sent by express to any address by proprietors.

WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE

FOR EXPELLING WORMS.

Remember, it is the only Worm Medicine that can be depended upon. It has had years of trial, and has always been attended with joy by the mothers. Price 25c. per bottle.

For sale by all Druggists, and by T. W. WRIGHT & CO., Sole Proprietors, No. 100 Liberty Street, N. Y.

A Winter Evening's Entertainment.

A SOCIAL CANTATA. Words by SYDNEY DYER. Music by C. A. GRUE. This Cantata introduces the hearty pleasures of the festive winter season, and possesses many attractive features which will recommend it to the most popular taste of the land. ever published. Cloth, $1 25; Paper, $1 00. Sent postpaid on receipt of PRICE by O. DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $10, $16, $25, and $30. Price of an Office, with Press, $15, $30, $40, $45, and $70. Send for a circular to the LOWE PRESS COMPANY, 19 Water Street, Boston.

"The Mamme'h Informer" gives away to every body. Send stamp for it. Courtship made easy. Sent free. Address Professor Fitzgerald, Lowell, Mass. 50 cents. W. C. WEMYSS, 618 Broadway, New York.

FALL FASHIONS

DEMAND

J. W. BRADLEY'S

DUPLEX ELLIPTIC

(OR DOUBLE SPRING)

SKIRTS.

They will not BEND or BREAK like the single springs, but will PRESERVE PERFECT GRACEFUL SHAPE, where three or four ordinary skirts have been THROWN ASIDE AS USELESS. They are the most PLASTIC, FLEXIBLE, and DURABLE SKIRT MANUFACTURED. They COMBINE CONFORT, Durability, and Economy, with that ELEGANCE of SHAPE which has made the "DUPLEX ELLIPTIC" the STANDARD SKIRT OF THE FASHIONABLE WORLD.

FOR SALE in all stores where first-class Skirts are Sold, in this City, and throughout the United States and elsewhere. At wholesale by

J. W. BRADLEY, CADLEY, & CARY,
PROPRIETORS OF THE INVENTION AND SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
97 Chambers and 79 and 81 Reade Streets, N. Y.

GREAT FINANCIAL OPERATION.

"Conversion of Seven-Thirties into Five-Twenties."

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our personal attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

At Reduced Rates. POLLAK & SON, Meerschaum Manufactory, 692 Broadway, near Fourth St., N.Y. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Pipes from $5 upward.

PEABODY'S BREECH-LOADING
MUSKETS, CARBINES, AND SPORTING RIFLES,
FOR METALLIC CARTRIDGES,
Manufactured by the
PROVIDENCE TOOL CO. ARMORY,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

These arms are made in the most perfect manner, are interchangeable in all their parts, and are unequalled for symmetrical appearance, simplicity, accuracy of fire, and strength. They have been received with remarkable favor in our own and several other countries, and can now be supplied in large numbers. Send for descriptive pamphlets and illustrated price-lists, printed in English, French, German, or Spanish.

THE "THUNDERBOLT," Howard's new Breech-loading Rifle. Superior to the Needle-Gun. Only $20 00. FOWLER & WELLS, Agents, 389 Broadway, New York. Circulars on receipt of stamp.

SURE PILE CURE.

Dr. Gilbert's Pile Instrument, for the radical cure of piles, prolapsus, &c., without an operation or medicine, relieves the worst case in minutes, and has never failed to effect a permanent cure. Send for circular. Sold by druggists generally. Discount to dealers. Sent by mail to any part of the United States on receipt of $5.

J. B. Romaine, Proprietor, 575 Broadway, New York.

Autumn is again upon us, and soon Winter will clasp us in his frigid embrace. Beware of Coughs and Colds: they often terminate in Consumption. Cox's Cough BALSAM is a pleasant but certain remedy. It is exempt from Opium among the Children.

50 MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP PER CENT SAVED BY
USING B. T. BABBITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH, or READY SOAP-MAKER. Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or ley in the market. Put up in cans of 1 pound, 3 pounds, 6 pounds, 4 pounds, and 12 pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making hard and soft Soap. One pound will make 15 gallons of soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in the market.
B. T. BABBITT, 64, 66, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 65 Broadway.

JOHN BONNER,
Stock Broker,
22 BROAD STREET.
Government Securities of all kinds, Railway Stocks, and Bonds, Petroleum and Mining Shares, and Gold, bought and sold on commission.

THE best Stereoscopticons and Magic Lanterns and Views for Public and Private Exhibitions are made by JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.
Priced and Illustrated Catalogue of 72 pages sent gratis.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.

A MAGNIFICENT PICTURE, ENTITLED
"HOME AGAIN,"
WILL BE GIVEN AWAY TO EVERY PURCHASER OF No. 71 OF FRANK LESLIE'S
Chimney Corner
This is the most entertaining paper published in the United States. Each Number contains numerous excellent Stories, Incidents of Animal Life, Sketches of Travel, Manners and Customs of Different Countries, Portraits of Self-Made Men, a Fairy Story, Gossip ther Whitehead's Lectures for Little Folks, Family Pastimes, Enigmas, and Charades, all illustrated by Thirty Beautiful Engravings.
FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER contains more entertaining and useful reading matter than can be found in any other paper.
10 cents weekly or $4 per year.
Send 15 cents in stamps, and you will receive No. 71 and picture by return of mail, postpaid.
FRANK LESLIE, Publisher,
New York.

HOMES FOR THE MILLION!

COUNTRY HOUSES, COTTAGES, FARM HOUSES, BARNS, OUTBUILDINGS, GROUNDS, &c.
Three new distinct, practical works. Postpaid by mail.
WOODWARD'S ARCHITECTURE AND RURAL ART. 1867. 178 Designs and Plans. Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 00.
WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES. 150 Designs. $1 50.
MANUAL OF RURAL ARCHITECTURE. 16 Designs and Plans. $1 00.
GEO. E. & F. W. WOODWARD, 37 Park Row, N.Y.

HYDROKONION,
Or new treatment for Catarrh, Throat and Lung Diseases. The most unique medical apparatus ever seen, and the only method ever discovered that rescues Catarrh No snuffing through the nostrils, no injecting solutions, no inhaling poisons, and no exorbitant fees, but a treatment at once original, safe, and effectual, adapted to all cases, and at a price within the reach of all. THE HYDROKONION, complete in case, medicine, directions, &c., is sent by express to any address upon receipt of price, $12. Address or apply to Dr. S. C. PRATT, 679 Broadway, New York.

WANTED Ag'ts, $150 per month everywhere, male and female, to sell GENUINE COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Greatest invention of the age. Price only $15. Every machine warranted 3 years. Address for particulars SHOOM & CO., Cleveland, O.

Future Destiny Made Easy. Fortune-telling Flowers tell the fate of every lady and gentleman as to present and future prospects, health, wealth, and matrimony. Infallible guide. By mail, 61 60.
FORBES & CO., 78 Nassau Street, N. Y. Box 386.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
GRAND SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANO-FORTES.
WAREROOMS, 652 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
(CARD.)
It is with feelings of pride, as American Manufacturers, that we publish the following testimonials, which have been received by us recently.

EUROPEAN TESTIMONIALS,
Received during the Month of August, 1866.

"LONDON, July 26th, 1866.
"MESSRS. CHICKERING & SONS: GENTS.—I have much pleasure in inclosing a document signed by the first composers, musicians, and professors in Europe. I held your pianos in such high estimation (vide my certificate) that I felt it my duty to take one of them with me to Europe, to ascertain the opinion of my professional brethren. The inclosed certificate will prove how unanimous they have been on the subject. I beg to forward at the same time a letter I received from Prof. M. Collard, which, I am sure, must be gratifying to you. I have the honor to be, gentlemen, yours very truly, JAMES M. WEHLI."

"LONDON, January 14th, 1866.
"JAMES M. WEHLI, ESQ.: MY DEAR SIR,—I feel great pleasure in asking you to convey to MESSRS. CHICKERING the expression of my highest approval of their instrument. It is, I consider, not merely the best instrument of America but of Europe. Since I have tried, last one of the finest Grand Piano-Fortes that has ever come under my observation; and the MESSRS. Chickering may well be proud of having turned out from their manufactory an instrument which, for touch, quality, power, and workmanship, it would be very difficult to surpass in any part of the wide world.
"Dear Sir, very sincerely yours,
CHAS. D. COLLARD.[1]
(Firm of Collard & Collard, Piano-Forte Manufacturers, London.)

"LONDON, July 20th, 1866.
"MESSRS. CHICKERING & SONS: GENTS.—I have just been invited by MESSRS. Collard to try a Grand Piano-Forte manufactured by you, and I have no hesitation in indorsing the opinion of my old friend Mr. C. D. Collard, viz., that it is the finest instrument that I ever played on.
"Believe me, gentlemen, most faithfully yours,
J. L. HATTON."

Testimonial from the most Distinguished Artists in Europe to Messrs. Chickering & Sons.

"LONDON, July 25th, 1866.
"Having played upon a Piano-Forte made by MESSRS. Chickering & Sons, Boston and New York, I have much pleasure in testifying to its general excellence
"For sweetness and brilliancy of tone, delicacy of touch, and magnificent power for concert purposes, I consider it a really Grand Piano-Forte, and decidedly the best I have seen of American Manufacture.

"ARABELLA GODDARD,	HENRI HERZ,	J. MOSCHELES,
A. G. OSBORNE,	RENE FAVANGER,	(Professor au Conservatoire de
W. KUHE,	SYDNEY SMITH,	Leipsick).
JULES BENEDICT,	GUSTAV ROCKEL,	S. ARTHUR CHAPPEL,
"H. W. BALFE,	ALFRED GILBERT,	(Director of Monday Concerts,
CESAR HALLE,	LINDSAY SLOPER,	London.)

"I recently had occasion to play on one of Chickering's Concert Grand Pianos. The high reputation of these instruments had already reached me, and the instrument under notice fully sustained the reputation of the celebrated makers. It is distinguished by the fullness, beauty, and noblesse of its tone; by the perfect exactness of the entire scale, and by its action, which is of a most agreeable kind that it gives to the player the most complete mastery of expression in p p to medium and f f. In short, this Piano unites all the advantages of the best productions of the kind, and stands side by side with the most celebrated European instruments."
LOUIS PLAIDY.
"LEIPZIG, August 20TH, 1866.[2]
Certificate from HEINRICH CARL BREIDER, Successor to the Partners of MENDELSSOHN, both in the Conservatorio and as Conductor of the Celebrated "Gewandhause Concerts" in Leipzig.
"I hereby assert and affirm that the Grand Piano-Forte of Chickering & Sons, of Boston and New York, which I have tried and examined, is one of the finest instruments of the class that ever came to my notice.
"LEIPZIG, July, 1866. CARL REINEKE."

Certificate from Y. VON ARNOLD, the Celebrated Russian Pianist and Composer.
"At MR. LEVIT'S, in Leipzig, I have this day (July 24th, 1866) examined a Grand Piano-Forte from the manufactory of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, of Boston, U. S., with concert instruments of seven and one-third octaves, with regard to which I would make the following remarks:
"First. The action is so finely balanced that any gradation of power can be obtained, from the most delicate lightness to the greatest force.
"Second. Between the two extremes of the key-board the vibrations are perfectly equal in graduated power. The 'singing' quality of the instrument (prolongation of sound), especially in the middle octaves, is greatly developed, and is extraordinarily beautiful. The tone is full, uniform, powerful, without harshness, and the ensemble very beautiful.
"Third. Nothing further than this instrument could be desired with regard to power and fullness of tone. In conclusion, it must be acknowledged that this instrument is one of the most perfect Piano-Fortes of our time, namely, as regards tone in general and in the perfection of its mechanical parts.
"LEIPZIG, July, 1866. (Signed.) Y. VON ARNOLD."

Warerooms, 652 Broadway, New York.

THE
GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
Have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Corge Price, the same as the agents only sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show. All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

Price-List.

YOUNG HYSON, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ₱ lb.	IMPERIAL and HYSON, best $1 25 ₱ lb.
MIXED, 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 ₱ lb.	ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 ₱ lb.
JAPAN, $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ₱ lb.	Gunpowder, $1 25, best $1 50 ₱ lb.
OOLONG, 75c., 80c., 90c., best $1 ₱ lb.

MADISON, JEFFERSON CO., IND., September 10, 1866.
Great American Tea Company, Nos. 81 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church, New York:
THIS CLUB'S SEVENTH ORDER.

20 lbs. best Oolong	at $1 00	....	$20 00
10 " best Imperial	at 1 25	....	12 50
10 " best Gunpowder	at 1 25	....	12 50
5 " best Young Hyson	at 1 25	....	6 25
5 " best Japan	at 1 25	....	6 25
Total			$57 50

I received by express this morning the last lot ordered. It gives very general satisfaction. I will have to order more frequently than I have been doing, to keep up a supply. I shall not wait for clubs, but order in advance.
Send by express, and collect on delivery.
JAMES DONNELLY.

P.S.—All towns, villages, or manufactories, where a large number of men are engaged, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to the

Great American Tea Company,
Nos. 81 and 33 VESEY STREET, corner of CHURCH. Post-Office Box No. 5643, New York City.
See Pamphlets, getting up Clubs, &c., see Harper's Weekly, Feb. 25, 1866.—page 654.

"KA-FOOZLE-UM."
DAUGHTER OF THE BARAN, Comic Song.....35c.
THE CUCKOO'S NOTES, Ballet, for violin, 10c.; piano..10c.
NELLIE'S GOOD QUALITIES, Ballad, 35c.; violin, 10c.; piano, 10c.
ORGAN GRINDER POLKA.* for violin, 10c.; piano.....10c.
*Marked with Steel Engraving. FREDERICK BLUME, 366 Bowery, New York, Publisher.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING
B. T. BABBITT'S BEST MEDICINAL SALERATUS, "made from common salt." Bread made with this Saleratus contains no alum, nothing but soda, common salt, water, and flour. No. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

MILLER & CO., 9 Maiden Lane, N. Y.,
Dealers in all kinds of ARMS and AMMUNITION.
Revolvers: Colt's, Remington's, Whitney's, Colt's Model, Cooper's Double Action, Eagle, Smith & Wesson's, National, Ball's "My Friend," including all of the latest improved models.
Rifles: Colt's, Sharp's, Remington's Derringers, also the Original Philadelphia Derringer. Agents for Dickinson's Patent Single-Shot Pistols. Send for Circular.

THE Howe Sewing Machines, lock stitch, for Families and Manufacturers. They are world-renowned. The Howe Machine Co., 696 Broadway, N.Y.

"GET THE BEST WARD'S PAPER COLLARS
For Ladies and Gentlemen. The largest assortment in the New World.
TO BE HAD IN EVERY WHERE.
And at wholesale and retail at the manufactory, No. 887 Broadway, New York.

FRIENDS!
For a Fortune of FIVE to $50,000, and add to a charitable institution, address for details
HARRIS BROTHERS, Boston, MASS.

STEREOPTICONS
AND
MAGIC LANTERNS
For Public Exhibitions. A Priced and Illustrated Catalogue of Stereopticons, Oxy-Calcium Lanterns, Dissolving Lanterns, Magic Lanterns, &c., with views for the same, will be sent free on application.
WILLIAM Y. McALLISTER,
728 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—No. 511.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' CONVENTION AT PITTSBURG.

THE Soldiers' and Sailors' Convention at Cleveland has met the same fate as the Philadelphia Convention of August 14. Neither of these Conventions were successful in their aims. They were, indeed, an expression of sentiments which responded to those of a large portion of our people. But, as the event proves, they did not touch the practical and immediate question before the people. They had their influence, but they did not create a new party. The Democratic party, condemned in every successive election since that of 1860, during the war insisted upon its claims to popular support in a manner extremely offensive to all patriots; and now it has determined to reiterate those claims and calculates upon the prestige of Presidential support as a certain condition to its triumph. But the people have spoken in Maine and Vermont, and their verdict is clearly against trusting to the Democratic party the restoration of the country to peace. The case stands simply thus: the people are compelled to choose between a party which has carried them triumphantly through the most troublous and critical period of our history, and a party whose immediate antecedents excite their most hearty indignation.

It is at such a political turning-point that a Convention of soldiers and sailors has been held at Pittsburg, the assembling of which we illustrate on our first page.

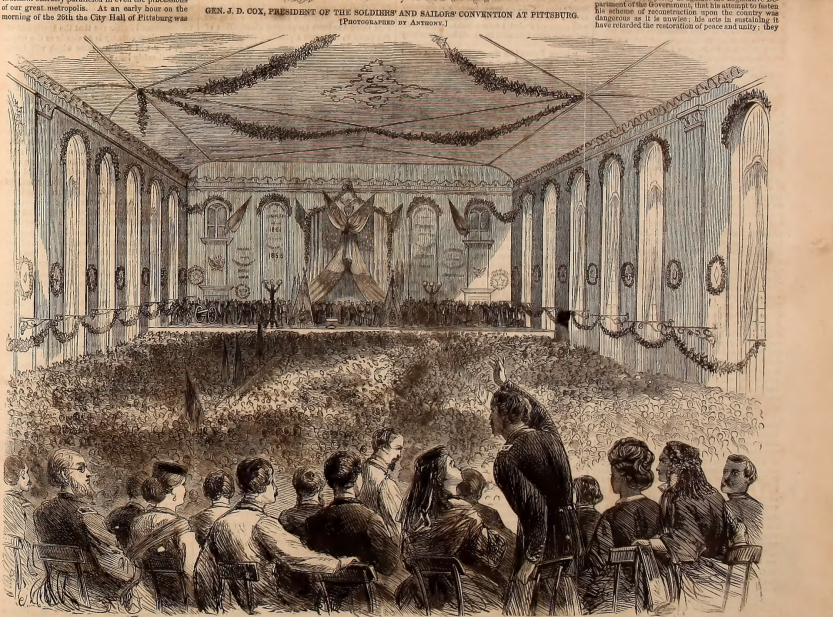
The Convention met September 26. The evening previous there had been a torch-light procession. It was an occasion of popular excitement and enthusiasm scarcely paralleled in even the processions of our great metropolis. At an early hour on the morning of the 26th the City Hall of Pittsburg was thronged with an enthusiastic audience, of whom a good proportion were ladies.

An eloquent speech was made by General MOODY.

At twelve o'clock General NEGLEY called the Convention to order, and General FRANCIS F. BARLOW, after the delivery of a prayer by Rev. CHARVILLE MOODY, read the call of the Convention.

In the afternoon General JACOB D. COX, of Ohio, whose portrait we give herewith, and whose military record has been one of great and deserved distinction, was chosen President of the Convention. He took the chair, which had been temporarily occupied by L. EDWIN DUDLEY, a private of the Thirteenth Massachusetts, and made a brief speech, in which he insisted that Congress had the sole right to determine upon the conditions of restoration.

General BUTLER, Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, reported the following platform, which was unanimously adopted:



Resolved, That the action of the present Congress in passing the pending Constitutional Amendment is wise, prudent, and just. It clearly defines American citizenship, and guarantees all his rights to every citizen. It places on a just and equal basis the right of representation, making the vote of a man in one State equally potent with the vote of another man in any State. It righteously excludes from places of honor and trust the chief conspirators, guiltiest rebels, whose perjured crimes have drenched the land in fraternal blood. It puts into the very frame of our Government the inviolability of the National Debt, and the nullity forever of all obligations contracted in support of the rebellion;

Resolved, That it is unfortunate for the country that these propositions have not been received in the spirit of conciliation, clemency, and fraternal feeling in which they were offered, as they are the mildest terms ever granted to the subdued rebels.

Resolved, That the President, as an executive officer, has no right to a policy as against the Legislative Department of the Government, that his attempt to force his scheme of reconstruction upon the country was dangerous as it is unwise; his acts in sustaining it have retarded the restoration of peace and unity; they have converted conquered rebels into impudent claimants to rights which they have forfeited and place which they have deserted. If consummated it would render the victories of the nation useless, the loss of the lives of our buried comrades vain, and the war in which we have so gloriously triumphed what his present friends at Chicago in 1864 declared to be a failure.

GEN. J. D. COX, PRESIDENT OF THE SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' CONVENTION AT PITTSBURG.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANTHONY.]

MEETING OF THE SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' CONVENTION AT PITTSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.—[SKETCHED BY C. S. REINHART.]

Resolved, That the right of the conqueror to legislate for the conquered has been recognized by the public law of all civilized nations, by the practice of all law for the conservation of the good of the whole country. Congress has the undoubted right to establish measures for the conduct of the revolted States, and to pass all acts of legislation that are necessary for the complete restoration of the Union.

Resolved, That when the President claims that by the old of the army and navy he might have made himself dictator he contented every soldier and sailor of the republic. He ought distinctly to understand that the brief patience of the nation can never be used to overthrow civil liberty or popular government.

Resolved, That the neutrality laws should be so amended as to give the fullest liberty to the citizen, consistent with the national faith that the United States Republican party is pledged to sustain liberty and equality of rights every where; and therefore we tender to all people struggling for freedom our sympathy and cordial cooperation.

Resolved, That the Union men of the South, without distinction of race or color, are entitled to the gratitude of every loyal soldier and sailor who served his country in suppressing the rebellion, and to all their present dark hours of trial, when they are persecuted by the common enemy because they are now and have been true to their Government, we will not prove recreant to our obligations, but will stand by and protect with our lives, if necessary, those brave men who remain true to us when all around are false and traitorous.

Resolved, That, in reorganizing the army, justice to the volunteer officers and soldiers demands that faithful and efficient service in the field ought ever to have place in the army and navy of the Union.

AN ADVENTURE WITH A MUG.

NOT long ago a party of six gentlemen were assembled at a private table in one of the best restaurants hotels in Manchester. Of this number I happened to be one, and the guest of the giver of the dinner. A pleasanter and more social gathering I never witnessed, and although we sat down to the table at a little after six o'clock it was near midnight before we rose from it.

When the cloth was removed and the wines were set on the real enjoyment of the evening began. Toasts, speeches, and stories followed each other in quick succession, and with a brilliancy that I have rarely seen equaled.

Among those present was General I——, a veteran, who had seen service in India until his face was as tronzed as his hair was bleached white by the sun of that burning sky. I was especially charmed with him. He was a frank, outspoken, genial man, and at once gained both your respect and friendship.

It was late in the evening, when some of the company called on him for a story.

"A story!" he said, with a smile. "I am but a poor hand, gentlemen, at story-telling."

"Surely, General," remarked our host, "you have seen too much active service in the East not to have passed through some remarkable adventure."

"Oh, if that is what you want, I can give you. I have had some strange adventures in my life," said the General, thoughtfully. "Let me see. What shall it be? Suppose I tell you of my adventure with a Thug?"

"By all means!" we exclaimed.

"Well, then," began General I——, leaning back in his chair, "you must know that I went out to India in the service of 'the Company' nearly forty years ago. I was a mere lad at that time, being barely eighteen. I left England with a determination to make something of myself in the land to which I was going, and when I reached my destination I began immediately to apply myself to the duties of my profession. I labored hard and soon made progress. I studied closely the manners, customs, and language of the natives, and spared no effort to make myself as thorough an Indian as possible. I wanted to fit myself for my station in the Company's service; for I meant to rise, and I knew that as I had no political influence to sustain me, I would have to depend on my own merits for promotion. It was slow work at first, but I persevered; and when I was forty-three, just fifteen years ago, I was a Colonel of cavalry, and I flatter myself that I was the best-informed officer in the service with regard to the country in which I was serving. I do not say this through vanity, but merely that you understand better what follows.

"About that time the authorities at Calcutta were making strong efforts to suppress the sect of Thugs, who, you well know, are a band of fanatics who make murder a part of their religion. They rarely select a European, on account of the great danger in which it would have placed them, but they carried on a regular system of operations against the natives, and especially against those who were friendly to us. Certain sections of the country were kept in a state of the most terrible anarchy by them, and their atrocities had increased to so great an extent that the authorities thought it necessary to at once inaugurate the most prompt and decisive measures for their suppression.

"In the district of Benares the trouble was very great, and the Thugs managed their affairs with so much dexterity that for a time they completely baffled the authorities. The command of this district was one given to me, on account of my knowledge of Indian affairs, and my long experience in the country. I did not need the letter of the Governor-General to assure me that it was a delicate and difficult task which was assigned me, and that I was expected to discharge it. I accepted the appointment immediately. I was given a regiment of mounted men, picked for their long experience in the country, and at once set out for my new command, being determined to use no halfway measures when I got there.

"Upon reaching the neighborhood of Benares we halted and encamped near the Ganges, about five miles from the city. I had two reasons for doing this. One was, that I would be able by encamping there to move on the instant any occasion required it; the other, that I would be freer there from observation by the spies of the Thugs than I would be in the city. I said nothing, and permitted my men to say nothing of the cause of our coming, but at once set my spies to work. As I have said, I resolved to attempt no half-way measures with the assassins, but to proceed against them with the utmost vigor, and to spare none that offered any resistance to me. In short, I was determined to capture or exterminate them. Such as I captured were to be sent to Calcutta for trial, but it was my intention that these should be very few in number, as I thought the example I meant to set my part would do more to strike terror to the sect than a hundred civil trials and executions.

"By the time I had been there six weeks I had sent ten prisoners to Calcutta with their families, had hung twenty caught in the act of strangling had hung twenty caught in the act of strangling their victims, and had destroyed one of their towns and a temple. With my own hand I broke the image of their goddess Kali into a thousand pieces, age of their goddess Kali into a thousand pieces, knowing that this would be a severe blow to them. This act, together with the rest of my career there, caused me being fatal to me. The Thugs began to consider me the most well as the means of their misfortunes, and at length made me the object of their special vengeance.

"When I had been in camp for about two months my orderly informed me that there was a native waiting at the door of my tent to see me. I had him shown in at once. He was a small, spare man, of about thirty, and my first glance told me that he was possessed of great muscular strength. There was something unusually quiet and stealthy about him, and at first I loosened my pistol and regarded him with a suspicious eye. But he did not seem to notice this, but saluted me humbly and respectfully. In reply to my demand to know his business, he said that he had come to engage his service as a syce. He was well acquainted with the country, and was sure that he could make himself useful. He gave me his name, and told me that his brother had recently been murdered by the Thugs and that he desired to avenge them. I looked at the fellow searchingly, but could gain nothing from his countenance, which was fixed and devoid of expression, save a strange and perplexing glitter in his eyes. He told me that his name was Ali, and that he was a Mohammedan. I said to him that if he would come back at the same hour the next day I would give him my answer.

"After he left me I thought long and seriously of his request. I did not like his looks, but I thought it might be well enough to try him more closely. If faithful, he would make an excellent spy; and I thought myself competent to the task of watching him so closely that he could gain no opportunity to play me false. So, after weighing the matter well in my own mind, I determined to engage him, but not to trust him until he should have been fully tried.

"When I gave him my answer the next day I saw his eyes flash and his lips curl into a smile of mouth. In an instant his face resumed its stolid expression. I was startled by this, and was more than ever resolved to watch the man closely. I gave him simple and easy tasks at first. He performed them with so much skill and celerity that I began to place more confidence in him, and gave him more difficult and important duties to perform. Thus ten days passed away. At the end of that time I went out one morning for a walk a small party to follow up a scent which Ali had discovered. Toward mid-day I chanced to be alone, having sent the men away on different errands. The heat was intense, and I dismounted from my horse and stood for a short while under a large tree to enjoy the shade which it afforded. While standing so, I had been there scarcely ten minutes when a rustling in the leaves above me caused me to look up. I saw a dark figure in the act of leaping on me, and from the handkerchief, which he held ready in his hand, I knew he was a Thug and bent upon my destruction. He was so near and his movements in his movements that he might have succeeded but for a timely interposition. He had hardly descended from the tree when I heard the sharp report of a rifle, and the next instant the Thug fell crashing at my feet. I looked around in astonishment to discover whence came the timely aid. Ali was standing at my feet. I looked around in astonishment to discover whence came the timely aid. Ali was all running toward me at full speed, with his discharged rifle in his hand. He asked me anxiously if I was sure that I was not hurt. I answered him in the affirmative, and then, with a look of intelligence which showed me that my suspicions of his fidelity were unjust.

"I could not help blushing with mortification as he spoke, and I felt deeply ashamed of having suspected him at all. I told him that he should have no occasion to feel hurt at my conduct again, as he had that day proved the full extent of his loyalty that I could desire. I could not see his face as I spoke, for his eyes were bent on the ground, and his head was lowered.

"A week passed away after this and the success which had attended my efforts against the Thugs was unbroken. I could not account for it. My movements were as secret and as energetic as formerly, and I felt sure that we had not yet alarmed the band to a sufficient extent to warrant our departure, but each day recorded new failures for us. Somehow I could not help connecting Ali with this, though even though for the life of me I could not tell why I should do so, and I did my best to banish the suspicion as both ungenerous and unjust.

"Toward the close of the week I sent out a party with a better prospect of success than had been vouchsafed to us during the week past. That night, feeling somewhat worn down by my constant exertions, I retired early without undressing.

"I could not have been sleeping very soundly, for I was awakened by a slight rustling in my tent. I endeavored to spring up, but in an instant I was seized by a powerful hand, and a handkerchief, which is the instrument used by the Thugs in their work, was twisted around my neck. I managed to thrust my left hand between the fold of the handkerchief and my throat, and thus prevented the handkerchief from strangling me at once. By a powerful effort I succeeded in gaining my feet, but the fellow clung to me with almost superhuman strength. I was counted then one of the most powerful men in the army, and I was much larger and heavier than my assailant, but I was by no means as much as I could do to keep him from mastering me. By the dim light of the moon which struggled in through the open door of the tent I recognized in my adversary my native spy Ali. Like lightning it flashed across my mind that the whole affair was a plot. Ali had come to win my confidence and throw me off my guard. The shooting of the Thug a week back had been simply a part of the plot. I knew that I had a powerful and desperate man to deal with, and I nerved myself to the task before me.

"The fellow's grip on the handkerchief was like that of a vice, and it seemed that he would crush my left hand. The strain on my throat was terrible, and I felt that unless I was released very speedily I would be at his mercy.

"A novel and desperate plan presented itself to me in this emergency, and I at once proceeded to put it into execution.

"Bracing myself for a mighty effort, I sank back slowly, as if being overcome, and all at once, with a triumphant glance tightened his grip on my throat, and bent over me until his flashing eyes were just above my face. With a sudden bound I sprang forward, recovering myself and throwing Ali backward. At the same instant I spit, with true aim, a mouthful of tobacco juice directly into his eyes. Thoroughly astounded and thrown off his guard he relinquished his hold on the handkerchief, and with a yell of pain clapped his hands to his eyes. This was just what I had expected, and in another instant I put him out of the way of doing more harm by sending a pistol-ball through his head.

"The next morning the expedition I had sent out returned, bringing two prisoners with them. From them I learned that my would-be assassin was no other than the notorious chief of the Thugs, Ranjbeet, who had sworn to take my life in revenge for the damage I had inflicted upon his sect.

"In a month more I returned to Calcutta, having thoroughly accomplished the work assigned me."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1866.

THE UNION PARTY.

THOSE who are anxious to know the exact policy of the Union party must remember that there has been no general Convention of the party to lay down a platform since the end of the war; and consequently, its policy must be sought in the resolutions of State Conventions, in the action of Congress at its last session ending in July, and in the general tone of the Union press. Looking at such authorities, it is perfectly clear that the present policy of the Union party is the requirement of the following measures as the indispensable preliminary condition to the restoration of the unrepresented States. There is a feeling in one part of the party that it is not altogether wise to insist upon the abolition and Rebel debt as another feeling in another part that no State should be restored except upon condition of equal suffrage. But these are not vital points. The Rebel debt extreme, as for instance the Tribune and the Evening Post, reserving their differences, act with the mass of the party which requires the ratification of the Amendment as the cardinal condition.

Congress, indeed, properly declined to commit its future action by any declaration upon the subject. The Report of the Joint Reconstruction Committee it proposed the Amendment, which, in its judgment, was essential to restoration, and it promptly restored Tennessee upon the adoption of the Amendment. Generally, therefore, Congress said that, in the present condition of public feeling, it was satisfied to limit what it would do as Congress certainly has done. The New York Union Convention, following the lead of Congress, declared that it should be glad to see any State restored which should adopt the Amendment; and, by common consent, the question to be decided at the elections is, whether such adoption shall be required as the condition of restoration?

This policy is practically opposed by the Democratic party only. Its habit of subservicency to the political interest known as "the South" is so strong that it is actually going before the States which have just subdued the rebellion of "the South" upon the proposition that they shall lose political power in consequence of their rebellion. And this party alleges revolution and treason and disunion and tyranny and want of Christian charity upon the people of Virginia, for instance, because they are not willing that Georgia, with a white population of less than 600,000, shall have seven representatives, while Wisconsin, with nearly 800,000 white population, will have only six. This is a more absurd and suicidal platform than the proposition of surrender to the rebellion which the party made at Chicago in 1864. Indeed nothing more clearly proves the loss by that party of the shrewdness which marks a living and hopeful organization than this kind of stupidity. How can a party expect popular support which seriously proposes to the white people of the free States that after 1870 a thousand votes in the late rebel States shall be equal to more than two thousand in the loyal States?

It is not surprising, as the New York Times truly remarks, that, however desirous the loyal people of the country may be to have all the States again represented, they naturally prefer a continuance of the present situation to the renewed ascendency of a party whose servile and reckless subservience to the most atrocious of treasons demands that the people is incompatible with the peaceful permanence of the Union produced the war; which in the midst of the most proposed measures of publication; and which, now that the war is over, insists that those who rebelled shall have gained political power. Finding that this is the alternative, those who, like the Times, counseled another policy than that which the Union party has adopted, still prefer to intrust the Union to its tried friends rather than to its proved enemies. And this again is natural; for our late political history shows that, however unwise some conspicuous and most faithful Union men may be in the general good sense of the party dictates a reasonable, just, and humane policy—a policy which is alike mindful of human nature and of the structure of our political system.

Yet it must be remembered that in times like these convictions rapidly ripen and measures change. Lincoln was rapidly overruled the emancipation orders of Generals FREMONT and HUNTER he said that, in doing so, he did not question the rightful power of the Government to do what they had done; but he was not satisfied that the time had come, and if it should come, he held that he was the proper officer to take the responsibility. The time, however, did come, and very rapidly; and the Commander-in-Chief, who opposed the partial emancipation of his Generals, issued a decree of general emancipation. The present policy of the Union party is the expression of its present conviction. In perfect good faith it proposes to restore the unrepresented States upon condition of their adoption of the Amendment. Their refusal would create an entirely new situation, to meet which there would undoubtedly arise a new policy. But they will not refuse. Two years ago JEFFERSON DAVIS passionately exclaimed that he would rather fraternize with hyenas than with YANKEES. NOW MR. KOSCIUSKO DAVIS is reported saying that not even all radicals are bad men. When the unrepresented States see that the sentiment of the victorious country is as steady as the north star, they will act in the course which will bring them all safely into port.

CARLYLE AND GOVERNOR EYRE.

THE reception in England of MR. EYRE, the late Governor of Jamaica, is curiously illustrative of English character. The accounts of the massacre of the colored population in Jamaica after the troubles had been repressed, the wanton murder of GEORGE WILLIAM GORDON after a mock trial, and the subsequent refusal of the outraged conscience of England compelled the Government to supersede MR. EYRE and to send out a special commission to investigate the facts. After a prolonged and thorough examination the commission reported, and evidently as tenderly as it could. But it was impossible to deny that there had been a severity amounting to cruelty. In a mild-spoken official verdict, translated into plain English, was simply that the measures of MR. EYRE were revolting and inhuman. MR. JOHN STUART MILL proposed in Parliament that he should be brought to trial for the murder of GORDON, and he is the chairman of a Committee to secure justice in the case, and to vindicate the honor of England share the feeling that the honor and humanity of the British name have been indelibly disgraced by MR. EYRE'S proceedings.

In the month of August MR. EYRE returned to England, and a banquet was immediately offered him at Southampton, where he landed. by various gentlemen and public bodies in county. The speeches were by the Earl of CARDIGAN for the regular army, by the Earl of HARDWICKE for the navy, and by other untitled persons for the militia and volunteers; by the Earl of SHREWSBURY for the nobility, and by the Reverend CHARLES KINGSLEY, author of "Alton Locke" and "Yeast," and now Professor of History at Cambridge, for humanity in general. MR. KINGSLEY'S speech was the most atrocious and silly performance of the kind that has been lately known. Its atrocity was in the declaration that he took MR. EYRE "upon trust;" which course he justified by the puerile assertion that "if they gave upon upon trust, especially rulers and official men, there would be nothing in the world but anarchy, which would be followed by despotism, and in due time by a big tyrant who would not take the people upon trust." MR. KINGSLEY'S folly was in his abject snobbishness. He declared that government made of "gentlemen" and political value only to the most sacred of all institutions, the monarchy itself." An English nobleman was in his opinion the incarnate chivalry of Britain. The aristocracy "adopted into its ranks all the genius, all the talent, all the virtue, and he was afraid a great part of the beauty," which was a daring proposition for a Professor of History. Finally, he thought it possible that, "after wider and deeper services" upon the part of Mr. EYRE, the House of Lords might have the honor of welcoming him to their society as "not the least nobleman in that august and ancient assembly." So ends Mr. CHARLES KINGSLEY.

But the saddest fact of the whole is, that at a meeting of the Committee of "the Eyre Defence Fund" THOMAS CARLYLE took the chair—regretting, as he did so, that it was not filled "by some gentleman of power and influence"—his own Sir Jabesh Windbag, for instance. He added that it was the solemn duty of the Committee to attack, by all fair methods, the fallacy that the people of England did not approve the course of Mr. EYRE. Mr. S. C. HALL and HENRY KINGSLEY were of the same opinion. This is the natural consequence of CARLYLE'S deification of mere brute force, and his worship of FREDERICK THE GREAT as a hero. For the question is not whether a magistrate ought to enforce the law at all hazards; but whether, after the suppression of a riot, an exasperated soldiery should be allowed to shoot, hang, burn, and ravage as their pleasure? Honor, decency, humanity, the moral sentiment, are all rose-water and sentimental rubbish to the mind of CARLYLE. The more ferocious inhumanity and remorseless oppression are proofs of a noble and efficient manhood. How CARLYLE will rejoice over the anti-rose-water slaughter of Union men in New Orleans! How he will write dithyrambics to Mayor MONROE and President JOHNSON, and be devoutly grateful that while Thugs do their unbridled pleasure there is still hope for the world! The thanks of the meeting were appropriately moved by an army Captain, and seconded by a Captain in the navy.

The story of such proceedings is a more appalling Latter-Day pamphlet than ever CARLYLE wrote. They reveal the tendency of the British mind to confound ferocity with firmness, and the bloody frenzy of fear with the might of real force. Friendlessness and misfortune are getting to be unpardonable and contemptible crimes; and in fact, however obtained and however employed, the sole admirable quality in human affairs. In CARLYLE'S opinion Ireland ought to be put under water for twenty-four hours. "Quashee" and "Sambo" are noxious impertinences in creation, who ought to be caught, enslaved, and scourged forever. Constitutional government is a mania and a folly. MACHIAVELLI said long ago that a government of the people was an impossibility —and CARLYLE echoes MR. CARLYLE. Resolute, embittered, his mind and heart awry, he strives with his last strength to lead a reaction against Christianity and Civilization, and it is the most tragical spectacle of this time. Conservatism, of course, gladly hails him as its ally; but the struggles of his age can not repair the effects of the stalwart blows of his youth. The spirit of human freedom is which he as much as any man has infused into the better mind of England, animates that powerful party to which the future in that country belongs. He himself has educated those who most surely oppose his present influence. "I believe the working-classes of England would rather there should be no House of Lords than see a man of the Governor EYRE stamp there," said one of the speakers at a meeting to protest against the sentiments of the Southampton banquet.

Mr. EYRE may not be brought to a formal trial; but there is no more doubt that he is permanently disgraced in the estimation of generous and thoughtful and noble Englishmen than there is that Mayor MONROE is morally responsible for the most cruel murders in the minds of honorable and intelligent Americans.

A PULL ALL TOGETHER.

THERE is very general confidence of the universal success of the Union party at the coming elections; a confidence which is based upon the evident popular perception of the simple justice and rationality of the policy of the party. It is confirmed also by all public events. The elections are the most emphatic declaration of the drift of feeling. The tour of the President revealed both the peril and the folly of confidence in him as the leader of a party. Then the Rowan Philadelphia Convention was capped and extinguished by that of the loyal Southerners, and the Cleveland Military Convention was but the glory of the last Pittsburg. Indeed both the JOHNSON civil and military Conventions have already an appearance of trick. The padlock, as Mr. SAM HOUSTON says, is in his picture, was the symbol of the first, and the last was utterly pointless, except in expressing gratitude at a message of approbation from FORREST, whose complicity in the massacre of Fort Fillow has certainly not yet been so fully disproved that Union soldiers should hasten to cheer him.

All these are signs of a profound popular feeling, and a feeling which might reasonably be expected of a people which had revealed its character as it did through the war. But the excitement of midsummer has palpably subsided. That was doubtless the crisis. The massacre of New Orleans settled the President and his policy. The RADICAL PHILADELPHIA Convention was a palpable effort of the Democratic party to resuscitate itself. The Cleveland Military Convention was a political mockshow in which Mr. DOOLITTLE and Mr. LEWIS D. CAMPBELL were plainly visible pulling the ropes, and the nomination of Albany of Mr. JOHN T. HOFFMAN, a Fence Supervisor of the war, was the end of the alliance between the "Conservative Republicans" and the Democracy in that State. The Pittsburg Convention actually decided, because it is seen to be merely a question between the old Copperheads of 1864 and the Union party.

But because of great our confidence, there should be no relaxation of effort. As in 1864, we want not only a majority, but a conclusive majority. It must not be forgotten that the Executive patronage is devoted to the defeat of the Union party, and that it has wisely not been wholly given up to Copperheads. A party is not demoralized by receiving patronage away from it; and the single shrewd action of the President in his own interest has been the retention in office of such members of the party which elected him as will help to carry that means to alienate from their political friends. That all such will sustain him at the polls is very doubtful—and it is doubtful not from the most persuasive method to inspire confidence upon any side. Yet there may be a considerable addition from this cause to the forces of the enemy, and it is truly called a mistake. In any case, the present contest is of the very highest importance. The complete success of the Union party will do more than any conceivable event for the speedy pacification of the country. The time is but short. Only a month remains; and a month of active work, of a joyful charge all together and all along the line, will secure that triumph and the peace which the soldiers won. No man has any excuse for indolence because of confidence in victory. The struggle must end not only in victory, but in a rout of the enemy—a rout as of '64.

GENERAL GRANT'S POLITICS.

IT is very amusing to watch the contest of General GRANT with the politicians. The General is evidently the one American who can refuse to make speeches, and who can receive letters without committing himself. His reticence and brevity are equally remarkable. Of course we are of opinion that every American citizen should have an opinion upon public affairs, and be willing to say what it is; but there is more than one method of saying it. We understand also why the General of the army and the Lieutenant of the Commander-in-Chief should decline to express himself directly upon his Commander's civil policy. And he is said with which he does not directly express himself is truly admirable; while the zeal with which the Presidential orators and journals claim his sympathies for the Philadelphia Convention is wisely tempered with discretion, for it compels the General to say that they do so without authority.

Thus Mr. KERR, candidate for Congress, in a speech somewhere in Indiana, announced the General as a supporter of the President's policy. Proof was demanded, and Mr. KERR produced a letter written to him by General HILLYER, of New York. General GRESHAM, Mr. KERR'S opponent, still doubtful, wrote to General GRANT. The General replied by sending him a copy of a letter which he had written to General HILLYER, of which it may be said that the meaning was perfectly clear. In a letter saying to General HILLYER that he had heard of his letter, General GRANT says: "You nor no man living is authorized to speak for me in political matters, and I ask you to desist from the future." It will be refreshing to see the General again chained for the President's policy.

It is a peculiarity of epistolary correspondence that those which express much often say nothing, and those which express nothing sometimes say very much.

NORTH AND SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE recent political action in North and South Carolina is very significant. The Union State Convention at Raleigh, in accordance with the spirit of the article from the Raleigh Standard, which we recently published, urged upon the Legislature the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment now pending, and recommended the people every where to demand it of their representatives. In the spirit of that amendment it professed its desire to co-operate with any action that the wisdom of Congress and of the Executive may devise for full restoration without "obstinate adherence to any special plan or policy;" and it nominated for Governor General ALFRED DOCKERY, who had no connection with the causes of the rebellion, and had been active in the Union ranks. This is a very rapid and instructive advance of public sentiment; and even if the Union party are not able to carry the election these proceedings show that it is very intelligently organized, and holds an attitude of wise adaptability to events.

The action of the special session of the South Carolina Legislature is not less interesting. It has passed a bill to declare the rights of persons lately known as slaves or as free persons of color. The text of this bill defines their rights as in the Civil Rights bill passed by Congress, excepting the right of marrying at pleasure—a restriction which seems about as unnecessary as any that could be devised. The passage of this bill shows extraordinary good sense. But the fact that the State preferred to originate the law instead of adopting it in the form of the Amendment proposed by Congress, indicates a present unwillingness to conform to the situation, which, we hope, will not long endure. Certainly a Legislature which is willing to do it in one way can not wisely, under the circumstances, refuse to do it in the other; for the Legislature must see that, however wise its action may be in itself, the very object of the Constitutional Amendment is to defend the civil rights of citizens of the United States in whatever State they may reside from the whims or wickedness of the people of that State. When equal civil rights are established in the national organic law, they are safe from any interference; but when they exist merely by the pleasure of a State they may be destroyed at the same pleasure.

But the most advantage of this action of the South Carolina Legislature is that it familiarizes the people of the State with the idea of equal civil rights. It abrogates the special legislation of the past, which against the freedmen, and is the sign of a wholesome conviction that the population of the State can not be permanently divided into two hostile classes. It is plainly the beginning of that true equality both of personal and political right which is the final security of every State; and while it does not in the least modify the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment by South Carolina less necessary, it certainly makes it much easier.

LUNGS.

No organ in the body is so outrageously interfered with as the lungs. The brain is goaded with unnatural stimulants, and the stomach is overtasked and abused, but systematic pressure is not brought to bear upon either of these organs from without. But there is no limit to the lungs in the female, not only preventing them from performing their full function, but repressing their growth, so that they are born of much less volume than they should be to compare with the other organs of the body. The natural proportion in the human machine, for so it may be regarded, inevitably results in disorder, just as it would in any machine in which the most important part were made altogether too small for the other parts.

To appreciate the importance of the lungs as a part of the body's machinery, let us observe their function and the arrangements for its proper performance. The function of those organs is to effect a change in the blood by means of pure air. The blood that returns to the heart from all parts of the body must be sent to the lungs to be thus aerated in order to fit it to circulate again to the organs. If this were not done it would carry death and destruction, instead of life and growth, wherever it goes. But how is the blood aerated? Not by shaking it up with air in a cavity. This would be man's way of doing it. But the Creator has an arrangement which is not less simple and ineffectual. The lungs are a mass of minute air-cells. There are millions upon millions of them. Into these the air is fully introduced at every inspiration, and there acts upon the blood in the vessels spread out upon the walls of these cells, of course through very minute pores. You can also see how important it is that each cell should have its full supply of air in order to perform its work.

Observe now the pains which have been taken in the construction of the chest to secure the free action of all these air-cells, or, as we may term them, There are no organs that so distinctly proclaim in their structure the purpose of the whole as the lungs. They are fully expanded for the introduction of air into the lungs. The cavity of the chest is separated from the cavity of the abdomen below by a large sheet of muscular substance, called the diaphragm, attached all around to the inside of the chest. This is arched upward, forming a membranous dome, and it is chiefly by the flattening of this downward that the cavity of the chest is enlarged, causing the air to rush in through the windpipe to fill out all the little air-cells.

It is plain enough to any one that this apparatus is designed to have freedom of motion, and that arrangements of dress should surely permit this. But fashion prescribes smallness of the waist in the female, and to secure it the lower part only is lower part, thus limiting its capacity, and preventing the diaphragm from having its full action. And so early in life does fashion, and so systematically is it pursued, that the chest and the contained organs are not permitted to attain any thing like their full volume.

Observe now what are the consequences of this constraint. We will suppose that the capacity of the lungs is reduced one-half—that is, that there are one-third less cells in the lungs than there should be. If, then, the other organs attain their usual size with the ordinary intake of respiration, the aeration of the blood must be defective to this amount. But this result does not come in full, but is in part prevented by another injury which the system at large sustains from the same source; for the response of growth in the lungs, lessening the general vigor, represses growth in all the other parts. In such a state of things there is not as much blood in the body as in a vigorous condition, and therefore there is not as much sent to the lungs to be aerated. Still, this general stinting of growth (for such it is) does not so regulate the proportion between the organs as to prevent embarrassment in breathing, and this nature seeks to remedy by increased frequency in respiration, for the tightly corseted lady always breathes more quickly than one whose chest has its natural freedom.

There is another point to be looked at. Growth repressed by pressure will not be a good and regular as natural, unrestrained growth. The air-vesicles, of which we have spoken, will not be uniformly well connected and well arranged. They can not, therefore, do their duty perfectly, and will be liable to disease.

There is another point still. With the chest free the hurried circulation caused by occasional strong exercise is prevented from doing violence to the lungs by the means at command for the full expansion of the chest. But crippled in this respect, injury must be done to the delicate cells, and thus the germs of disease are often planted.

Compressing the chest does harm, then, in two ways—by causing a tendency to diseases in the lungs themselves, and by impairing the general vigor.

We think it ridiculous and cruel in the Chinese mother to repress the growth of her daughter's feet, but is it really as much so to repress the growth of lungs? Is the organ are more important? Which by their disability most affect the general health? Let American mothers consider whether they do not go beyond the Chinese in foolish and cruel obedience to the mandates of fashion.

LITERARY.

"Spanish Papers," in two volumes, by WASHINGTON IRVING (published by HURD & HOUGHTON, New York), a collection, for the most part, of miscellaneous papers left by WASHINGTON IRVING at his death, and only partially prepared for publication, which his nephew PIERRE IRVING has edited and presented to the public, to complete the series of IRVING'S works. Some of the papers have appeared before in periodicals, and a book containing a few of them was published some years ago, but is now out of print. The matter is semi-legendary; but is not, therefore, of any less historical value. The legends of a romantic people are valuable not merely as myths, but as a relex of its history during that period in which legends and tales are blended together in such a way that it is hard to tell where the former end or the latter begin. And all who have read the "Alhambra" of Washington Irving will admit that a narrative told by this most graceful of American authors gains rather than loses in interest from the peculiar guise in which it is presented. We find in these papers the same fidelity to his subject, and the same graces of style, which have made all of IRVING'S work so popular.

AN ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The Editor of Harper's Weekly acknowledges the receipt of excellent photographs of the Ruins of the Bridge of Johnstown, Pennsylvania, from BRADY & CO.'s National Photograph Gallery, 352 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington. This favor, one of very many received from all parts, was unfortunately came too late to be made available; but our thanks are none the less due to BRADY & CO. for their courtesy.

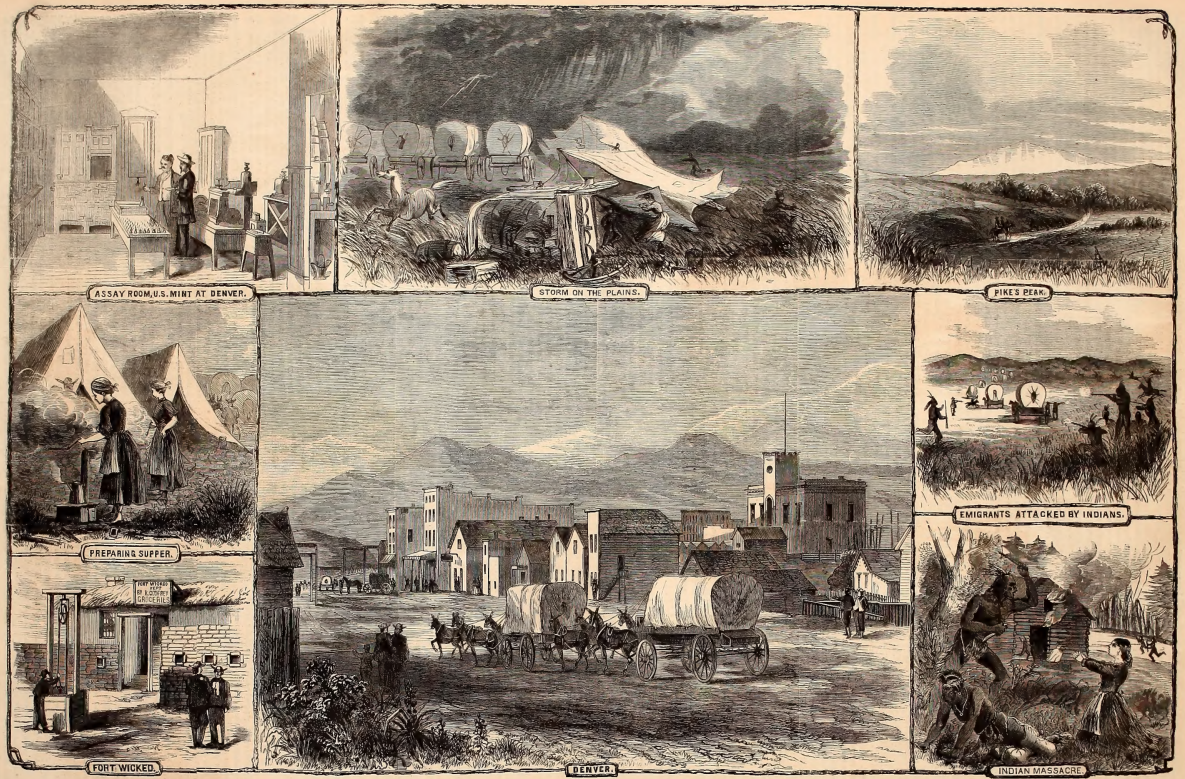
DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS ITEMS.

The President has appointed Hugh Ewing, of Kentucky, to be Minister Resident at the Hague.

General Dix took formal possession of the New York Custom-House on the 1st inst., and assumed the duties attached to his new commission as Naval Officer of the port.

The Augusta (Maine) Farmer of September 27 says: "On Monday of the present week—a few days—three weeks from the day of the great fire in this city in September, there be workmen, by direction of the rulers of the Stanley House, found that the bricks at the bottom of the chimney are as hard as a rock—it impossible to handle them. The cost that was to the cellar was also seen in the heat. Portions of the latter, and also of the bricks, were, when brought into our office, too hot to be retained in the hands."



Hon. John Minor Botts had a narrow escape from being killed at the railroad depot in Newark, New Jersey, on the evening of September 26.

W. J. Valentine has been associated with Professor Morse as agent for the United States Government from Massachusetts to next year's Paris exhibition.

The Government contractors have finish a section of the "Original Big Tree" to the World's Fair at Paris in sail for the Marquess to be shipped there, for want of a saw long enough to cut it. The cutting will require a saw 40 feet long.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Ocean Telegraph gives us dispatches up to Friday, September 28. Denmark is certainly ill. Prussia can ill afford to spare at this time the services of the bold and unscrupulous statesman, the Prussian Chamber of Deputies has passed the loan bill, the minister having been to a proposition of 20,000,000 thalers. The Diet has been prorogued. It is reported that Spain has accepted the mediation of France and England between herself and the South American Republics. A Military Commission has been sent by the Italian Government to Venetia to take possession of war materials. The Archduchess Carlotta is visiting the Pope at Rome. Great Britain is still dispatching troops to Canada. Advices from Paris by the Cuba's mails state that the Marquis de Gallo got goes as Civil Commissioner with General Castelnau to Mexico. A dispatch from Madrid says the Spanish Government have been informed that the negotiations are conducted by the United States Government to bring about a peace between Chili and Spain were progressing favorably.

LIFE ON THE PLAINS.—From Sketches by Mr. James F. Gookins.—[See Page 654.]

LITTLE AZURE BLUE.

ONCE upon a time a poor bird-catcher was wandering along a stony, dangerous path up the Montagne Noire. His cloak was torn, his shoes were worn out, his knapsack was empty. He carried a number of cages tied together, but they were empty too, and he walked with the slow step of a tired man who has lost heart, and harshly cares to reach his journey's end. Otherwise he would have been afraid to linger so late on the Montagne Noire, where witches and wizards had their head-quarters, and all manner of evil spirits reside. That day, and many before it, he had not sold a bird or a cage; indeed the birds seemed to have fled out of the land, and the inhabitants would have been glad to do the same if they could, war and famine were so sore in it. He walked slower and slower, and at last he sat down, and looked from the mountain side far away across the country, where the sun was setting the color of a marigold in a pale sky; but he saw nothing; for his eyes were full of tears. The last sunbeams shone through them, and so dazzled him that a tall, grave man in a flowing brown robe was close to him before he had noticed him. The bird-catcher started, thinking of sorcerers and spirits who take deceitful shapes; but he looked again, and made up his mind that this was no sorcerer but a good monk. He held out his hand, asking charity in a hasty, ashamed way.

"Thou hast an honest trade and shouldst take shame to beg," was the answer, while the newcomer looked gravely down upon him.

"Alas! holy father, who is there to buy my cages or my birds? You know yourself that the Spaniards have burned our towns and wasted our fields, and now the plague is on us."

"Alas! it is too true," said the monk, sorrowfully, "and the rich oppress the poor, and the poor have no pity upon one another. But if you, Raymond Caylon—"

"You know my name!" exclaimed the bird-catcher, alarmed, and for a moment again suspecting sorcery; but his eyes sank ashamed as he met the grave, lofty look of the monk, who without answering his question went on: "When it is in your power to help others, remember what you felt in your own need. Show me your cages."

"This is the largest and best made."

"Return home; it is a league hence; but take courage, good news is waiting for you there. As soon as you arrive open the window, set the cage on the table, and say, 'Little Azure Blue, do your duty.' Farewell, Raymond Caylon."

Raymond would have caught at the brown floating robe to detain the monk, and ask a dozen questions, but it vanished out of his grasp, and only a few drops of dew remained in his hand. The monk was gone, and no trace of him was left; but Raymond fell on his knees among the evergreen oaks, and crossed himself in awe, for he knew now that he had seen St. Stapier.

You may be quite sure that he hastened home as fast as he could; have you never yourselves forgotten that you were tired and out of heart when some unexpected delight has proved to be awaiting you? Without stopping to rest a moment after he had reached his cottage, he put the cage on the only table in it, and said, in a trembling voice, "Little Azure Blue, do your duty." In a moment a sky-blue bird came flying in, perched in the cage, and began to sing a song so wild and sweet that there are no words to tell what it was like. And while it sang the table became covered with dainty dishes, fish and game and fowl, a roasted peacock, a boar's head—dishes which only nobles ate of, and they not every day. Raymond stood gazing, too much amazed to eat; he only repeated "St. Stapier! St. Stapier! St. Stapier!" like one out of his wits, till hunger reminded him sharply that these good things were there to be eaten; and then he was about to fall to, when the thought of all the poor starving creatures in the village, as hungry as himself, crossed his mind, and he hurried out to bid them to the feast, as the good saint had enjoined him. The cottage was soon more than full; men, women, and children came, lean and pale with long want, but their great wonder almost took away their appetite. They eat on the floor, they crowded round the table, they stood outside, and there was abundance for all. Such a day had never been known in the village, even in the good old days before the Spaniards wasted the land, and the sire de Chaufontaine became their seigneur. A murmur run through the little crowd that surely the lord of Chaufontaine would hear of this marvelous bird, and then—! But Raymond said that St. Stapier would surely protect his own gift. While they were yet speaking of this matter low and anxiously, like oppressed men, the sweet song of the bird suddenly ceased; it spread its blue wings and was gone in a moment. All looked on dismayed, all wondered whether it would ever return again; but Raymond's faith in St. Stapier was firm, and he assured them that the next day Azure Blue would provide another feast. And he was right. Day after day the whole village was fed; day after day Azure Blue sang his magic song, till a good harvest had brought back plenty to the country, and the Spaniards and fever had both left the land. And then, and not till then, did the seigneur of Chaufontaine hear of the gift which St. Stapier had made to Raymond Caylon.

THE TIRED BIRD CATCHER AND THE MONK.

No one ever heard who betrayed the secret kept so long, but one day a squire came from Chaufontaine with an order that Raymond should follow him instantly, with his cage, to the presence of his master. Raymond trembled as he unwillingly set out; all the villagers stood sorrowful at their doors and watched him go by for they were sure that, even if he came back safe, it would be without the precious cage. The sire de Chaufontaine locked grim when Raymond came before him. "Is it thou," he cried, "who hast kept this treasure to thyself all these months past? a treasure not fit for peasants, for whom black bread and chestnuts are too good. It was thy duty to have brought it to me—thy lord! Thou dost merit death for this base knavery; but none can say that I am an ill lord; fix thy price, and it shall be paid thee."

Raymond looked helplessly dismayed. Not a vassal far or near dared disobey the sire de Chaufontaine; yet he faltered out, "My lord, I may not barter away the gift of St. Stapier!"

"Fool!" answered the baron. "Hast thou heard of my chamber of roses?"

Too well did all his vassals know that name; some had seen the inside of that dungeon deep down in the old gray tower of the castle, where the baron tortured poor wretches who had displeased him. He called it in cruel mockery his chamber of roses, and laughed to see the bird-catcher turn pale.

"Choose!" he repeated; and Raymond seeing there was in truth no choice, hoped that St. Stapier would forgive him—surely he would if he knew the sire de Chaufontaine—so asked boldly for the Mill of Croissac in payment for his cage.

"No more?" laughed his lord. "That shalt thou have; and here is my notary to draw up a deed of gift. Master notary, write that the Mill of Croissac belongs to Raymond Caylon and his heirs forever, and make it sure."

The baron put his large seal at the bottom of the parchment, and Raymond went away, on the whole well pleased, though he had left the cage behind him. Scarcely was he gone when the sire de Chaufontaine sent messengers all over Languedoc to invite his noble friends to a banquet where one single bird should furnish the feast. They came from far and near; the hall was decked, the tables covered with dishes, but all empty; the guests stood in wonder looking at their host. "Silence, noble lords," he said. "Listen!" and placing the cage on the table he shouted, "Little Azure Blue, do your duty." There was a deep silence of expectation. Suddenly through the open window with a great noise of wings entered a gray bird; its eyes were yellow and large, its beak and claws sharp. It perched in the cage, uttered three loud shrieks, and went as it had come.

ACADIANS HAULING BOATS—A SCENE ON THE BAYOU LAFOURCHE, LOUISIANA.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 634.]

There was no feast at Chanfontaine that day; the guests went away hungry, leaving the baron in such a rage as no one had seen him in before, which is saying much. Doubtless he would have been revenged on Raymond Cayion, but he had not time. He fell ill of some unknown sickness that day, and died before the week's end. And the Cayions are still at the Mill of Croissac.

JANETTE'S HAIR.

"Oh, loosen the snood that you wear, Janette,
Let me tangle a hand in your hair, my pet—"
For the words as he had no distinter might
Than your brown hair veiling your shoulders white.

As I tangled a hand in your hair, my pet.

It was brown with a golden glass, Janette,
It was finer than silk of the floss, my pet;
'Twas a beautiful mist falling down to your wrist,
'Twas a thing to be braided, and jeweled, and kissed—

'Twas the loveliest hair in the world, my pet!

My arm was the arm of a clown, Janette,
It was sinewy, bristled and brown, my pet,
But warmly and softly it loved to caress,
Your round white neck and your wealth of tress,
Your beautiful plenty of hair, my pet.

Your eyes had a swimming glory, Janette,
Revealing the old, dear story, my pet,
They were gray, with that chastened tinge of the sky
When the trust hope quickest to grasp the fly—
And they matched with your golden hair, my pet.

Your lips—but I have no words, Janette,
They were fresh as the twitter of birds, my pet,
When the spring is young, and the roses are wet
With dew-drops in each red bosom set,
And they rifled your gold-brown hair, my pet.

Oh, you tangled my life in your hair, Janette,
'Twas a silken and golden snare, my pet;
But so gentle the bondage my soul did implore
The right to continue your slave evermore,
With my fingers enmeshed in your hair, my pet.

* * * *

Thus ever I dream what you were, Janette,
With your lips, and your eyes, and your hair, my pet;
In the distress of desolate years I mourn,
And my tears fall bitterly over the stone
That covers your golden hair, my pet.

MILES O'REILLY.

UNEASY SHAVING.

I WONDER whether a man is more likely to be sleepless on the night before he is married or on the night before he is hanged? I have experience in only the more blissful of these two kinds of anticipation; but I confess that the night before I was to be joined to my beloved Julia in the bonds of wedlock was one of the most restless I ever passed in my life. I am a timid man, a nervous man, a man ever painfully conscious of all his defects and deficiencies, but never before had I felt such a poignant regret that I could not add a couple of inches to my stature; and when I reflected that I had never had the courage to reveal to Julia a carefully-concealed bald spot on my head, which she would now be sure to discover, to my shame and confusion, my remorse was terrible.

I got up in the morning at a not very early hour, and dressed myself with scrupulous care in garments which, though by no means of overpowering magnificence, were unmistakably suggestive of matrimonial intentions. But when I attempted to shave, my hand shook so as to make it likely that the operation, if persevered in, would be unsatisfactory. My beard grows with a strength and determination which no one acquainted with my character would suppose possible unless he saw it. My beard is also of a dirtyish yellow color. I could not proceed to church to meet my bride without having it closely removed. I therefore determined to step into some barber's shop and get it done. And so I made my breakfast with what appetite I might, put the license into the ring into my pocket, and set out for the town where Julia lived.

This town was about twenty minutes by rail from our village. I arrived there in very good time, and Julia and I had agreed that our wedding should be as quiet as possible; and it had been arranged that I should walk alone to the church, while she should proceed thither in a carriage, accompanied only by an uncle and a younger sister. My way to the church led by Julia's door, and, so much was I engrossed by thoughts of the coming ceremony, that it was not until I had arrived at that point that the sight of a barber's pole on the opposite side of the way reminded me that I had not yet got shaved. I glanced at Julia's window, but I was so early that no one was visible, and there was as yet no sign of a carriage at the door. I looked at my watch and stepped into the barber's shop.

The window of the shop fronted the street, but the door was up a little court by the side—so that, as the barber subsequently confessed to me, a couple who, when I entered, I could not see the barber's face, neither did the barber see me. It seemed as if he did not hear either; seating myself in a chair in the middle of the shop, and placing my hat on a form, I said, in a mild tone of voice: "I want a shave, if you please."

The barber did not move, and the expression of his countenance—as far as could be inferred from an inspection of the back of his head—was one of melancholy abstraction.

Again I said, in a somewhat louder tone: "I will trouble you to shave me, if you please."

Still the barber did not move.

Surprised at this, I called out in a sharper manner: "I want a shave!"

The barber, with a callous indifference to all precedent, remained unmoved.

I fancied he must be deaf, and next time concentrated all the power of my lungs—which would have otherwise been diffused over a whole sentence—into a most emphatic pronunciation of one word: "Shave!"

This unwonted firmness of policy produced its effect, and the barber turned toward me.

He was a tall young man, slender but well built, tolerably good-looking, with a dark mustache, but without whiskers or beard; his eyes were large and well opened, but appeared, as he first looked toward me, as if they saw nothing of me, or my beard, or any thing else. One would have supposed that he had never heard of shaving before.

I thought all this very queer, but still supposing that he must be deaf, I put my hands to my mouth, so as to form a natural speaking-trumpet, and bawled out as loudly as I could:

"I want a—shave! And please to—make haste! I have a pressing—engagement!"

In a moment his eyes flashed with a strange light. Advancing toward me with a bound he seized a chair, set it down with most unnecessary violence opposite to mine, flung himself into it, and, leaning forward with his hands on his thighs, eyed me over, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot and back again, as if I had made a most extraordinary request: "You want to be shaved?"

I was beginning to be alarmed at all this, and only thought now of beating a retreat; so, taking out my watch, I said: "If—a—I think of it, but I fear I have not time now. Good-morning."

And I rose to go away.

But the barber rose also; and, pressing me back into the chair by main force, stood over me with one hand on each of my shoulders, while I looked up at him in utter terror and astonishment.

"You came into this shop," said he; "you came into this shop to be shaved?"

"Yes—a," was all I could stammer out.

"And by me?"

"Well, I—I suppose so."

"Then haste me," cried he, "but I'll do it!"

Stepping to the door, he locked it in the most determined manner, and put the key into the pocket of his light linen jacket.

I rather take credit to myself that I did not faint away at once; but that, on the contrary, I began to consider my danger more. The barber was certainly mad, but perhaps I might be able to pacify him, and induce him to let me go; or perhaps some other customer might come, and I should somebody would come! I looked through the window, but the street was quiet and still. A dog lay basking in the sun; a horse seemed to doze over the sleepy where he was tied to the door of a public house next to Julia's dwelling; but scarcely any body passed, and nobody came to be shaved.

The barber went to the little fire-place, took up a pot of soap-suds, and stirred them round with a savage earnestness which I have never seen equaled, and then stropped a razor with such ferocity that I thought my last hour was come. My knees trembled, and a feeling of faintness came over me.

When I had somewhat recovered, I saw the barber again seated in the chair opposite to me; and in him our eyes met. "Sir," I began, "I assure you I have the utmost confidence in your skill; but time, my dear Sir, time—" There was not much time to waste if I was to be married, instead of murdered, that fine morning.

"Time!" cried the barber, with a dreadful flourish of his razor, "time was made for slaves!"

There was something reassuring in this last observation, which I remembered to have heard at a convivial meeting. Certainly, thought I, a barber might not be wholly devoid of human sympathy, I determined to tell him on what errand I was bound, and, in as wheedling a tone as possible, I assured him as I could, and with an attempt to appear jocose, which, I think, was highly creditable to me under the circumstances: "Why—a—the fact is, between you and me and the post, that I am on my way to be married, and that it is time for me to be at church. Ha, ha! I dare say a couple was I expressed by thoughts of the coming ceremony, that I was not until I had arrived at that point that the sight of a barber's pole on the opposite side of the way reminded me that I had not yet got shaved. I glanced at Julia's window, but I was so early that no one was visible, and there was as yet no sign of a carriage at the door. I looked at my watch and stepped into the barber's shop.

The window of the shop fronted the street, but the door was up a little court by the side—so that, as the barber subsequently confessed to me, a couple who, when I entered, I could not see the barber's face, neither did the barber see me. It seemed as if he did not hear either; seating myself in a chair in the middle of the shop, and placing my hat on a form, I said, in a mild tone of voice: "I want a shave, if you please."

The barber did not move, and the expression of his countenance—as far as could be inferred from an inspection of the back of his head—was one of melancholy abstraction.

Again I said, in a somewhat louder tone: "I will trouble you to shave me, if you please."

Still the barber did not move.

Surprised at this, I called out in a sharper manner: "I want a shave!"

The barber, with a callous indifference to all precedent, remained unmoved.

I fancied he must be deaf, and next time concentrated all the power of my lungs—which would have otherwise been diffused over a whole sentence—into a most emphatic pronunciation of one word: "Shave!"

"Quite a mistake," cried the barber; "quite a mistake, I assure you. Never was there a greater fallacy." Married with that beard? Perish the thought!"

Throwing a cloth over my shoulders, he at once began lathering away with prodigious rapidity—lathering not only my chin, but my cheeks, my nose, my ears, my throat, my nostrils, my teeth, my forehead, to the very roots of my hair. My eyes alone he suffered to escape around them with as much care as if he were an artist painting a delicate picture.

Under this infliction I saw the carriage drive up to Julia's door, and presently drive off again in the direction of the church; while through its window I saw a fleeting vision of two white veils and a white waistcoat.

Two or three women came out of their houses to look at the carriage, but otherwise the street remained quiet, the dog still lay basking in the sun, the horse kept on going to sleep outside the public house door, nobody was hurried, and nobody came to be shaved.

At that moment I saw a man walking on the other side of the street. He looked at the barber's pole; he paused; he passed his hand over his chin; he was a dirty-faced man. I could see, even from that distance, that he had not been shaved for a week; surely, surely, he would come, and I should be rescued. He looked at the barber's window, and stood outside the window. He was coming! He paused again. He put his hand into his pocket, took out some pence, looked at them. He shook his head. He recrossed the street, and went into the public house. I suppose he spent his money in beer. Oh, the fickleness of inconstancy!

Still the barber lathered away, as though he would never cease, using the brush now with the light hand, now with the heavy.

Another man stopped in the street and looked at the barber's pole; he, too, passed his hand over his chin. He paused; he looked at the barber. This man had on a cleanish shirt and an average hat. My heart bounded with hope. Surely such a respectable man would not pass by an unshaven acquaintance. Surely such an exemplary man would come to be shaved. He, too, put his hand to his pocket, but looked at pence, and took out a twist. He looked at his watch and seemed startled. He shook his head and passed on.

And the dog still lay basking in the sun, and the horse kept going to sleep outside the inn door, and few people passed by, and nobody came to be shaved.

And still the barber kept lathering away at me, as if it is if the lather must be an inch thick upon my face, and my countenance became ghastly. I became sick and faint, and there was a buzzing noise in my ears, as if I had been under water.

The barber left off lathering me, and the shaving-brush—both he and his soap-suds were pretty nearly exhausted—but he took the razor and passed it once or twice over the strop, and then, pulling a handful of hairs from my head, tried the edge of the blade upon one of them. The hair was split, and the razor was pronounced sharp enough. He left hand and took hold of my nose; he held my nose much more tightly than the exigencies of the occasion required, but my nose was about in every direction, he elongated and compressed my nose as if it had been made of gutta-percha. The pastime seemed to afford him great satisfaction. He forced myself to grin, as though it were a capital joke. At length he ceased and advanced the razor. It was a terrible moment. The barber stared at me, and then again seated himself in the chair, and said in a more conversational and easy tone than he had before used:

"Perhaps—perhaps you think I am mad?"

This, if any, was a time in which a little white lying was warrantable. I said:

"Oh dear no, my dear Sir, quite the contrary—a little eccentric, perhaps," and I forced a smile, "but nothing more!"

"Oh, if you did," said he, lightly and airily, "you would not be the only one. Many have feared the life of many a person, themselves inclusive, have formed that erroneous opinion. But woe to him, and he brandished the razor—" was to him the windows and doors of his mind! You—you do not consider me mad; eh?"

"My dear Sir," said I, "how can you suspect such a thing for a moment? On the contrary, I consider you the most perfectly sane and sensible person I ever met."

"Good. And my conversation is both instructive and agreeable to you?"

"Highly so," I replied. "I should like, above all things, to spend the whole afternoon with you. But at present—I am very sorry, but I —I fear I must be going. In fact, that pressing engagement which I mentioned—"

The comparative mildness of his manner had emboldened me to make this further attempt to escape; but it did not succeed.

He gave me a look which again made me shrink into myself, and said:

"As it is well known, and fully understood both by me and by yourself, that I must and will shave you, it is right and proper that I should, before commencing that difficult and delicate operation, explain to you the precise position in which we stand. I perceive that, unfortunately, you treasure a good deal of unnecessary hair. You have a considerable mole on one cheek, and one or two dangerous-looking pimples on the other. I fear," he shook his head, "I fear that these little disturbances may cause most serious, if not fatal, difficulties. It appears to me, then, that, before commencing the serious task, it will be advisable for me to relate to you a portion of my history, so that you may understand the perilous position in which we are placed."

"Know, then," said he, "that at a former period of my existence I had a shop of a similar kind to this. It was a thriving business, and my profits immense, overwhelming. As the customers stood waiting for their turns they were packed as thick as herrings in a barrel. They were mostly coal-heavers. Coals are beneficial to the growth of beards, though detrimental to razors. Can it be wondered at that my arms grew feeble and my eyelids heavy? I had no assistants—I always scorned assistance. I was happy, for on the morrow, on that very Sunday which was so close at hand, I was to wed my Jemima. O Jemima! It was half past eleven o'clock, and it seemed as if I were to have no more customers that night. But I did not close until twelve, and my razors were all blunted; so I determined to get one of them thoroughly sharpened before I shut the shop. I took one, and honed it, and lathered it, and stropped it until it was in wonderful order, and fit to shave the down from the cheek of a peach. This razor that I have just prepared for you is the nearest approach to it that I have ever seen."

He looked the razor a few times with the pale of his hand, and resumed:

"It was close on the stroke of twelve. I put up the shutters, and neatly closed the door. I was about to turn off the gas, believing that work was over for the night, when one more customer entered—a man like myself. I had shaved him before. He was a little old weazen man. He was the clerk of the parish church, to which I sometimes went. His throat was long and sinewy, and its larynx was very prominent. The larynx of your throat," and the barber stepped back a pace and looked at me with the air of a connoisseur, "is remarkably prominent. The old clerk was very angry. I apologized and began again. In an instant, in a moment, a sudden chokingfit of anger seized him, and I feared that I could withdraw my hand his throat came forward with a violent jerk against the keen edge of the razor, and the blood came pouring out. He fell down in a wet heap on the floor, and was dead almost directly!"

The barber paused, and pressed his hand to his head. I was horribly startled at the dreadful accident in the tale. I had expected something mournfully sentimental about Jemima.

He continued, and his manner again became excited:

"I fled at once; fled all night, all next day, for a week, for a month. For six months; straight on, straight on, through fire, water, wind, and snow, fog, mist, thunder, sods-water, and treacle. But the pursuers were on the track, for, before the last mind, I heard them coming. I escaped them. The means by which I escaped I shall never reveal, as I may want them again. A constant escape is averse to this town. I came, concealed in the steam of an express engine. This shop was to be let. I took it. I was constrained upon my profession and upon my features. No one suspected me. Last night was the Tower anniversary. As it approached I felt that I must commemorate it. But I did not go to bed. You would not have had me go to bed, would you? Very well, then, don't look as if you would. I was alone in the shop. From half past eleven to twelve I employed myself in stropping a razor—this one—as I had done then. At the stroke of twelve I put out the gas, closed the door, closed door, and seated himself in the chair where you now sit. I could not help myself. I advanced to shave him. But he confronted me boldly, and in the same creaking voice in which he used to say Amen, 'To-morrow one customer will come into your shop. Defy me, and he is lost!' Those were the very words as you shaved ME!" He pointed to his throat, and vanished. I have been thinking over the matter, and have come to the conclusion that I am not necessarily bound to cut your throat. I did not cut the old man's; he did it himself; and therefore I think that I may yet be well. If I can shave you without drawing a drop of blood you will escape. But if I accidentally cut you, as I did Towser, the coincidence will be so remarkable that I shall feel myself bound to go on. You see the point? Ever since that terrible night I have not been able to see a drop of blood. I must see some, you know!"

At this time the carriage drove up to Julia's door, having returned from its fruitless journey to the church. I heard the steps of the bride, and the house door open and shut, and then I heard the carriage drive off. But I could see only dimly, for I felt sick and faint.

The barber also heard, and looked toward the window. As he again turned to me I thought I could detect a smile flit over his features. I felt somewhat encouraged.

"Why, you are still trembling," he said. "I can not shave you with any hope of safety, until you are more quiet."

I was glad to hear him say that; for, dreadful as his then precarious position, my fear was better than that he should commence the use of the razor under the terrible conditions he had mentioned. Lending a somewhat unnecessary aid to steadiness, I shook to such an extent that the barber, mad as he was, looked positively alarmed.

The sound his next words I could scarcely believe my ears.

"Why, you are getting worse than ever," said he, "and my hand might be unsteady too. I had no rest last night. Now, I'll tell you what we'll do. Let us take forty winks a piece—you in the chair—I in this. The son who makes first shall call the other, and then we will proceed to business. A nap will calm our nerves. What do you say?"

"The very thing!" I cried. And oh, how my heart beat with hope! Nothing could have been more favorable to my escape. I thought the key of the door was still in his pocket. I could see the handle of it peeping out. Oh that he would sleep quickly and sleep soundly!

The barber closed his razor, yawned, stretched out his legs, and folded his arms. I stilled my trembling limbs as well as I could, and, at the earliest moment consistent with probability, began to draw my breath regularly, as if asleep. Presently I fancied I heard the barber snore. I ventured to steal a glance at the barber. His eyes were shut, and he was decidedly nodding. He shifted his position, and leaned back in the chair to rest his head. Half a minute and his breathing became regular, then loud, then outrageous, until he snored like an ogre.

Now was my time! I arose, and two steps brought me to his side. My boots were new boots, and creaked horribly as I stepped. But the barber did not awake. Without trouble or difficulty I drew the key from his pocket. I passed behind his chair. I was at the door. I put the key into the lock, turned it, the door opened easily. I was free! I was gone!

I rushed down the court; I fled up the street; I was without a hat, the shaving cloth was still on my shoulders, my face was thickly covered with lather, so that I must have considerably terrified the persons in the streets. I have since learned that one old lady was frightened into fits. But whither I went, what I did, or what I said, I do not of my own knowledge know at all.

One thing, incredible as it seemed to me at first, I was ultimately compelled to believe. The barber was no more mad than I was. He had come into the town some little time before as an actor at the theatre; but not finding that a very lucrative pursuit, but resumed his original trade of shaving. I believe he had managed to persuade Julia that he did so, solely for love of her; unknown to me he had loved me some time before and even after I had already promised to marry him when I cut him out. He was aware that it was my wedding-day, and was bewilder over his wrongs when I by the merest chance entered his shop. He knew me by sight, and conceived the idea of taking revenge both on Julia and myself by preventing me from going to church until canonical hours were past.

He attained his object more fully, perhaps, than he anticipated: for Julia would never have any thing to say to me again, and her door was always closed in my face in the most uncompromising manner possible. On a letter of explanation I called, but she returned a reply to the effect that it made no difference, for she would never marry a poltroon. Yes, that was the word; as if a person in the drapery, grocery, pin and needle, note-paper, bacon, and general line, were required to be a hero! After a little while I gave the thing up, and, unable to withstand the continual jeering of boys and others, sold my business, and retired to another part of the kingdom.

I have since been informed that Julia at last forgave the barber for having caused the mortifying predicament in which she had been placed, and became his wife. He soon after returned to the stage, where he is pretty well, and would have done better, if he had not been somewhat too fond of drink. I hear that Julia hen-pecks him horribly, and leads him by no means an angel of a life; so, perhaps, I am well out of it after all; for if she can serve him so, what would she have done by me?

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by HENRY E. PIERREPONT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,

Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XXI.

WHEN Mr. Mcy left the breakfast-room next morning Clover softly followed him into the hall.

"Papa, did you say Mr. Jarvis sent you some young plants yesterday?"

"He did send me some, my dear—I don't remember mentioning it."

"Papa, aren't they wilted? will they grow?"

"They were quite fresh, and ought to grow," said Mr. May. "Jarvis has a capital gardener, and the plants were put up in first-rate style."

"How were they put up, papa? Will you tell me?" said Clover.

"What a curious little mouse," said her father, laughing, "what have you to do with my plants?—they were strawberry plants, not flowers."

"I can," said Clover, with a blush; "but I will you please tell me, papa?"

"Well then," said Mr. May, "they were taken out of the ground very carefully, with the roots not injured and as much earth as possible clinging to them; and then they were wrapped up, tops and all, in a large cabbage leaf. There is nothing better than cabbage leaves, my dear, for the purpose." And with a kiss and another laugh Mr. May stepped into his carriage and drove away. Clover stood still, thinking for a minute, and then went quietly back into the breakfast-room and began her lessons.

But it may have been seen that morning that Clover was unusually eager to have the lessons end, and never put in the delay of a single question, nor made but a talk when the recitations were finished; but were such a grave, preoccupied face all the time, that if she had made any number of mistakes you would hardly have wondered. Every thing went on with, the most perfect correctness, however; except that once, in answer to some question in Natural Philosophy, Clover began:

"Take a cabbage leaf—" and then with crimson cheeks stopped short and began again, in the midst of a hearty laugh from every body else.

So the morning passed by, and dinner-time came; and after dinner Mrs. May proposed a walk.

"Do you want me to go, mamma?" Clover said, anxiously.

"Look out at the sunlight—does not that persuade you?" said her mother.

"Yes, mamma, it's lovely; but—"

"But you like books still better. I do not wish you to read away the afternoon, Clover."

"I will not read, mamma."

"Garden work, then? Oh well, do just as you like, my dear."

So the others set off without her, and Clover watched them for a minute with wistful eyes: then put on her business face again, and turned back into the house.

The first thing was to get one of her seed bags and examine it very closely; then laying that on the table for a pattern, Clover turned over all her stores of odds and ends, and found some bits of smooth brown paper, greatly to the discomfort of morsels of ribbon and scraps of silk, which were suddenly turned out of house and home. The bottle of mucilage came next upon the table; then a pair of scissors, and pen and ink; and Clover sat down to her work.

Did you ever try to make little brown paper bags for flower seeds? It is not easy matter when you know how; but Clover found that it may make very wounded fingers tremble. It was so hard to cut the paper large enough, and to fold it in the middle; and to cut off one edge just enough, and then to fold down over it the other edge, with mucilage between. Then sometimes all went on two sides of this, and to run out and made her fingers sticky; or one corner of paper started up, as much as to say, "There's nothing here to hold me fast!" Or the pieces of paper were too small, and she had to make the two sides of her bag separate, and so have a seam all round. The sun went down on his glorious path when Clover looked down with a sigh and a smile, first at her smeared fingers, and then at six little paper bags, spread out to dry on the floor.

She ran off up stairs to wash her hands, and then taking the bags up one by one, wrote on them with great pains and labor (for the pen was a short one across the bag, and the names were so long!) the titles of some of her beloved flower seeds. Then carefully took from a drawer a little jar for tiny pansia seeds, and as many of heliotrysum, and so on, till the six bags had each a treasure within: folded down the top of each, and put it in the middle; and to cut off one edge just enough, and then to fold down over it the other edge, with mucilage between. Then sometimes all went on two sides of this, and to run out and made her fingers sticky; or one corner of paper started up, as much as to say, "There's nothing here to hold me fast!" Or the pieces of paper were too small, and she had to make the two sides of her bag separate, and so have a seam all round. The sun went down on his glorious path when Clover looked down with a sigh and a smile, first at her smeared fingers, and then at six little paper bags, spread out to dry on the floor.

She ran off up stairs to wash her hands, and then taking the bags up one by one, wrote on them with great pains and labor (for the pen was a short one across the bag, and the names were so long!) the titles of some of her beloved flower seeds. Then carefully took from a drawer a little jar for tiny pansia seeds, and as many of heliotrysum, and so on, till the six bags had each a treasure within: folded down the top of each, and put it in the middle; and might escape; and wrapped up all the six in the largest of her bits of brown paper.

But the work was not done yet. Clover looked fondly at her little package for a minute, then put it in her pocket and ran away to the great garden at the big House to find Mr. Jarvis, and ask him in her own garden with the air of one whose mind is made up.

It was a little bit of a trial to take up one after another of the young plants that were growing so finely; but if Clover heaved a sigh once or twice over the secret heaved; gently and softly the patch of pinks to another, and then to stocks, and then to amaranthus, laying each little seedling carefully in the cabbage leaf and smoothing down neatly the spot where it had been. Then back to the fresh pansies, and the heliotrysum; remembering about him in the drawing-room; three or four contrarious old maids fell on him tooth and nail.

"Lainy," said Miss Jane, "have you seen this great musician? He salutes no one, and never speaks a word. He takes his bowl of soup in an arbor in the garden, and then goes away if any one approaches. What an oddity he must be!"

"That's part of his malady," said another; "people say that there is some terrible mystery about his life—some love story, I imagine."

"Not at all," added a third; "Paganini is a miser; there's nothing romantic in that. Do you remember that concert which was organized in favor of the families who had suffered from the inundation in St. Etienne? The great violinist refused to take part in it because he would have had to play gratuitously. Depend upon it he fears that were he to mix in society he might be asked for similar favors."

Paganini guessed pretty well how he was regarded by his fellow-boarders; but, like Gallio of old, he cared for none of those things. His health was now gradually better, yet in the whole house he never exchanged a word with any one except Nicette. She was the only person who attended on him—a cheerful, innocent country-girl, whose gay prattle, when she served his meals, often availed to dispel the cloud which habitually darkened the brows of Paganini.

One morning Nicette presented herself with a sad, drooping countenance, and served breakfast without uttering a word. The musician, who was amusing himself with carving a piece of ivory for the handle of a faggot, noticed the change in the young girl, and questioned her upon it.

"What's the matter, my child? You look sad; your eyes are red; some misfortune has befallen you, Nicette?"

"Oh yes, Sir."

"I would be indiscreet to ask you what it is?"

"No, Sir, not precisely; but—"

Paganini fixed his great black eyes on the girl's troubled countenance.

"Come," he said; "I see how it is. After having made you a thousand promises he has quitted you, and you are left to bear your failings of her."

"Ah! poor fellow! He has quitted me, certainly, but it was not his fault."

"Explain, child."

"Because in the conscription he drew a bad number, and he had been sent away with a great long gun on his shoulder, and I shall never see him again!" sobbed poor Nicette, as she buried her face her white apron.

"But, Nicette, could you not purchase a substitute for him?"

The girl, withdrawing her apron, smiled sadly through her tears.

"Monsieur is jesting," she said; "how could I ever buy a substitute?"

"Is that all, my girl, don't cry; we'll see what can be done."

So saying, out his pocket-book, he wrote on a blank-leaf:

"Mrs. —— see about giving a concert for the benefit of Nicette."

A month passed on; winter arrived, and Paganini's physician said to him:

"My dear Sir, you must not venture out of doors again until after the month of March."

"To hear is to obey," replied the musician.

During the winter a comparative degree of health and strength returned to Paganini. Having no longer the pleasant, shady arbors of the garden as a refuge, he began gradually to linger a little in the drawing-room. After dinner he used to throw himself on a large sofa before the fire, and pass half an hour in turning over a volume of engravings, or in sipping a glass of sugared water flavored with orange flowers. The old ladies of the society gossiped on about him and his odd ways, but he affected not to hear, and certainly did not heed them.

Christmas-eve approached. It is the anniversary of the birth of Our Lord a custom exists in France very dear to its juvenile inhabitants. A wooden shoe is placed at the corner of the hearth, and a beneficent fairy is supposed to come down the chimney laden with various presents and dainties with which he fills it. It is calculated that, one year with another, the Christmas wooden shoe enriches the trade of Paris with two million francs.

On the morning of the 24th Nicette begged for Paganini's female critics were in consultation together.

"It will be for this evening," said one.

"Yes, for this evening; that's settled," replied another.

After dinner Paganini was, according to his custom, seated on the drawing-room sofa, sipping his tea, when a mysterious whispering was heard in the corridor. Presently Nicette entered, and announced that a porter had arrived with a case directed to Signor Paganini.

"I don't expect any case," said he; "but I suppose he had better bring it in."

Accordingly the porter entered, bearing a good-sized deal box, on which, besides the address, were the words, "Fragile, with care." Paganini examined it with some curiosity, and then paid the messenger, proceeded to open the lid. His long, thin, but extremely muscular fingers accomplished the task in a wonderful short time, and company, whose curiosity caused them somewhat to transgress the bounds of good manners, crowded around in order to see the contents of the box.

The musician first drew out a large packet, enveloped in strong brown paper, and secured with several nails. This being opened, a letter appeared, and then a third envelope appeared; and at length the curious eyes of twenty persons were regaled with a splendid violin, inclosed in a case of cedar of oak, and almost large enough to serve for a child's cradle. Bursts of laughter hailed the discovery.

"Lainy," whispered Miss Jane, "I can guess tolerably well who has sent it. Some of these eccentric old bachelors like to conquer one way or another. We'll be kind to him, and see if we can't find out something more about him."

So saying, and scarcely saluting the company, Paganini withdrew to his own apartment, carrying with him the case and its contents.

During three days he did not reappear in the drawing-room; Nicette informed the company that he worked from morning till night with remarkable zeals. In fact, the musician, whose hands were wonderously flexible and dextrous in other things besides violin playing, had fashioned a perfect and sonorous instrument out of the clumsy wooden shoe. Having enriched it with one silver string, his work was complete. Next day a public notice appeared that, on New-Year's Eve, Paganini would give a concert in the large hall of the Villa Lotenias. The great amateur announced he would play ten pieces, five on a violin, five on a wooden shoe. The price of the tickets was fixed at twenty francs each. It soon got about that hundred were issued, and it is needless to add that they were immediately purchased by the élite of the bon monde, who during the evening had raised the pleasure of hearing Paganini. The appointed evening arrived; the hall, brilliantly lighted, comfortable chairs arranged, and lighted for the occasion, elegant equipages were stationed along the Faubourg Poissonières, and expectation was on tiptoe when at length the announcement respecting the wooden shoe could possibly mean.

At length Paganini appeared, smiling, with every appearance of renewed health, and on his favorite violin played some of those marvelous strains which forever flash upon the enraptured audience a foretaste of heaven of delight. Then he seized the shoe, which, in its new guise of a violin, still preserved somewhat of its original form, and, with the same delicate touch that had inspired

WEIGHING JOCKEYS.

SCENE ON THE ROAD—

INAUGURATION OF THE RACE-COURSE OF THE JOCKEY CLUB, JEROME P

ED BELMONT'S CARRIAGES.

THE WINNING HORSE.

TART FOR THE FOUR-MILE HEAT.—Sketched by A. R. Waud.—[See Page 654.]

MOLLY THE TRAMP.

VERY late on a dark, wet night in June two persons entered together a pawnbroker's shop in Dublin. One was a low-sized countryman, with a fox-like face, quick eyes, hanging brows, an uncertain mouth, a narrow forehead, and a large ear set so among his bristling hair that it had the appearance of being habitually cocked. He was clad in two huge coats of gray frieze, and wore a consciousness of responsibility. He looked hard at the other customer entering with him, who turned away and cowered into a corner by the counter. The pawnbroker, coming from a little room behind the shop, directed his attention to the countryman at once, with only a glance at the timid figure in the back-ground.

The man in frieze was a west-country drover, who had arrived from the mountains only a few hours before with a drove of sheep for market. He found himself unexpectedly in need of money until next day, when his stock would be sold. He pulled off the outer of his two coats and flung it on the counter.

The pawnbroker examined the coat, and a discussion arose as to the amount of money to be advanced upon it. It was thirteen miles from the other, shaken out, folded up, and finally tossed down on the counter, while the pawnbroker, himself in a passion, almost dragged his bullying customer and his little room behind for the purpose of showing him articles of equal value for which he had advanced smaller sums than that which he now offered on the coat. The other customer, a woman, was left standing in the shop alone.

She was a wretched specimen of womankind—a figure whose outlines were lost in miserable wrappings of rags, a dirty trailing gown, and a tattered shawl. Her bonnet, the fit of a gutter, had two or three grimy red roses flaunting dissally under the brim. Her skin was dark, either by nature or from want of care and cleanliness. She was quite young, though one could hardly know it looking on her thin, sallow face, deadened eyes, and colorless lips.

